Bathing next at the tirtha called Koti, he earns the merit of giving away a thousand cows. Having walked around Koti, he must go on to Jyeshtasthana. Looking at the image of Mahadeva there, the tirtha-yatri shines like the moon. There is a renowned well in that place, Bharatarishabha, in which are the four seas. He that bathes there, and with mind subdued, worships the gods and the ancestors, is cleansed of all his sins and attains to an exalted state.

Then, one should journey to the great Sringaverapura, where once Dasaratha's son Rama crossed the Ganga. Bathing in that tirtha, Mahabaho, one is exorcised of all one's sins. Bathing with subdued senses in the Ganga, while observing brahmacharya, one is washed of every sin, and also receives the punya of the Vajapeya.

After this, the pilgrim goes on to Mayuravata, consecrated to Mahadeva of awesome intelligence. Seeing the image of the God there, bowing down to him and walking around the place in pradakshina, one acquires the condition of Ganapatya. Bathing in Ganga at that tirtha, all one's sins are washed away.

Then, O Kshatriya, one should go on to Prayaga, whose praises have been sung by Rishis and where the gods dwell with Brahma at their head, the cardinal directions with their presiding deities, the Lokapalas, the Siddhas, the Pitrs adored by the worlds, the Maharishis – Sanatkumara and others, stainless Brahmarshis — Angiras and others, the Nagas, the Suparnas, the Siddhas, the Rivers, the Seas, the Gandharvas, the Apsaras, and the Lord Hari with Prajapati.

In that tirtha are three fiery caverns between which the Ganga, that foremost of tirthas, rushes. There in that place the world-purifying daughter of the Sun, Yamuna, celebrated across the three worlds, unites with the Ganga. The country between the Ganga and the Yamuna is regarded as the yoni, mons veneris, of the world, and Prayaga as the foremost point of that.

The tirthas Prayaga, Pratishtana, Kambala, Aswatara and Bhogavati are the sacrificial altars of the Creator. In those places, O Kshatriyottama, the Vedas and the Yagnas, in embodied forms, and the Rishis blessed with the wealth of asceticism, adore Brahma, and there the gods and kings of the world also celebrate their sacrifices. The learned however, say that of all these tirthas Prayaga is the most sacred, in fact, the foremost of all tirthas in the three worlds.

By going to that tirtha, by singing its praises, or by taking a little earth from it, one is purified of every sin. He who bathes in that confluence, celebrated the world over, acquires all the punya of the Rajasuya and the Aswamedha Yagnas. The gods themselves worship this tirtha.

If a man gives ever so little here, it increases, O Bhaarata, a thousandfold. Child, do not let the texts of the Veda, nor the opinions of men turn your mind from the desire to die at Prayaga. O son of the Kurus, the wise say that six hundred million and ten thousand tirthas exist at Prayaga. Bathing in the confluence of Ganga and Yamuna, one obtains the merit that attaches to the four kinds of knowledge and the merits also of those that are founded in the truth.

At Prayaga is the excellent tirtha of Vasuki, called Bhogavati. He that bathes in it, obtains the merit of the Aswamedha. There in the Ganga is also the tirtha famed throughout the three worlds, called Hamsaprapatana, which confers the merit of ten Aswamedhas.

O Kurunandana, wherever a person bathes in the Ganga, he earns merit equal to that of a visit to Kurukshetra. An exception, however, is made in regard of Kanakhala, while the punya attaching to Prayaga is the greatest. Having committed a hundred sins, he that bathes in the Ganga, has all his sins washed away by the waters, even as fuel is consumed by fire.

It has been said that in the Satya-yuga all the tirthas were sacred; in the Treta, Pushkara alone was holy; in Dwapara, Kurukshetra; and in the Kali-yuga, the Ganga alone is sacred. In Pushkara, one should practise austerities; in Mahalaya, one should perform charity; in the Malaya mountains, one should ascend the funeral pyre; and in Bhrigutunga, one should renounce one's body by forgoing food.

Bathing in Pushkara, in Kurukshetra, in the Ganga and in the confluence of the Ganga and the Yamuna, one sanctifies seven generations of one's vamsa up and down. He that recites the name of the Ganga is purified; he that sees her, receives prosperity; while he that bathes in her and drinks of her waters sanctifies seven generations of his race, above and below himself.

As long as one's bones lie touching the waters of the Ganga, so long does one live regarded in swarga, even as one lives in heaven in consequence of the merit he earns by pious pilgrimages to all the sacred tirthas and other holy places. There is no tirtha like the Ganga, there is no god like Kesava, and there are none superior to Brahmanas – this has been said even by Brahma, the Grandsire.

The land through which the Ganga flows must be regarded as a sacred asrama, and any place on the banks of the Ganga should be regarded as one favourable to the attainment of ascetic success.

One should narrate this description of the tirthas only to the regenerate, to those that are pious, to one's son and friends and disciples and dependants. This narrative, without a rival, is blessed and holy and leads to heaven. Sacred, enlivening and sanctifying, it bestows merit and high worth. Destructive of every sin, it is a mystery that the great Rishis cherish with care. By reciting it in the midst of Brahmanas, one is cleansed of every sin, and ascends to paradise.

Truly, this description of the tirthas is auspicious and heaven-giving and sacred indeed; ever blessed as it is, it destroys one's enemies; foremost of all accounts, it sharpens the intellect. By reading this narrative the sonless obtains sons, the destitute obtains riches, the Kshatriya conquers the whole world, the Vaisya comes by great wealth, the Sudra has all his desires fulfilled, and the Brahmana crosses the ocean of samsara.

Purifying himself, he that listens daily to the merits of the different tirthas, recollects the incidents of many previous births and rejoices in swargaloka. Of the tirthas that have been named here, some are easily accessible, while others are difficult of access. But he who is inspired with the desire of beholding all the tirthas, should visit them even in imagination.

Wanting to obtain punya, the Vasus, the Sadhyas, the Adityas, the Maruts, the Aswins, and the Rishis equal to the Devas, all bathed in these tirthas. O Kuru, observe the vows I have explained, and with subdued senses, visit these tirthas, increasing your punya. Because of their pure senses, their belief in God, and their knowledge of the Vedas, pious men are able to visit these holy tirthas.

O Kauravya, he who does not observe vows, he whose mind is not conrolled, he that is impure, he that is a thief, and he that is of crooked mind, does not bathe in any tirthas. You always keep dharma, and are of pure character. By your virtue, you have always gratified your father, your grand-father, and great-grand-fathers, and the gods with Brahma at their head, and the Rishis also.

O Bhishma, who resembles Vasava, you will attain to the world of the Vasus, and also find eternal fame on earth!'"

"Narada continues, 'With this, the illustrious Rishi Pulastya, well-pleased, bid Bhishma farewell and vanished before his eyes. And Bhishma, O tiger among men, well knowing the import of the Shastras, wandered over the world at the behest of Pulastya. Bhishma ended his great pilgrimage to all these tirthas, which destroy every sin, at Prayaga.

The man that ranges the earth in accordance with these injunctions, obtains the highest fruit of a hundred horse-sacrifices and earns salvation thereafter. O son of Pritha, you will acquire punya consisting of the eight attributes, even as Bhishma, foremost of the Kurus, did of yore. And since you will lead these ascetics to those tirthas, your merit will be much greater.

These tirthas are infested by Rakshasas, and no one but you, O Kauravya, can go to them. He who rises early and recites this narrative by the Devarishis on the subject of the tirthas becomes free from all sins. Those best of Rishis, Valmiki, and Kasyapa, and Atreya, and Kundajatara, and Viswamitra, and Gautama, and Asita, and Devala, and Markandeya, and Galava, and Bharadwaja, and Vasishtha, and the Muni Uddalaka, and Saunaka with his son, and Vyasa, best of Sages, and Durvasas, foremost of Munis, and Jabali of great austerities – all these lustrous Rishis, endowed with the wealth of tapasya, are waiting for you. Mighty king, meet with these by undertaking a tirtha-yatra to all the tirthas.

A great Rishi of immeasurable tejas, Lomasa, will come to you. Follow him, and me, and visit the tirthas one by one. By this, you will acquire great fame, even like King Mahabhisha! O tiger among kings, even as the virtuous Yayati and King Pururava, you blaze forth with your own virtue. Like King Bhagiratha and the illustrious Rama, you shine among kings even as the Sun himself. And you are, Maharajan, celebrated in the world even as Manu or Ikshvaku, or the famed Puru or Vainya!

As in days of yore, the slayer of Vritra, after burning all his enemies, ruled the three worlds, his mind freed from anxiety, so will you rule your people, after killing all your enemies. And, O you of eyes like lotus leaves, having conquered the earth according to the customs of your varna, you will have renown by your dharma, fame even like Kartaviryarjuna.'"

Vaisampayana continued, "O great King Janamejaya, having comforted and advised the monarch thus, the illustrious Rishi Narada bids him farewell and vanishes before Yudhishtira's eyes. And the virtuous Yudhishtira, reflecting upon what Narada Muni said, begins to describe to his Brahmanas and Rishis the great spiritual merit attaching to the tirthas."

Vaisampayana continued, "Having ascertained the opinion of his brothers, and of the intelligent Narada, Yudhishtira says to Dhaumya, who was even like the Pitamaha himself, 'I have sent Purushavyaghra Jishnu away to acquire the Devastras. Arjuna, whose prowess can never be baffled, whose arms are long and his intelligence immeasurable — that hero of immense ability and a master of weapons, who is like the peerless Vasudeva himself, is devoted to me.

O Brahmana, I know both Krishna and Arjuna, those destroyers of enemies, endowed with untold prowess, even as the puissant Vyasa knows them. I know Vasudeva and Dhananjaya to be none else than Vishnu himself, possessed of the six gunas. And this is what Narada also knows, for he has always spoken so to me. I also know the two to be the Rishis Nara and Narayana.

I have sent Arjuna on this mission, knowing that he will accomplish it. Not inferior to Indra and entirely capable, I have sent that son of a god to meet the king of the Devas and to receive astras from him.

Bhishma and Drona are Atirathas. Kripa and the son of Drona are invincible; Dhritarashtra's son has made these mighty warriors the commanders of his army. All of them are versed in the Vedas, they are heroic, and possess of the knowledge of every weapon. Endowed with great strength, they always want to face Arjuna in battle.

And the Sutaputra Kana is also a mighty warrior, a master of celestial astras. As far as the swiftness of his missiles is concerned, he owns the strength of Vayu. Himself a fire, his arrows are like great tongues of flame; the sound his left hand cased in leather makes, when he looses these shafts, are like those flames crackling. The dust of the battlefield is the smoke of the fire. Spurred on by the son of Dhritarashtra, even as the wind urges agni, Kama is like the all-consuming apocalypse at the end of the Yuga, which Death himself sends. He will consume my troops like straw.

Only that awesome thunderhead called Arjuna, helped along by Krishna like a powerful wind, with devastras its fierce lightning, the white steeds the rows of white cranes coursing below it, and the unbearable Gandiva the rainbow ahead, can extinguish the conflagration that is Kama with arrowy showers loosed with unflagging consistency.

I have no doubt that that conqueror of hostile cities, Bibhatsu, will acquire all the celestial astras, with their awesome might and energy, from Indra himself. I believe that Arjuna by himself is equal to all the great heroes that oppose us; otherwise, we could never hope to vanquish them.

We shall see Arjuna, Parantapa, entirely armed with devastras, for once he undertakes a task he never droops under its weight.

However, without him here in the Kamyaka, Draupadi and we can find no peace. So, tell us of some other vana, which is sacred and full of delight, where game and fruit abound, where pious Munis live in tapasya, and where we can pass our days waiting as eagerly for mighty Arjuna as the Chataka birds do the gathering of rainclouds. Tell us of some asramas; tell us where we can find lakes and streams and beautiful mountains.

O Brahmana, I cannot stay on in this Kamyaka without Arjuna. All of us want to leave and go elsewhere.'"

Vaisampayana said, "Seeing the Pandavas so anxious and dejected, Dhaumya, who resembles Brihaspati, comforts them, 'Bharatarishabha, sinless one, listen to me and I will tell you about some holy asramas and lands and tirthas and mountains of which the great Brahmanas approve. Listen to me, yourself, your brothers and Drupada's daughter, and you will find relief from your sorrow. Son of Pandu, by merely hearing of these places, you will acquire punya; by visiting them, you will gain merit a hundred times greater, O best of men!

First, O King, I will, as far as I recall, speak of the beautiful eastern country, much adored by Rajarishis. In that direction, O Bhaarata lies a place called Naimisha which is regarded by the Devas. There, in that land, are several tirthas belonging to the gods. There, too, flows the sacred and beautiful Gomati, worshipped by Devarishis; and there, as well, stands the sacrificial stake of Surya.

In that quarter is also that best of hills, Gaya, and much regarded by royal Sages. On that hill, is the auspicious lake called Brahmasara, which is adored by celestial Rishis. The ancients say that one should wish for many sons, so that at least one among them might visit Gaya, perform the Aswamedha or give away a Nila bull, and thereby deliver ten generations of his clan, up and down.

There, O Yudhishtira, is a great river and a particularly auspicious spot called Gayasira. In Gayasira is a nyagrodha, a banyan tree, which the Brahmanas call the Eternal banyan: for, food that is offered there to the Pitrs becomes eternal, O Mahatman! The great river that flows by the tree is known by the name of Phalgu, and its waters are most sacred.

Bharatarishabha, in that place is also the Kausiki, whose basin abounds in various fruit and roots, and where Viswamitra, his wealth his tapasya, acquired Brahmanahood.

Towards that direction also is the Ganga, on whose banks Bhagiratha performed many sacrifices with profuse gifts to Brahmanas.

They say that in the country of Panchala there is a forest called Utpala, where Viswamitra of Kausika's race performed sacrifices with his son, and where, seeing the relics of Viswamitra's superhuman power, Rama, the son of Jamadagni, recited the praises of his ancestry. At Kamyaka, Kausika's son once quaffed the Soma rasa with Indra. Then, abandoning the Kshatriya varna, he said, "I am a Brahmana!"

In that quarter, O hero, is the confluence of Ganga and Yamuna, which is celebrated the world over. Holy and sin-destroying, that tirtha is much reverenced by the Rishis. It is here that the soul of all things, Brahma the Grandsire, in olden days, performed his sacrifice; and it is for this, O lord of the Bhaaratas, that the place has come to be called Prayaga.

In this direction, O foremost among kings, lies the beautiful asrama of Agastya, and the forest called Tapasa, which many Rishis adorn. And there also is the great tirtha called Hiranyabindu on the Kalanjara hills, and that best of mountains called Agastya, which is sacred and auspicious.

In that quarter, O scion of the Kurus, is the mountain called Mahendra, sacred to the illustrious Rama of the Bhrigus. There, Kaunteya, the Grandsire performed sacrifices of yore. There, O Yudhishtira, the sacred Bhagiratha enters a lake and there also, O King, is that holy river, the punya-giving Brahmasara, on whose banks live men whose sins have been washed away, whose very sight bestows great grace.

In that direction, also, lies the high-souled Matanga's fine asrama, Kedara, which is holy and auspicious and renowned through the world. There is also the mountain called Kundoda, so delightful and abounding in fruit and roots and waters, where Nala, king of the Nishadhas, slaked his thirst and rested a while.

In that quarter, also, is the delighltful Deva-vana, graced by ascetics; there, too, are the rivers Bahuda and Nanda on the mountain's crest. Mighty king, I have described to you all the tirthas and other sacred places in the eastern quarter.

Hear now of the tirthas, and rivers and mountains and holy places in the other three quarters.'"

"Dhaumya continues, 'Listen, O Bhaarata, and I will now I tell you about the holy tirthas of the south. In that quarter flows the sacred and auspicious Godavari, full of crystalline water, abounding in tapovanas and frequented by ascetics.

In the south also are the rivers Vena and Bhimarathi, both of which destroy sin and fear, and their banks abounding in birds and deer, and graced with the hermitages of Munis. In that part, too, O Bharatarishabha, is the tirtha of the Rajarishi Nriga – the river Payoshni, enchanting and brimfull of water and visited by Brahmanas. There the lustrous Markandeya, of lofty ascetic merit sang the praises, in verse, of King Nriga's line.

We have heard what happened to King Nriga while performing a yagna at the auspicious Varaha tirtha on the Payoshni. Indra became intoxicated by drinking the Soma rasa during the sacrifice, and the Brahmanas, with the gifts they received. The water of the Payoshni, taken up in a vessel or flowing along the ground, or as spray blown by the wind, can cleanse a person from whatever sins he may commit until the the day of his death.

Higher than heaven itself, and pure, and created and given by the Trisulin, in that tirtha is an image of Mahadeva, seeing which a mortal attains to Sivaloka. Placing on a scale Ganga and the other rivers with their waters on one side, and on the other the Payoshni, in my opinion the latter would outweigh all the other tirthas in terms of punya.

Then, O Bharatottama, upon the mountain called Varuna-strotasa is the auspicious vana Mathara, with its plenitude of fruit and roots, and containing a sacrificial stake. In the land north of the Praveni, and around the holy asrama of Kanva, are many tapovanas of Rishis.

And, O child, in the tirtha called Surparaka are two sacrificial platforms of the illustrious Jamadagni, known as Pashana and Punaschandra. And, O son of Kunti, in that place is the tirtha Asoka, also with an abundance of hermits' tapovanas.

And, O Yudhishtira, in the country of the Pandyas are the tirthas named Agastya and Varuna. Bull among men, there, amongst the Pandyas, is the tirtha called the Kumaris.

Listen, O son of Kunti, I will now describe Tamraparni. In that asrama, the Devas, impelled by the desire of obtaining salvation, performed tapasya. In that country, also, is the lake of Gokarna, celebrated across the three worlds, which is full of cool, pure water, and which is auspicious, and can bestow great punya. That lake is extremely difficult of access to men of unpurified hearts and souls.

Near that tirtha is the asrama of Agastya's disciple, the mountain Devasabha, which abounds in trees and grass, and fruit and roots. And there also is the Vaidurya mountain, delightful, replete with gemstones and which bestows great spiritual merit. There on that mountain is the hermitage of Agastya, rich with fruit and roots and water.

Lord of men, I will now describe the tirthas, asramas, and holy rivers and lakes that belong to the Surashtra country. O Yudhishtira, the Brahmanas say that on the sea-coast is the Chamasodbheda, and also Prabhasa, that tirtha which is highly regarded by the gods. There also is the tirtha called Pindaraka, frequented by ascetics and which can bestow great punya.

In that region is a mighty hill named Ujjayanta, which is conducive to quick success, about which Devarishi Narada of great intelligence has composed an ancient sloka. By performing tapasya on the sacred hill of Ujjayanta in Surashtra, which abounds in birds and animals, a person becomes honoured in heaven.

Dwaravati is also in this region, producing great merit, where Madhusudana dwells, who is the Ancient One, in embodied form, and the Sanatana Dharma. Brahmanas versed in the Vedas, and men who know the Atma Vidya say that the illustrious Krishna is eternal Virtue. Govinda is said to be the purest of all pure things, the most righteous of the righteous and the most auspicious of the auspicious.

In all the three worlds, He of eyes like lotus-leaves is the God of gods, and is eternal. He is the pure soul and the Life of life, the Supreme Brahman and the lord of all. That slayer of Madhu, Hari of inconceivable soul, dwells in Dwaravati!'

Dhaumya continues, 'O Bhaarata, I will describe to you the holy tirthas, which lie in the west, in the land of the Anartas. There, in a westward course the sacred river Narmada flows, graced by priyangu and mango trees, and garlanded with thickets of bamboo. All the tirthas and rivers and woods and foremost of mountains that are in the three worlds, all the gods with the Grandsire, along with the Siddhas, the Rishis and the Charanas, Kurusthama, always come to bathe in the sacred waters of the Narmada.

And I have heard that the holy asrama of the Muni Visravas once stood there, and that there was born the Lord of treasures, Kubera, who has men for his vahanas. There also is that best of hills, the auspicious Vaidurya peak with abundant trees that are evergreen and always graced with flowers and fruit. Lord of the earth, on the top of that mountain is a tank laden with full-blown lotus, to which the Devas and the Gandharvas come. Many are the wonders, O mighty King, that can be seen on that holy mountain, which is like swarga itself and which is visited by celestial Rishis.

There, O subduer of hostile cities, is the sacred river called Viswamitra, which belongs to the Rajarishi of that name and which teems, O Rajan, with tirthas. It was on the banks of this river that Yayati, the son of Nahusha, fell from heaven among the virtuous, and also obtained once more the eternal regions of the righteous.

In this region also are the famed lake called Punya, the mountain called Mainaka, and that other mountain Asita, rich with fruit and roots. And here also is the hermitage of Kakshasena, and O Yudhishtira, the asrama of Chyavana, also, which is famed in every country, O son of Pandu. In that place, O noble one, men attain to moksha without performing severe austerities.

Here, also, Maharajan, is the land called Jambumarga, inhabited by birds and deer, where Sages of self-restraint dwell, O foremost of those that have subdued their senses.

Next, lie the exceedingly sacred Ketumala and Medhya, always graced by Munis, and, O lord of earth, Gangadwara, and the renowned vana of Saindhava, most holy, where the regenerate ones dwell. Here also is the celebrated lake of Brahma, called Pushkara, the favourite abode of the Vaikanasas, and Siddhas and Rishis.

Moved by the desire of having its protection, the Creator sang this verse at Pushkara, O lord of the Kurus and most virtuous of men – If a man of pure soul ever imagines a pilgrimage to the Pushkara, he is purged of all his sins and rejoices in swarga!'

Dhaumya continues, 'O tiger among kings, I will now describe the tirthas and sacred places that lie in the north. Do you, O exalted one, listen to me attentively. By hearing this narration, O Kshatriya, one acquires a reverential frame of mind, which is conducive to great good.

In those parts, flows the most sacred Saraswati, abounding in tirthas and her banks easy of descent. There, also, O son of Pandu, is the impetuous ocean-going Yamuna, and the tirtha called Plakshavatarana, which bestows high merit and prosperity. It was there that the Brahmanas bathed after having performed the Saraswata Yagna.

Sinless one, in the famed celestial tirtha called Agni-siras, which generates great punya, the King Sahadeva once performed a sacrifice, after measuring out the sacrificial ground by a throw of the Samya. It is for this reason, Yudhishtira, that Indra sang the praises of Sahadeva in verses, which are still current in this world, and recited by the Dvijas – On the Yamuna Sahadeva worshipped the sacrificial fire, with gifts in a hundred thousands to Brahmanas.

There, too, the illustrious king, the imperial Bharata, performed thirty-five horse-sacrifices.

O child, I have heard that Sarabhanga once used to fully gratify the desires of the Brahmanas. In this region is his celebrated asrama, which produces great merit. In that land also, O son of Pritha, is the river Saraswati, which is ever worshipped by the gods, where, in elder days, the Balakhilyas, O great king, performed sacrifices.

In the northern region, also, O Yudhishtira, is the renowned river Drishadwati, which bestows great punya. Then, O chief of men, are Nyagrodhakhya, and Panchalya, and Punyaka and Dalbhyaghosha, and Dalbhya, which are, O son of Kunti, the sacred resort in this world of illustrious Anantayasas of excellent vows and great energy, and which are celebrated over the three worlds.

Here, too, O lord of men, the illustrious Etavarna and Avavarana, versed in the Vedas, learned in Vedic lore, and proficient in the knowlegde of Vedic rites, performed sacrifices of great merit, O king of the Bhaaratas.

Here in the north, is also Visakhayupa to which, in days of yore, came the Devas with Varuna and Indra, and performed tapasya. And that is why the place is so eminently auspicious.

Here, also, is Palasaka, where the great and lustrous and most blessed Rishi Jamadagni performed sacrifices, and all the great rivers, in their embodied forms, each bringing their own holy waters, stood surrounding that best of sages. And there also, O king, Viswavasu, Agni himself, at seeing that Mahatmans initiation, sang this sloka – The rivers, coming to the illustrious Jamadagni, who was sacrificing to the gods, gratified the Brahmanas with offerings of honey.

O Yudhishtira, the place where Ganga rushes past, cleaving that king of mountains, which is frequented by Gandharvas and Yakshas and Rakshasas and Apsaras, and inhabited by hunters, and Kinnaras, is called Gangadwara. Sanatkumara regards that place visited by Brahmarshis, as also the tirtha Kanakhala that is near it, as being sacred.

There, as well, is the mountain named Puru to which great Rishis come, and where Pururavas was born, and Bhrigu performed tapasya, for which that asrama has become known as Bhrigutunga.

Near that peak is the sacred and extensive Badari, most auspicious asrama, famed over the three worlds, of Him, O Bharatarishabha, who is the Present, the Past and the Future, who is called Narayana and Lord Vishnu, who is eternal and the best of purushas, and who is pre-eminently illustrious.

Near Badari, the cool current of Ganga was once warm, and her banks there were covered with golden sands. There the Devas and Rishis of high fortune and great effulgence, approach the divine Lord Narayana, always, and worship him. All the universe, with all its tirthas and other holy places, is there where the divine and eternal Narayana, the Supreme soul, dwells, for he is Punya, he is the Parabrahman; he is the tirtha, he is the asrama; he is the First, he is the foremost of gods, and he is the great Lord of all creatures. He is eternal, he is the great Creator, and he is the highest state of blessedness.

Learned men, versed in the scriptures, attain to great happiness by knowing him.

In that place are the Devarishis, the Siddhas, and, indeed, all the Rishis, where the slayer of Madhu dwells, that primeval Deity and mighty Yogin. Let no doubt enter your heart that this place is the first of all holy places.

These, O lord of the earth, are the tirthas and other sacred places in the world. These are all visited by the Vasus, the Sadhyas, the Adityas, the Marutas, the Aswins and the illustrious Rishis who resemble the celestials themselves. By journeying, O son of Kunti, to those places, with your Brahmanas and ascetics, and with your blessed brothers, you will be set free from fear!' says Dhaumya."

Vaisampayana continued, "O son of the Kurus, even as Dhaumya speaks, Rishi Lomasa of great tejas arrives there; and Yudhishtira, with his followers and his Brahmanas sits around that most righteous Sage, even as the celestials in heaven do around Indra. And having received him with reverence, Dharmaraja Yudhishtira enquires after the reason of his arrival, and the object of his wanderings.

Well-pleased with his welcome, the illustrious Muni replies in sweet words which delight the Pandavas, 'Travelling at will, O Kaunteya, over all the realms, I came to Indra's abode and saw the lord of the Devas there. There, I saw your heroic brother, who can wield the bow with both hands, seated on the same throne with Sakra. Seeing Partha in the lofty place, I was greatly astonished, O tiger among men.

Indra then said to me, "Go, Lomasa, to the sons of Pandu." At his behest, as also that of the noble Arjuna, I have come swiftly here to you, wanting to see you and your younger brothers. Child, I will relate something that will please you greatly, O son of Pandu. Listen to it, O king, with Krishnaa and the Rishis that are with you.

Bharatarishabha, Partha has got that peerless weapon from Rudra for which you sent him on his journey. That fierce astra, the Brahmasira, which arose after the Amrita, and which Rudra once gained through stern tapasya. Arjuna now has that astra, along with the mantras to loose and withdraw it, and the rites for expiation and revival.

Yudhishtira, Arjuna of immeasurable prowess has also acquired Vajras and Dandas and other celestial weapons from Yama and Kubera and Varuna and Indra. He has also music, both vocal and instrumental, thoroughly, and dancing and the art of the proper recitation of the Sama, from Vishwavasu's son. And having thus acquired weapons and mastered the Gandharva Veda, your third brother lives happily in Devaloka.

Listen now Yudhishtira to the message of Indra. He commanded me, "You will go to the world of men. O best of Brahmanas, tell Yudhishtira that I said, 'Your brother Arjuna will soon return to you, having acquired the astras and also having accomplished a great deed for the Devas, which they themselves cannot accomplish. Meanwhile, devote yourself to sannyasa, along with your brothers. There is nothing superior to asceticism, and it is through sannyasa that a person achieves great results.

And, O Bharatarishabha, I well know that Kama is endowed with great ardour and energy and strength and prowess, all incapable of being baffled. Well do I know that, skilled in fierce battle, he has no rival in war; that he is a mighty bowman, a hero who is a master of great weapons and cased in the best mail. Well do I know that that lofiy son of Aditya resembles Siva's son Kartikeya himself.

I also well know the awesome natural prowess of the broad-shouldered Arjuna. In battle, Kama is not even a sixteenth part of Pritha's son. And as for the fear of Kama which is in your heart, O Parantapa, I will dispel that when Savyasachin leaves Devaloka.

As for your intention, Kshatriya, to set out on a pilgrimage to the tirthas, Maharishi Lomasa will speak to you about that. And whatever that regenerate Sage says to you about the great merits of sannyasa and the tirthas, you must receive with respect and not otherwise,' said the Lord Indra," Lomasa says.

Lomasa continues, "Listen now, O Yudhishtira, to what Dhananjaya said – 'Cause my brother Yudhishtira to attend to the practice of dharma, which leads to prosperity. Blessed with the wealth of asceticism, you are conversant with the highest dharma, with ascetic austerities of every kind, with the eternal duties of kings blessed with prosperity, and the high and sanctifying merit that men obtain from the tirthas. Persuade my brothers, the sons of Pandu, to acquire the punya attaching to the tirthas. With all your soul persuade the king to visit the tirthas and to give away kine.'

This is what Arjuna said to me. Indeed he also said, 'Protected by you, let Yudhishtira visit all the tirthas. You must also protect him from Rakshasas, watch over him in inaccessible regions and upon rugged mountain breasts. And as Dadhichi protected Indra, and Angiras protected the Sun, so must you, O Dvijottama, protect the sons of Kunti from demons. Along the way are many Rakshasas, big as mountain-cliffs, but with your protection, these will not be able to approach the sons of Kunti.'

Obeying the command of Indra and the request of Arjuna, and also safeguarding you from all danger, I will come with you on your pilgrimage. I have visited the tirthas twice before, O Kuru, and with you I will go to them a third time.

O Yudhishtira, Manu and other Rajarishis of great deeds journeyed to the tirthas. Indeed, a tirtha-yatra can dispel all fear. They that are crooked-minded, who do not have their minds under control, who are ignorant and perverse, do not, O Kauravya, bathe in tirthas. But you are ever virtuous and conversant with dharma and firm in keeping your promises. You will certainly free yourself from samsara, for, O Pandava, you are even like King Bhagiratha, or Gaya, or Yayati, or any one, O son of Kunti, that is like them."

Yudhishtira replies, 'I am so overwhelmed with delight, O Brahmana, that I cannot find words to answer you. Who can be more fortunate than he who is remembered even by the lord of the Devas? Who can be more fortunate than he who has been favoured with your company, who has Dhananjaya for a brother, and who is thought of by Vasava himself?

As for what you say, illustrious one, about a tirtha yatra, my mind had already been made up at what Dhaumya said to me. O Brahmana, I will set out at whatever hour you may be pleased to appoint, on the pilgrimage. This is my firm resolve!'

Lomasa then says to Yudhishtira, who has made up his mind to go on the yatra, 'O mighty king, be light in your retinue, for so you will travel more easily.'

Yudhishtira then says, 'Let those mendicants and Brahmanas and Yogis that cannot bear hunger and thirst, the fatigues of travel and toil, and the severity of winter, desist from coming with us. Let those Brahmanas also not come that live on sweetmeats, and they also that desire cooked food that is sucked or drunk, as well as meat. And let those also remain behind that are dependent on cooks.

Let those citizens that have followed me from loyalty, and whom I have hitherto suppported, go back to King Dhritarashtra. He will give them succour and allowances. If, however, that king refuses to grant them proper allowances, the king of the Panchalas will, for my satisfaction and welfare, surely maintain them.'

And now, though stricken with grief, the citizens and the prinicipal Brahmanas and Yatis set out for Hastinapura, and out of affection for Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, the royal son of Ambika receives them properly, and gratifies them with proper allowances.

And the royal son of Kunti, with only a small band of Brahmanas, stays for three nights in Kamyaka, consoled by Lomasa."

Vaisampayana said, "The Brahmanas, who have been living with him in the forest, see the son of Kunti about to set out on his tirtha yatra, approach him, O King, and say, 'You are about to set out on your journey to the sacred tirthas, along with your brothers and the Rishi Lomasa. O King, O son of Pandu, take us with you, for without you we will never be able to visit them at any time. Surrounded by dangers and difficult of access, they are infested by beasts of prey.

Those tirthas, O lord of men, are inaccessible to small bands of men. Greatest among bowmen, your brothers are always valiant; and with your protection, we also wish to visit the sacred places. Help us also, O lord of the earth, to acquire the punya of the tirthas. Protected by your valour, let us, as well, be cleansed of all our sins by visiting the sacred fords and bathing in their waters.

Bathing in the tirthas, O Bhaarata, you will certainly gain the realms so difficult of acquisition, which only Kartavirya and Ashtaka, the Rajarishi Lomapada and the imperial and heroic Bharata earned for themselves. Rajan, we want to behold Prabhasa and the other tirthas, Mahendra and the other mountains, Ganga and the other rivers, and Plaksha and the other giant trees.

If, O lord of men, you have any regard for Brahmanas, do our bidding; you will surely gain prosperity from this. Mahabaho, the tirthas swarm with Rakshasas that ever obstruct ascetic penances. It falls to you to protect us from them. Watched over by Lomasa and taking us with you, go to all the tirthas of which Dhaumya and the wise Narada spoke, as also to all those of which the celestial Lomasa, blessed with great ascetic wealth, told; and by this, be cleansed of all your sins.'

Thus addressed respectfully by them, the king, that bull amongst the sons of Pandu, surrounded by his heroic brothers led by Bhima, with tears of joy in his eyes, says to all those ascetics, 'Let it be so.'

So, at Lomasa's behest and Dhaumya's urging, that best of the Pandavas, his soul perfectly restrained, resolves to set out, along with his brothers and Draupadi of faultless features. Just then, the blessed Vyasa, as also Parvata and Narada, all of lofty wisdom, come to Kamyaka to meet the son of Pandu. Seeing them, Yudhishtira worships them with proper rites.

Thus worshipped by the king, those blessed ones say, 'O Yudhishtira, O Bhima, and you twins, banish all evil thoughts from your minds. Purify your hearts and then set out for the tirthas. The Brahmanas have said that the observance of regulations for the body are called earthly vows, while efforts to purify the heart, so that it may be free from evil thoughts, are called spiritual vows.

O King, the mind that is free from all evil thoughts is most pure. Purifying yourselves, therefore, harbouring only friendly feelings for all, go and see the tirthas. Observing earthly vows with your bodies and purifying your minds through spiritual vows, obtain all the fruit, as told to you, of pilgrimages.'

Saying, 'So be it,' the Pandavas, with Krishnaa, have those celestial and human Rishis perform the customary propitiatory rituals. And having worshipped the feet of Lomasa and Dwaipayana and Narada and the divine Rishi Parvata, and accompanied by Dhaumya as also the ascetics that had been living with them in the forest, the Pandavas set out on the day following the full moon of Agrahayana in which the constellation Pushya is ascending.

Dressed in bark and hides, and with matted locks on their heads, they are all cased in impenetrable mail and armed with swords. And, O Janamejaya, the heroic sons of Pandu, with quivers and arrows and swaords and other weapons, and accompanied by Indrasena and other attendants, with fourteen and one chariots, a number of cooks and servants of other classes, set out with their faces turned towards the east!

"Yudhishtira says, 'O best of Devarishis, I do not think that I am without merit. Yet I am afflicted with so much sorrow that there never was a king like me. I think, however, that my enemies have no good in them, nor even any dharma. Then why, O Lomasa, do they prosper in this world?"

Lomasa says, 'Do not grieve, O son of Pritha, that sinful men often do prosper as a consequence of the sins they commit. A man may be seen to prosper by his sins, obtain good therefrom and vanquish his enemies. However, destruction overtakes him to his very roots.

O King, I have seen many Daityas and Danavas prosper through sin but I have also seen doom overtake them. O exalted one, I have seen all this in the Krita Yuga.

The Devas practised dharma, while the Asuras abandoned it. The gods visited the tirthas, while the demons did not. And at first the sinful Asuras were possessed by pride; pride begot vanity and vanity begot wrath. And from wrath there arose every kind of evil propensity, and from these sprang shamelessness. And in consequence of shamelessness, good conduct disappeared from amongst them; and because they had become shameless and devoid of virtue and good conduct and virtuous vratas, forgiveness and prosperity and morality forsook them in no time.

And then, O King, prosperity sought the Devas, while adversity found the Asuras; and when the Daityas and the Danavas, deprived of good sense by pride, were possessed by adversity, Kali also sought to possess them. And overwhelmed by pride, and destitute of rites and sacrifices, and devoid of reason and feeling, and their hearts full of vanity, destruction soon overtook them. Covered with infamy, the Daityas were quickly exterminated.

However, the Devas, who were virtuous in their practices, going to the seas, the rivers, the lakes and the holy spots, cleansed themselves of all sins, O son of Pandu, through ascetic penances and sacrifices and gifts and blessings, and found prosperity. And because the gods always performed sacrifices and holy deeds abandoning every practice that was evil, and visited the tirthas, they acquired great good fortune.

Be guided by this, O King; and you also, with your brothers, bathe in the tirthas, for then you will regain prosperity once more. This is the eternal road. As King Nriga and Sibi and Ausinara and Bhagiratha and Vasumanas and Gaya and Puru and Pururavas performed tapasya and, visiting the tirthas, touched sacred waters and saw illustrious Rishis, gained fame and sanctity and merit and wealth, so will you find fortune that is great. And as Ikshvaku with his sons, friends and followers, as Muchukunda and Mandhatri and King Marutta, as the Devas, through the power of asceticism and the Devarishis also, all gained fame, so will you also find great celebrity. The son of Dhritarashtra, on the other hand, enslaved by sin and ignorance, will, without doubt, soon be destroyed like the Daityas.'" Vaisampayana said, "The heroic sons of Pandu, accompanied by their followers, travelling from place to place, at last arrive at Naimisha. O King, reaching the Gomati, the Pandavas bathe in the sacred tirtha of that river, and having performed their ablutions there, they give away, O Bhaarata, both kine and wealth. Repeatedly offering oblations of water to the Devas, the Pitrs, and the Brahmanas, in the tirthas called Kanya, Aswa, and Gaya, and staying in Kalakoti and the Vishaprastha hills, the Pandavas then come to Bahuda and perform their ablutions in that stream.

Going next, O lord of earth, to the sacrificial realm of the gods known as Prayaga, they bathe at the confluence of Ganga and Yamuna and living there, perform tapasya of great merit. And bathing in that tirtha, the Pandavas, of firm vratas, cleanse themselves of every sin.

The sons of Pandu, accompanied by those Brahmanas, travel next to the tirtha called Vedi, sacred to the Creator and adored by ascetics. Staying there for some time and gratifying the Brahmanas with the fruit and roots of the wilderness and with ghee, those Kshatriyas begin to perform tapasya of deep punya.

They next journey to Mahidhara consecrated by the great Rajarishi Gaya of unrivalled splendour. In that land is the mountain called Gayasira, as well as the enchanting river Mahanadi, her fine banks graced by thickets of bamboo. On that divine mountain of holy peaks is another tirtha, the Brahmsaras, adored by Rishis. On the banks of that lake, of old, Dharma Deva, eternal god of justice himself dwelt, and it was there that the illustrious Rishi Agastya went to see that deity.

From that lake, all those sacred rivers arise, and in that tirtha, Mahadeva, wielder of the Pinaka, is present for ever.

Arriving there, the Pandavas keep the vrata called Chaturmasya, observing all the rites of the great sacrifice called Rishiyagna. There that mighty tree called the Eternal Banyan stands; any sacrifice performed there produces merit that is eternal. In that sacrificial dais of the gods producing eternal punya, the Pandavas begin to fast with concentrated souls. And there, Brahmanas, by hundreds, endowed with the wealth of tapasya, come to them; these Brahmanas also all perform the Chaturmasya sacrifice according to the rites prescribed by the Rishis.

In that tirtha, those Brahmanas old in knowledge and ascetic merit and masters of the Vedas, become the court of the lustrous sons of Pandu, and they discourse upon various subject of sacred import. And it was in that place that the wise and holy Shamata, who leads a life of celibacy, speaks to them, O King, of Gaya, the son of Amurtaraya.

Shamata says, 'Gaya, the son of Amurttaraya, was one of the greatest of all Rajarishis. Listen to me, O Bhaarata, I will tell of his deeds of dharma. It was here, O King, that Gaya performed many sacrifices distinguished by the vast quantities of food he distributed and the profuse gifts he gave. Those yagnas had hundres of thousands of hills of cooked rice, lakes of clarified butter and rivers of curds, in many hundreds, and streams of rich curries, in thousands.

Day after day, these were prepared and given to all comers, while, over and above this, Brahmanas and others, received more food that was clean and pure. During the conclusion of every sacrifice, when gifts were dedicated to the Brahmanas, the chanting of the Vedas reached the heavens. And so loud, indeed, was the sound of the Vedic mantras that nothing else, O Bhaarata, could be heard, for these sacred sounds filled the earth, the points of the horizon, the sky and heaven itself.

Such were the wonders that people observed on those occasions. Gratified with the excellent food and drink that the illustrious Gaya provided, men, O Bharatarishabha, went about singing these verses:

At Gaya's great sacrifice, who is there today, amongst creatures, that still wants to eat anymore? There are yet twenty-five mountains of food there after everyone has been fed! What Rajarishi Gaya of untold splendour has achieved in his sacrifice has never been achieved by men before, nor will be by any in the future. The gods have been so surfeited by Gaya with ghrita that they are unable to take anything that anybody else offers. As sand grains on earth, as stars in the firmament, as raindrops showered by clouds cannot ever be counted by anyone, so, too, can no one count the gifts given during Gaya's sacrifice!

O son of the Kurus, many times did King Gaya perform such yagnas here, by the side of this Brahmasaras!"

Vaisampayana said, "After this, the royal son of Kunti, who always gave profusely to Brahmanas, goes to the asrama of Agastya and takes up his abode in Durjaya. It is here that that best of speakers, King Yudhishtira asks Lomasa why Agastya slew Vatapi in this place. And the king also enquires after the extent of that man-killing Daityas prowess, and the reason, also, why the illustrious Agastya's wrath was stirred against that Asura.

So questioned, Lomasa says, 'O son of the Kurus, there was in the city called Manimati, in days of yore, a Daitya named Ilvala, whose younger brother was Vatapi. One day that son of Diti said to a Brahmana endowed with tapasyashakti, "Holy one, grant me a son equal unto Indra."

The Brahmana, however, did not grant the Asura a son like Indra. At this, the Asura was inflamed with wrath, and from that day, O king, the Asura Ilvala became a killer of Brahmanas. And blessed with the power of maya, the angry Asura would transform his brother into a ram. And Vatapi, who could also assume any form at will, would assume the shape of a ram; and the flesh of that ram, after being properly cooked, was offered to Brahmanas as food. And after they ate, they were killed, for whoever Ilvala summoned with his voice would come back to Ilvala, re-embodied, even if he had gone to the land of Yama, and show himself to Ilvala.

So, tranforming Vatapi into a ram and cooking his flesh and feeding Brahmanas therewith, he would summon Vatapi. And the mighty Asura Vatapi, that enemy of Brahmanas, endowed with great strength and the power of illusion, upon hearing, the loud voice of Ilvala calling, would tear open the belly of the Brahmana and come out chortling! So it was that the evil Daitya Ilvala, having fed unsuspecting Brahmanas, frequently took their lives.

Meanwhile, the illustrious Agastya saw his departed ancestors hanging in a pit with their heads downwards. He asked them, "What is the matter with you?"

Those Brahmavadins replied, "We are your manes, and it is to have offspring that we hang in this pit. Agastya, if you can beget a good son, we can be saved from this hell and you will also find the blessed state of having a child."

Blessed with great energy and observant of truth and dharma, Agastya replied, "O Pitrs, I will accomplish your desire. Let this anxiety of yours be dispelled."

And the lustrous Rishi then began to think of perpetuating his race. But he did not see a wife worthy of him, from whom he himself could take birth in the form of a son. Then he took every part considered most beautiful from many who possessed these individually, and created an exquisite woman.

That Muni, endowed with great tapasyashakti, gave that girl created for himeslf to the king of the Vidharbhas who was then performing tapasya to have children. Through Agastya's power, the lovely girl he had created was born into Vidarbhas royal line and, beautiful as effulgent lightning, she grew day by day. And as soon as that lord of earth—the king of the Vidarbhas—saw her ushered into life, he joyfully gave the news, O Bhaarata, to the Brahmanas. The Brahmanas blessed the girl and they named her Lopamudra.

Possessed of great beauty, she began to grow as quickly as a lotus in the water or the flame of a fire. And when she attained puberty, a hundred virgins decked in ornaments and a hundred maids waited in obedience upon her; she shone in their midst, brilliant as she was, like Rohini in the firmament amidst an inferior multitude of stars. And possessed as she was of good conduct and excellent manners, none dared ask for her hand even when she attained puberty, through fear of her father, the king of the Vidharbhas.

Lopamudra, devoted to truth, surpassing even the Apsaras in beauty, gratified her father and relatives with her deportment. Seeing his daughter turn into a young woman, her father began to think, "To whom should I give this daughter of mine?'"

Lomasa continues, 'When Agastya thought that that girl was competent for domesticity, he approached the king of the Vidharbhas, and said, "I ask you, O king, to give me your daughter Lopamudra."

The king swooned; yet, though unwilling to give the Muni his daughter, he dared not refuse. Going to his queen, he said, "This Rishi has great power. If angered, he may consume me with the fire of his curse. O you of the sweet face, tell me what you wish."

His queen did not say a word. Lopamudra saw them both distraught and came to them. She said, "O king, do not grieve on my account. Give me away to Agastya, and, O father, save yourself."

So, the king gave Lopamudra to the illustrious Agastya with due rites. When she was his wife, Agastya said to Lopamudra, "Cast away these costly robes and ornaments."

At the word of her lord, that large-eyed young woman, of thighs tapering as the stem of the plantain tree, put aside her fine and costly robes, and she dressed herself in rags and tree-bark and deer-skin, and became her husband's equal in vrata and karma.

Going then to Gangadwara that best of Rishis began to practise the severest penances along with his dutiful and helpful wife. Lopamudra, herself well pleased, began to serve her lord from the deep respect that she bore him. The lofty Agastya also began to show great love for his wife.

After a considerable time, O king, the Rishi one day saw Lopamudra, blazing in ascetic splendour, emerge from the stream after the bath, in her season. And pleased with the girl, for her services, her purity, and self control, as also with her grace and beauty, he called her to him for marital intercourse.

However, the girl, folding her hands, said bashfully but lovingly to the Rishi, "The husband, without doubt, weds the wife for offspring. But, O Muni, I beg you show me the same love which I bear for you. O Dvija, it becomes you to approach me on a bed like the one I had in the palace of my father. I also want you to be decked in garlands of flowers and other ornaments, and that I should come to you adorned in the celestial ornaments that I like.

Otherwise, I cannot come to you, dressed in these rags dyed in red. Nor, O regenerate Rishi, is it sinful to wear ornaments on such an occasion."

Agastya replied, "O blessed girl, you of the slender waist, I do not have wealth like what your father has, Lopamudra!"

She said, "You who have the wealth of tapasya can certainly fetch anything that exists in the world of men, in a moment, by your power."

Agastya said, "It is even as you say, but that would exhaust my punya. O bid me do what may not make me lose my ascetic merit."

Lopamudra then said, "O Muni, my season will not last long, but I do not wish to come to you otherwise, nor do I wish to diminsh your punya in any way. You must do as I wish, without injuring your virtue."

Agastya then said, "O blessed one, if this is your resolve, upon which you have set your heart, I will go out in quest of wealth. Meanwhile, you stay here, as it pleases you.'"

Lomasa continues, 'Agastya went to King Srutarvan who was regarded as richer than other kings, to beg for wealth. And that monarch, learning of the arrival of the pot-born Rishi on the frontiers of his kingdoms, went out with his ministers and received the holy one reverentially. The king duly offered the Sage arghya, submissively and with folded hands and then enquired after the reason for the Rishi's coming.

And Agastya answered, "Lord of the earth, know that I have come to you for wealth. Give me what you can afford and without doing injury to anyone."

The king, then, told the Rishi how his income and his expenditure were equal, adding, "Learned one, take from my possessions the wealth you please."

Seeing however that the king's income and what he spent were equal, the Sage thought that if he took anything, he would deprive someone by what he did. So, taking Srutarvan with him, the Rishi went to Bhadhnaswa, who, hearing of their arrival on his frontiers, went forth to receive them. Bhadhnaswa also offered them the arghya and padya, water to wash their feet. Then, with their leave, he asked after the reason for their coming.

Agastya said, "Lord of the earth, know that we have come to you for wealth. Give us what you can, while doing no injury to any of your subjects."

That king informed them of how his income and his expenditure, also, were equal, and said, "Knowing this, take whatever you want."

The Rishi, who saw all things with equal eyes, thought that if he took anything under the circumstances, what he did would injure all creatures. Agastya and Srutarvan, with King Bhadhnaswa then went to Purokutsa's son, Trasadasyu, of enormous wealth. The high-souled Trasadasyu learnt of their arrival on the border of kingdom, went out and received them with reverence. And that best of kings, in Ikshvaku's line, having worshipped all of them duly, asked why they had come.

And Agastya said, "Lord of earth, know that we have all come to you for wealth. Give us what you can, while doing no creature any harm."

That monarch then, also, told them how his income and his expenses were equal, and added, "Knowing this, take what you wish."

However, seeing how that king's expenses were equal to his income, the Rishi, who saw all things with equal eyes, thought that if he took anything, he would harm all creatures.

Now, Rajan, those kings looked at one another, and together said to the Rishi, "O Brahmana, there is a Danava called Ilvala, who of all beings on earth has the most wealth. Let us go together to him today and beg wealth of him."

This suggestion, O king, of begging wealth of Ilvala appeared to them to be proper; and all of them went together to Ilvala.'

Lomasa says, 'When Ilvala learnt that those kings along with the Maharishi had arrived on the confines of his domain, he went out with his ministers and worshipped them duly. And that prince of Asuras received them hospitably, entertaining them, O son of the Kuru race, with well cooked meat, which was that of his brother Vatapi, transformed into a ram.

When those Rajarishis saw the mighty Asura Vatapi, who had changed into a ram, thus cooked for them, they became disconsolate and were almost senseless with grief and fear.

But Agastya , best of Rishis, said to those royal sages, "Do not worry, I will eat the Asura."

And the mighty Rishi sat himself down on an excellent chair, and the prince of Asuras, Ilvala, began to serve the food, smiling. Agastya ate up all of the meat of the ram which Vatapi had turned into. When the meal was over, Ilvala began to call out to his brother. But only a great belch of air issued from the belly of Agastya, with a sound, O child, as loud as the rumbling of clouds.

Repeatedly, Ilvala called, "Come out, O Vatapi!"

Then that best of Munis, Agastya, burst out laughing, and said, "How can he come out, I have digested him?"

Ilvala was stricken, and folding his hands, along with his ministers, said, "What have you come here for? What can I do for you?"

Smiling, Agastya replied, "We know, O Asura, that you have great power and great wealth, as well. I have great need of wealth and these kings cannot give it to me, being needy themselves. Give us what you can, without depriving anyone."

Ilvala saluted the Rishi and said, "Say what I should give, and I will."

Agastya said, "O great Asura, give each of these kings ten thousand cows and as many gold coins; and to me give twice as much, as well as a golden chariot and a pair of horses fleet as thought. Why, if you look even now you will find that your chariot has become made of gold."

At which, O son of Kunti, Ilvala made enquiries and learnt that the car he intended to give away was really a golden one. His heart sad, the Daitya then gave away much wealth and that ratha, to which two steeds called Virava and Surava were yoked. Those steeds, O Bhaarata, took the kings and Agastya and all that wealth to the Sage's asrama, in the twinkling of an eye. Taking Agastya's leave, the Rajarishis went away to their respective cities.

Agastya, using the wealth of the Asura, did all that Lopamudra wanted. And Lopamudra said, "Most illustrious one, you have given me everything I wanted. Now beget a son on me, a child of immense tejas."

And Agastya replied, "Blessed and beautiful one, you have pleased me greatly with your conduct. Listen now to what I have to say with regard to your offspring. Would you have a thousand sons, or a hundred sons each equal to ten, or ten sons equal each to a hundred, or only one son who may vanquish a thousand?"

Lopamudra answered, "Let me have one son equal to a thousand! One good and wise son is preferable to many evil ones."

Saying, "So be it," that pious Muni took his chaste wife to himself, and after she had conceived, he retired into the forest. After Agastya Muni had gone away, the foetus grew inside Lopamudra for seven years. At the end of seven years, from her womb there issued the wise and learned Dridasyu, blazing, O Bhaarata, in his own splendour. He came forth auspiciously, as if chanting the Vedas, with the Upanishads and the Angas.

Endowed with great energy while yet a child, he would carry loads of sacrificial fuel into his father's asrama, and so he was called Idhmavaha – the bearer of sacrificial wood.

When Agastya saw his son, with such virtue, he was greatly pleased. So it was, O Bhaarata, that Agastya begot a splendid son, as a result of which his ancestors, O king, gained the realms they desired. And it is from that line that this place has become known in the world as Agastyasrama.

Indeed, Rajan, this is the asrama of great beauty, of the Rishi Agastya who consumed Vatapi of the race of Prahlada. The sacred Bhagirathi, adored by Devas and Gandharvas, gently flows by this hermitage like a breeze-shaken pennon in the sky. Yonder also she flows over craggy crests, descending lower and lower, and looks like an affrighted she-snake lying along the hilly slopes. Issuing out of the matted locks of Mahadeva, she passes along through the southern country nurturing it like a mother; and ultimately flows into the ocean as if she were his favourite bride.

Bathe as you like in this sacred river, you son of Pandu! And behold there, O Yudhishtira, the tirtha of Bhrigu that is celebrated throughout the three worlds and adored, O King, by Maharishis. Bathing there, Rama, of Bhrigu's race, regained his might, which had been taken from him by Dasaratha's son. Bathing here, O son of Pandu, with your brothers and Krishnaa, you will certainly regain that power of yours, which has been taken by Duryodhana, even as Parasurama regained his, which Dasaratha's son took from him during their hostile encounter.'

At this, Yudhishtira bathes there with his brothers and Krishnaa, and offers oblations of water, O Bhaarata, to the Devas and the Pitrs. And, O bull among men, after Yudhishtira has bathed in that tirtha, his body blazes forth in brighter effulgence, and he becomes invincible to all his enemies.

The Pandava asks Lomasa, 'Illustrious one, why were Rama's energy and might taken away? And how did he regain them? Mahatman, I beg you, tell me everything.'

Lomasa says, 'Listen, O king, to the tale of Dasaratha's son Rama and Rama of Bhrigu's line, of great intelligence. To kill Ravana, Vishnu incarnated himself as the son of Dasaratha. We saw Dasaratha's son in Ayodhya after he was born. It was then that Rama of Bhrigu's line, the son of Richika by Renuka, heard of Dasaratha's son Rama, of immaculate purity, and impelled by curiosity, he went to Ayodhya, taking with him the divine bow which had been the scourge of the Kshatriyas, to test the prowess of Dasaratha's son.

Hearing that Rama of Bhrigu's race had arrived at the borders of his dominion, Dasaratha sent his own son Rama to receive the great one with reverence. Seeing Dasaratha's son approach and stand before him with his weapons, Rama of Bhrigu's line said challengingly, sneeringly, to him, "O king, O lofty one, if you can, with all your might, string this bow, which in my hands became the instrument of the destruction of the race of Kshatriyas."

Dasaratha's son answered, "Illustrious one, it does not behove you to insult me like this. I do not lack the virtues of the Kshatriya varna, and the descendants of Ikshvaku, in particular, never boast of their prowess."

Rama of Bhrigu's line replied, "Be done with clever talk and take the bow!"

At this, Rama the son of Dasaratha, angered, took that celestial bow from the hands of Rama of Bhrigu's, that weapon which had killed the greatest Kshatriyas. And, O Bhaarata, the mighty prince smilingly strung that bow, effortlessly, and with its twang loud as thunder, terrified all creatures.

Dasaratha's son Rama said to Parasurama Bhargava, "Here, I have strung this bow. What else, O Brahmana, shall I do for you?"

Jamadagni's son Rama handed Dasaratha's Rama a heavenly arrow, and said, "Fit this to the bow-string and draw it to your ear, O Kshatriya!"

Dasaratha's son blazed up in wrath and said, "I have listened to whatever you said and even forgiven you; O Bhargava, you are full of vanity. Through Brahma's grace you have got prowess superior to that of the Kshatriyas, and it is for this that you insult me. But behold me now in my pristine form – I give you sight."

Then Rama, the Bhargava, saw in the body of Dasaratha's son the Adityas with the Vasus, the Rudras, the Sadhyas with the Marutas, the Pitrs, Hutasana, the stellar constellations and the planets, the Gandharvas, the Rakshasas, the Yakshas, the Rivers, the tirthas, those eternal Brahmarishis called the Balakhilyas, the Devarishis, the Seas and Mountains, the Vedas with the Upanishads and Vashats and the Yagnas, the Samans in their living form, the Science of weapons, O Bhaarata, and the Clouds with rain and lightning, O Yudhishtira!

And lustrous Vishnu then loosed that arrow, and the earth was filled with sounds of thunder, and burning meteors began to flash through the sky; and showers of dust and rain fell upon the earth; and whirlwinds and frightful reverberations convulsed everything, and the earth herself began to quake.

And shot by the hand of Rama, that shaft, confounding the other Rama, came back blazing into Rama's hands. Bhargava, who had fainted, regaining consciousness, now bowed to Rama -that manifestation of Vishnu's power. Then, commanded by Vishnu, he went away to the mountains of Mahendra, and then onwards that great ascetic began to live there, in terror and shame.

When a year passed, the Pitrs, seeing Rama there, bereft of all vitality, his pride quelled, and sunk in affliction, said to him, "O son, having approached Vishnu, you did not behave properly towards him. He deserves worship for ever and reverence in the three worlds. Go, O child, to the sacred river Vadhusara. Bathing in all the tirthas of that stream, you will regain your vigour. There in that river is the tirtha Diptoda where your grandsire Bhrigu, O Rama, performed great tapasya in the Krita Yuga."

Rama, O son of Kunti, did as the Pitrs asked, and at this tirtha, he regained the powers he had lost. This, O Pandava, was what befell the great Rama in days of yore, after he met Vishnu incarnate as Dasarathas son.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Dvijottama, I want to listen again in detail to the achievements of Agastya Rishi, of awesome glory.'

Lomasa says, 'Listen then, O king, to the excellent and wonderful and extraordinary story of Agastya, as also about the prowess of that Rishi of immeasurable tejas.

In the Krita Yuga there were some tribes of fierce Danavas that were invincible in battle, and they were called the Kalakeyas and possessed dreadful prowess. Banding together under Vritra and arming themselves with diverse weapons they hunted the Devas with Indra at their head, in all directions.

The gods decided that Vritra must be killed, and went with Indra to Brahma. Seeing them standing before him with folded hands, Parameshti addressed them all, saying, "I know everything, O Devas, and why you have come. I will tell you how you can kill Vritra.

There is a high-souled and great Rishi called Dadhicha. Go, all together, and seek a boon from him. He will become pleased, and that virtuous Rishi will grant you the boon. If you want victory, go and say to him: For the good of the three worlds, give us your bones.

Renouncing his body, he will give you his bones. With these bones of his, make a fierce and powerful weapon, which will be called Vajra, with six sides, and a terrible roar, and capable of destroying even the most powerful enemies. With that weapon, Indra of a hundred sacrifices shall kill Vritra.

This is all I have to say; see you do as I have told you, quickly."

Taking his leave, the gods came away, and with Narayana at their head went to Dadhicha's asrama, which stood on the banks of the Saraswati, in an entwinement of many diverse trees and vines. The hermitage resounded with the hum of bees as if they were reciting Samans; it echoed with the melodious songs of the male kokila and the chakora. Bison and boar and deer and chamaras wandered there at their pleasure, free from the fear of tigers in this holy place; and tuskers with the juice of rut trickling down from rent temples, plunged in the stream, sported with she-elephants and made all the place resound with their trumpeting.

The place also echoed with the roars of lions and tigers, while at times those grisly monarchs of the forest could be seen lying stretched in caves and glens, adorning them with their presence. Such was the asrama of Dadhicha, like a bit of heaven, which the gods entered. And there they saw Dadhicha looking like the Sun in splendour and ablaze with grace like the Grandsire himself.

The Devas prostrated at the feet the Rishi, and bowing low before him, begged the boon that Brahma had told them to.

Well pleased, Dadhicha said to those greatest of gods, "Devas I will do anything for your good, even give up this body of mine."

Saying this, that greatest of men, his soul under perfect restraint, suddenly renounced his life. The gods then took the bones of the deceased Rishi as they had been directed to. Glad at heart, the Devas went to Tvashtri, the celestial Artificer, and told him about the way in which they could defeat the Asuras.

Tvashtri was filled with joy, and, with great attention and care, he fashioned the awesome weapon called the Vajra. And having made it, he said happily to Indra, "Great One, make ashes of the terrible enemy with this ayudha; and having slain him, rule all the domains of swarga in joy, with all who follow you."

Purandara took the Vajra from Tvashtri's hand, joyfully and with proper reverence.'

Lomasa says, 'Armed with the Vajra, and with the mighty Deva host behind him, Indra confronted Vritra, who was then ruling all of Swarga and Bhumi, heaven and earth. Kalakeyas, of immense bodies, guarded Vritra on every side, with upraised weapons and resembling great mountains with towering peaks.

The battle between the Devas and the Danavas lasted for a short while and was, O lord of the Bhaaratas, terrific in the extreme, appalling the three worlds. Thunderous was the clash of swords and scimitars, wielded by heroic hands. Heads that had been severed fell down from the sky onto the earth like fruits of the palmyra falling onto the ground, when loosened from their stalks.

Armed with iron-mounted bludgeons and cased in golden mail, the Kalakeyas ran against the gods, like moving mountains afire. And unable to stand the shock of that ferocious and haughty host, the Devas broke ranks and fled in fear. Purandara of a thousand eyes saw his gods flying in terror and Vritra growing in boldness, and Indra was dejected.

Now, terrified himself by the Kalakeyas, Indra, king of the Devas, sought refuge with Narayana, the Supreme One. Seeing Indra so distraught, eternal Vishnu infused the Deva with a part of his own infinite prowess; and when the Devas saw that Vishnu now protected Sakra, each of them also transferred a portion of his prowess to Indra.

The taintless Brahmarishis also imparted their mystic energies to the lord of the celestials. Indra was mightier than ever, and when Vritra learnt that the Deva king was infused with powers of others, he sent forth some terrific roars. At these, the earth, the directions, the firmament, heaven, and the mountains, all began to tremble.

Hearing this awful sound, Indra was filled with fear and, wanting to kill the Asura quickly, cast, O king, the mighty Vajra at the Demon. Struck by Indra's Vajra, the great Asura, decked in gold and garlands fell headlong, like the great mountain Mandara hurled of old by Vishnu's hands; and although the prince of Daityas was slain, yet Indra ran in panic from the field, and took shelter in a lake, thinking the Vajra had not killed Vritra.

However, the Devas and the Maharishis were filled with joy, and all of them began to joyously sing Indra's praises. Mustering their forces again, the gods began to slaughter the demons, now dispirited at the death of their leader. The Danavas fled into the depths of the sea; and having entered the fathomless deep teeming with fish and crocodiles, the Asuras assembled together and arrogantly began to conspire to destroy the three worlds.

Those among them that were deemed wise suggested different courses of action, each according to his judgment. In course of time, however, the dreadful resolution those sons of Diti arrived at was that they should, first of all, compass the destruction of all men of knowledge and ascetic virtue: for, the worlds are all supported by tapasya.

Therefore, they said, "Lose no time in wiping out dhyana and yagnas. Kill all those on earth who have ascetic virtues, those who know the ways of karma and dharma, and especially those that have knowledge of Brahman; for when these are dead, the very universe will be destroyed."

Arriving at this decision to destroy the universe, the Danavas were pleased. They made the ocean—that realm of Varuna—with waves high as hills, their fortress, from which to make their attacks.'

Lomasa says, 'The Kalakeyas began to put their plan to destroy the universe in motion. During the darkness of night, the angry Daityas would issue from the Sea and devour all the Munis they found in wooded asramas and other sacred places.

In Vasishta's asrama, the evil ones ate a hundred and eighty Brahmanas, besides nine other ascetics. Going on to Chyavana's hermitage, home to many Brahmacharis, they devoured another hundred Brahmanas who lived on just fruit and roots.

While these depredations continued through the nights, they returned to safety under the sea by day. In Bharadwaja's asrama, they killed a score of Brahmanas of subdued souls, Brahmacharis who lived just on air and water. So, the Kalakeyas, intoxicated with power and their lives nearly run out, invaded every Rishis asrama, one by one, during the hours of darknes, and slaughtered numberless holy Brahmanas.

And, O best of men, though they continued with these savage attacks, killing so many Sages in their asramas, no one could find them, or where they hid. Every morning dead bodies of fragile Munis were found, many of them without flesh and without blood, without marrow, without entrails, and with limbs torn from one another; here and there, bones were heaped like conch shells.

And the earth was strewn with the contents of broken sacrificial urns and shattered ladles for pouring libations of clarified butter and with the ruins of sacred fires once kept burning with care by the ascetics.

And the universe, afflicted with terror of the Kalakeyas, and without the Vedas being chanted or vashats or sacrificial festivals or religious rites, was dreary and without any joy. O king, when men began to perish in this way, the survivors, taken with fear, fled for their lives in all directions; some fled to caverns and some hid behind mountain-streams and springs, while others just died of fight.

But some that were brave and mighty bowmen, spiritedly, cheerfully, went out and took great pains to track the Danavas to their lair; however, they did not find them because the demons hid beneath the sea. The valiant bowmen returned to their homes, at least satisfied that they had searched.

And, O lord of men, while the universe was being ruined, and when sacrificial festivals and religious rites had all ceased, the gods became deeply perturbed. Gathering together around Indra, they held council; and then going to the exalted and un-born Narayana—that unvanquished God of Vaikunta—the celestials sought his protection.

Bowing to Madhusudana, the Devas said, "O Lord, you are the creator, the protector, and the destroyer of ourselves, as well as of the universe. It is you who have created this universe with its mobile and immobile creatures. O lotus-eyed one, in days of old, you took the form of the Varaha and raised the sunken earth out of the Sea, to benefit all beings.

Purushottama, you assumed the form of the Narasimha, and, in ancient times, killed the mighty Asura Hiranyakasipu; taking the form of the Vamana, you subdued the invincible Bali, and thrust him down into Patala. Lord, it was you who killed the evil Jambha, who was a matchless bowman and who always desecrated and obstructed sacrifices.

Achievements like these, beyond count, belong to you. O slayer of Madhu, we are taken with terror and have only you for our refuge. Devadeva, protect the worlds, the gods, and Sakra also, from this terrible fear."

The Devas said, "Through your grace everything is born and the four kind of beings increase. And being created, they worship the swargavasis with offerings made to the gods and the manes of departed fathers.

So, protected by you and free from troubles, they live depending on one another, and increase. Now this peril has befallen the people. We do not know who is killing the Brahmanas during the night. But if the Brahmanas are destroyed, the earth itself will cease to exist, and if the earth comes to an end, heaven also will cease to exist.

Mahabaho, O lord of the universe, we beg you to save all the worlds!"

Vishnu said, "Devas, I know the reason why these Brahmanas die; I will tell of it, listen to me with calm minds. There exists a savage and ferocious host of demons called Kalakeyas. Led by Vritra, these were devastating the very universe.

When the thousand-eyed Indra slew Vritra, to save their lives these Kalakeyas submerged themselves in Vaurna's domain, the ocean. Making the ocean deeps, which abound with sharks and crocodiles, their refuge, they come out at nights, and kill the holy sages, with a view to ending the worlds.

But they cannot be killed, since they have made the sea deeps their sanctuary. Think of some way to dry up the ocean, and I say to you -who but Agastya can achieve this thing? Without drying up the sea, you have no way to attack these Asuras.'

The gods listened to Vishnu, then sought leave from Brahma, who lives in the best of all lokas, and then went to the hermitage of Agastya. They saw the high-souled Agastya, the son of Varuna, of resplendent mien, waited upon by sages, even as Brahma is by gods.

Approaching that son of Mitra and Varuna in his asrama, that magnanimous and unswerving one, who looked like an embodiment of pious karma heaped together, they glorified him by reciting his deeds.

The deities said, "You were once the refuge of the gods when Nahusha oppressed them. Thorn of the world that he was, he was cast down from his throne in swarga – from the very celestial realms.

Vindhya, foremost of mountains, suddenly began to increase his height, due to an angry competition with the Sun, but you commanded him to stop and he could not refuse you and stopped growing.

And when darkness covered the world, the created were all threatened by death, but having gained you for a protector, they found utmost security. Whenever peril besets us, you are always our refuge; this is why we have come to ask a boon from you, and we know that you always grant any boon for which you are asked.'"

Yudhishtira says, 'O Maharishi, I am eager to know in detail how Vindhya became so incensed that he began to grow.'

Lomasa says, 'Between his rising and setting, the Sun used to revolve around that monarch of mountains – the great Meru of golden lustre. Seeing this, the Mountain Vindhya said to Surya, "As you go every day round Meru and honour him with your pradakshinas, do the same to me, O maker of light!"

The Sun replied to the great mountain, "I do not honour Meru by my own will. Those who have made this universe have assigned my path to me."

Wrathful in a moment, the Vindhya mountain suddenly began to increase his size, for, O Parantapa, he wanted to obstruct the paths of the Sun and the Moon. All the Devas assembled and came to Vindhya, that mighty king of mountains, and tried to dissuade him from this. But he paid no heed to their entreaties.

Then the gods went to the Sage in his asrama, at his tapasaya, the very best and most powerful of those who are devoted to dharma, and told Agastya Muni what had happened.

The Devas said, "This king of hills, Vindhya, has yielded to anger and stops the paths of the Sun and the Moon, and also the course of the stars. O best of Brahmanas! O most gifted one! None but you can make him desist; we beg you, make him stop."

Hearing what the Devas said, the Brahmana came to the mountain; and, with his wife, he said to the Vindhya, "O best of mountains, give me a path, for I need to go south for a purpose of mine. Until my return, wait for me; and when I have come back grow on as much as you please!"

Parantapa, having made this compact with Vindhya, Varuna's son has not, until today, returned from the southern region. So it is that, by Agastya's power, the Vindhya has not grown any further.

Now, O king, listen to how the Devas killed the Kalakeyas, after getting their boon from Agastya Muni.

Having heard what the gods said, Agastya, the son of Mitra and Varuna, said, "Why have you come here? What boon do you want from me?

The Devas replied, "O Magnanimous, we beg you to drink up the ocean and drain it, for then we shall be able to kill the Kalakeyas, and all their allies."

The Sage said, "So be it. I will do what you wish, and that will bring great happiness to all men."

Saying this, O virtuous one, Agastya went to the ocean, lord of rivers, and with him went Rishis of great tapasya, and the Devas as well. And Manavas and Nagas, Gandharvas, Yakshas and Kinnaras followed the awesome Sages, wanting to witness the event of wonder.

Together they came to the sea, which roared, dancing with its waves, leaping in the wind, and laughing with masses of froth, and gushing into caves on the shore, the ocean thronging with all kinds of sharks, and flocks of diverse birds above and upon his waters.

The Devas, along with Agastya and the Gandharvas and huge Nagas and most gifted Munis, approached the immense waters.'

Lomasa says, 'Varuna's son, that blessed saint spoke to the assembled gods, and the sages, "I am going to drink up the ocean, abode of the god of waters. You be ready with whatever preparations you need to make."

With these few words, the unswerving son of Mitra and Varuna, now full of wrath, began to drink up the sea, while all the worlds watched. Indra and the Devas were awestruck and began to give praise to mighty Agastya:

"O you are our protector, and Providence itself for men, why, the very creator of the worlds. By your grace, possibly, the universe with its gods might be saved."

Glorified by the Devas, while the musical instruments of Gandharvas played all around, and while celestial blossoms were showered upon him, the great Agastya drained the vast ocean and it was dry!

Seeing the ocean rendered devoid of water, the host of gods rejoiced; taking up diverse weapons of celestial forge, they fell to slaughtering the demons. Assailed by the Devas of untold strength and speed, who came roaring at them, the Asuras could not stand before the heaven dwellers, O Bhaarata! Only for a moment, did the demons last before the onslaught of the gods, and return battle.

Moreover, the evil ones had already been consumed by the tapasya shakti of the greatest Rishis; the Devas quickly massacred the Kalakeyas. Decked with brooches of gold, wearing ear-rings and armlets, the demons, when slain, looked beautiful indeed, like palasa trees in full crimson bloom.

Then, O best of men, a few of the Kalakeyas who remained alive rent the goddess Earth, and took refuge at the bottom of the Pataias.

When they saw that the demons were slain, the gods gave praise to the mighty sage:

"O Mahabaho, through your grace, all men have found a great blessing, and the ruthless Kalakeyas have been killed by your power, O creator of beings! Now, mighty-armed, fill the ocean again, give up once more the waters that you drained."

The blessed and mighty Muni replied, "I have digested that water, so if you wish to fill the ocean again, you must think of some other expedient."

Great king, the assembled gods were struck with both wonder and sadness. Now, after bowing to the Maharishi and saying farewell to one another, they all went away to their respective homes.

The Devas, with Vishnu, came to Brahma; they consulted again now about how to fill the empty sea. They stood with folded hands, and forlorn.'

Lomasa says, 'Brahma Pitamaha said, "Go, O Devas, where your pleasure may lead you, or your desire takes you! It will take a long course of time for the ocean to resume its original state; the occasion will be furnished by the ancestors of the great king Bhagiratha."

Hearing what the Pitamaha said, all those main gods went to their homes, and would bide their time until the day when the ocean was filled again.'

Yudhishtira says, 'What was that occasion, O Muni? And how did Bhagiratha's ancestors furnish it? And how was the ocean filled again through Bhagiratha's efforts? O Sage, who deem your tapasya as your only treasure, O Brahmana, I want to hear the achievements of that king, in detail, from you.'

Thus addressed by the magnanimous and virtuous king, Lomasa, best of Brahmanas, narrates the achievements of the high-souled king, Sagara.

Lomasa says, 'Into the clan of the Ikshvakus, was born a ruler of the earth named Sagara, endowed with beauty and strength. And that king was sonless, O Bhaarata! He brought havoc through the tribes of the Haihayas and the Talajanghas, all of Kshatriya kind under his rule, and then reigned over his own kingdom.

And, O most praiseworthy of the scions of Bhaarata, O chief of the Bhaarata race, Sagara had two wives, proud of their beauty and of their youth – one a princess of the Vidarbhas, and the other of the royal line of Sibi.

Best of kings, Sagara and his wives went to Mount Kailasa, and sat in severe tapasya in order to have a son. Practising rigid penance, and locked in Yoga, Sagara had a vision of three-eyed Siva, who made ashes of the Tripura, who is the Eternal One, the bestower of blessings to all beings, the Great Sovereign, who wields the bow Pinaka, with the Trisula in his hand, in whom infinite peace resides, the lord of all those that are fierce, who can assume any form; and who is the Lord of the Goddess Uma.

Mahabaho, as soon as Sagara saw that God, the giver of boons, he and his two queens fell at Siva's feet, and offered him a prayer to have a son.

Well pleased, Siva said to that most just king and his wives, "Lord of men, considering the moment at which you have offered your prayer to me, sixty thousand sons, valiant and exceedingly proud, will be born in one of your two wives. But they will all perish together.

In the other wife, a single brave son will be born, who will perpetuate your race."

Having said this to him, the God Rudra vanished, and king Sagara came home with his queens, all of them delighted with what had transpired. And, O best of men, there, the two lotus-eyed queens—the princess of Vidarbha and the princess of Sibi— soon became pregnant.

When her time came, the princess of Vidarbha brought forth something shaped like a gourd while the princess of Sibi gave birth to a boy as beautiful as a god. Sagara decided to throw away the gourd, when he heard an asariri speak gravely from the sky, "O King, do not be hasty, you must not become guilty of abandoning your sons! Take the seeds out from the gourd and let them be preserved with care in steaming vessels partly filled with ghrita. Then thou will get, O scion of Bharata's race, sixty thousand sons.

King of men, Mahadeva Siva has decreed that your sons are to be born in this fashion, so do not turn your mind away from what must be."'

Lomasa says, 'Most righteous king, when he heard the voice speak from the sky, he believed what it said and did as it asked. Sagara took each seed from the gourd, separately, and immersed it in a vat of ghee. Intent on the survival of his sons, he provided a nurse for every receptacle.

Then, after a long time, there arose sixty thousand immeasurably strong and powerful sons from those vessels of ghee, sons born to the Rajarishi Sagara through Siva's grace.

And they were terrible and their deeds were ruthless. They could fly and range through the sky, and being as many as they were, they were unafraid of anyone, including the gods. They would chase even the Devas, the Gandharvas, and the Rakshasas and all the born, for they were mighty and addicted to fighting.

Harassed by the dull-headed sons of Sagara, all men and the gods with them went to Brahma, as their refuge.

The Grandsire of all beings said to them, "Go your way, Devas, and take these mortal men with you, for very soon the sons of Sagara will find death for all their sins, and a terrible end will they find."

The Devas and the Manavas bade farewell to the Pitamaha, and went back to where they had come from. Then, O Bhaarata, when many days had passed, the mighty king Sagara took the consecration for performing the rites of a horse-sacrifice, an Aswamedha yagna.

Protected by his ferocious sons, the king's sacrificial horse ranged across the earth; when it reached the sea, waterless and frightful to behold, although the horse was guarded with great care it suddenly vanished from where it stood.

Sagara's sons thought that fine steed had been stolen; they returned to their father and told him how it had disappeared.

He said to them, "Go and look for the horse in all the cardinal points."

Great king, at their father's command, his sons began their quest for the horse in all the cardinal points and throughout the surface of the earth. But even all together, those sixty thousand could not find the horse, nor the one who had stolen it.

Returning home, they stood with folded hands before their father, and said, "O Protector of men! O ruler of the earth! O king! At your command, we combed all this world, with all its hills and its forests, with its seas, and its woods, and its islands, with its rivulets and rivers and caves. But we did not find either the horse, or the thief who stole it."

Sagara was insensate with anger, and stirred by destiny, too, he said to them in wrath, "Go again and seek the horse and never return until you find it!"

Again obedient to their father's command, his sons, those awesome Kshatriyas, once more searched the earth and they found a cleft upon her surface, upon the dried up sea-bed. The sons of Sagara began to excavate it.

Exerting themselves to the utmost, with spades and pickaxes they dug the bed of the sea. At their violent excavation, Varuna's abode writhed in agony, and Asuras, Nagas, Rakshasas and all living beings began to cry out in distress, while Sagara's sixty thousand sons slaughtered them.

Hundreds of thousands of living creatures could be seen with severed heads and trunks and with their skins and bones and joints rent asunder and broken.

They went on digging up the ocean, abode of Varuna, and a vast amount of time went by but they still did not find the horse. Then, lord of earth, towards the north-eastern region of the sea, the incensed sons of Sagara dug down as far as Patala, and there they saw the animal, roaming about as it pleased.

And they saw the magnificent Kapila, looking like a perfect mass of splendour. Seeing him shining even as fire does with flames and seeing the horse, as well, they became flushed with joy. Having been sent by fate, and after their fervid exertions, they paid Kapila Muni no heed but ran forward to seize the horse.

Maharajan, Kapila, most righteous of Munis, whom the great sages name Kapila Vasudeva, assumed a fiery look, and the mighty ones loosed flames at Sagara's sons, and burnt them to ashes.

Narada, of vast tapasya, saw Sagara's sons reduced to ashes and he came to that king and told him what had happened. When Sagara heard the terrible news from the Rishi's lips, he was plunged in grief for an hour, until he recalled what Siva had said.

Sending for his grandson Ansuman, the son of Asamanjas, he said, "Because of me, my sixty thousand sons of measureless strength encountered Kapila's wrath and have met their death. My pure child, taintless Ansuman, I have also forsaken your father for the sake of my Rajadharma and for the weal of my people."

Yudhishtira says, 'O Muni, whose only wealth is your tapasya, tell me why Sagara, foremost of kings, abandoned his own son, endowed with valour – something so diffcult for other men to do.'

Lomasa says, A son was born to Sagara, by the princess of Sibi, and he was called Asamanjas. The prince would seize the weaker children of the townspeople and throw them into the river. Outraged, and stricken by grief and fear, the townsmen met together, and came, hands folded before Sagara, and implored him, "Great king, you protect us from invasions by hostile enemies. Now you must protect us from the peril of Asamanjas."

Hearing the fearful news of his son's doings, the king fell sad and silent for almost an hour, and then he said to his ministers, "Let my son Asamanjas be driven out of our city from this day. If you wish to please me, do it quickly!"

And, O King, the ministers did what he asked without delay. So did the great Sagara banish his son for the welfare of his people. Now listen in full to what Sagara said to his grandson Ansuman of the powerful bow.

Sagara said, "O my child, my heart is broken from having banished your father and now from having sent your uncles to their deaths. Besides, I have not recovered the horse for my sacrifice.

My grandson, grief tears at me and my mind is confounded that I cannot complete my Aswamedha yagna. Your must fetch the horse back and deliver me from hell."

Ansuman went with sorrow to the place where the earth had been excavated; he went down by the same tunnel beneath the dry sea bed, and saw the illustrious Kapila and the horse. Seeing the ancient Sage, most righteous of his kind, who looked like a mass of light, the prince bowed touching his head to the ground, and told the Rishi why he had come.

Maharajan, Kapila was pleased with Ansuman, and told him to ask for a boon. Ansuman first asked to have the horse back for the sacrifice, and then he prayed for the purification of his uncles.

The mighty Kapila said, "I will grant you all that you desire, stainless prince. May good fortune be with you! In you I see forbearance, truth, and righteousness. By you Sagara shall have his wishes fulfilled; you are truly a grandson to your sire. Through your goodness, the sons of Sagara will find redemption and heaven.

Your son's son will find Mahadeva Siva's grace so your ancestors might be purified of their sin. He will perform a great tapasya that will bring the river of three streams down into this world – the Ganga, O lord of men!

May good fortune be yours! Here, take this sacrificial horse with you and complete the Aswamedha yagna of the great Sagara."

Ansuman took the horse with him, and returned to mighty king Sagara's yagnashala. He prostrated at the feet of the high-souled Sagara, who sniffed the top of his head lovingly; Ansuman told him everything, all that he had seen and heard, and all about the death of Sagara's sons. He also announced that he had brought back the horse.

When Sagara heard all this, he no longer grieved on account of his dead sons. He praised and honoured Ansuman, and completed his sacrifice. When this was done, all the Devas greeted him with honour, and Sagara made the sea, where Varuna dwells, his son.

The lotus-eyed Sagara ruled his kingdom for a great length of time, and then he set his grandson Ansuman upon his throne, laden with responsibility, and ascended into Swarga.

Like his grandsire, the virtuous Ansuman ruled over the world with dharma, as far as the edge of the sea, following in the footsteps of his father's father. His son was named Dilipa, versed in virtue. Finally, Ansuman gave his throne to Dilipa and he also left this world.

When Dilipa learnt of the awful fate that had overtaken his forefathers, he grieved and thought of the means to redeem their souls. That king of men did his utmost to bring the Ganga down into the world, but he did not succeed.

A son was born to him, and known by the name of Bhagiratha, who was beautiful, and devoted to a virtuous life, and truthful, and free from all malice. Dilipa made his son the king, and took to vanaprastha himself. And, O best of all the scions of Bhaarata's race, Dilipa devoted himself to a long tapasya, at the end of which he, too, rose from the forest into heaven.'

Lomasa says, 'Bhagiratha, of the mighty bow, Maharatha, lord of all he surveyed, became the delight of the eyes and the soul of the world. He, the Mahabaho, learnt how his ancestors had met an awful end from Kapila, and how they had been unable to attain the realm of the gods.

With a sorrowful heart, he made over his kingly duties to his minister, and, O lord of men, he went to the Himalayas, mountains of snow, to sit in tapasya, and by leading the most austere life, to gain the favour of the Devi Ganga.

He saw Himavana, adorned with peaks of diverse forms, full of bright minerals, strewn on all sides with raindrops from clouds resting upon the breeze; beautiful with rivers and groves and rocky spurs, looking like so many palaces in a city, attended upon by lions and tigers that had hidden themselves in its caves; and also inhabited by birds of myriad species, uttering diverse sounds – bhringarajas, and ganders, and datyuhas, and water-cocks, and peacocks and birds with a hundred feathers, and jivanjivakas, and blackbirds, and chakoras with black-cornered eyes, and the koyals that love their young.

He saw the mountain abounding in lotus plants that grew in enchanted lakes. And kraunchas, cranes, rendered it charming with their sounds; and Kinnaras and Apsaras sat upon its stone slabs.

And the Diggajas, the elephants of the cardinal points, had marked the trees growing there with their tusks; and Vidyadharas frequented the mountain, which was replete with treasures of jewels, as it was infested by serpents with glowing tongues and virulent venom.

In places the mountain seemed to be made of gold, while in others it was silver, and yet other peaks were like massifs of kohl. So was the snowy mountain where the king now found himself.

There, that best of men sat in a fierce tapasya. For one thousand years, he sustained himself on just water, fruit and roots. When a thousand years of the Devas passed, the great Devi, the divine river Ganga, manifested herself before him, embodied and shimmering.

Ganga said, "Great king, what do you want from me? What boon must I bestow upon you? I will do what you ask."

Bhagiratha replied to Himalaya's daughter, "Grantress of boons, O great River, when my father's fathers went in search of their sire's sacrificial horse, Kapila sent them to the land of Yama; in an instant, those sixty thousand perished.

Since then, there has been no place for them in Swarga. O great river, as long as you do not wet their ashes with your water, they will not find moksha. Blessed Devi, I beg you, redeem my ancestors, Sagara's sons, lead them into heaven. I am here to beg you to save their souls."

Ganga, the goddess whom the worlds worship, was pleased to hear what Bhagiratha said, and she said to him, "Great King, I am prepared to do what you ask. But when I descend from the sky to the earth, the force of my fall will be impossible to bear.

Protector of men, in the three worlds none but Siva, greatest of Gods, the Lord Nilakanta whose throat is sable blue, can break my falling into the world.

Mahabaho, with tapasya gain the grace of the Lord Siva, river of boons. He will bear my descent upon his head; he will fulfil your desire, and save your sires, O King."

Maharaja Bhagiratha went to Mount Kailasa and undertook another great penace, and after a long tapasya, he gained the grace of Lord Siva, worker of blessings. Protector of men, that king secured from Mahadeva a boon that the Ganga might fall safely upon his head, and flow into the world.'

Lomasa sayas, 'The blessed Siva listened to Bhagiratha's petition, and, also, in order to fulfil the wishes of the dwellers in Swarga, said, "Tathastu! So be it, O guardian of men, O Mighty-armed. For your sake I will contain the descent of the pure and blessed and divine river of heaven, O King!"

Saying this, The Lord came to the snowy mountain, surrounded by his ganas, of awful mien, who bore uplifted weapons of diverse forms. Standing there, he said to Bhagiratha, most praiseworthy of men, Mahabaho, you pray to the river who is the daughter of the king of mountains. I will contain her when she falls down from Swarga."

Reassured by Siva, Bhagiratha made obeisance with utmost devotion, and directed his thoughts again towards Ganga. Seeing that Mahadeva stood to receive her fall, Ganga flashed down suddenly in a pure and crystal torrent from the sky, and the Devas, the Maharishis, the Gandharvas, the Nagas, and the Yakshas, assembled there as witnesses.

Down from the sky came the snow mountain, Himavan's daughter; her whirpools raged and she teemed with fish and sharks. O King, directing her course towards the sea, she separated herself into three streams; and her water was strewn with piles of froth, which seemed like so many rows of white ganders.

Sinuous and twisting, at times, at others stumbling, as it were; covered in foam as with a robe; she came down like a woman drunk. Elsewhere, by virtue of the roar of her waters, she gave vent to loud sounds.

Thus assuming many different aspects, when she fell from the sky, she reached the surface of the earth, and said to Bhagiratha, "Great King, show me the path I must take! Lord of the earth, for your sake I have come down into the world."

Bhagiratha made a course towards where the dead sons of mighty Sagara lay, so that the sacred waters might drench their ashes. Having borne and contained the fall of Ganga, Siva, saluted by all men, went back to Kailasa, best of mountains, accompanied by the Devas.

With Ganga following him, Bhagiratha reached the sea; and the sea, the abode of Varuna, was quickly filled! The king adopted Ganga as his own daughter, and at that spot offered libations of water, tarpana, to the manes of his ancestors; thus was his heart's wish fulfilled.

At your asking me, I have narrated the whole story of how Ganga, running in three streams, was brought down to the earth to fill the sea; how the mighty Sage drained the sea for a particular reason, and how Vatapi, slayer of Brahmanas, was destroyed by Agastya.'" Vaisampayana said, "O lord of the Bhaaratas, next the son of Kunti goes leisurely to the two rivers Nanda and Aparananda, which have the virtue of destroying the dread of sin. Reaching a great mountain Hemakuta, he sees many strange and inconceivable sights there. When their party merely speak among themselves, clouds rumble into the sky and a thousand volleys of stones fall, so they cannot climb the mountain.

Here the winds blow incessantly, and the heavens forever lash down rain; they also hear the chanting of the Veda, yet they see nobody. In the evening and in the morning they see the blessed fire that carries offerings to the gods, and there sharp insects sting them to interrupt their tapasya.

An unaccountable sadness overtakes the soul, and men fall sick. Seeing all these uncanny phenomena, Yudhishtira asks Lomasa what they are and what causes them.

Lomasa says, "Parantapa, Rajan, I will tell you about this as we heard it of old; listen carefully to what I say.

Upon this peak of Rishabha, there was once a Rishi of that name, who lived for hundreds of years. He was devoted to penance and was also wrathful. When some men came and spoke to him, interrupting his dhyana, he said in anger to the mountain, "If any man speaks in this place, cast stones at him and summon the winds to prevent him from making any sound."

This was what the sage said; and so, in this place, as soon as a man utters any words, he is forbidden by a roaring cloud. Rajan, in anger he also forbade other deeds in this place, that Maharishi.

Yudhishtira, tradition has it that, when of old, the Devas came to the Nanda, suddenly a number of men arrived there to look at the gods. However, the Devas, at whose head Indra stood, did not want to be seen; and so they rendered this place inaccessible, by raising obstructions in the form of mountains. From that day, O Kaunteya, men could not cast their eyes, at any time, upon what looked like this mountain, far less climb it.

No one who has not led an austere life can see this mountain, or ascend it.

Therefore, O son of Kunti, keep your tongue under control. Here, at that time, all those gods performed the most sacred yagnas. O Bhaarata, even to this day the marks of those sacrifices can be seen. This grass here has the form of the sacred kusa grass; the ground here seems to be covered by the sacred grass; and, O lord of men, so many of these trees here look as if they are ideal for tying up yagnapasus.

O Bhaarata, the Devas and the Rishis still dwell here and one can see their sacred agni burning in the morning and in the evening. If one bathes here, one's sins are immediately destroyed, Kaunteya! So, best of the Kurus, you and your younger brothers, perform your ablutions here.

Having bathed in the Nanda, you must journey to river Kausiki, to the place where Viswamitra performed his great tapasya."

Yudhishtira, and all that are with him, bathe in that river, and then go on to the Kausiki, crystalline, her waters cool and delightful.

Lomasa says, "This is the pure and divine Kausiki. Lord of the Bhaaratas, here is the enchanting asrama of Viswamitra; and there is the hermitage of the mighty-souled Kasyapa, whose son was Rishyasringa, devoted to tapasya, his passions under control. Through the rigours of his penance he forced Indra to pour down his rain during a drought, for the Deva, slayer of Bala and Vritra, was in dread of Rishyasringa's penance.

That powerful son of Kasyapa was born of a hind. He worked a great marvel in the kingdom of Lomapada; and when the rains brought forth crops in his lands, Lomapada gave his daughter Shanta in marriage to Rishyasringa, even as the Sun gave away his daughter Savitri."

Yudhishtira says, "How was Kasyapa's son, Rishyasringa, born of a hind? And how was he endowed with such holiness, being the offspring of a sinful sexual union? Why did Indra fear this Rishi, so he poured down his rain during a time of drought?

Tell us about the beauty of the princess Shanta, pure in life, she who captivated his heart when he had turned himself into a stag? And since the Rajarishi Lomapada was as virtuous as he is known to have been, why was it that over his lands, Indra, scourge of Paka, withheld rain?

Most holy one, I beg you, relate all this to me in detail, exactly as it happened, for I want to know everything about Rishyasringa's life."

Lomasa says, 'Listen to how Rishyasringa, of dreaded name, was born as the son of Kasyapa Muni's son Vibhandaka, a Brahmana Rishi who had evolved through tapasya, of unfailing seed, who was learned and bright like the Lord of beings. And the father was honoured, and the son was possessed of a mighty spirit, and, though a boy, he was respected by old men.

Vibhandaka went to a great lake and devoted himself to the practice of austerities. He who was like a Deva performed a long penance. One day, while he was washing his mouth in the water, he saw the Apsara Urvasi, at which he ejaculated his seed.

Rajan, a hind was drinking from the lake and she lapped up his seed, floating on the water, and at once she became pregnant. That hind was, in fact, a Devaputri, and Brahma had once told her, "You will be a hind; and while you have that form, you will give birth to a Rishi; then you will be free."

As fate would have it, and as the word of the Creator can never prove untrue, that female deer bore Vibhandaka's son, a mighty sage, Rishyasringa.

Rishyasringa, devoted to tapasya, always passed his days in the forest, and there was a horn on his head and for this he came to be known as Rishyasringa. Apart from his father, he had never seen any other man; and so, his life was entirely absorbed in brahmacharya.

During this same time, there was a king of the land of Anga known as Lomapada, who was a friend of Dasaratha. We have heard that, from his love of pleasure, he had been guilty of telling a lie to a Brahmana; and for that Lomapada was shunned by all men of the priestly varna, and he had no priest to perform his religious rites.

And Indra of a thousand eyes abruptly withdrew the rains from his kingdom and his people suffered. He asked a number of Brahmanas, devoted to austerities, of cultivated minds, "How will the heavens send us rain? Think of some expedient."

Each of them gave their view, and among them, the best, said to the king, "King of kings, the Brahmanas are angry with you, so you must do something to appease them. Send for Rishyasringa, the Muni's son, who lives in the forest and knows nothing of women, who is the epitome of simplicity.

O King, if he whose tapasya is so great, shows himself in your kingdom, I have no doubt that the rain will also come."

Lomapada made atonement for his sins, and he went away. When the Brahmanas had been pacified, he returned and his people were glad. The king of Anga convened a meeting of his ministers, men who were expert at giving counsel, and he sought their counsel to devise a plan to fetch Rishyasringa into his lands.

Finally, with the advice of those men versed in all branches of knowledge, very proficient in worldly matters, he settled on a plan. He sent for a number of courtesans, women of the town, all clever.

When they came, Lomapada said to them, "Lovely ones, you must find a way to entice Rishyasringa into my kingdom."

Those women, on the one hand afraid of the king's wrath and on the other dreading a curse from the Rishi, were alarmed and declared the business to be beyond their power.

However, one among them, a seasoned and forward woman, said to the king, "Maharajan, I will try to fetch him whose wealth consists solely of tapasya, into your lands. However, there are some things I will need to put my plan into action. If you can give me these, I might be able to bring Rishyasringa here."

The king gave an order that all that she might ask for should be procured. He also gave her a good deal of wealth and jewels of various kinds. Then, Lord of the earth, taking a number of young and beautiful women with her, she went to the forest.

Lomasa says, 'O Bhaarata, she prepared a floating hermitage, both because the king had ordered so, and also because it exactly accorded with her plan. Delightful it was, the floating asrama, with artificial trees adorned with various flowers and fruit, with diverse shrubs and creepers, and it provided delicious fruit. It truly looked as if it had been created by magic.

She moored this great craft very near the hermitage of Kasyapa's grandson, then sent emissaries to survey the places that that Rishi habitually frequented. Then she saw her opportunity, and sent forth her daughter, also a courtesan and of smart sense. That clever woman went to the vicinity of the Rishis's hermitage, and she saw Rishyasringa.

Approaching him, she said, "Muni, I hope that all is well with you and the other tapasvins. I trust that you have a plentiful store of fruit and roots and that you take delight in this hermitage.

I have come to visit you, and I hope the tapasya of the Rishis waxes, daily. I trust your father's spirit has not slackened and that he is well pleased with you. O Rishyasringa, I hope that you pursue the studies that are appropriate for you!"

Rishyasringa said, "You shine with lustre, as if you were made of light; and I say you are worthy of worship. I will give you padya to wash you feet and such fruit and roots that you might like, for this is what my dharma says.

This darbhasana is made of kusa grass and covered with a black deerskin to make it comfotable. Sit upon it, O Brahmana who resembles a Deva, and tell me where is your asrama. And what is this vrata called, which you now seem to be observing?"

The courtesan said, "O son of Kasyapa, my asrama is on the other side of yonder hill; it covers three yojanas and is full of delight. There, it is my faith not to receive obeisance or to touch water to wash my feet. I am not worthy of being worshipped by men like you, rather I must make my obeisance to you.

O Brahmana, this is the vrata that I must observe – to clasp you in my arms!"

Rishyasringa said, "Let me give you ripe fruits, gallnuts, myrobalans, karushas, ingudas from sandy soil, and figs. Be pleased to taste them and find some pleasure."

She, however, flung aside all those pure things he offered and instead gave him unclean things to eat, but deliciously prepared and fine to look at; and the innocent Rishyasringa found them most agreeable.

She gave him the most fragrant garlands, exquisite and shimmering garments to wear, and fine drink; they talked and laughed and played together. In his sight she played with a ball, sinuously, and seemed like a creeping plant broken in two, her lissom body.

Repeatedly she touched his body with her own, and clasped him in her arms. She took flowering twigs from sala, asoka and tilaka trees. Drunk, assuming a bashful look, she continued tempting Rishyasringa; and when she saw that she had touched his heart, she pressed his body with her own, again and again, and with sidelong, seductive glances, slowly wandered away, saying that she was going to make offerings to the fire.

When she left him, Rishyasringa was frantic with desire, and could think of nothing else but her. His mind turned constantly to her and felt empty. He began to sigh and seemed to be in great distress.

At that moment, Kasyapa's son Vibhandaka, whose eyes were tawny like a lion's, whose body was covered with hair down to the tips of his nails, who was devoted to Brahmana dharma, whose life was pure and spent in dhyana, came and saw his son sitting alone, pensive and sad, obviously distraught, and sighing again and again with upturned eyes.

Vibhandaka said to Rishyasringa, "My child, why are you not chopping firewood for the agni. I hope that you have offered havis, the burnt offering, today? I hope you have polished the sacrificial ladles and spoons and brought the calf to the milch cow whose milk gives us all we need to make our sacrificial offerings to the fire?

Surely, you are not yourself, my son. You are pensive, why, you seem to be terribly disturbed. Why are you so sad today? Who has come here this day?"

Rishyasringa said, "A Brahmachari with a mass of jata on his head came here today. He was neither short nor tall. He had a spirited look, a golden complexion, and eyes large as lotuses; and he was shining and graceful as a god.

Rich was his beauty, alight like the sun; and he was exceedingly fair, ah his eyes graceful and black. His twisted hair was blue-black and neat and long and fragrant and tied up with strings of gold. A beautiful ornament glittered at his throat, like lightning in the sky.

And under the throat he had two balls of flesh without a single hair upon them, and oh an exceedingly beautiful form, with such a slender waist and a deep navel; and the skin upon his chest was smooth. A golden string shone from under his cloth, just like this waist-string of mine.

There was something on his feet of a wonderful shape which gave forth a lovely tinkling. His wrists, likewise, bore a pair of ornaments that made a similar sound and looked just like these prayer beads. And when he walked, his ornaments sounded like delighted ganders upon a sheet of water.

He wore garments of wonderful make upon his person; these clothes I wear are by no means beautiful like those. His face was was also so wonderful to behold; and his voice was modulated to gladden the heart, just as his speech was as sweet as the song of the koyal; while I listened to him, I felt stirred in my inmost heart.

As a forest in spring is most graceful when swept by a breeze, even so, my father, that fragrant sage is most beautiful when the air fans him. His mass of hair is neatly tied and is slick againt his head and brow, divided evenly by a parting.

His eyes seemed to be covered with chakravaka birds of exceptionally beautiful forms. In his right hand he held a wonderful round fruit, which falls to the ground and again leaps up to the sky, in the strangest way; and he beats it and turns himself round and whirls: like a tree moved by the breeze.

When I looked at him, O father, he seemed to be a son of the Devas, and my joy was extreme, and my pleasure unbounded. He clasped my body, seized my matted hair, and bent me down, and mingling his mouth with my own, uttered a delightful sound I have never heard.

He does not care for padya or the fruit I offered him, and said to me that this was his vrata. But he gave me many fruit, and these we have do not match those nearly for taste. They have no rind nor any stone within them, like these.

That noble-formed one gave me water of such flavour that I have never drunk before; it was exquisite and having drunk it, I felt uncanny pleasure; why, the ground seemed to move under my feet.

These redolent garlands, entwined with silken threads, belong to him. And he, bright with fervent piety, scattered these garlands here, then went back to his own asrama. His going has saddened my heart; and my body seems to burn all over.

My desire is to go to him as soon as I can, and to have him walk about here every day. O father, let me go to him this very moment. Ah, what tapasya does he practise? As he, that pious one, is performing tapasya, I want to go and live with him, and share his penances. My heart yearns for his unusual mode of practising austerities; my soul will be in torment if I cannot see him."

Vibhandaka said, "My child, these are Rakshasas, who walk about in wonderful forms. Their strength is unrivalled and their beauty great, and they always strive to obstruct the practice of true austerities. They assume lovely forms and try to seduce by various means.

Those fierce beings hurled the Rishis, the dwellers in the forest, down from blessed regions won through their piety. And the Muni who has control over his soul, and who wants to gain the realms where the righteous go, must have nothing to do with them.

They are vile creatures, who obstruct tapasya and delight in that, and a Rishi should never look at them.

O my son, those were drinks unworthy to be drunk; they were spirits that sinners consume. And these garlands, bright and fragrant and of many hues, are not intended for sannyasis."

Having thus forbidden his son, saying that those were evil demons, Vibhandaka went in quest of her. When, after a three days' search he could not find her, he returned to his asrama.

In the meanwhile, when Rishyasrinuga went out to gather fruit, the courtesan returned to tempt him.

And as soon as Rishyasringa saw her, he was ecstatic and ran to her, crying, "Let us go to your asrama before my father returns!"

Rajan, those courtesans made Rishyasringa board their floating hermitage. As soon as he was aboard, they unmoored the vessel and cast off. With a myriad of pleasures they kept him engaged and delighted, until they arrived in the kingdom of Anga.

Then, leaving the floating vessel, of dazzling white, upon the water, they fetched the innocent Rishi, Vibhandaka's son, to the king Lomapada, who kept him in his antahpura, among his women. Suddenly, the heavens opened and it poured over the kingdom, why, the very world seemed to become flooded with water.

His fervent wish fulfilled, Lomapada bestowed his daughter Shanta on Rishyasringa in marriage.

With a view to appease the wrath of his father, he ordered kine to be placed, and fields to be ploughed, by the road that Vibhandaka would take to come to his son. He also set stout cowherds along the route, with a plenitude of cattle, and ordered them:

"When the Maharishi Vibhandaka asks you about his son, you must fold your hands and say to him that all these cattle, all these fields belong to his son, and that you yourselves are his slaves, ready to obey his every wish."

Now, having gathered roots and fruit, the Rishi Vibhandaka, whose temper was fierce, returned to his hermitage, and looked for his son; not finding him, he became fiercely angry. He was beside himself with fury and he suspected king Lomapadas hand in what had befallen Rishyasringa.

He set out for the city of Champa, having made up his mind to burn the king, his city, and his whole kingdom. On the way, he was tired and hungry, when he reached the cleverly placed and opulent cowherd settlements, rich with cattle. He felt honoured at the way in which the cowherds welcomed and feted him; and he spent that night in a manner befitting a king.

Having partaken of their great hospitality, he asked them, "To whom, O cowherds, do you belong?"

They surrounded him and said, "All this wealth has been provided for your son."

Vibhandaka continued his journey, and along his way he was similarly honoured, frequently. Finally, arriving, he saw Rishyasringa, his son, who looked like the god Indra in heaven. He also saw his daughter-in-law, shanta, looking like lightning springing from a cloud. Having seen everything provided for Rishyasringa, as well as the exquisite princess shanta, Vibhandaka was appeased.

Rajan, he expressed his satisfaction with Lomapada. The Maharishi, whose powers rivalled those of Surya and Agni, said to Rishyasringa, "As soon as a son is born to you, and having done all that this king wants from you, you must return immediately to the forest."

Rishyasringa did exactly as his father said, and he returned to Vibhandaka's asrama. Rajan, shanta obediently waited upon him, as in the firmament Rohini waits upon the Moon, or as the fortunate Arundhati waits upon Vasishta, or as Lopamudra waits upon Agastya. Just as Damayanti was an obedient wife to Nala, or as Sachi is to the god who wields the thunderbolt, or as Indrasena, Narayana's daughter, was always obedient to Mudgala, so did shanta wait lovingly upon Rishyasringa, while he lived in the forest.

This is the holy hermitage that was Rishyasringa's; ennobling the great lake here, it bears sacred fame. Perform your ablutions here and have your desire fulfilled. And having purified thyself, direct your course towards other holy tirthas.'" Vaisampayana said, "Then, O Janamejaya, the son of Pandu sets out from the river Kausiki and journeys in succession to all the sacred shrines; and he comes to the sea where the river Ganga flows into it. There, at the nave of five hundred rivers, he performs the holy ceremony of an ablution.

Then, O ruler of the earth, accompanied by his brothers, the valiant Kshatriya goes along the shore towards the land where the Kalinga tribes dwell.

Lomasa says, 'This is the land, Kaunteya, where the Kalinga tribes live. The river Vaitarani passes through it, upon the banks of which river Dharma Deva performed a tapasya, having first placed himself under the protection of the celestials.

This is the northern bank, with its charmed mountain, inhabited by Rishis, ideal for the performance of religious rites, and frequented by Brahmanas. This place rivals the path by which a virtuous man, fit for heaven, repairs to Devaloka. Here, in days of yore, other sages worshipped the Gods with austerities.

It was here, O King, that the Lord Rudra seized the sacrificial beast and cried, "This is my share!" Bharatottama, when Siva carried away the yagnapasu, the Devas said to him, "Do not covet the property of others, flouting the laws of dharma."

They eulogised the Lord Rudra, and pleased him with the offering of a sacrifice, and honoured him duly. Thereupon he gave up the beast, and left by the path trodden by the gods.

Hear what happened to Rudra, O Yudhishtira! Influenced by their dread of him, the Devas forevermore set apart the best of all shares of their offerings, what was fresh and not stale for him.

Whoever performs ablutions at this spot, while reciting this ancient story, will see, with his mortal eyes, the path that leads to Devaloka.'

All the sons of Pandu and the daughter of Drupada—all of whom were the favoured by fate—descend to the river Vaitarani, and offer libations in the names of their fathers.

Yudhishtira says, 'O Lomasa, how great must be the force of a pious deed! Having bathed here, I feel as if I am no more in the world of men! Maharishi, I see all the worlds! And I hear the holy Munis of the forest chanting the Veda.'

Lomasa says, 'Yudhishtira, the place from where the chanting comes is three hundred thousand yojanas from here. Lord of men, be quiet and utter no word. This is the divine forest of the Swayambhuva, which has now come to our view. There Viswakarma, whose name is dreaded, performed a yagna.

During that mighty sacrifice, the Self-existent One made a gift of this entire earth, with all its hilly and forest tracts, to Kasyapa, by way of dakshina, for serving as a priest. As soon as Bhumi Devi was given away, she became sad, and spoke in anger to that great lord, the ruler of the worlds.

"O Mahadeva, it is unworthy of you to give me away to an ordinary mortal, and this daana of yours will come to nothing. For I mean to plunge down into the bottom of Patala!"

When the blessed Rishi Kasyapa saw the goddess Earth despondent and angry, he performed a propitiatory ritual to appease her. Pandava, Bhumi Devi was pleased with his worship and she rose again from within the waters, and showed herself in the form of a sacred altar.

This, O king, is the place which distinctly manifests the form of a vedi. Walk over it, and you will gain valour and strength. Rajan, this is the very altar which reaches as far as the sea, and rests itself upon its bosom.

May good fortune be yours; climb here and by yourself walk out into the sea, while I perform the ritual for averting all evil from you. For, as soon as it receives a mortal's touch, this vedi at once enters into the sea.

Salutation to the God who protects the universe! Salutation to You that are beyond the universe! O Lord of gods, vouchsafe your presence in this sea.

Pandava, you must swiftly climb the vedi, while chanting this mantra: "The god of fire, and the sun, and the organ of generation, and water, and goddess and the seed of Vishnu, and the navel of nectar. The god of fire is the organ that generated the ocean; the earth is your body; Vishnu deposited the seed that caused your being and you are the navel of nectar!"

Chant these words aloud, Pandava, and plunge into the sea even as you do so. Otherwise, O best of Kunti's son, this lord of waters of divine birth, this most auspicious of all waters of the earth, must not be touched, not even with the tip of a blade of sacred grass.'

When the ritual for averting evil has been completed, Yudhishtira enters the sea, and having done everything that the Rishi had asked of him, repairs to the foothill of the Mahendra mountain, and spends the night in that place."

Vaisampayana said, "The king of the earth spends a single night there, and, with his brothers, pays the highest homage to the Rishis. And Lomasa acquaints him with the names of all of them – the Bhrigus, the Angiras, the Vasishtas, and the Kasyapas.

And the Rajarishi visits them all and makes obeisance to them, with folded hands.

And then he asks the valiant Akritavrana, who is a follower of Parasurama, 'When will the worshipful Parasurama show himself to the Rishis here? I, too, wish to have a darshana of the Bhargava.'

Akritavrana says, 'Rama already knows about your coming here, for his soul spontaneously knows all things. He is in every way well-pleased with you, and he will show himself readily to you.

The Rishis who perform tapasya here are allowed to see him on the fourteenth and the eighth day of the lunar month. When this night ends, tomorrow, the fourteenth day of this moon will begin; and you shall see him, clad in a sable deerskin, and wearing his hair in a mass of jata.'

Yudhishtira says, 'You have long been a follower of the mighty Rama, Jamadagni's son; you must have been an eye-witness to all his awesome deeds of yore.

I beg you, tell me how Rama vanquished all the Kshatriyas on the field of battle, and tell me also what the original cause of the conflict was.'

Akritavrana says, 'Bhaarata, gladly, I will narrate that great tale to you, the legend of the the godlike deeds of Rama, the son of Jamadagni, who belongs to the race of Bhrigu.

I will also relate the achievements of the great king of the Haihaya tribe; his name was Arjuna, and Parasurama killed him. He, O Pandava, was endowed with a thousand arms; and through the grace of Dattatreya he also had a golden, heavenly vimana.

His sway extended over all the worlds, and his vimana could go anywhere at his very thought. Become invincible with the boon, he went everywhere in that vimana, and rode rough over the Devas, Yakshas and Rishis, wherever he pleased; he tyrannised all the created.

Finally, the Devas and the Rishis of austere tapasya went together to Vishnu, slayer of demons, God of gods, of inexorable prowess, and said to him, "Blessed and revered Lord, if creation is to be saved, you must kill Kartaviryarjuna."

The mighty king of the Haihayas, riding his vimana, rudely affronted Indra, while that Deva was alone with his queen Sachi. At this, O Bhaarata, the Lord Vishnu consulted with Indra with a view to killing Kartavirya's son Arjuna.

Indra told Vishnu all about Arjuna's depredations and sins, and the God whom the worlds worship went to the enchanted Badari forest, which was his own chosen tapovana.

At this very time, there lived on the earth a mighty sovereign, monarch in the land of Kanyakubja, a king with a vast army. His name was Gadhi and his fame resounded through the world. He, however, retired into the forest, becoming a vanaprastha.

While he lived in the vana, a daughter was born to him, as beautiful as an Apsara was she. And Richika, the son of Bhrigu, asked for her to be his wife.

Gadhi said to that Brahmana, who led a most austere life, "We have a family custom in our race, founded by our most ancient ancestors -know, O Brahmanottama, that he who wishes to marry a princess of our clan must offer a dowry of a thousand fleet horses, whose colour must be brown and every one of which must have a single sable ear.

But, son of Bhrigu, a reverend Muni like you cannot be asked to make the same offering, neither can I refuse to give my daughter to an exalted and holy one like you."

Richika said, "I will give you a thousand fleet steeds, brown in hue and each one with a single black ear; give me your daughter."

Richaka went to Varuna and said, "Give me a thousand swift horses, brown in colour, and each with one black ear. I want them as the dowry for my marriage."

Varuna gave him a thousand steeds. These steeds had issued out of the river Ganga; and so the place has been named Aswatirtha.

In the city of Kanyakubja, the daughter of Gadhi, the princess Satyavati was given in marriage; and the gods themselves were in the bride's party. Thus, Richaka, best of Brahmanas, procured a thousand horses, and saw the dwellers of heaven and won a wife. And he enjoyed the girl of the slender waist, and gratified all the desire that he ever had.

When the marriage had been celebrated, O king, his father Bhrigu came on a visit to see him and his wife; and he was glad to see his son. The husband and wife together paid their respects to him, who was worshipped by all the gods. Bhrigu sat, and they stood near him with folded hands, waiting to do his bidding.

Maharishi Bhrigu, glad at heart, said to his daughter-in-law, "Lovely child, ask me for a boon, I will give you anything you want."

And she asked that a son might be born to both herself and her mother. And he granted her wish.

Bhrigu said, "During the days that your season lasts, you and your mother must bathe, observing the vrata to bear a son. Then you must both separately embrace two different trees – she a peepal tree, and you a fig tree.

Dutiful child, here are two pots of payasa, rice and milk, which I have prepared with great care. I have combed the universe to find the medicaments that I have blended into this payasa. With great care must you both drink this."

Saying this, he vanished. However, the two women interchanged not only the vessels of payasa that he gave them but also the trees that they embraced. After many days, the Sage appeared again, and he already knew, through his mystic vision, what had happened.

The mighty Bhrigu said to Satyavati, his daughter-in-law, "Dharmaputri, you ate the wrong pot of payasa and you embraced the wrong tree. It was your mother who deluded you. You will have a son who, though born a Brahmana, will have the character and nature of a Kshatriya. Your mother will have a Kshatriya son who will live the life of a Brahmana, and great shall be his power and he will walk the path trodden by the righteous."

She begged repeatedly, "O let my son not be so but my grandson!"

And, O Pandava, Bhrigu replied, "Tathastu, so be it!" and he was pleased to grant her wish.

On the expected day, she gave birth to a son, who was called Jamadagni, endowed with both splendour and grace. As he grew in years and in strength, he excelled all the other Sages in his knowledge of the Vaidik lore. Bhaarata, he rivalled the Sun in lustre and the entire astra shastra, the martial science, and the fourfold Devastra gyana came to him spontaneously, with no instruction.'

Akritavrana says, 'Jamadagni devoted himself to the study of the Veda and the practice of tapasya, and became famous for his .great austerities. He pursued a deep and systematic course of study and gained mastery over the entire Veda.

Then, O king, he went to Prasenajit and sought the hand of Renuka in marriage. That king happily gave the Sage his daughter, and having got Renuka for his wife, the Bhrigunandana, delight of Bhrigu's race, began living with her in his asrama; now, he performed tapasya and she helped and looked after him.

Four boys were born to her, Rama the fifth. Although the youngest, he was superior to all his brothers.

One day, when her sons had gone into the forest to gather fruit, the pure and austere Renuka went to bathe in the river. While bathing, she happened to see the king of Martikavataka, who was known as Chitraratha. This Kshatriya, wearing a lotus wreath upon his chest, was sporting with his wives in the water.

Seeing his magnificent form, Renuka was touched by desire that she could not contain, and she sinned in thought in the very river and was polluted. She returned to the hermitage, trembling in her heart. Her husband instantly saw the condition she was in, and seeing that the lustre of chastity had abandoned his wife, he cried out in anguish and anger.

At that very moment, the eldest of Jamadagni's sons, Rumanvan arrived there; and then, Sushena, and then, Vasu, and Viswavasu also. One by one, the Maharishi ordered them to kill their mother. However, they could not find the heart to do so; they stood silent. He cursed them in anger, and they lost their reason, and became like senseless things, dull as inanimate objects, and in conduct like beasts and birds.

Now, Rama arrived in the asrama, last of all. The mighty-armed Jamadagni, of great austerities, said to him, "Kill this evil mother of yours, without compunction, O my son."

Rama immediately took up an axe and cut off his mother's head. The wrath of Mahatama Jamadagni was appeased; and well-pleased, he said,

"My child, knower of dharma, you have done this most difficult thing at my bidding. Ask me for whatever your heart wishes for and I will give you everything you want."

At which, Rama asked that his mother be restored to life, and that he himself not be haunted by the remembrance of his savage deed and that he might not be affected by any sin, and that his brothers might recover their former condition, and that he might be unrivalled on the field of battle, and have a long life.

Bhaarata, Jamadagni of awesome tapasya granted all those wishes of Rama.

Then, one day, when the Sage's sons had all gone out again, the valiant son of Kartavirya, the lord of the country near the shore of the sea, came to Jamadagni's hermitage. The Sage's wife received him hospitably. However, intoxicated with a Kshatriya warrior's pride, he was; not pleased with the reception given to him, and forcibly seized and carried off the foremost among the cows whose milk supplied the sacral butter, heedless of its loud lowing.

He wantonly tore down the great trees of the forest. When Rama came home, his father told him all that had happened. When Rama saw how the cow lowed for its calf, anger arose in his heart and he rushed towards Kartavirya's son, whose last moments had drawn near.

Then Bhargava, scourge of the Kshatriyas, put forth his valour on the field of battle, and with flat-tipped, sharp arrows loosed from a beautiful bow, cut away Kartaviryarjuna's thousand arms, which were as massive as great door bolts. Touched by the hand of death, Kartavirya's son died at Rama's hands.

Their wrath stirred against Rama, Arjuna's kinsmen rushed at Jamadagni in his hermitage, while Rama was still away. They slew him there; for although his strength was great, he was at tapasya and would not fight. Helplessly, repeatedly, he cried out Rama's name in a piteous voice.

And, O Yudhishtira, the sons of Kartavirya shot Jamadagni dead with their arrows, and left the asrama. When they had gone, and when Jamadagni had breathed his last, Rama Bhrigunandana returned to the hermitage, bearing fuel for the sacred agni in his arms, and saw his father lying slain. He was stricken and railed against the grievous fate that had caused this tragedy.'

Rama cried, "The blame is mine, O father, that the wretched sons of Kartavirya have shot you dead with arrows, like a stag in the woods. O father, you were always virtuous and never swerved from the path of dharma, nor harmed any living creature. How did Fate bring you such a vile death?

What an awful sin they have committed, who have killed you with hundreds of arrows, although you were an old man and performing tapasya and would not fight them! With what face will those shameless ones speak of this deed of theirs to their friends and servants? That they have murdered an unassisted and unresisting holy man?"

O King, thus Rama of great penance wailed, piteously, and then, at last, performed the obsequies for his dead sire. Rama, conqueror of hostile cities, cremated his father on a pyre, and vowed, O scion of Bharata, to annihilate the very race of Kshatriyas.

Of awesome strength, with the valour of a great warrior, and comparable to the god of death himself, he took up his weapon in wrath, went forth and singlehandedly put Kartavirya's sons to death. In three encounters, he struck down all the Kshatriya followers of Kartavirya's sons.

And seven times, that powerful one exterminated the warrior tribes of the earth. In the land called Samanta-panchaka, he made five lakes of their blood.

There the mightiest scion of Bhrigu's race offered tarpana to his ancestors, and Richika appeared to him in a visible form, and spoke words of counsel to him; after this, Jamadagni's son performed a mighty sacrifice and gratified the king of the Devas, and gifted the Earth to the ministering priests.

Lord of men, he raised a golden altar there, ten vyamas in breadth and nine in height, and gifted that vedi to the great Kasyapa. At Kasyapa's bidding, the Brahmanas divided the altar into a number of shares, and so they became known as as the Khandavayanas, the share takers.

The exterminator of the Kshatriyas bestowed the earth upon Mahatma Kasyapa, then engaged himself in an atikatora tapasya. He now dwells upon this Mahendra, monarch of hills.

So it was that there were hostilities between Rama and all the Kshatriyas of the world; and killing them, Rama conquered all the earth,' says Akritavrana.

Then on the fourteenth day of the moon, at the appointed hour, the mighty-souled Rama shows himself to those Brahmanas and also to the virtuous Yudhishtira and his younger brothers. And, O king of kings, the Pandavas worship Rama, and also all the other Dvijas. After worshipping Jamadagni's son and receiving words of praise from him, at Parasurama's behest, Yudhishtira spends the night on the Mahendra Parvata, and then sets out on his journey towards the southern lands."

Vaisampayana said, "The great king pursues his journey, and at different places on the sea shore he visits all the auspicious tirthas to which Brahmanas went. And O son of Parikshit, Yudhishtira bathes in them all, and his brothers with him.

Later, they come to a sacred river, holiest of them. There, also, the king performs his ablutions and offers libations to his ancestors and the gods, and distributes riches to the leaders of the dvijas.

Next he comes to the Godavari, river that falls direcdy into the sea. There he is freed from his sins. He reaches the sea in the Dravida land, and visits the holy tirtha bearing Agastyas name, which is exceedingly sacred and exceptionally pure. The valiant king visits the feminine tirthas, of the crocodiles who were Apsaras; here he listens to the story of Arjuna's feat, which no other mortal man could have performed.

Here, the Pandava is praised by the highest men among all Brahmanas, and Yudhishtira experiences the greatest delight. And, O Lokarakshaka, along with Krishnaa, Pandu's son bathes in those tirthas, and lauding Arjuna's valour, spends some delightful time there.

Yudhishtira gives away thousands of cows at those tirthas on the coast of the sea; and with his brothers tells, with pleasure, of how Arjuna had made a gift of kine here. Rajan, one after another, they visit those holy places, both on the coast and many other sacred spots, as well, fulfiling their hearts' desire, until they come to that holiest tirtha known as Surparaka.

Crossing over a stretch of the sea coast, they arrive at a forest celebrated over the world. Here the Devas had performed tapasya in the elder days, and so had the great Rajarishis of dharma undertaken yagnas. Here, Yudhishtira, of long and mighty arms, sees the celebrated altar of Richaka's son, who had been the greatest of archers.

And the vedi is surrounded by hosts of ascetics, altar fit to be worshipped by men of dharma. The king sees the holy, and beautiful, and delightful shrines of all the Devas and of the Vasus, and of the Maruts and of the Aswin twins, the celestial physicians, and of Yama, son of Surya, and of Kubera, the lord of riches, and of Indra, and of Vishnu, and of Brahma and of Siva, and of Soma the Moon, and of Surya, author of day, and of Varuna, lord of waters, and of the host of Sadhyas, and of the Pitrs, and of Rudra together with all his ganas, and of Saraswati, the goddess of learning, and of the host of Siddhas, and of many other immortal holy gods besides.

In all those shrines the king observes various vratas, and gives away countless gemstones. He bathes in all the tirthas, then returns to Surparaka, from where, with his brothers, he crosses to Prabhasa, whose fame great Brahmanas have spread throughout the world.

There Yudhishtira, of the large reddish eyes, bathes with his brothers and offers libations to the Pitrs and the Devas, as do Krishnaa and all the Brahmanas travelling with them, and Lomasa as well. For twelve days he subsists upon air and water, and performs ablutions during those days and their nights, surrounding himself with kindled fires.

Thus that greatest of all virtuous men engages himself in asceticism, while word reaches Balarama and Krishna in Dwaraka of Yudhishtira's severe penance, and those two lords of all the Vrishnis, bring a large complement of soldiers with them, and come to meet the Pandava of the race of Ajamidha.

When the Vrishnis see the sons of Pandu lying upon the ground, their bodies covered in dirt, when they see the daughter of Drupada in a piteous condition, their grief is great and they cannot stop themselves from breaking out into loud lamentation.

Now the king, whose courage is such that no misfortune can ever prevail over his heart, rises and lovingly meets Rama and Krishna and Krishna's son Samba, and the grandson of Sini and other Vrishnis, and pays his respects to them, suitably. In return, they also honour him and all the sons of Pritha, who in turn honour them.

And they seat themselves around Yudhishtira, as the Devas sit around Indra, O king! He describes the machinations of his enemies to them, and how he has spent his years in the forest, and how Arjuna has gone to Indra's realm to acquire the Devastras; he is joyful in their company and relates all this with a light and glad heart.

And they are happy to learn all this news from him; but when they see the Pandavas so emaciated, the majestic and kindly Vrishnis cannot stanch their tears, gushing from their eyes for the anguish they feel."

Janamejaya said, "O you of ascetic wealth, when the sons of Pandu and the Vrishnis reach holy Prabhasa, what do they do and whatconversation do they have between them? For all of them were such Mahatmans, and held each other in high esteem."

Vaisampayana said, "When the Vrishnis arrive in holy Prabhasa, the sacred landing on the coast of the sea, they surround the sons of Pandu and wait upon them.

Then, Balarama, whose complexion is as fair as the milk of the cow, the kunda flower, the moon, silver and the lotus root, Balarama who wears a vanamala and whose weapon is the ploughshare, speaks to the lotus-eyed Panchali, 'Krishnaa, I do not see that the practice of dharma leads to any good or that sin fetches evil upon the sinners, for I see the godly Yudhishtira in this miserable condition, with matted hair, a vanaprastha, and wearing valkala; while Duryodhana rules the earth, and the ground does not open to swallow him.

It would seem that a life of viciousness is more rewarding than a virtuous one. All ordinary men wonder that the sinner Duryodhana flourishes while the righteous Yudhishtira Dharmaputra, who cleaves to justice, is always honest and liberal has been robbed of his throne.

Why, this son of Pritha would give up his kingdom and his pleasure but would not swerve from the path of dharma. How do Bhishma and Kripa and the Brahmana Drona and the old king Dhritarashtra live happily after banishing the sons of Pandu into exile? Ah, fie on the sinful lords of Bharata's race!

What will Dhritarashtra say to the Pitrs of his noble line when the wretch meets them in the next world? He has cast his sinless sons from their throne; how can he ever claim that he is not guilty of the worst crime?

At this time he does not see with his mind's eye that he has acted blindly, and truly gone blind in the sight of the kings of the earth. It is because he has banished Kunti's son from his kingdom! I have no doubt that, when he with his sons perpetrated this inhuman act, Vichitravirya's son saw the dread smasana where bodies are burnt with flowering trees of a golden hue.

Surely, when these stooped towards him, the evil dead with great crimson, staring eyes, he must have heeded their vicious counsel, since he so fearlessly sent Yudhishtira to the forest, even while this son of Pandu had all his weapons with him and his brothers, as well.

This Bhima here, whose voracious appetite is like that of a wolf, can decimate a formidable army just with the strength of his arms and bearing no weapon. The forces on the battlefield were unmanned just to hear his war-cry. And now this mighty one suffers from hunger and thirst, and is emaciated with toilsome journeys.

But when he takes up his arrows and other weapons, and meets his enemies on the field, he will remember the suffering of his wretched forest-life, and kill them to the last man – of this I have no doubt.

Throughout the whole world no one can boast of strength and prowess equal to his. Alas, his great body is denuded by the cold, and heat and the winds. But when he stands up to fight, he will not spare a single enemy.

This mighty Kshatriya is inexorable when he rides a chariot — this Vrikodara single-handedly conquered all the rulers of the east, together with ther armies; and he returned from those wars uninjured. And that same Bhima, clad miserably in the bark of trees, now leads a sorry life in the vana.

This powerful Sahadeva vanquished all the kings of the south; those lords of men who amassed on the sea coast – look at him now in tapasavesham, an anchorite's garb. Valiant Nakula singe-handedly vanquished the kings of the west; and he now roams the jungles, subsisting on fruit and roots, with a matted mass of jata on the head, and his body covered with dirt.

This daughter of a king who is a maharatha, rose from the flames during a sacrifice. She has always known a life of luxury and happiness; how does she now endure this sorry existence in a forest?

And the son of the god of virtue—dharma which stands at the head of the three purusharthas—and the son of the wind god and the son of the lord of the Devas, and these two sons of the Aswini Kumaras – how do they live in the forest deprived of all comforts?

When Dharmaputra was beaten at dice, and when he, his wife, his brothers and his followers were all driven into exile, and Duryodhana began to flourish, why did the very earth not perish with all her mountains?"

Satyaki says, "Rama, this is not the time to lament. Although Yudhishtira does not say a single word, we must do what the time and occasion demand. Those who have others to look after their welfare do not need to undertake anything themselves; others do their work, as Saibya and the rest did for Yayati.

So, too, Rama, those who have friends, patrons who, of their own accord, fight their causes meet with no trials, as if they are helpless. How is it that when the sons of Pritha have Balarama and Krishna for friends and patrons, as well as Samba and Pradyumna and myself—we who can protect the three worlds—how is it then that Yudhishtira lives in the forest with his brothers?

Even today our army of Dasarhas, fully armed and wearing chequered mail, should march on Hastinapura, and the Vrishnis should send Dhritarashtra's sons and their allies to Yamaloka. If roused, Krishna by himself, Krishna who wields the bow made of horn, could subdue all the world. Krishna, I ask you to kill Dhritarashtra's son, with all his men, even as Indra did Vritra.

Pritha's son Arjuna is my brother, and my friend, and my guru; he is like another Krishna. It is for this that men wish for a worthy son, and that a guru seeks a pupil who would never contradict him. It is for this that the time has come for that best of all tasks, difficult to perform.

I will baffle Duryodhana's volleys of weapons with my archery. I will overpower them all on the field of battle. In my wrath, I will strike him down with my fine shafts that are no less than snakes, poison and fire. And with the keen edge of my sword, I will cut his head from his trunk, on the battlefield.

After this, I will kill his followers, and annihilate all of Kuru's race. O son of Rohini, let the followers of Bhima look at me with joy in their hearts, when I wield my weapons on the field of war, when I slay all their best warriors, just as fire consumes the worlds like bales of straw, when time ends.

Kripa and Drona and Vikarna and Karna will not stand against Pradyumna's fierce arrows. And I know the power of Arjuna's son – he is like the son of Krishna in battle. Let Samba punish Dusasana; let him kill Dusasana and his charioteer and destroy his ratha, for on the field of battle Jamabavati's son is irresistible and nothing can withstand him. Why, when he was a mere boy he routed the Asura Sambaras army; he slew Asvachakra, whose thighs were like pillars, and whose muscular arms were of great length.

Who can even approach Samba's chariot? Even as all mortals that are born do not escape death, so, too, whoever meets Samba on the battlefield will die.

As for Krishna, he will burn up the enemy troops with his astras of fire; he will kill the maharathas Bhishma and Drona, and Somadatta surrounded by all his sons. Who or what is there in all the world, including the gods, that Krishna cannot vanquish in battle when he takes up arms?

Then let Aniruddha also take up his bow and sword, and let him cover the earth with Dhritarashtra's sons, their heads hewn from their trunks, even as a sacrificial vedi is strewn with blades of kusa grass.

And Gada and Ulmuka, and Bahuka and Bhanu and Nitha and the young Nishatha, so valiant in battle, and Sarana, and Charudeshna, inexorable in war – let them all perform feats that befit their race.

Let the united army of the Satwatas and Suras, together with the best warriors of the Vrishnis, the Bhojas, and the Andhakas slay the sons of Dhritarashtra upon the field of war, and swell their great fame throughout the world.

Then let Abhimanyu rule the world as long as this best of virtuous men, Yudhishtira, is away fulfilling the vow that he swore during the game of dice. After that time expires, he will rule the world again, unchallenged, for we would have slain all his enemies already. No son of Dhritarashtra will remain on earth, neither the Sutaputra.

This is the vital mission before us, which we must accomplish without delay."

Krishna says, "O scion of the race of Madhu, what you say is true and we accept and honour your words, always valiant one! But this bull of the Kurus would never accept sovereignty of the earth, unless it were won by the prowess of his own arms. Neither for the sake of pleasure, nor from fear, nor from greed would Yudhishtira ever renounce Kshatriya dharma; and nor would these two heroes, the maharathas Bhima and Arjuna; nor the twins, and neither Drupada's daughter Krishnaa.

Vrikodara and Dhananjaya have no equals or rivals in battle throughout the word. And why will this king not rule the whole world when he has Madri's twin sons to fight for him?

The noble king of Panchala, together with the Kekaya king, and we ourselves shall put forth our might, and at that time the enemies of Yudhisthira shall be annihilated."

Yudhishtira says, "It is not strange that you should say this, Satyaki! However, to me dharma must be the first consideration, above that of sovereign power.

But only Krishna knows what I am, just as I alone know who he truly is. Scion of Madhu, most valiant of Sini's race, when Krishna knows that the time for war has come, he, Kesava of the beautiful hair, will also help vanquish Suyodhana.

But today let the Dasarha heroes go back; they are my patrons and the greatest of all men, who have visited me here. O you of immeasurable strength, never fall away from the path of dharma, and I will see you again and that shall be a joyful occasion."

Then, after exchanging mutual greetings and paying obeisance to their elders, and having embraced the youthful, the Yadavas and the Pandavas part. The Yadus return to their home, and the Pandavas continue their tirthayatra.

Leaving Krishna, Yudhishtira, accompanied by his brothers and servants, and also by Lomasa, goes to the sacred river Payoshni, with its fine landing-ford that had been built by the king of Vidarbha. The Pandavas begin living on the banks of the Payoshni, whose waters are mixed with Soma rasa.

There, Yudhishtira is greeted with praise and affection by very many Brahmanas, who are delighted to see him in that place.

Lomasa says, "Rajan, King Nriga performed a sacrifice here, he gratified Indra Purandara with the offering of Soma rasa. Indra was refreshed and very pleased. Here, Indra and the Devas and the protectors of all born beings celebrated Mahayagnas of diverse kinds, and gave abundant wealth to the ministering priests.

Here King Amurtarayasa, lord of the earth, gratified Indra Vajradhari, also with Soma rasa, when that king performed seven aswamedha yagnas. All things which in other sacrifices are made of wood and earth, were made of gold at those seven horse sacrifices.

And he himself fashioned for all the rites seven sets of stakes, the rings for the sacrificial stambas, the pots, the ladles, utensils, and spoons. On top of each sacrificial stake, seven rings were fastened, and, O Yudhishtira, Indra and the Devas themselves erected the stakes of shining gold which had been prepared for that king's sacred rites.

In all the magnificent yagnas of Gaya, protector of the earth, he delighted Indra by giving him Soma rasa to drink, and the ministering priests were gratified with the untold wealth the king gave them. As no one can count the sand-grains of the earth, or the stars in the sky, or rain-drops when it rains, so, too, the wealth Gaya gave away was beyond calculation, it was past anything given before, even during the seven aswamedhas.

And Viswakarman created golden images of Saraswati, Goddess of speech, and Gaya gave these away to the Brahmanas who attended his sacrifice, coming from all the directions and cardinal points.

Lord of men, when King Gaya, Mahatman, performed his sacrifices, he erected sacrificial mounds at so many different places that but little space was left upon the surface of the earth. Bhaarata, through this Mahayagna, Gaya attained Devaloka, Indra's realm.

Whoever bathes in the river Payoshni goes to the realms which Gaya attained, so, Rajadhiraja, prince of dharma, you and your brothers must bathe in this river; and, O protector of the earth, you will be freed from all sin.'

Purushottama, Yudhishtira and his brothers perform ablutions in the river Payoshni, after which they journey on to the hill of sapphires and the great river Narmada, where Lomasa names all the sacred tirthas for the Pandava and all the holy shrines of the Devas, as they visit each of these, one after the other, at their leisure.

At each of them, Brahmanas by thousands receive gifts from Yudhishtira.

Lomasa says, 'Kaunteya, he who visits the Vaidurya Parvata, the sapphire mountain, and immerses his body in the river Narmada, attains the lokas of the Devas and the Rajarishis. This is the cusp of the Dwapara and the Kali yugas; this is the time when a man rids himself of all his sins.

This is where Saryati performed sacrificial rites, at which Indra appeared and drank Soma rasa, along with the Aswini Kumaras. And here Bhrigu's son of great tapasya became angry with Mahendra, and the mighty Chyavana paralysed Indra, and gained the princess Sukanya for his wife.'

Yudhishtira says, 'How did Chyavana paralyse the Deva of the six gunas, the scourge of Paka? Why did the Maharishi become angry with Indra? And how, O Brahmana, did Chyavana enable the Aswini Kumaras to drink the Soma rasa? I beg you, tell me about all this exactly as it happened.'

Lomasa says, "A son was born to the Maharishi Bhrigu, and he was called Chyavana. He was respelendent and sat in tapasya on the banks of the lake you see there. Pandava, Chyavana of great tejas sat in the posture called Vira; he sat quiet and still as a post, for a very long time, in the same place.

An anthill covered him, and creepers the hillock. Swarms of ants enveloped him, and he looked just like a mound of earth, but he continued his tapasya, lost to the world.

When a long time passed, King Saryati came to this fine lake for his amusement. With him, came four thousand women, his wives all, O Bhaarata! Also with him came his only daughter, Sukanya of the beautiful brows.

She wore jewels fit for the Apsaras, was surrounded by her sakhis, and while wandering here, came to the anthill inside which Bhrigu's son sat in dhyana. She looked around her, enchanted by the beauty of the place, the grand and lofty trees.

Ah, she was exquisite and in the prime of her youth. She was playful and began to break the twigs of the forest trees bearing blossoms. Bhrigu's son of awesome intelligence saw her roaming about bright like a streak of lightning, now having left her maids behind, and wearing just a single cloth and her ornaments.

The Muni was stricken with desire, and he called out to her in a low voice, but she did not hear him. Then she saw his eyes shining through the anthill, and not knowing what they were, and becoming curious, she pierced those eyes with a twig of thorns. From that searing pain of being blinded Chyavana in anger cursed Saryati and his party -freezing their bowels! Unable to answer the calls of nature, the men suffered direly.

Seeing their agony, the knowing king asked, "Who has offended the illustrious son of Bhrigu? He is old and always at tapasya, and he is wrathful. Tell me quickly if you know who has wronged him."

His soldiers replied, "We do not know who has wronged the Rishi. We ask you to inquire into this thing."

At which, using both menace and conciliation, Saryati asked his advisors and friends about what had happened, but they did not know anything either.

When Sukanya saw the distress of the army and her father aggrieved, she said, "Roving in the forest, I lighted upon this anthill and saw something shining inside it. Taking it for glowworms, I pierced the anthill with thorns."

Saryati immediately came to the anthill, and there he saw Bhrigu's son, old both in years and tapasya. With folded hands, the lord of the earth begged the Sage, "My daughter did this atrocious thing in ignorance and youth, it becomes you to forgive her."

Bhrigu's son Chyavana said, "Full of pride, she pierced my eyes. O King, I will forgive you only on one condition – that you give me your beautiful, ignorant and arrogant daughter for my wife."

Saryati never paused but bestowed Sukanya on Mahatama Chyavana. Now the holy one was pleased with the king and withdrew his curse. Having won the Rishi's grace, the king went home to his city, with his troops.

Having become the Muni's wife, the lovely Sukanya quickly proved herself to be dutiful – in tending to his needs, in keeping vows and practising austerities herself, in observing dharma. She was graceful, guileless and she worshipped her husband Chyanava, she looked after his guests, whenever they came, and she kept the sacred fire burning."

Lomasa says, "One day the Aswin twins saw Sukanya, when she had just finished bathing and she was naked. They approached her, who was as beautiful as the daughter of the king of the Devas, and they said, 'You of the shapely thighs, whose daughter are you? And what are you doing in this forest? Auspicious, most graceful one, tell us who you ae."

She replied shyly, "I am Saryati's daughter, and Chyavana's wife."

At which, the Aswins smiled, "Why, most fortunate one, has your father given you to a man who is near death? Ah, timid girl, you shine like lightning in this jungle. Why, not in Devaloka have we seen the likes of you. Even wearing no ornament and neither any costly garment, you light up this vana!

Still, faultless limbs, you cannot be as beautiful here as you would decked in every ornament and wearing gorgeous apparel. Why, exquisite one, do you serve a decrepit old husband, who is incapable of satisfying you or even maintaing you, O luminous smiles? Divine beauty, leave Chyavana and take one of us for your husband. You must not lay waste your youth."

Sukanya replied, "I am devoted to my husband, do not think for a moment that I would betray him."

They said to her, we are the Aswins, the legendary physicians of heaven. We will make your lord as young and handsome as ourselves, but then you must choose one among us to be your lord. Swear you will do this and having sworn go and fetch your husband here."

Rajan, Sukanya went and told Bhrigu's son what the Aswin Kumaras proposed. Chyavana Muni said to her, "Do as they ask."

She went back with him to the Aswins and said, "Do what you said."

They said, "Let your husband enter into this lake."

Chyavana, who wanted beauty and youth, quickly walked into the water. The twin Aswins also, O king, sank into the sheet of water. Next moment, all three emerged with surpassingly beautiful forms, and young, and wearing burnished earrings. But all three looked exactly alike, indistinguishable from one another.

They said to Sukanya, "Fortunate one, choose one of us to be your lord, whichever of us takes your fancy."

Finding all three of them identical, she deliberated; and at last her heart discovered who her husband was, and she chose him for her lord.

Having become young and radiantly handsome, and his wife having chosen him, as well, Chyavana of geat tejas was pleased and said to the Aswini Kumaras, those nose-born twins, "You have given me youth and beauty, and I will make you drink Soma rasa in the very presence of Indra. This I solemnly swear."

The Aswins were delighted and flew up into Devaloka. Chyavana and Sukanya passed their days in fine joy, even like a Deva and his wife.'

Lomasa says, 'Now the news came to Saryati that Chyavana had been turned into a youth. Well pleased, he went with his troops to the hermitage of the son of Bhrigu. And he saw Chyavana and Sukanya, like Devas' children, and his joy and that of his wife were as great as if the king had conquered the whole world.

The Sage received the king and queen with honour. Saryati sat next to the Rishi, and entered into a happy and auspicious conversation with him.

Bhrigu's son said, "O King, perform a yagna at which I shall be the priest. Procure everything that we need for the sacrifice."

At which, Saryati was overjoyed and expressed whole-hearted approval. On an auspicious day, Saryati ordered a most excellent sacrificial shrine to be erected, provided with all that was needed for the yagna.

Chyavana, the son of Bhrigu, was the king's priest; and listen to the wonderful events which unfolded there. Chyavana took up some Soma rasa to offer it to the Aswini Kumaras, who are physicians to the Devas.

Even as the Rishi was doing this, Indra declared, "These Aswins have no right to receive an offering of the Soma rasa. They are the physicians to the Devas in heaven — their vocation does not permit them to drink the Soma."

Chyavana said, "These two are of mighty enterprise, possessed of mighty souls, and endowed with uncommon beauty and grace. Besides, Indra, they have given me eternal beauty, even as of a Deva. Why should you and the other Devas have a right to drink the Soma juice, and not they?

Lord of the Devas, Puranadara, know that the Aswins are also Devas!"

At this, Indra said, "These two practise the healing arts, they are but servants; assuming different forms at their pleasure they roam the world of mortal beings. How can they justly claim the juice of the Soma?"

Indra spoke these words again and again, but setting him at naught, Bhrigu's son still took up the offering he meant to make. As he was about to offer a sizeable portion of Soma rasa to the Aswins, Indra said, "If you offer the Soma to the Awins, I will burn you with my thunderbolt!"

But Chyavana only gave Indra a smile and took a a goodly portion of Soma rasa to offer it to the Aswins. Indra began to cast the dreadful Vajra as the Sage, but found his arm frozen by Bhrigu's son.

Chyavana continued to chant mantras and made his offerings into the sacred fire. Through the Rishi's tapasakti, an evil spirit, an immense and mighty demon called Mada sprang forth from the flames. So great was he that neither the Devas nor the Asuras could measure his body.

His mouth was terrifying, chasmal, with rows of razor sharp teeth; one of his jaws rested on earth while the other stretched up into heaven. Four fangs he had, each a hundred yojanas, while his other teeth were ten yojanas each and like the towers of a palace, all pointed and sharp as spears.

The demon's arms were like hills, both of equal bulk, stretching ten thousand yojanas each. His two eyes resembled the sun and the moon; and the fire of his face rivalled the conflagration at the dissolution of the universe.

He licked his lips with his tongue like a gash of lightning, without pause; his maw gaped wide, his gaze was frightful, and it seemed that he meant to swallow the every earth.

This demon rushed at Indra of a thousand yagnas, and he meant to devour that Deva. The world rang with the terrifying roars of the Asura."

Lomasa says, "When Indra saw the Asura Mada, looking like Yama himself, rushing at him, jaws agape, certainly meaning to devour Lhim, whle the Deva's arms remained frozen, that god could only lick the corners of his mouth in terror.

Frightened past endurance, Indra cried to Chyavana, "O Bhargava,

O Brahmana, I swear to you in the name of truth itself that from today the Aswini Kumaras shall partake of the Soma rasa! Be merciful to me, for I can never forswear myself.

May your yagna be fruitful; these Aswins shall drink Soma rasa from now because you, most holy one, have entitled them to it. O Bhargava, I did all this to spread the renown of your powers, my purpose being to provide an occasion for their display. My other object was to spread the fame of Sukanya's father Saryati.

So be merciful to me."

Mahatama Chyavana's wrath was quickly appeased and he freed Indra from the spell that held the Deva frozen. As for the Asura Mada, whose name means intoxication, the Rishi divided the demon and put his spirit into drink, into women, into gambling, into field sport.

Having lessened Mada, Chyavana now gratified Indra with a draught of Soma and helped Saryati worship the entire host of Devas, and now the Aswins with them, equally, thereby truly covering the earth with the fame of that king. His yagna complete, Bhrigu's son, best among those blessed with speech, passed his days happily in the forest, in the company of Sukanya, his loving wife.

This is his lake, shining before you, O Yudhishtira, and echoing with the voices of birds. Here you and your brothers must offer tarpana to your Pitrs and to the Devas.

Sovereign of the earth, scion of Bharata, you must go to Sikataksha, as well, then to the Saindhava vana, where you will find a number of small rivers and lakes. You must touch the waters of all these, while chanting mantras to Lord Siva; and so you will find success in every endeavour of yours.

For this is the conjunction of two yugas, the Dwapara and the Kali. It is a time, O Kaunteya, in which a man's every sin can be destroyed.

Perform ablutions here, for this place can take all his sins from a man. And yonder is the Archika hill, where men of evolved souls live; fruit of all seasons grow here perennially and the streams run always full.

Why, this is a place fit for the Devas and indeed they have erected various holy images of diverse forms, which you see. Look, Yudhishtira, here the gods built the bathing tank of the Moon.

Rishis dwell here on every side, in the forest, as do the Balakhilyas and the Pavakas, who live just on air. Here are three peaks and three springs; you can walk around them in pradakshina, one by one; then you may bathe at your leisure.

Santanu, and Sunaka, the sovereign of men, and both Nara and Narayana attained everlasting realms from this place. Here the gods constantly come, as also the manes, together with the greatest sages.

All of them have performed tapasya upon this Archika Parvata. Sacrifice to them, Yudhishtira; here the Devas and the Rishis eat payasa.

And here is the Yamuna, her spring exhaustless; here Krishna sat in tapasya. O Pandava, you who drag the dead bodies of your enemies across the ground, the twins, Bhimasena, Panchali and all of us will come with you to the river.

Lord of men, this is the holy spring that belongs to Indra. Here Varuna Deva also rose up, and here they sat with faith, in dhyana. This sacred hill welcomes kindly and honest folk. This is Yamuna of renown, frequented by hosts of mighty sages, and the setting for diverse religious rituals; she is most holy and destroys the fear of sin.

Here Mandhata himself, of the mighty bow, performed yagnas to the gods; and so did Somaka, the son of Sahadeva, and a most munificent giver of gifts."

Yudhishtira says, "Great Brahmana, how was that tiger among kings, Mandhata, Yuvanaswa's son, born, that best of monarchs, celebrated across the three worlds? And how did he of unmeasured lustre attain the very pinnacle of regal power, since all the three worlds were as much under his subjection as they are under that of Vishnu of mighty soul?

I am eager to hear all about the life and achievements of that Rajarishi. I would also like to hear how he was named Mandhata, he whose lustre rivalled that of Indra himself. Tell me also how he was born, for you are a master of narration."

Lomasa says, "Listen attentively, Rajan, to how the name of Mandhata, of the great soul, came to be celebrated throughout all the worlds. Yuvanaswa, ruler of the earth, was born into Ikshvaku's race. That protector of the world performed many sacrifices, noted for their magnificent gifts.

A thousand times, that most virtuous of men performed the Aswamedha yagna. He also performed other sacrifices of the highest order, wherein he gave abundant daana. But that saintly king had no son; and he of mighty soul and rigid vows made over the duties of the state to his ministers, and went away to dwell in the forest.

There, he undertook a stern tapasya during which, once, he kept a fast. Pangs of hunger tormented him and his very soul seemed parched with thirst. In this state, he came to the asrama of Bhrigu. That same night, king of kings, the Maharishi who was the joy of Bhrigu's race had overseen a sacrifice devoted to a son being born to Saudyumni.

In the place where the rituals had been performed stood a great urn filled with holy water, consecrated with mantras; and that water was imbued with the virtue that when Saudyumni's wife drank it she would give birth to a godlike son. Those great Sages had left the blessed water on the altar and had gone to sleep, for they were exhausted after the nightlong ritual.

As Yuvanaswa passed by them, his mouth was dry, and he was in the grip of an agony of thirst; ah, he was desperate for a drink of water. The king entered that hermitage and asked for water, but his voice was feeble with weakness, and coming from an arid throat the sound he made was like the inarticulate cry of a bird. Nobody heard him.

Then the king saw the jar full of water and he ran to it, and drank deeply, thirstily, emptying the vessel. The water was cool and appeased his thirst. Then, the Rishis there awoke and found that the jar of water had been disturbed from its place and it was empty.

They gathered together and asked who had drunk the water, at which Yuvanaswa confessed that it had been he. The revered son of Bhrigu said to him, 'It was not right. This water was infused with an occult siddhi and had been placed there so that a son could be born to you. I invested the water with the power of my tapasya.

Mighty Rajarishi, you would have had a son of great strength and valour, why a prince who could have despatched even Indra to Yamaloka. So much power had I infused into this water, and now look what you have done.

It is impossible to undo what has been done, and surely what you did was fate's own fiat. Great king, you were thirsty and you drank the water consecrated by my mantras of power and blessed with the punya of my tapasya; there is only one course ahead – you must bring forth the splendid child I have described from your own body!

We will perform a sacrifice to that end, of wonderful effect, and brave as you are, you will bring forth a son as great as Indra. Nor will you experience any pain of labour.'

When a hundred years passed, a son brilliant as Surya burst out from the king's left side, and he was mighty indeed; and neither did Yuvanaswa die, which was also strange.

Indra came to visit the child and the Devas asked great Indra, 'What will this boy suck to feed?'

Indra put his own forefinger into the child's mouth and the Vajradhari said, 'Mandhata – me he shall suckle on.'

The dwellers of heaven and Indra as well named the boy Mandhata. He tasted Indra's forefinger and grew instantly to be thirteen yojanas, and he was incomparably powerful. Rajan, the prince acquired all sacred knowledge, all the Shastras, along with the holy science of arms, just through the power of his thought and intuition, unassisted.

That same day, the renowned bow Ajagava and a host of arrows made of horn, an impenetrable coat of armour, all these came magically into his possession! Indra himself set Mandhata on the throne and that king conquered the three worlds, always with dharma, even as Vishnu did with his three strides.

Mandhata's chariot was inexorable on its course through the world; and the greatest jewels came of their own accord into that Rajarishi's keep.

Lord of the earth, this is Mandhata's land; it abounds in wealth. Here he performed a number of diverse yagnas, during which vast bounties were given to the officiating priests.

Mandhata of immense power and measureless lustre erected sacred shrines, performed countless deeds of untold piety, and he attained the honour of sitting by Indra's side.

That wise king of dharma sent forth his command and just by its virtue conquered the earth, together with the sea—source of gems—and all the cities of the world. The yagnashalas that he made covered the very face of Bhumi, on all sides.

That great sovereign gave ten thousand padmas of cows to Brahmanas. Once, there came a drought of twelve years and Mandhata made it rain over the parched earth, while Indra could not prevent it but only stared.

Mandhata slew the powerful Gandhara king, born into the House of the Moon, who was dreadful like a thundercloud full of lightning and who wounded Mandhata sore with arrows.

Rajan, he led a virtuous and austere life and with his untold might protected the worlds from all evil, and nurtured the four varnas equally. This is where, lustrous like the Sun, he sacrificed to God. Look at the place – here it is, in the very midst of the field of the Kurus, holiest of holies!

Master of the world, I have told you how Mandhata was born, extraordinarily, and also about his magnificent life."

Yudhishtira immediately asks Lomasa fresh questions, now about Somaka.

Yudhishtira says, "O best of masters, how strong and powerful was King Somaka? I want to hear a detailed account of his might and his deeds."

Lomasa says, "Yudhishtira, Somaka was a most virtuous king. He had a hundred wives, all chaste and noble, but he did not have a son by any of them, for a long, long time.

Then one day, when he had become old, a son was born to him, and called Jantu. All day long, the prince's hundred mothers would sit around their child, every one giving him whatever he wanted or whetever they thought would please him.

One day, an ant stung the boy on his leg and he screamed. His mothers were so distressed that they stood around him and set up a chorus of cries of their own – a tumult of shrieks.

That great outcry reached the ears of the king, where he sat in his court among his ministers, with his family priest at his side. He sent forth to discover what had caused the agitation. A royal guard brought him the news of how his son had been bitten by an ant.

Somaka rose and, with his ministers, hurried to the antahpura, and there he tenderly comforted his child, Parantapa.

When the prince grew quiet, the king came out from his harem and sat again in his sabha with his family priest and his council of ministers.

Somaka said sombrely, 'Fie on having a single son! I had rather been a sonless man, for if one thinks of how vulnerable to sickness all men are, to have just one son is only a trouble and a heartache.

O Brahmana, I married a hundred wives so that I might have many sons. But they gave me none, until at last this single boy was born, this prince Jantu.

What grief can be greater than this? Dvijottama, I have grown old and so have my wives; yet, this child is like our very prana, our life-breath. But, tell me now, is there any yagna, performing which one can get a hundred sons? Tell me if the sacrifice is great or small, easy to perform or difficult.'

The family priest, the kulaguru, said, "There is indeed a yagna by which a man may get a hundred sons. If you can perform it, O Somaka, I will explain it to you.'

Somaka said, 'Whether it be a good or an evil rite, take it that I have already performed the yagna for a hundred sons. Explain it to me.'

The Brahmana said, 'I will begin a yagna and at it you must sacrifice your son Jantu. Then, very soon, you will have a hundred splendid sons. When Jantu's fat is offered into the fire to the gods, the queens must inhale the smoke of the burning flesh and they will bring forth a hundred radiant princes, brave and powerful. Why, and Jantu himself will be born again, of himself, svaymbhuva, and upon his back there will be a golden mark.'

Somaka said, 'Brahmana, do whatever you must. I want to have many sons and I will do as you say.'

The priest commenced the sacrifice at which Jantu was to be the offering. But the hundred wailing mothers snatched at their son and tried to save him.

'Ah, we are lost!' they cried, and held the boy's right arms, but the priest snatched him back, while the queens screamed like female ospreys. The Brahmana killed Jantu and offered his flesh as havis, the burnt offering into the sacred agni.

Kurunandana, while the prince's fat burned, the agonised mothers whiffed its smell and fell in a swoon all together. At once, all those women became pregnant, and when ten months passed they delivered a hundred sons to Somaka.

Lord of the earth, Jantu was also born again, to his own mother, and he was the eldest of the hundred princes and the most beloved of all his mothers; not so their own sons. And upon his back there was the mark of gold, and of those hundred sons he was the superior one.

Somaka's kulaguru left this world after a time, and so did that king. After they died, Somaka saw his priest being tortured with fire in a dreadful hell.

Somaka asked him, 'Why are you being roasted in this naraka?

In searing pain, the priest gasped, 'This is my punishment for performing that sacrifice for you.'

Rajarishi Somaka said to Dharmaraja, who punishes dead sinners, 'Lord, free my priest. I am to blame for the torment he suffers; burn me in the fire instead.'

Dharmaraja replied, 'No one can suffer for another's sins or enjoy the fruit of anyone else's good deeds. Look, here is the fruit of all the punya you have done.'

Somaka said, 'Without this, I have no wish to go to the blessed realms. I want to remain with this man, either in heaven or here in hell, for I have done what he has and we should share an identical fate.'

Dharmaraja said, 'O King, if this is what you want, then taste the fruit of his sin for the same time that he does. After that you will find the realms of heaven.'

That lotus-eyed king did exactly that, and when his sins were paid for he and his kulaguru were set free together. Fond as Somaka was of his priest, he shared all the fruit of his punya, his great good deeds, with the Brahmana.

This is his enchanting asrama, which is so lovely before your eyes. Anyone who spends six nights here, with his passions controlled, will attain the blessed realms of heaven. King of kings, let us rid ourselves of all excitations, and spend six nights in this sacred place!'

Lomasa says, 'O King, in this place Narayana himself performed a sacrifice of old, the yagna called Ishtikrita, which lasted a thousand years.

Nabhaga's son Ambarisha sacrificed near the Yamuna river; and he gave away ten padmas of gold coins to the attendant priests; and he attained the final felicity through sacrifices and austerities.

Kaunteya, this is the place Nahusha's son, Yayati, lord of all the world, man of dharma, his power measureless, performed his sacrifice. He was as mighty as Indra and performed his yagna here. Look how the ground is strewn with fire pits of diverse kinds, and how the earth seems to subside here under the weight of Yayati's pieties.

Look, here is the Sami tree, which has just one leaf, and look at this sparkling lake. Why, behold all these lakes of Parasurama, and the asrama of Narayana. Rajan, here is the path that Richaka's son of untold tejas trod, who ranged over the world, and practised rites of yoga in the river Raupya.

Kurunandana, listen to what a Pisachi, who wore pestles for her ornaments, said to a Brahmana woman, as I once sat here chanting the timeless lineages.

Having eaten curd in Yugandhara, and stayed in Achutasthala, and also bathed in Bhutalaya, you must remain here with your brothers. Having passed one night here, if you stay another, what happens during the night will be very different from the events of the day, O most righteous of Bharata's race.

We will spend tonight here; this is the threshold of Kurukshetra, field of the Kurus. In this very place did Nahusha's son Yayati perform a yagna and gave gifts of a bounty of gemstones. Indra was pleased with those sacred rites.

This is a most auspicious tirtha along the Yamuna, called Plakshava-tarana, the descent of the banyan tree. Evolved men call it the entrance to Swarga. Here the greatest Rishis performed the sacrificial rites of the Saraswata king, using the sacrificial stake for their pestle, and when the sacrifice ended they performed their ablutions in the river.

Rajan, King Bharata undertook his sacrifice here, sending forth the sacrificial horse for his Aswamedha yagna, the animal which would be sacrificed. Through dharma that king won sovereignty over the earth by righteousness. The horses that he sent forth, many times, were mottled with black.

Purushvyaghra, it was here that Samvarta, greatest among Rishis, helped Marutta perform his renowned yagnas.

Bathing in this tirtha one can see into all the worlds, and is purified of all one's sins. Therefore, you, too, must bathe here, Yudhishtira.'

Yudhishtira, best of Pandu's sons, bathes there with his brothers while the mighty Munis chant his praises.

Yudhishtira says to Lomasa, 'O Rishi whose power is dharma, bathing here I see all the worlds! Ah, from here I see Arjuna, who rides the white charger!'

Lomasa says, 'Mahabaho, the greatest Rishis see all realms even so! This is holy Saraswati, thronged by those that regard her as their sole refuge. You have bathed here and you shall be free of all your sins.

Kaunteya, the Devarishis performed sacrifices for the Saswata king here, as did the Rishis and Rajarishis. This is the Vedi of Brahma Prajapati, extending five yojanas on every side. And this is the field of the magnificent Kurus, who always undertake great yagnas.'

Lomasa says, 'Bhaarata, if any of the mortals breathes their last here, they find Swarga. Thousands upon thousands of men come to this place to die. Daksha pronounced a blessing on this place, while he performed his yagna here, saying, "Whoever dies in this place will win a place in Swarga."

Look at this beautful and sacred Saraswati full of crystalline water; and here, lord of men, is Vinasana, where the Saraswati disappeared. Here is the gate of the kingdom of the Nishadas and it is from hatred for them that the Saraswati entered into the earth, so that the Nishadas might not see her.

Here, too, is the sacred land of Chamasodbheda, where the Saraswati became visible to them again. And here she is joined by other sacred rivers flowing seawards. Parantapa, here is the sacred Sindhu — where Lopamudra accepted the Maharishi Agastya for her lord; and, you of sunlike lustre, here is the holy tirtha Prabhasa, which Indra favours and which removes all sins.

Yonder is Vishnupada, and here is the sacred river Vipasa. Grieftsricken at the death of his sons, Maharishi Vasistha bound himsef hand and foot and cast himself into this river. But he rose out of the waters and was unfettered.

Look, O king, with your brothers, at the sacred land of Kasmira, frequented by holy sages. Here, O scion of Bharata, is the place where Agni Deva and Maharishi Kasyapa conferred; and also Nahusha's son and the sages of the north.

Yonder, Kshatriya, is the gateway to the Manasa-sarovara, where Sri Rama opened a gap in the mountain with his astra. And there is the renowned realm of Vatikhashanda, which, although adjacent to the gate of Videha, lies to its north.

There is something else very remarkable about this place- that on the waning of every yuga, the Lord Siva, who can assume any form at will, can be seen here with Uma and his ganas.

In the holy lake, also, those wanting the weal of their familes worship Siva Pinakin with sacrifices during the month of Chaitra. Devoted folk, their passions restrained, who bathe in the Manasa-sarovara are freed from their sins, and attain the holy realms.

And here is the tirtha called Ujjanaka, where the Maharishi Vasistha, his wife Arundhati and also the Muni Yavakri found peace.

Yonder is the lake Kusava, where the lotuses called Kusesaya grow; and here also is the sacred hermitage of Rukmini, where she attained mukti, after conquering that evil passion, anger.

I think, O prince, that you have heard something about that mountain of meditation, Bhrigutunga; look, that is the lofty peak. And there is Vitasta, the sacred stream that absolves men from all sins; its water is cool and limpid, and used mainly by the great sages.

Kshatriya, behold the holy rivers Jala and Upajala, on either side of the Yamuna. By performing a sacrifice here, king Usinara surpassed Indra himself in greatness; wanting to test Usinaras merit and also wanting to bestow boons on him, Indra and Agni came to his yagnashala.

Indra took the form of a hawk, and Agni that of a pigeon, and they flew to the king. In apparent fear of the hawk, the pigeon fell upon the king's thigh, seeking his protection.'

"The hawk said, "The kings of the earth all say that you are a righteous sovereign. Why, O Kshatriya, have you stooped to this adharma? I am afflicted with hunger, do not keep me from my prey which God has given me to be my food. You think that you serve dharma by this, while, in fact, you forsake it."

The king said, "Best of avians, this pigeon is terrified of you and for its life. It has flown to me to escape you, and to beg for its life. How do you not see that my highest dharma is to give it my protection?

It trembles in fear and I would surely find sin if I abandon it. He that slays a Brahmana, he that slaughters a cow—the common mother of all the worlds—and he that forsakes one seeking protection are equally sinful."

The hawk replied, "O King, all beings live through food, which nourishes and sustains them. A man can live long even after relinquishing what is dearest to him, but he cannot live without food.

If you deprive me of my food, my life will leave this body and find realms where such troubles are unknown. But at my death, pious king, my mate and children will also surely perish, and by protecting this single pigeon, you will take many lives.

The virtue that stands in the way of another virtue is certainly no virtue at all, but in reality is sin. O King, whose prowess consists of truth, only the dharma which does not conflict with a greater dharma is worthy of being called dharma. Compare the conflicting costs in lives; you should not do what you mean to. Take the course of the lesser evil."

The king said, "O best of birds, you speak words fraught with wisdom, and I suspect that you are Suparna, monarch of birds. I have no hesitation in declaring that you are fully conversant with the ways of dharma. You disclose wonders about dharma so that I must believe there is nothing that you do not know about it.

So, then, how can you say that abandoning a creature that seeks my protection is dharma? Sky ranger, you are in quest of food; surely, you can assuage your hunger with some other food, more copious than this pigeon. I am willing to procure any kind of food for you, which is even more to your taste, even if it be an ox, or a boar, or a deer, or a buffalo."

There hawk said, "Great king, I have have no wish to eat a boar or an ox or any other animal; they are not my natural prey. So, O bull among Kshatriyas, give me this pigeon that heaven has ordained to be my meal today, for, that hawks will eat pigeons is the law of nature. Do not cling to a plantain tree for support, O king; it is not strong enough to support you."

The king said, " Sky rover, I will give you this rich kingdom of my race, or anything else you want; anything other than this pigeon, which has flown to me for my protection. Ah, tell me what I should do to save this bird because I do not mean to give him to you under any circumstance."

The hawk said, "Rajan, if you have such love for this pigeon, then cut off some of your own flesh and weigh it upon a scale until it equals the pigeon's weight. And when it does, give me that flesh and I will be satisfied."

The king said, "I will do so gladly and consider this a favour to me.

The Rajarishi Usinara cut off some of his flesh and weighed it in a balance against the pigeon. He found the pigeon heavier and cut off another piece of his flesh, and still the bird weighed more. Portion after portion of his flesh he cut and added but the scale remained tilted on the side of the bird.

At last there was no flesh left upon Usinaras body and he mounted the scale himself.

Now the hawk said, "King of dharma, I am Indra and the pigeon is Agni, who bears the havis to the gods. We came to your yagnashala to test your merit. You cut all the flesh from your body and your glory shall be resplendent, and will surpass that of all others in the world.

As long as men speak of you, your glory will endure and you will dwell in Swarga, in the holiest realms."

Saying this to the king, Indra flew up into Devaloka. And, after having filled heaven and earth with the punya of his great and pious deeds, Usinara also ascended into heaven in a radiant form.

Look, O King, at the asrama of that noblest-hearted sovereign. Here the Devas and Maharishis come, along with the purest Brahmanas.'

Lomasa says, 'And look here, lord of men, at the holy asrama of Uddalaka's son Swetaketu, whose fame as an expert in the sacred mantras is spread across earth. Coconut trees grace this hermitage. Here Swetaketu saw the Goddess Saraswati in her human shape, and said to her, "Bless me with the gift of speech!"

In that yuga, Swetaketu, the son of Uddalaka, and Ashtavakra, the son of Kahoda, who were uncle and nephew, were the greatest masters of the sacred lore. Those two Brahmanas, of matchless tejas, went to King Janaka's yagnasala and bested Vandin in a debate.

Kaunteya, you and your brothers worship the holy asrama of him whose grandson was Ashtavakra, who, even as a child, drowned Vandin in a river, after having vanquished him in a metaphysical debate.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, O Lomasa, all about the power of this man, who vanquished Vandin. Why was he born as Ashtavakra, crooked in eight parts of his body?'

Lomasa says, 'The Rishi Uddalaka had a disciple named Kahoda, of subdued passions, and entirely devoted to the service of his guru, who had studied long. The Brahmana had served his master for many years, and recognising his service, his preceptor gave him his own daughter, Sujata, in marriage, as well as a mastery over the Shastras.

And she conceived a child, radiant as fire.

One night, while his father was reading the scriptures aloud, the child spoke from his mother's womb, "Father, you have been reading all night but it seems to me that not everything you recite is correct. Through your study, I have become versed in the Shastras and the Vedas, and their Angas. I say to you that what comes from your mouth is inaccurate."

Insulted in the presence of his disciples, the Maharishi cursed the child in the womb in anger, "Because you speak even from the womb, you shall be crooked in eight parts of your body!"

The child was born crooked, and he was known as Ashtavakra. Now, he had an uncle named Swetaketu who was the same age as himself.

Anxious about the child growing in her, one day Sujata said to her impoverished husband, "Maharishi, the tenth month of my pregnancy is near. You have nothing to sustain us once our child is born."

Kahoda Muni went to King Janaka for wealth. In that Rajarishi's court, Vandin, master of dialectics, defeated Kahoda in a debate and drowned him in a river. Hearing of this, Uddalaka said to his daughter Sujata, "You must keep this secret from Ashtavakra."

She did so, and when Ashtavakra was born, he heard nothing about the matter; and he regarded Uddalaka as his father and Swetaketu as his brother. One day, when Ashtavakra was in his twelfth year, Swetaketu saw him sitting in Uddalaka's lap and pulled him roughly down.

Ashtavakra began to cry and Swetaketu said, "It isn't your father's lap!"

Ashtavakra was devastated. He went home and asked his mother, "Where is my father?"

Sujata was stricken by his question and she was also afraid that he might curse her; she told him what had happened.

At night Ashtavakra said to his uncle Swetaketu, "Let us go to the sacrifice of King Janaka, where we might see many wonderful things. We will listen to the debate between the Brahmanas and partake of excellent food. Our knowledge will increase. The recitation of the sacred Vedas is sweet to hear and is fraught with blessings."

Uncle and nephew went to Janaka's splendid sacrifice. Upon being turned away from the entrance to the yagnasala, Ashtavakra spoke to the great king inside.'

'Ashtavakra said, "Where no Brahmana is encountered, the right of way belongs to the blind, the deaf, the women, carriers of burden, and the king. But when a Brahmana is on the way, the path belongs to him alone.'

King Janaka said, "I give you the right to enter; go in by whichever entrance you choose. No fire, be it ever so small, is to be slighted. Even Indra bows to the Brahmanas."

Ashtavakra said, "Ruler of men, we have come to witness your sacrifice and our curiosity is greát. Besides we have come here as guests, sadasyas; we want your permission to enter. And, O son of Indradyumna, we have come to meet King Janaka and to speak to him. But your gatekeeper obstructs us and for this our anger burns us like fever."

The gatekeeper said, "We carry out the orders of Vandin. Listen to what I have to say. Boys are not allowed to enter here, only learned old Brahmanas."

Ashtavakra said. "If this is the condition, dwarapalaka, that the door is open only to those that are old, then we have a right to enter. We are old and we have observed sacred vratas and possess energy which comes from the Vedas. We have served our elders and subdued our passions, and have mastered the scriptures.

It is said that even boys are not to be slighted, for a fire, small though it be, burns on being touched."

The gatekeeper replied, "Young Brahmana, I consider you a boy. But if you are a gyani, then recite, if you know it, the mantra that demonstrates the existence of the Supreme Being, the hymn adored by the Devarishis, which, although composed of one letter, is yet multifarious. Make no vain boast, learned men are really very rare."

Ashtavakra said, "True growth cannot be inferred from the mere development of the body, even as the growth of the knots of the Salmali tree cannot signify its age. That tree is full-grown, which although slender and short, bears fruits, while the tree, however large, which does not bear fruit, is not mature."

The gatekeeper said, "Boys receive instruction from the old and in time they also grow old. Knowledge certainly cannot be attained in a short time. Why, then, being a child, do you talk like an old man?"

Ashtavakra said, "One is not old because his head is grey. But the gods regard him as old who, although a child in years, is yet possessed of knowledge. The sages have not laid down that a man's merit consists in years, or grey hair, or wealth, or friends. To us, he is great who is versed in the Vedas.

I have come here, O gatekeeper, to see Vandin in the sabha. Go and inform King Janaka, who has a garland of lotuses around his neck that I am here. Today you will see me enter into dispute with all the learned men, and defeat Vandin in a debate. And when the rest have been silenced, the Brahmanas of mature learning and the king also, with his principal priests, shall bear witness to the superior or the inferior quality of my attainments."

The dwarapalaka said, "You are just ten; how can you hope to enter this yagnasala? Only great scholars can go in here. But I will try to let you in, and you yourself also try."

Then Ashtavakra said to the king, "O Janaka, best of your race, you are the greatest sovereign and all power reposes in you. In times of old, King Yayati was the celebrator of sacrifices, and in this yuga you.

We have heard that the learned Vandin bests the most expert debators and then has your loyal servats drown them. Hearing this, I have come to these Brahmanas, to expound the doctrine of the unity of the Brahman.

Where is Vandin? Tell me so that I can face him, and eclipse him even as the sun does the stars."

Janaka said, "Brahmana, you hope to defeat Vandin without knowing his power of speech. None who knows his powers will dare say what you do. The greatsest masters of the Veda have faced and been vanquished by him; you only say what you do because you do not know how mighty he is.

So many Brahmanas have wilted before him even as the stars before the sun. Countless scholars, arrogant of their learning, merely saw Vandin and lost all their pride. They left my sabha, shamed, without uttering a word."

Ashtavakra said, "Vandin has never debated against a man like me; only so does he look upon himself as a lion, and goes about roaring like one. But meeting me today he will fall dead, even like a cart whose wheels have come loose on a highway."

The king said, "Only he is a truly learned man who understands the significance of the thing that has thirty divisions, twelve parts, twenty-four joints, and three hundred and sixty spokes."

Ashtavakra said, "May that ever-moving wheel that has twenty-four joints, six naves, twelve peripheries, and sixty spokes protect you!"[1]

The king said, "Who amongst the gods bears those two which go together like two mares yoked to a chariot, and sweep like one hawk, and to what also do they give birth?"

Ashtavakra said, "May God, O king, forfend the presence of these two[2] in your house; yes, even in the house of your enemies. He who appears, having the wind for his charioteer,[3] begets them, and they also produce him."

Thereupon the king said, "What does not close its eyes even while sleeping; what is it that does not move, even when born; what is it that has no heart; and what increases even in its own speed?"

Ashtavakra said, "It is a fish[4] that does not shut its eye-lids while sleeping; and it is an a egg[5] that does not move when born; it is stone[6]that hath no heart; and it is a river[7] that increases in its own speed."

The king said, "It seems, O Tejasvin, that you are no human being. I do not consider you a boy, but a matured man; there is no other man who can compare with you in the art of speech. I therefore give you admittance. There is Vandin." '

[1] This wheel is the wheel of Time—i.e., measured according to the solar, lunar and astral revolutions. The significance of Ashtavakra's reply is: May the meritorious deeds performed at proper times during the revolution of this wheel of Time protect you.

[2] Thunder and lightning or misery and death.

[3] The male being that is ever conscious.

[4] Cloud or the mind.

'Ashtavakra said, "O king, O leader of fierce legions, in this assembly of monarchs of unrivalled power who have met together, I cannot recognise Vandin, master of the controversialists. But I am searching for him, even as one does for a swan on a vast expanse of water.

O Vandin, you regard yourself as the foremost of debators; yet, when you debate against me you will hardly flow like the current of a river. I am like a fire in full flame. Be silent before me, Vandin! Do not awaken a sleeping tiger. Know that you will not escape unstung, after trampling on the head of a venomous snake licking the corners of its mouth with its tongue. That weak man who, in pride of strength, attempts to strike a blow at a mountain, only gets his hands and nails broken, but no wound is left on the mountain itself.

As the other mountains are inferior to the Mainaka, and as calves are inferior to the ox, so are all other kings of the earth inferior to the lord of Mithila. And as Indra is the foremost of Devas, and as the Ganga is the best of rivers, so you alone are, O king, the greatest of monarchs. O king, have Vandin brought into my presence."

O Yudhishtira, when Vandin stood forth, Ashtavakra thundered at him in wrath, "You answer my questions, and I will answer yours!"

Vandin said, "Only one fire blazes forth in various shapes; only one sun illumines this whole world; only one hero, Indra, the lord of the Devas, destroys all enemies; and only one Yama is the sole lord of the Pitrs."[1]

Ashtavakra said, "The two friends, Indra and Agni, ever move together; the two Devarishis are Narada and Parvata; the twins are the Aswini kumaras; two is the number of the wheels of a chariot; and it is as a couple that husband and wife live together, as ordained by God."[2]

Vandin said, "Three kinds of born beings are produced by acts; the three Vedas together perform the Vajapeya; at three different times, the Adhwaryas commence sacrificial rites; three is the number of worlds; and three also are the divine lights."[3]

Ashtavakra said, "Four are the Asramas of the Brahmanas; the four varnas perform sacrifices; four are the cardinal points; four is the number of letters; and four also, as is ever known, are the legs of a cow."[4]

Vandin said, "Five is the number of fires; five are the feet of the metre called Punki; five are the sacrifices; five locks, it is said in the Vedas, are on the heads of the Apsaras; and five sacred rivers are known in the world."[5]

Ashtavakra said, "Some assert that six cows are given while first lighting the sacred fire; six are the seasons belonging to the wheel of time; six is the number of the senses; six stars constitute the constellation Kirtika; and six, it is found in all the Vedas, is the number of the Sadyaska sacrifice."[6]

Vandin said, "Seven is the number of the domesticated animals; seven are the wild animals; seven metres are used in completing a sacrifice; seven are the Rishis; there are seven forms of paying homage in the world; and seven, it is known, are the strings of the Vina."

Ashtavakra said, "Eight are the bags containing a hundred fold; eight are the legs of the Sarabha, which preys upon lions; eight Vasus, as we hear, are amongst the Devas; and eight are the angles of the yupastamba in all sacrificial rites."[7]

Vandin said, "Nine is the number of the mantras used in kindling the fire in sacrifices to the Pitrs; nine are the appointed functions in the processes of creation; nine letters compose the foot of the metre, Brihati; and nine is also always the number of the figures in calculation."[8]

Ashtavakra said, "Ten are the cardinal points, entering into the cognition of men in this world; ten times hundred make up a thousand; ten is the number of months of a woman's gestation; and ten are the teachers of true knowledge, and ten, the haters thereof, and ten again are those capable of learning it."[9]

Vandin said, "Eleven are the objects that beings can enjoy; eleven is the number of the yupas; eleven are the changes of the natural state of those that have life; and eleven are the Rudras among the gods in heaven."[10]

Ashtavakra said, "Twelve months compose the year; of twelve consists a foot of the metre Jagati; twelve are the minor sacrifices; and twelve, according to the learned, is the number of the Adityas."[11]

Vandin said, "Unaffected by happiness and misery, the Paramatman does exist, but His existence is not susceptible of being proved, nor can the ignorant ever perceive Him. Men attain that condition through these twelve

- virtue, truth, self-restraint, penance, good-will, modesty, forgiveness, freedom from envy, sacrifice, charity, concentration and control over the senses.

The thirteenth lunar day is considered the most auspicious; thirteen islands exist on earth."[12]Saying this much, Vandin stopped; he could not go on. Ashtavakra completed the sloka, "Thirteen sacrifices are presided over by Kesi; and thirteen are devoured by Atichhandas, the longer metres, of the Veda."[13]

And seeing Ashtavakra speaking and the Suta's son silent and pensive, and with his head hung down, the assembly broke into a loud uproar. Delighted, the Brahmanas at king Janaka's splendid sacrifice rose as a man, and, with folded hands, paid Ashtavakra homage."

Ashtavakra said, "Before today, this man would best all Brahmanas in debate and cast them into water. Let Vandin meet the same fate today. Seize him and drown him in water!"

Vandin said, "O Janaka, I am the son of King Varuna. Simultaneously with your sacrifice, there also began another twelve years' yagna. It was to that sacrifice that I despatched the principal Brahmanas; they have gone to witness Varuna's sacrifice.

Look! There they are returning. I pay homage to the worshipful Ashtavakra, by whose grace today I shall join him who begot me."

Ashtavakra said, "Defeating the Brahmanas either with straight debate or sophistry, Vandin had cast them into the waters of the sea. That Vedic truth which he had suppressed by false arguments I rescued by dint of my intellect today.

Now let honest men judge. As Agni, who knows the character of both the good and the bad, leaves the bodies of those whose designs are honest, untouched by his heat, and is thus partial to them, so, too, good men judge the assertions of boys, and are favourably disposed towards them.

O Janaka, you listen to me as if you have been stupefied by eating the fruit of the Sleshmataki tree; as if flattery has robbed you of your good sense; and this seems why, although my words pierce as hooks do an elephant, you do not heed them."

Janaka said, "Listening to you, I find your words extraordinary, more than merely human. Your form is also superhuman. You have vanquished Vandin in debate and I put him at your disposal."

Ashtavakra said, "O king, Vandin remaining alive will serve no purpose of mine. If Varuna really is his father, let Vandin be drowned in the sea."

Vandin said, "I am King Varuna's son. I have no fear of being drowned. Even at this moment, Ashtavakra shall see his long-lost sire, Kahoda."

Then all the dead Brahmanas appeared before Janaka, after having been duly worshipped by the magnanimous Varuna.

Kahoda said, "It is for this, O Janaka, that men pray for sons, by performing deeds of punya. That in which I failed has been achieved by my son. Weak persons may have sons endowed with strength; fools can have intelligent sons; and the illiterate may have learned sons."

Vandin said, "It is with your sharpened axe, O monarch, that even Yama severs the heads of foes. May prosperity attend upon you! In this sacrifice of King Janaka, the principal hymns of the Uktha rites are being chanted, and the Soma rasa is also being amply quaffed. And the gods themselves come to accept their sacred shares of the sacrifice, with joyful hearts."

When the dead Brahmanas rose up, their splendour enhanced, Vandin took his leave of King Janaka and entered into the waters of the sea.

Then Ashtavakra worshipped his father, and he himself was worshipped by the Brahmanas. And thus having defeated the Suta's son, Ashtavakra returned to his own fine hermitage, and his uncle with him.

Then, in the presence of his mother, his father said to him, "Hurry, son, and enter this river, Samanga."

Ashtavakra did so, and as he submerged himself beneath the water all his crooked limbs were instantly made straight. And from that day that river is called Samanga and she became invested with the virtue of purifying. He that bathes in her is set free from his sins.

Therefore, O Yudhishtira, do you, with your brothers and wife, enter the river and perform your ablutions in her. Kaunteya, scion of the race of Ajamidha, we will remain here with the Brahmanas, and you will perform other deeds of punya with me, for you are bent upon doing good.'

[1] Ashtavakra comes to Janaka's sacrifice with the object of proving the unity of the Supreme Being. Vandin avails himself of various System of Philosophy to combat his opponent. The iterative form of the dialogue is unique in being that of enigmas, and the latent meaning is in a queer way hidden under the appearance of puerile and heterogeneous combinations of things.

Vandin opens the debate by saying that as the number of each of these is one, so one only intellect is the lord, leader and guide of the senses.

2 There is a Vedic revelation that two birds live together on a tree as friends—one of these eats the fruits and the other looks at the former. From this it is manifest that these two are the lords, leaders and guides of the senses. That there is a second faculty besides the intellect is also proved by the fact that in sleep when the intellect is inactive that faculty continues in action, for if it were not so we could not remember having slept, nor connect the state after awaking with that preceding sleep. Accordingly by citing the number two Ashtavakra asserts that besides intellect there is another faculty—conciousness, and that these two are jointly the lords, leaders and guides of the senses and that they act together as Indra and Agni, etc.

3 By citing the number three Vandin means to say that as it is deeds that produce the three kinds of born beings, etc., so deeds are supreme and that everything else be it intellect alone, or intellect and conciousness together is subservient to Karma.

4 Ashtavakra here advances the thesis that even if Karma be supreme, still when the Fourth or Supreme Being (Turiya) becomes manifest to the soul, it stands in no further need to act or perform any karma.

5 By bringing in the quinquennial series, Vandin wants to assert that the five senses are competent to cognise their respective objects and that besides these senses and their objects there is neither any other sense to perceive nor any other object of perception. He also cites the authority of the Veda according to which the Apsaras (or consciousnesses) have five locks on their heads—i.e., five objects of perception.

6 Vandin admits the existence of the six senses but says that the soul experiences happiness and misery through those as well as through the intellect.

7 Ashtavakra advances an eighth element, namely, the knowledge of these.

8 Each of the three qualities (existence, foulness and ignorance) of prakriti (the passive or material cause of the world) mixing with each of the three corresponding qualities of pradhana (the active or spiritual cause of the world) in various proportions produces the mundane order of things. Thus is proved the eternity of prakriti or nature and so, also, established the doctrine of duality.

9 Prakriti does not really create. It is the Supreme Being who through the medium of illusion in contact with the ten organs (the five locomotive organs and the five organs of sense) makes manifest the System of things. Prakriti therefore has no real existence—her existence is only apparent in the real existence of the soul.

10 Yupas (stakes) mean here, feelings, etc., which keep men bound to the world. Rudras are those who makes others cry.

11 Vandin means to say that the soul is not essentially free from the fetters of happiness and misery arising from the eleven objects of perception. In this world all men are subject to happiness and misery. We also hear that there are Rudras in heaven.

12 According to some, endeavours to attain emancipation can be successful not in this world but in the world of Brahma. Others say that to that end a special yoga is necessary. By bringing forward the objects numbering thirteen, Vandin advances the opinion that, virtue, etc., are not sufficient to attain moksha but that a suitable time and place are also essential.

13 Ashtavakra concludes by citing the same number thirteen. The soul, which is essentially unaffected, becomes subject to happiness and misery through the thirteen: the ten organs of locomotion and sense, and intellect, mind and egoism. But Atichhanadas, i.e., those that have surmounted ignorance, namely, the twelve, virtue, etc., destroy those thirteen and that is emancipation.

Lomasa says, 'Here, of yore this Samanga was called Madhuvila, and yonder is Kardamila, the bathing place of Bharata. When misery struck Sachi's lord, after he killed Vritra, Indra bathed in this Samanga and was freed from his sin.

Here, Purusharishabha, is where the Mainaka mountain sank his roots into the earth, and so it is called Vinasana.

Once, it was here that Aditi cooked her offering of sacred food to the Brahman, so that she might have sons. Climb this lofty hill, O you bulls among men, and put an end to your inglorious, unreliable sorrow.

Here before you, O king, is the Kanakhala mountain range, a favourite resort of sages. Yonder is the mighty Ganga. In ancient times, the Rishi Sanatkumara found mukti by performing ablutions here in this river.

You will also be freed from all your sins, son of Kunti, if you and your brothers touch the waters of this lake called Punya, and this mountain Bhrigutunga and also the waters of these two rivers, called Ushniganga.

Look, here is the asrama of the Rishi Sthulasiras; here renounce your anger and sense of self-importance. And there, Pandava, is Raibhya's beautiful asrama, where Bharadwajas son, Yavakrita, profound in Vedic lore, perished.'

Yudhishtira says, 'How did the mighty Yavakrita, son of Bharadwaja, acquire profundity in the Vedas? And how also did he perish? I am eager to hear all this, just as it happened. I find great delight in listening to the deeds of such godlike men.'

Lomasa says, 'Bharadwaja and Raibhya were two friends. And they lived here, ever taking the greatest pleasure in each other's company. Raibhya had two sons, named Arvavasu and Paravasu, while Bharadwaja had an only son, named Yavakrita. Raibhya and his two sons were versed in the Vedas, while Bharadwaja practised tapasya. But, O Bhaarata, from their boyhood, the friendship that existed between these two was unequalled.

Sinless, the highspirited Yavakrita found that brahmanas slighted his father, who practised asceticism, while they revered Raibhya and his sons; Yavakrita was overwhelmed with sorrow, and became sorely aggrieved. He embarked upon severe austerities, in order to obtain knowledge of the Vedas.

He exposed his body to fire. He made Indra anxious with his terrific penance.

Indra went to him and said, "Why, O sage, do you sit in such a dreadful tapasya?"

Yavakrita said, "O you whom the Devas adore, I sit in penance to gain such gyana of the Vedas as no Brahmana has ever had before. O conqueror of Paka, my tapasya is to have the Vedas manifest themselves in me; why, I mean to acquire every manner of knowledge through my tapasya.

Lord, learnt through gurus, the Vedas take a long time to be known. I perfom my austerities to have them in a short while."

Indra said, "Brahmana, the path you tread is not the proper way. Why do you want to destroy yourself? Go and learn from the lips of a preceptor."

Saying this, Sakra went away and Yavakrita of immeasurable energy fell once more to his tapasya. O king, I have heard that by continuing his stern penance he greatly agitated Indra, who came again to that Maharishi and forbade him, saying, "You strive so that the Veda manifests both in yourself and in your father; but your exertions can never be fruitful, nor is this tapasya of yours well-advised."

Yavakrita said, "Lord of the Devas, if you do not give me what I want, I will perform even more stringent tapasya. Indra, if you do not grant me what I want, I will cut off my limbs and offer them as a sacrifice into a blazing fire."

Indra realised how determined the sage was and decided to use some guile to dissuade him. Indra assumed the guise of an ascetic Brahmana, hundreds of years old, and infirm, and suffering from consumption. And he fell to throwing up a dam with sand, at the very place along the Bhagirathi to which Yavakrita used to come to bathe.

Unceasingly, Sakra began to fill the Ganga with sand, and he attracted Yavakrita's attention. When that bull among the sages saw Indra earnestly building his dam, he broke into laughter, and said, 'What are you doing, O Brahmana, and what is your object? Why do you undertake this mighty endeavour for no good reason?"

Indra said, "My child, I am trying to dam the Ganga so that there may be a commodious passage across the water. People experience considerable difficulty in crossing and recrossing the river by boat."

Yavakrita said, "O you of ascetic wealth, you cannot dam this mighty current. O Brahmana, desist from what is impracticable, and take up something that you can achieve."

Indra said, "Rishi, I have imposed this weighty task upon myself just as you have undertaken your tapasya, which can never be fruitful, in order to know the Vedas."

Yavakrita said, "If, Lord of the Devas, my penance is doomed to fail, be pleased to grant me something that I can achieve. Bless me with boons by which I can excel other men."

Indra said, "The Vedas will be manifest in you, and in your father as well; and all your other desires will also be fulfilled. Return home, Yavakrita."

Having thus got the object of his desire, Yavakrita came to his father and said, "Father, the Vedas will be manifest in you as well as myself, and I have obtained boons whereby we shall excel against all men."

Bharadwaja said, "O my son, because you have obtained the objects of your desire, you will become proud. And when you are puffed up with pride and have also become uncharitable, destruction will soon overtake you.

There is a tale that the gods themselves tell. In ancient times, there lived a sage named Baladhi, possessed of great energy. And in grief over the death of a child, he practised the severest penance to have a child that would be immortal; and he got a son even as he desired. But though they were favourably disposed towards him, the gods did not yet make his son immortal.

They said, 'No mortal can be deathless, without some condition by which he can die.'

Baladhi said, 'O Devas, these mountains have always existed and are invincible; let their destruction be the condition of my son's death.'

Baladhi's son was called Medhavi, and he was highly irascible. When he learnt of the only way in which he could die, he grew haughty and began to insult the sages of the earth. And he ranged over the world, doing mischief to the Munis.

One day, he met the Maharishi Dhanushaksha of immense tejas and the arrogant Medhavi insulted him. The Rishi cursed him, 'Be you ashes!'

But Medhavi was not reduced to ashes. Then Dhanushaksha had a vast herd of buffaloes shatter the mountain, which stood as the condition of Medhavi's immortality. The young man instantly died.

Taking his son's corpse in his arms, Medhavi's father began to bewail his fate. Now listen, my child, to what the Rishis, who were masters of the Vedas, chanted when they found the sage mourning: Never can a mortal overcome what Fate ordains. Lo! Dhanushaksha shattered even the mountain with a herd of buffaloes.

So do young ascetics, who are puffed up with the pride of the boons they have received, swiftly perish. You do not want to be one of them.

This Raibhya, O my son, is possessed of great tejas, and his two sons are like him. Therefore, be vigilant - never approach him. My child, Raibhya is a Maharishi of short temper; if angered, he can do you harm.

Yavakrita said, "I will do as you say. Do not be anxious, father, for Raibhya deserves my reverence even as you do.'

Yet, after placating his father with sweet words, Yavakrita, fearing nothing and nobody, began to take his delight in wantonly offending other munis.'"

Lomasa says, 'One day in the month of Chaitra, while wandering fearlessly, Yavakrita approached the asrama of Raibhya. In that beautiful hermitage, adorned with trees rich with flowers, he saw the daughter-in-law of Raibhya, sauntering about like a Kinnara woman.

Smitten by swift passion, deprived of his good sense, Yavakrita said shamelessly to the bashful young woman, "Be mine!"

At which, knowing his nature, and afraid of a curse, and also thinking of Raibhya's power, she said to him, "I will, wait for me here", promising him everything and, tying him up with vines, sweetly, she went back into her dwelling.

When Raibhya returned to his asrama, he found his daughter-in-law, Paravasu's wife, in tears. Consoling her with soft words, he asked what was the cause of her grief.

Thereupon, the beautiful girl told him what Yavakrita had said to her, and also how she had adroitly kept him at bay.

Raibhya's mind flared up in wrath. He tore off a matted lock of his jata, and with holy mantras offered it to the sacred fire. At this, a woman who resembled his daughter-in-law in every particular, sprang out of the flames.

The Rishi plucked out another dreadlock from his head, and again offered it to the fire. Now a terrible demon leapt forth from the flames, his eyes fiery.

The two said to Raibhya, "What shall we do?"

The angry sage said to them, "Go and kill Yavakrita."

They said, "We shall!" and flew to do as he bid them.

Using her charms, the lovely woman spirit took Yavakrita's sacred water-pot from him. Then, spear upraised, the demon flew at Yavakrita, when he had been deprived of his water-pot and rendered unclean.

Yavakrita jumped up and fled towards a tank. He found it empty of water and flew towards all the rivers, but found them dry too. Threatened repeatedly by the Rakshasa with his spear, the terrified Yavakrita tried to enter his father's Agnihotrasala. But there a blind Sudra seized and prevented him.

Now the demon cast his spear at Yavakrita and struck him through the heart, and Yavakrita fell dead. After killing Yavakrita, the Rakshasa went back to Raibhya, and with the permission of that sage, began to live with the female spirit.'

Lomasa says, 'Kaunteya, Bharadwaja returned to his hermitage after performing the nitya karma of the day and having collected wood for the sacred fire of sacrifice. But since his son had been slain, the sacrificial flames that came to welcome him every day, did not come forth to greet the Rishi.

Seeing this change in the Agnihotra, the Mahamuni asked the blind Sudra, "Why, O Sudra, do the fires not rejoice at sight of me? You, also, do not welcome me gladly, as you usually do.

Is all well in my asrama? I hope my son of little sense did not go to Raibhya. Answer me quickly, Sudra, my heart misgives me."

The Sudra said, "Your foolish son did go to the Rishi Raibhya, and that is why he lies dead on the ground, slain by a mighty demon. Attacked by the Rakshasa holding a spear, he tried to force his way into this room, and I barred his way.

Then, wanting holy water while he was unclean and stood hopeless, he was slain by the Rakshasa."

Bharadwaja, griefstricken, took his dead son in his arms and began to lament. He cried, "O my son, you did tapasya for the weal of all Brahmanas, so that the Vedas, which had not been studied by any Brahmana at all, might become manifest in you.

You were always kindly and reverent towards any Brahmana, why towards all creatures.* But, alas, you did lapse into arrogance and rudeness. O my son, I warned you never to go to Raibhya's arama, but even there you went like Yama himself.

Evil is that man, who, knowing that I am an old man, and also that Yavakrita was my only son, gave way to wrath and killed my child. My son, without you, the most precious thing in the world, I will give up my life as well.

Yes, in grief at the death of my child I renounce my life; but this I say, that Raibhya's eldest son will soon kill him, although he be innocent.

Blessed are those to whom children have never been born, for they lead a happpy life, without having to experience this dreadful grief. Who in this world can be more vile than they, who made senseless with sorrow at the death of a child, curse even their dearest friend? Finding my son dead I cursed my dearest friend.

Ah, which other man in this world has ever suffered such misfortune!"

After lamenting long, Bharadwaja cremated his son and then consigned himself to a full-blazing fire.'

Lomasa says, 'At this very time, the mighty king Brihadyumna, of great fortune, who was the Yajamana of Raibhya, began a sacrifice. The two sons of Raibhya, Arvavasu and Paravasu, were engaged by that wise sovereign to assist him in the performance of the yagna.

Kaunteya, with their father's leave, the two went to the sacrifice, while Raibhya remained in their asrama, with Paravasu's wife. One day, wanting to see his wife, Paravasu returned home alone. He met his father in the vana, wrapped in the skin of a black antelope. The night was far advanced and dark; Paravasu, blinded by drowsiness in that deep forest, mistook his father for a wild stag, and fearing for his own safety, killed his father.

Then, after performing the funeral rites for his father, he returned to the sacrifice and said to his brother, "You will never be able to perform this task unassisted. And I have killed our father, mistaking him for a deer. My brother, keep a vrata of expiation for the sin of killing a Brahmana, and I, O Muni, shall complete the yagna by myself."

Arvavasu said, "Do then fulfil this sacrifice of the gifted Brihadyumna; and for you, bringing my senses under perfect control, I will observe the vow to expiate the sin of a Brahmahatya."

Having kept the vrata for that sin, the Muni Arvavasu came back to the sacrifice. Seeing his brother, Paravasu, in a voice choked with malice, cried to Brihadyumna, "O king, see that this slayer of a Brahmana does not enter your yagna, or even look upon it. Even by a glance, the killer of a Brahmana can harm you immeasurably.'

The king ordered his attendants to turn Arvavasu out. As they drove him out the king's men repeatedly cursed Arvavasu, crying, "Brahmana killer!"

More than once Arvavasu protested, "It is not I that have killed a Brahmana!"

He said he had not kept the vrata for his own sake, but to free his brother from the sin that Paravasu had committed.

Having said this in anger, and being reprimanded by the attendants, the Brahmana sage of austere penance retired silently into the forest. There he sat in fierce tapasya, worshipping the Sun. The Surya mantra was revealed to him, and then Agni Deva, immortal god who has the first share of the havis from any yagna, appeared, embodied, to the Rishi.

The Devas were well pleased with Arvavasu for what he had done; they had him made chief priest at Brihadyumna's sacrifice, and Paravasu dismissed from it.

Agni and the other celestials bestowed boons on Arvavasu, without his asking. He prayed that his father might be restored to life. He prayed that his brother might be absolved from his sin; that his father might have no recollection of his having been slain; that Bharadwaja and Yavakrita might both be restored to life; and that the solar revelation would find celebrity on earth.

The god said, "Tathastu, so be it," and conferred other boons on him also. Yudhishtira, all those who had died were restored to life.

Yavakrita now said to Agni and the other deities, "I gained knowledge of all the Vedas, and also performed tapasya. How, then, did Raibhya manage to kill me as he did, O best of the gods?"

The Devas said, "Yavakrita, never again do what you did. You could be killed because you acquired the Vedas without studying them and without learning from a guru. But Raibhya bore many trials, he satisfied his preceptor with his conduct, and gained the Vedas through great exertion and in a long time."

Having said this to Yavakrita, and having given life back to the dead, the Devas with Indra at their head ascended into heaven.

Look, Yudhishtira, here is the sacred asrama of that sage, with trees that bear flowers and fruit in all seasons. O tiger among kings, by staying here for a while you will be exorcised of all your sins.'

Lomasa says, 'O Bhaarata, O king, now you have crossed the mountains Usirabija, Mainaka and Sweta, as well as the Kala hills, and look, O son of Kunti, O Bharatarishabha, here before you flow the seven Gangas!

This is a most pure and holy place. Here Agni blazes forth without pause. No son of Manu can see this wonder. So, Pandava, concentrate your mind in dhyana so that you can behold all these tirthas.

Now you will see the playground of the gods, marked with their footprints. Since we have passed the mountain Kala, we will now cilmb Mandara, the white mountain, inhabited by the Yakshas, by Manibhadra, and Kubera, lord of the Yakshas.

Rajan, here eighty thousand fleet Gandharvas, and four times as many Kimpurushas and Yakshas of various shapes and forms, holding various weapons, attend upon Manibhadra, king of the Yakshas. Great indeed is their power in this realm, and their swiftness is like the very wind.

Why, they can unseat Indra himself from his throne. Protected by them, and also watched over by the Rakshasas, these mountains are inaccessible. Therefore, son of Pritha, fix your mind in dhyana for, besides these, Kubera dwells here with his ministers and his Rakshasa kindred. We will have to encounter them, so muster your energies.

O king, the mountain Kailasa is six yojanas high; upon it grows a gigantic nyagrodha tree. Kaunteya, numberless Devas and Yakshas and Rakshasas and Kinnaras and Nagas and Suparnas and Gandharvas pass this way, going towards Kubera's palace. With my protection, as well as the might of Bhimasena, and also the virtue of your own asceticism and self-command, today you must mingle with them.

May Lord Varuna and Yama, conqueror of battles, and Ganga, and Yamuna, and this mountain, and the Maruts and the twin Aswins, and all rivers and lakes, vouchsafe your safety. And, O effulgent one, may you be safe from all the Devas and the Asuras, and the Vasus.

Devi Ganga, I hear your roar from this golden mountain, sacred to Indra. O Goddess of high fortune, in these mountains, protect this king, worshipped by all of the race of Ajamidha. O daughter of Himalaya, this king is about to enter into this realm; do you confer your protection upon him.'

Having invoked the protection of the river, Lomasa says to Yudhishtira, 'Be careful.'

Yudhishtira says to his brothers, 'I have never seen Lomasa so anxious, so watch carefully over Krishnaa, and do not be careless. Lomasa knows this place is surely difficult of access. Therefore, observe utmost purity here.'

He now says particularly to his brother Bhima, of vast prowess, 'Bhimasena, watch intently over Draupadi. Whether Arjuna be near or away, in times of danger she always seeks only your protection.'

Then Yudhishtira goes to Nakula and Sahadeva, and after lovingly sniffing the tops of their heads, and embracing them, he says with tears in his eyes, 'Do not be afraid, yet go cautiously in this place.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Vrikodara, there are mighty and powerful invisible spirits in this place. We shall, however, pass safely through it with the punya of tapasya and Agnihotra sacrifices. So, Kaunteya, restrain your hunger and thirst by collecting your energies, and also, O Bhima, keep both your strength and your wits at the ready.

You heard what Rishi Lomasa said about Mount Kailasa; so think how Krishnaa will pass this place. Or, mighty Bhima of the large eyes, return from here, taking Sahadeva with you, and all our charioteers, cooks, servants, chariots, horses, and our Brahmanas worn out with travel; while Nakula and I, together with Muni Lomasa of great tapasya go on, subsisting on the lightest fare and observing vows.

You await my return at the source of the Ganga, protecting Draupadi till I come back.'

Bhima replies, 'Bhaarata, although this blessed princess has been sorely afflicted by toil and sorrow, yet she travels on easily in the hope of seeing Arjuna of the white steeds. Your grief also is great at not seeing the noble Arjuna, who never flees a battle.

It goes without sayng that your sorrow will only increase if you do not see me, Sahadeva and Krishnaa, as well.

It is best that the Brahmanas turn back, with our servants, charioteers, cooks, and whoever else you command. I will never leave you in these wild and inaccessible mountain realms, infested by Rakshasas.

And, O tiger among men, this princess of great fortune, always devoted to her lords, does not want to turn back without you. Sahadeva is ever devoted to you; he too will never turn back, I know him well.

Rajan, we are all eager to see Arjuna, and so we will all go on together. If we cannot pass over this mountain in our chariots, because it abounds in defiles, we will go on foot. Do not worry, O King, I will carry Panchali wherever she cannot walk.

This is what I have deceided, so do not be anxious or distracted. Over impassable places, I will also carry our tender-bodied heroes, the twins, the delight of their mother, wherever they cannot walk."

Yudhishtira says, 'May your strength increase, O Bhima, for what you say, that you will carry the illustrious Panchali and these twins. Bless you! No man is as brave as you are. May your strength, fame, merit and reputation increase! O long-armed one, since you offer to carry Krishnaa and the twins, exhaustion and defeat will never be yours.'

Now the enchanting Krishnaa says with a smile, 'O Bhaarata, I will be able to go, so do not be anxious on my account.'

Lomasa says, 'Access to the Mountain Gandhamadana can only be gained through asceticism. So, Kaunteya, we must all do tapasya; and then, O King, Nakula, Sahadeva, Bhimasena, you and I will all see Arjuna Swetavahana.'

Thus speaking together, journeying on, they see with delight the great domains of Subahu, situated on the Himalayas, abounding in horses and elephants, densely inhabited by the Kiratas and the Tanganas, crowded by hundreds of Pulindas, frequented by the Devas, and rife with wonders.

King Subahu, the lord of the Pulindas, receives them joyfully at the frontier of his realms, paying them proper respect. Being received with honour, and dwelling in comfort in that place, they set out for the Himalaya, when the sun shines brightly in the sky.

They entrust the care of all their servants—Indrasena and the others, and the cooks and the stewards, and Draupadi's accoutrements, and everything else those Maharathas, the mighty scions of the Kurus, and Krishnaa with them, go forth from that land, cautiously, all of them glad at heart at the prospect of seeing Arjuna.

Yudhishtira says, 'Bhimasena, Panchali, and you twins, listen to me. The karma done in previous births does not perish, but surely produces its fruit, sooner or later. Look how even we have become rangers of the wilderness!

Exhausted and distressed as we are, we have to support one another, and pass through well-nigh impassable places, so that we might see Arjuna. Kshatriya, I do not see Dhananjaya beside me and this burns me even as fire does a heap of cotton.

I live in the forest with my younger brothers, anxious to see Arjuna again. This thought, as also the memory of the grave insult to Yagnaseni, consumes me.

O Vrikodara, I do not see the invincible Partha of the great bow and incomparable energy, who is younger than you and older than Nakula. For this, Bhima, I am miserable.

Just to see my Arjuna again, I have been wandering to various tirthas for five years, passing through charmed jungles, passing lovely lakes; yet I do not see him. For this, Vrikodara, I am miserable.

I do not see the long-armed Gudakesa, of the dark blue skin, and the lion's gait. For this, Vrikodara, I am miserable. I do not see that Kurusthama, master of weapons, most skilful in battle, and matchless among bowmen. For this, Vrikodara, I am miserable.

I am distraught because I do not see Pritha's son Dhananjaya, born under the nakshatra Phalguni, who goes amongst his enemies even like Yama during the Pralaya; Partha who has the prowess of an elephant in musth, with the juice of rut trickling down its temples; Arjuna of the leonine shoulders; not inferior to Sakra himself in strength and energy; elder in years to the twins; of white steeds; unrivalled in heroism; invincible; and wielding an awesome bow. For this, O Vrikodara, I am miserable.

And he is always of a forgiving temper, even when insulted by the meanest man; and he confers benefit and protection to the righteous; but to a perfidious one who tries to do him harm with treachery, Dhananjaya is like virulent poison, be not the one Sakra himself.

And the mighty Vibhatsu of immeasurable soul and strength shows mercy and extends protection even to a foe, when fallen. He is the refuge of us all and he crushes his enemies in battle. He owns the power to garner any treasure whatever, and he ministers to our happiness.

It was through his prowess that I owned measureless precious jewels of myriad kinds, which now Suyodhana has usurped. It was through his might, O Kshatriya, that I owned the palatial Mayaa Sabha, embellished with every manner of gemstone, and celebrated throughout the three worlds.

Pandava, in prowess Phalguni is like Krishna, and in battle he is invincible and unrivalled, even like Kartavirya. Alas, I do not see him, Bhima, Arjuna who in might is like Krishna and Balarama!

In strength of arms and spirit, he is like Purandara himself; in swiftness, he is like the wind; in grace, like the moon, and in wrath he is like eternal Yama.

Mahabaho, to see that warlike Purushavyaghra, tiger among men, we will go to Gandhamadana, where the hermitage of Nara and Narayana is, beneath the celebrated nyagrodha tree, the asrama inhabited by Yakshas.

We will see that best of mountains, and by doing stern tapasya, we shall walk to Kubera's beautiful lake guarded by Rakshasas. That place cannot be reached by chariots or carts, Vrikodara, and neither can cruel, greedy or choleric men ever go there, Bhaarata.

Bhima, in order to see Arjuna, there shall we journey, in a company, with Brahmanas of strict vows, girding on our swords, and wielding our bows. Only those who are impure meet with flies, mosquitoes, tigers, lions, and reptiles, but never the pure.

Therefore, controlling our diet, and restraining our senses, we shall go to the Gandhamadana, to see Arjuna Dhananjaya.'

Lomasa says, 'Pandavas, you have seen many a mountain, and river and town and forest and beautiful tirtha; you have touched their sacral waters with your hands.

Now this way leads to the devine Mount Mandara; therefore be you attentive and composed. You will now climb to the dwelling place of Devas and Devarishis of great punya. Here, O King, there flows the mighty and lovely river Alakananda, of holy water adored by hosts of celestial ones and sages, and we will trace its source to the great nyagrodha tree.

High-souled Vaihayasas, Balakhilyas and Gandharvas of mighty spirits frequent this holiest asrama. Those unmatched singers of the Sama hymns, the Rishis Marichi, Pulaha, Bhrigu and Angiras chanted them here.

Here the king of the Devas performs his nitya puja, along with the Maruts; and the Sadhyas and the Aswins attend on him. The Sun, the Moon and all the luminaries with the planets come to this river, alternately by day and by night.

Most fortunate king, Mahadeva, protector of the world, the Bull his emblem, received the descent of the Ganga from the sky here, where now her source is.

My children, approach this Goddess of the six attributes and bow down before her with your minds concentrated in dhyana.'

Having listened to the Maharishi Lomasa, the sons of Pandu reverentially worship the Ganga, who flows through the firmament. And after having adored her, the pious Pandavas resume their journey, accompanied by the sages.

And in a while, those best of men behold at a distance a white massif of vast proportions, even like Meru, and stretching on all sides.

Knowing the question in the hearts of Pandu's sons, Lomasa master of speech, says, 'Listen, O sons of Pandu! Purushottamas, what you see before you, vast as a mountain and beautiful as the cliffs of Kailasa, is a mound of the bones of the mighty Daitya Naraka. Being heaped, they resemble a mountain!

The Daitya was slain by that Paramatman, the eternal Lord Vishnu, to help Indra, king of the Devas.

Wanting to usurp Indra's position, Narakasura, of the mighty mind, acquired knowledge of the Vedas and performed a dread tapasya, which lasted ten thousand years. And through this penance, as also by the force and might of his arms he became invincible and forever harassed Indra.

Anagha, Sinless, knowing the might of the Demon and his great penance, Indra became agitated and fear overwhelmed him. In his heart he thought fervently of Vishnu, the eternal One. At which, the gracious Lord of the universe, who is present everywhere, appeared and stood before Indra.

The Devas and Rishis began to sing hymns to Narayana, and to propitiate him with prayers. In his presence even Agni of the six attributes and of blazing beauty was overpowered by his effulgence, and was shorn of radiance.

Seeing Mahavishnu before him, the king of the Devas, the Vajradhari bowed his head low and told Narayana what the source of his fear was.

Vishnu said, "I know, O Sakra, that your fear is from Naraka, lord of the Daityas. He aims for your throne through his tapasya. And so, to please you, I will sever his soul from his body, despite his great tapasya. King of the Devas, wait a moment."

Vishnu then struck Naraka with a blow of his hand; the Asura fell to the ground even like the lord of mountains struck by cosmic thunder. So he died, and his bones gathered in this place.

Another miracle of Vishnu's is also manifest here. Once, when all the Earth was lost, having sunk into Patala, Narayana assumed the form of the Varaha, a Boar with a single tusk, and raised her up.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Worshipful one, tell me in detail how Vishnu, Devadeva, raised up the Earth which had sunk a hundred yojanas. How was Bhumi Devi, of lofty fortune, support of all created things, who dispenses blessings and brings forth all manner of grain, rendered stable?

Through whose power had she sunk a hundred yojanas? And how did the Paramatman come to rescue her with this great exploit? Dvijottama, you certainly know all about what transpired and I want to hear it all from you.'

Lomasa says, 'Yudhishtira, listen to that tale at length.

My child, in ancient days, there came a time of dread in the Krita Yuga, when the eternal and primeval Deity assumed the dharma of Yama; and when the God of gods began to do the work of Yama, not a creature died, while the births were as usual.

Birds and beasts and kine, and sheep, and deer and all kinds of carnivores multiplied, Parantapa, and the race of humans also swelled in tide, in millions.

My son, when the population multiplied to a frightening extent, the Earth, oppressed with her intolerable burden, sank a hundred yojanas. Agony lanced through all her limbs, and barely conscious from the vast pressure upon her, Bhumi Devi in great distress sought the protection of the Lord Narayana, the foremost of the gods.

The Earth said, "It is through your grace, O possessor of the six attributes, that I was able to remain so long in my position. But now I have been overcome with burden which I cannot sustain any longer.

Most adorable One, relieve me of my burden. I seek your protection, Lord, give me your favour."

Hearing her, the eternal Lord, possessor of the six attributes, Vishnu, said calmly, his words distinct in their every syllable, "Do not fear, O afflicted Bhumi devi, bearer of all treasures. I will relieve you of your burden."

Thus consoling Bhumi, who has the mountains for her earrings, and then sending her away, Vishnu suddenly turned into a refulgent boar with one tusk. Striking terror with his glowing red eyes and his blazing lustre smoking, fuming, he began to grow amazingly.

Kshatriya, then bearing the Earth upon his single radiant tusk, that Being who pervades the Vedas raised her up a hundred yojanas. And while she was being so raised, there was a terrific agitation and all the Devas, and all the Rishis of great tapasya became distraught.

Heaven, and the sky, and the earth, as well, were filled with exclamations of alarm and neither the gods nor men could find any peace. Then countless celestials and sages went to Brahma, who sat blazing with his own lustre.

Approaching Brahma, the lord of every celestial, and the witness of the deeds of all beings, they said to him with folded hands, "Devadeva, all the created are agitated and every being, mobile and immobile, are distraught.

Lord of the Devas, even the oceans are fraught and this whole world has sunk a hundred yojanas. What is the cause of this ferment in the universe? We are bewildered and dismayed; we beg you tell us what is happening."

Brahma replied, "Devas, do not be afraid of the Asuras, in any matter or place. Listen, O celestials, to the reason for all this commotion. The illustrious One, who is omnipresent, eternal and the never-pershiing Soul is responsible for this agitation.

The Paramatman Vishnu has raised up Bhumi, who was submerged a hundred yojanas; the great disturbance is in consequence of the Earth being lifted up. Know this and dispel your doubts."

The Devas said, "Where is that Being who joyfully raises up the Earth? O you who possess the six attributes, tell us where this is happening, so we might go to that place."

Brahma said, "Go, and may good befall you! You will find him resting in the gardens of Nandana. Look, there is the glorious and worshipful Garuda.

After having raised up the Earth, the God from whom the world became manifest, flames forth in the shape of a boar, even like the all-consuming apocalypse during the pralaya. Upon his breast the Srivatsa shines. Go and behold that Being who knows no decay."

Setting Brahma, the Grandsire, at their head the Devas came to that infinite Soul, and having sung his praises, bade him farewell, and went back to where they had come from,' says Lomasa.

Having heard this story, all the Pandavas go with all haste towards the place to which Lomasa pointed."

Vaisampayana said, "O King, those foremost of bowmen, of immeasurable prowess, holding bows strung tightly, carrying quivers brimful of arrows, wearing fingerlets made of iguana-skin, and their swords at their sides, go, with Panchali, towards the Gandhamadana, also taking with them the best of their Brahmanas.

On their way, they see lakes and rivers and mountains and forests, and trees of wide-spreading shade upon mountain summits; and places abounding in trees bearing flowers and fruit in all seasons, and frequented by Devas and Rishis.

Restraining their senses within the inner self, subsisting on fruit and roots, the heroes pass through rugged realms, craggy and difficult of passage, seeing diverse and numerous birds and beasts as they go.

Thus those high-souled ones enter the mountain of Rishis, Siddhas and Devas, of Gandharvas, Kinnaras and Apsaras. And, O lord of men, as those mighty Kshatriyas first set foot upon Gandhamadana, a violent wind blows there, bringing a torrent of rain with it. Great clouds of dust, bearing dry leaves, rise up, and all on a sudden cover earth, air and the firmament.

When the heavens are obscured by dust nothing can be seen, and neither can the Pandavas speak to one another. Eyes full of darkness and stung by the wind that carries rock particles, they cannot see one another.

Trees split open, cracking in the gale; towering trees crash down to the ground with force of the wind.

Dismayed by the storm, they think, 'Are the heavens falling down or is this mountain and the very earth cracking open?'

Terrified by the storm, they grope in the pitch darkness with arms outstretched, and shelter under trees, inside large anthills, and in caves.

Holding his bow and supporting Krishnaa, the mighty Bhimasena stands under a tree; Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, with Dhaumya, scurries into some heavy woods; Sahedeva, carrying the sacred fire, takes shelter under a huge rock. Nakula, with Lomasa and the other Brahmanas of great tapasya stand trembling, each one under a tree.

Then when the wind abates and the dust subsides, the sky opens and down comes a cascade of rain. The heavens shake with shocking batteries of thunder, each like Indra's Vajra being cast; and quick-flashing lightning begins to play vividly through the clouds. Without pause it rains, and everything is a solid sheet of water, until rivers of hurtling water rush all around, foam-crested and turbid with mud. These roaring cataracts uproot the greatest trees and plunge them down the mountain like twigs.

As suddenly as it began, the storm ceases, and when the wind is still and the air is clear, each of them comes out cautiously from their places of hiding, and they met together again.

Again, those Kshatriyas and their party set foot upon Mount Gandhamadana."

Vaisampayana said, "When the noble sons of Pandu have gone a mere two yojanas, Draupadi, unaccustomed to walking for long, cannot go on. She is weary, Panchala's most delicate daughter, and faint, and the storm has also terrified her.

The black-eyed Krishnaa supports herself with her graceful arms on her thighs, clenched together, for just a moment, before she collapses trembling onto the ground. Seeing her fall like a severed vine, Nakula runs forward and holds her.

The distrait Nakula cries, 'O King, Panchali has fallen down from tiredness. Tend to her, O Bhaarata. She deserves no such misery and has borne long hardship; she is exhausted from our journey. Comfort her, O mighty king.'

Hearing Nakula, Yudhishtira, and Bhima and Sahadeva, as well, rush to Panchali in alarm. They see her pale and drained, and, taking her onto his lap, Yudhishtira laments, 'Ah, accustomed to ease, used to sleeping in luxurious chambers, on beds spread over with fine sheets, how does this beautiful one lie on rough, bare ground now?

Alas! Only because of me, the soft feet and the lotus-like face of she who deserves all the finest things in life are callused pale. O what have I done!

Fool that I am, being addicted to dice, I have been wandering in forests full of wild beasts, taking Krishnaa with me. Her father King Drupada gave this doe-eyed one to me, trusting that his blessed child would be happy by having the Pandavas for her husbands. But because I am a wretch, today she lies on the rough earth, exhausted with every hardship, sorrow and wearying travel.'

As Yudhishtira Dharmaraja laments, Dhaumya and all the other principal Brahmanas come to him, and begin to console him and to honour him with their blessings.

They recite mantras to keep Rakshasas away and also perform some holy rites to restore Panchali's health and spirits. At this, and also at being stroked soothingly by her husbands' palms, as well as by a cool, moist breeze, she slowly recovers consciousness.

The sons of Pritha now lay her down upon a deerskin, and make her rest. Taking her red-soled feet, bearing auspicious marks, the twins begin to press them gently with their hands scarred by bowstrings. Yudhishtira, foremost of the Kurus, also comforts her.

Dharmaraja says to Bhima, 'Bhima, before us lie so many rough and rugged mountains, full of ice and snow, inaccessible. How, long-armed one, will Krishnaa pass over these?'

Bhima says, 'Rajan, I will carry you, our princess, and these Purusharishabhas the twins; so do not be anxious. Or, Anagha, at your command, with your leave, Hidimba's son, the mighty Ghatotkacha, who is as strong as I am and can fly through the sky, will carry us all to our destination.'

With Yudhishtira's permission, Bhima thinks of his Rakshasa son; and in an instant, the pious Ghatotkacha appears, salutes the Pandavas and the Brahmanas, and stands before them with folded hands. And they also caress him of the mighty arms.

Ghatotkacha says to his father, Bhimasena of dreadful prowess, 'You thought of me and I came at once to serve you. Command me, O long-armed, and I will do whatever you wish.'

Hearing this, Bhimasena hugs the Rakshasa to his breast.

Yudhishtira says, 'Bhima, let this mighty and heroic Rakshasa lord, your son, devoted to us, truthful and conversant with dharma, carry his mother Draupadi without delay. Owner of dreadful prowess, depending on the strength of your arms, I will reach the Gandhamadana unhurt, with Panchala's daughter.'

Hearing his brother, that Purushavyaghra Bhimasena commands his son Ghatotkacha Parantapa, 'Invincible son of Hidimba, this mother of yours is exhausted. You are strong and can go wherever you wish. So, sky-ranger, do you carry her.

May good fortune attend upon you! Carry her on your shoulders, and go with us, flying not too high so that she is not frightened.'

Ghatotkacha says, 'Single-handed, I can bear Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, and Dhaumya, and Krishnaa, and the twins. Then what wonder that today I will carry them, where there are others to help me? And, O sinless one, hundreds of other valiant Rakshasas, all of whom can fly, and assume any shape they wish, will together carry you all, and all the Brahmanas.'

Saying this, Ghatotkacha picks up Krishnaa, and the other Rakshasas, the Pandavas, while by virtue of his inherent power, Lomasa of incomparable effulgence courses along the path of the Siddhas, even like a second Sun. And at the command of the lord of the Rakshasas, the other Rakshasas of terrific strength bear all the other Brahmanas.

Flying above enchanted forests, they fly towards the gigantic Nyagrodha tree. Going at great speed, borne by the Rakshasas, the Kshatriyas pass over long distances as if over a few steps.

On their way they see below them lands crowded with Mlechha tribes, rich with mines of diverse gems. They see hills glittering with precious metals, where Vidyadharas throng, and Vanaras and Kinnaras and Kimpurushas and Gandharvas, and full of peacocks, and chamaras, and monkeys, and rurus, and bears, and gavayas, and bison, latticed with networks of rillets, full of countless species of bird and beast, handsome with lordly elephants, the birds all full of rapture in their trees.

Passing over many lands and kingdoms, including that of the Uttarakurus, they see that foremost of mountains, the Kailasa, replete with all wonders, and beside it, they behold the hermitage of Nara and Narayana, with unearthly trees hearing flowers and fruit in all seasons.

They also see the exquisite and mighty Nyagrodha, of the round trunk, fresh and so alive, its shade wide and deep, its foliage thick, soft and sleek; full of health; its boughs enormous and wide-spreading and of incomparable lustre; and bearing full, delicious and holy fruit, dripping nectar.

And this celestial tree is visited by hosts of mighty sages, and its branches teem with birds maddened by spirits; it grows in a grove where no mosquito or fly comes, a spot abundant with fruit, roots and sprakling water, covered in velvet green grasses, where Devas and Gandharvas come.

Its trunk is smooth, cool, its bark delicate and lovely. Reaching that ancestral tree, along with the Brahmanarishabhas, those mahatmans alight from the shoulders of the Rakshasas, and they see the charmed, most holy asrama of Nara-Narayana, where no sorrow comes, nor the rays of the Sun; where no hunger, thirst, heat or cold venture; where all grief melts away; where hosts of Maharishis throng; which hermitage is adorned by the grace of the Vedas, Saman, Rik, and Yajus; asrama inaccessible to men who have no devotion; asrama beautiful with offerings, and homas; and most sacred; and well-swept and fragrant; and shining all around with offerings of celestial blossoms; and spread over with altars of sacrificial fire, and holy women and water-pots and urns of holy waters and baskets, this refuge of all beings; and echoing with the chanting of the Vedas; and heavenly and most worthy of being dwelt in; where all tiredness disappears; and splendent and full of incomprehensible grace; and majestic, divine.

The Maharishis who live in that asrama subsist on fruit and roots, their senses perfectly restrained; they wear black deer-skins; they are effulgent like the Sun and Agni; their souls have been made great through tapasya and they are intent on mukti, while they lead the lives of Vanaprasthas, in communion with the Paramatman; and constantly the sound of Vedic hymns fill that place.

Then, having purified himself, and restraining his senses, Dharmaputra Yudhishtira of great tejas, together with his brothers, approaches those Rishis. And knowing him, for they are all blessed with supernatural knowledge, all the great sages receive him joyfully.

And those Munis, chanters of the Veda, themselves like fire, bless Yudhishtira; they give him holy water and flowers and roots. And Yudhishtira Dharmaraja receives these with reverence and joy.

Now, O sinless one, Pandu's son, along with Krishnaa and his brothers, and thousands of Brahmanas versed in the Vedas and the Vendangas, enters that most sacred asrama, which is like the abode of Sukra himself, and which pleases the mind with scents of heaven, which resembles heaven itself, so beautiful is it.

There Yudhishtira sees the hermitage of Nara and Narayana, made enchanting by the Bhagirathi and worshipped by the Devas and the Devarishis. Seeing that hermitage where Brahmarshis dwell, where fruits dripping ambrosia grow all around, the Pandavas are filled with rare delight.

Having reached that place, those high-souled Kshatriyas begin living with the Brahmanas. There they see the holy lake Vinda, and the mountain Mainaka, of golden summits, where so many species of birds live, and those magnanimous ones live there happily.

The sons of Pandu and Krishnaa delight in ranging through charmed woods and forests, bright with flowers of every season; exquisite on every side with trees bearing full-blown blossoms, and bending with the weight of fruits, and with countless male kokilas among their glossy leaves; and growing thickly and their shade cool and lovely to behold.

They delight in coming upon diverse lakes of limpid water, shimmering with lotuses and lilies. And there, O lord, the balmy mountain breeze blows, bearing the purest fragrances, gladdening their hearts.

And hard by the gigantic nyagrodha, the mighty sons of Kunti see the Bhagirathi falling down, crystalline, cool, bearing fresh lotuses, softly over a gentle descent of steps made of ruby and coral, and graced on both sides with celestial trees and her waters strewn with celestial flowers, and enchanting the mind and heart.

In that place, frequented by Deva and Rishi, and so hard of access, they make themselves pure and offer oblations to the manes, the gods and the great sages in the sacred waters of the Bhagirathi.

Thus those bulls among men, the heroic Kurupraviravas, begin to dwell there with the Brahmanas, making their offerings and practising dhyana. The Purushavyaghras feel particularly joyful to watch the various amusements of Draupadi."

Vaisampayana said, "There, in purity, those tigers among men remain for six nights, waiting to see Arjuna. One day, a gust of wind blows from the north-east bringing a heavenly lotus of a thousand petals, effulgent as the Sun. Panchali sees that bloom of unearthly fragrance, brought by the wind and left on the ground; she picks it up and is enraptured.

She cries to Bhimasena, 'Look, Bhima, this unearthly flower has the quintessential source of all redolence within it! Parantapa, it makes my heart soar in joy.

I will give this bloom to Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, so you must fetch some more for me, so that I can take them to our asrama in the Kamyaka. If, O Pandava, you do love me, bring me many, many of these wondrous flowers.'

Saying this, that chaste queen of the beautiful glances approaches Yudhishtira with the flower. Bhima Purusharishabha, mightiest of all men, sets out to satisfy her wish; intent upon bringing her the flowers, he goes swiftly, facing the wind, in the direction from which the flower had come. With his bow and mace inlaid with gold, with his arrows like venomous serpents, he goes forth like an angry lion or an elephant in rut; and all creatures on his way gaze at him with the powerful bow and arrows.

He felt no exhaustion, no languor, no fear or confusion, as that son of Vayu and Pritha. Up the peak he climbs, with the strength of his arms, to please Draupadi. That slayer of his foes ranges that finest mountain covered with trees and creepers, its ground black rock; and frequented by Kinnaras; and with all manner of mineral, plant, beast, and birds of various hues; and appearing like an upraised arm of the Earth adorned with an entire set of ornaments.

His eyes fixed on the slopes of Gandhamadana, fragrant mountain, various thoughts swirling through his mind, his ears thrilling with the sweet songs of male kokilas and the ubiqitous hum black bees, and his eyes enchanted by the vivid colours of the profusion of flowers of all seasons, he of unmatched prowess goes along even like an elephant in musth ranging mad through a forest.

And fanned by the fresh breeze of the Gandhamadana, bearing the scents of myriad blossoms and cooling like a father's touch, Bhima goes along sniffing the bright and perfumed air. The hairs on his body stand on end with delight, as he surveys all of that mountain for the flowers for which he has come, Gandhmadana home to Yakshas and Gandharvas and Devas and Brahmarshis.

Brushed by the leaves of Saptachchada tree, besmeared with fresh red, black and white minerals, he looks as if decorated with lines of holy unguenta drawn by uncanny fingers. With clouds stretching away at its sides, the mountain seems as if it were dancing with outspread wings; with its spring and streams flowing and sparkling, it seems to be decked with necklaces of pearls.

Upon its slopes are romantic caves and groves and waterfalls; brilliant peacocks dance to the chiming of the anklets and bangles of Apsaras; the mountain's jagged surfaces have been worn smooth by the tusks of the Diggajas; with the rivers cascading down, Gandhamadana looks as if its clothes are being loosened.

Cheerfully, playfully, that graceful son of the wind-god hies on, forcing his way through countless intertwined creepers. Great stags gaze curiously at him, with lush grass in their mouths; never having known fear before, they do not flee.

Determined to fulfil the wish of his love, Pandu's mighty and youthful son, stalwart and of splendour like that of gold, his body strong as a lion's, crashing along like a maddened elephant, and with the force of an elephant in rut, and his eyes coppery like those of a musth-stirred elephant, and able to stop the charge of a maddened elephant, ranges the enchanting Gandhamadana with his beautiful and extraordinary eyes upraised - presenting a most novel and unusual spectacle.

The wives of Yakshas and Gandharvas sitting invisible beside their lords, stare at him, turning their faces as he storms past. Intent upon gratifying Draupadi exiled into the forest, as he traverses wondrous Gandhamada, Bhima remembers all the grief and pain that Duryodhana has inflicted upon them.

Bhima thinks, 'What will Yudhishtira do now, with Arjuna not returned from Devaloka and with me here looking for Draupadi's flowers? Surely, out of love and uncertainty about their prowess he will not send Nakula and Sahadeva to look for us. Ah, how can I find these flowers quickly?'

Worried, his mind and eyes fixed to the mountains lovely slopes, that tiger among men goes along as swiftly as the lord of birds, as the wind, with Draupadi's wish his provender, making the earth tremble with his tread, he goes like the wind, even like a hurricane at the equinox; and frightening herds of elephants and prides of lions and lone tigers, and deer; and uprooting and smashing great trees and tearing up plants and creepers, he goes like some wild tusker, climbing higher and higher towards the summit of a mountain, and now roaring fiercely even like a cloud full of thunder.

Awakened by Bhima's dreadful roaring, tigers come out of their dens, while other rangers of the forest hide. The coursers of the skies spring up from their perches and wheel into the air. Deer herds run away in panic; mighty lions awake from their slumber and forsake their caves. Huge bison stand and stare. Terrified elephants, along with their mates, flee that forest and lumber away to more open spaces below.

And the boars and the deer and the lions and the bison and the tigers and the jackals and the gavayas of the forest wood all together set up a dismal outcry of fear; and geese, and gallinules and ducks and karandavas and piavas and parrots and kokilas and herons all fly frantically in every direction.

Some haughty elephants, goaded by their mates, as also some enraged lions fly at Bhimasena, but in their hearts they are afraid and they rush at him spraying urine and dung, and trumpeting and roaring only to embolden themselves.

The wind-god's lustrous and graceful son, the mighty Pandava, promptly begins to kill them all, why he hefts one elephant and swinging it through the air kills another with it; he does the same with some lions; while others he despatches with mere slaps!

At being struck by Bhima, all the elephants, lions, tigers and leopards that come yelp and scream in terror, and discharge more dung and urine. Quickly, he kills them all, those that do not flee, and the majestic and awesomely strong son of Pandu enters the jungle, now roaring and shouting aloud himself, making the forest echo.

Then that long-armed one sees upon the slopes of the Gandhamadana a beautiful and extraordinary grove of plantain trees, spreading over some yojanas. Like some crazed lion, he rushes towards it trampling countless plants on his way. That strongest of men begins to tear up the plaintain trees, each as tall as many palmyras, and flings them all around him like so many blades of grass. All the while his shouts and yells resound through the forest.

Forging on, he encounters countless beasts of gigantic size, and stags, and monkeys, and lions, and bison, and great fish in the streams; with the cries of these, and the roars of Bhima, even animals and birds in the remotest parts of the jungle all tremble and cry out.

At their cries, a great flock of waterfowl suddenly rise up into the sky on wet wings. Seeing these, that bull of the Bhaaratas now goes towards them, and he sees a great and lovely lake, rippled by soft breezes, fanned by the golden leaves of the plantain tree which grew upon its banks.

Immediately plunging into the water, abounding in lotuses and lilies, Bhima begins to sport lustily just like an elephant in rut. Having thus pleased himself for a long while, the bright one climbs out again, to make his way deeper into the thick jungle.

Filling his great lungs he blows a thunderous blast on his conch; striking his arms with his hands, the mighty Bhima makes all the points of heaven reverberate. Filled by the sounds of the shell, and by the shouts of Bhimasena, and also with the reports of his striking his own arms, the caves of the mountain seem as if they are roaring.

Hearing him smite his arms like thunderclaps, the lions asleep inside those caves howl like terrified cats. Frightened by the lions, the elephants of this deeper forest set up an awful trumpeting, which also echoes upon the mountain.

Hearing those sounds, and also knowing that this was Bhimasena his brother, the Vanara Hanuman, greatest of monkeys, wanting to meet and to bless Bhima, lays himself across the Pandavas path. Not wanting Bhima to go on, Hanuman lies squarely across the narrow way, flanked by plantain trees, obstructing it to keep Bhima safe.

So that Bhima does not face curse or defeat by entering the plantain forest, Hanuman lays his huge body down; he begins to yawn, and lashes the earth with his great tail first, raising it even like a stambha raised to Indra, and that sound is thunder. All around, the maintain caves echo those great reports, like a cow lowing.

As the tail lashes and the mountain quakes, it also begins to crumble on every side; the reverberations drown the trumpeting of frightened elephants and spread across every slope of Gandhamadana.

Bhima hears the sounds and the fine hairs on his body stand on end; he begins to range through that plantain wood in search of the source of the crashes. Upon a raised rocky base, he sees Hanuman, whose body is as brilliant as a streak of lightning and difficult to even look at; his fur is coppery, like the lightning-flash; the whiplashes of his tail are like lightning; the Vanara's waist seems slender for his shoulders are so vast; his neck his thick and short.

Long hairs cover his tail, which is a little bent at the end, and raised like some flag. Bhima sees Hanuman's coppery face, and his tongue between small lips, his ears red, his eyes bright and brisk, and his white sharp teeth.

Hanuman's head glows like the full moon ashine; his mane is tousled wild around it, like a pile of asoka flowers. Amidst the golden plantain trees, that refulgent one lies like some blazing fire, his body radiant, at times looking around him with eyes red as if with wine.

The most intelligent Bhima sees that mighty Vanara chieftain lying like the Himalaya, obstructing the path of heaven. Seeing him alone in that mighty forest, the dauntless Bhima approaches him with rapid strides, and gives a loud shout like thunder.

Birds and beasts are alarmed by that shout and scatter, but the great Hanuman only half opens his eyes, and looks at Bhima with disregard, through his eyes red as if with intoxication.

Then, with a smile, Hanuman says, "I was sleeping sweetly. Why have you awakened me? You have reason, surely, and you must show kindness to all creatures. We belong to the animals and are ignorant of dharma, but possessing reason, men show kindness towards creatures. Then why does a reasonable man like you do things which contaminate body, speech and heart, alike, and destroy virtue?

You do not know what dharma is and neither have you taken the counsel of the wise. Is it that from ignorance, and childishness, that you kill the animals?

Say, who are you, and for what have you come to this forest devoid of humans? And, O foremost of men, tell me also, where you are going today. You cannot go any further, for the hills ahead are inaccessible.

Shura, save the passage gained through tapasya there is no path to that place. This is the path of the celestials; mortals can never go this way. Out of kindness, O hero, I dissuade you. Listen to me, you cannot go on from this place, so desist.

Lord of men, you are welcome here in every way; so rest here and partake of fruits and roots, sweet as amrita and do not go on and have yourself killed for no reason.'

Vaisampayana said, "O Parantapa, hearing what the wise Vanara says, Bhima asks, 'Who are you? And why have you assumed the form of a monkey? It is a Kshatriya—one of the varna next to the Brahmanas—that asks you; and he belongs to the Kuruvamsa and the House of the Moon, and was borne by Kunti in her womb, and is one of the sons of Pandu, and is the offspring of Vayu, and is known by the name of Bhimasena.

Hanuman smiles to listen to the Kurupravira; that Vayuputra says to the other Vayuputra, his brother Bhimasena, 'I am a Vanara, and I will not allow you the passage that you desire. It is best that you return; do not go on to meet your death.'

Bhimasena replies, 'O Vanara, arise and let me pass; do not come to grief at my hands.'

Hanuman says, 'I have not the strength to arise; I am ill and suffering. If you must go on, step over me and do so.'

Bhima says, 'The Nirguna Paramatman pervades every body. I cannot disrespect Him that is knowable only by gyana. So, I will not step over you. If I had not known Him from whom all creatures manifest, I would have leapt over you and even the mountain, even as Hanuman once leapt across the ocean.'

At which, Hanuman says, 'Who is this Hanuman, who leapt across the ocean? Best of men, tell me about him if you can.'

Bhima replies, 'He is even my brother, excellent with every perfection, and endowed with intelligence and strength of both mind and body. He is the most illustrious lord of monkeys, renowed in the Ramayana; and for Rama's queen, that lord of the Vanaras crossed the ocean of over a hundred yojanas with a single leap.

That mighty one is my brother. I am his equal in energy, strength, and prowess, and also in battle. And I can chasten you, monkey; so get up. Either give me passage or witness my might today. If you do not listen to me, I will send you to halls of Yama.'

Realising that Bhima is intoxicated with his own strength, and full of pride of the might of his arms, Hanuman chides him in his heart, and says,

'Relent, sinless one. I am so old and weary that I do not have the strength to get up. Take pity on me; move my tail aside and pass.'

Bhima, proud and by now angry, believes Hanuman and thinks, I will seize the weakling monkey by his tail and send him to Yamaloka!'

With a mocking smile, he takes hold of the tail with his left hand; but he cannot move that monkey's tail. Bhima seizes the tail, straight and stiff like a stambha erected for Indra, with both hands; he still cannot shift it at all.

Quickly, the Panadava's brows are knit, his face wrinkled with effort, his eyes roll in their sockets, but he cannot budge the Vanara's tail.

Defeated, Bhimasena returns to the old monkey's side, and stands crestfallen and ashamed. Folding his hands, bowing low, Bhima says in a faltering voice, 'Relent, O Vanarottama, forgive me for the harsh words I spoke to you! Are you a Siddha, a Deva, a Gandharva, or a Guhyaka? I ask you out of curiosity. If it is not a secret and if I may hear it, tell me who you are that have assumed the shape of monkey, O long-armed. I ask you even as a disciple his master, and I, O Anagha, seek your protection!'

Hanuman says, 'O Parantapa, I will satisfy your curiosity fully, and tell you all that you want to know. Listen, O son of Pandu!

Lotus-eyed one, I was begotten by Vayu Deva, life of the world, upon the wife of Kesari. I am a Vanara and my name is Hanuman. All the greatest monkey-kings, and monkey-chieftains once used to wait upon Surya's son Sugriva and Indra's son Vali. Scourge of your enemies, Sugriva and I were friends even as the wind and fire.

Driven out from their kingdom by his brother Vali, Sugriva lived for a long time on Rishyamukha, and I with him. And the mighty son of Dasaratha, the heroic Rama, who is Vishnu's own self in human form, was born into the world.

His great bow in his hand, and his wife and his brother with him, Rama, greatest among archers, began to dwell in the Dandaka vana, to preserve his father's dharma.

From Janasthana, in that forest, the awesome Rakshasa King, the evil Ravana carried Rama's queen away, deceiving, O sinless one, that Purushottama through the agency of a demon, Maricha, who assumed the form of a golden deer marked with gem-like spots.'

Hanuman continues, 'After his wife was carried away, Rama, scion of the Raghuvamsa, with his brother Lakshmana, searched for his queen on that mountain, and there met Sugriva, lord of the Vanaras. He made a pact of friendship with the noble Sugriva; Rama slew Vali and installed Sugriva as king of the Vanaras.

Having the kingdom, Sugriva sent forth his monkeys, hundreds and thousands of them, in search of Sita. I, too, with numberless monkeys, set out towards the south in quest of Sita, O Mahabaho.

On our quest, a mighty vulture called Sampati informed us that Sita was in the palace of Ravana. Then, to serve Rama, I leapt across the ocean of a hundred yojanas, the abode of sharks and crocodiles.

In Lanka, I saw in Ravana's palace the daughter of king Janaka, Sita, like the daughter of a Deva. I spoke with Vaidehi, Rama's beloved, and then I burnt Lanka with its towers and ramparts and lofty gates, and proclaimed my name there, and then I returned to Bharatavarsha.

I told Rama everything, and that lotus-eyed immediately set out to rescue his wife. He created a bridge across the ocean for his army of monkeys and we crossed over it. In Lanka, Rama slew the Rakshasas in battle; he killed Ravana, oppressor of the worlds, and all his demons. Having slain the king of the Rakshasas, his brother, his sons and other kin, Rama crowned the pious and kindly Rakshasa lord Vibhishana as king.

Rama recovered his wife, even like the lost Vaidik revelation. Then Raghu's scion and his devoted Sita returned to Ayodhya, inaccessible to enemies; and that lord of men was crowned and began to rule from there.

Then, I asked a boon of the lotus-eyed Rama, saying, "Parantapa, Rama, let me live for as long as the story of your deeds is told in the world!"

Rama said, "So be it."

Bhima, through the grace of Sita, also, in this place I have everything I need or want, every rare luxury, as do all that dwell in this place. Rama reigned for ten thousand and ten hundred years; and then he ascended to his own abode. Ever since, Apsaras and Gandharvas delight me here, singing the pure and mighty deeds of that hero.

Sinless one, Kurunandana, this path is impassable to mortals. For this, O Bhaarata, and also to ensure that noone vanquishes you, or curses you, have I obstructed your passage to this path that the immortals tread. For the celestials, this is one of the paths to heaven; mortals cannot pass this way.

But the lake in search of which you have come lies in that direction.'"

Vaisampayana continued, "The powerful Bhimasena Mahabaho bows lovingly, and with a cheerful heart, to his brother Hanuman, the Vanara lord, and says in the mildest voice, 'Noone is more fortunate than I am, now that I have seen my elder brother! Fortune has been so kind to me, and I cannot express my delight.

But now I have a wish that I pray you will fulfil. Shura, I want to see that incomparable form you had when you leapt across the ocean full of sharks and crocodiles, ocean of a hundred yojanas. If you show me that form I will be satisfied, I will believe everything that you have said.'

The mighty Vanara replies with a smile, 'No one today can see that form of mine, not you or anyone else. In that yuga, all things were different, not as they are today, dwindled.

In the Krita yuga, the state of things was one; and in the Treta, another; and in the Dwapara, still another. Diminution is sweeping through this age; and I do not have that form now. Why, the earth, rivers, plants, and rocks, and Siddhas, Devas and Devarishis conform to Time, according to the yugas.

Therefore, do not wish to see my old form, O Kurupravira. I am bound by the nature of this age; time is irresistible.'

Bhimasena says, 'Tell me about the duration of the different yugas, and of the varied manners and customs and of dharma, kama and artha, and of karma, of tejas, and of life and death in the different yugas.'

Hanuman says, 'Child, that yuga is called Krita when the one eternal religion existed, the Sanatana Dharma. In that best of yugas, everyone owned spiritual perfection and, therefore, there was no need for religious deed or rituals. Dharma knew no deterioration, and neither did anyone die. For this, that yuga is called Krita, the perfect.

But in time the Krita yuga has come to be considered as an inferior one. In the Krita, there were neither Devas nor Asuras, nor Gandharvas, nor Yakshas, nor Rakshasas, nor Nagas.

There was no commerce, no buying and selling. And the Sama, the Rik, and the Yajus did not exist. And there was no manual labour. All the necessaries of life were obtained merely by being thought of, and the only punya lay in renouncing the world.

During that yuga, there was neither disease nor decay of the senses. There was neither malice nor pride, nor hypocrisy, nor discord, nor ill-will, nor cunning, nor fear, nor misery, nor envy, nor covetousness.

And for this, that prime refuge of Yogis, the Supreme Brahman, was attainable to all. Narayana, wearing a white complexion, was the soul of all creatures. In the Krita Yuga, the distinctive characteristics of Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras were natural and these always adhered to their respective dharmas.

Brahman was the sole refuge, and their manners and customs were naturally adapted to the attainment of Brahman; and the objects of their knowledge was the sole Brahman, and all their karma also had reference to Brahman. In this way, all the varnas attained punya.

One uniform Soul was the object of their meditation; and there was only one mantra, the Pranava, AUM, and there was one law. And although they had different natures, all of them followed a single Veda; and they had one dharma, one religion.

And according to the divisions of time, they lived the four asramas, without any desires, and so they attained moksha. The dharma which comprises of identifying the Atman with the Brahman is the sign of the Krita Yuga.

In the Krita Yuga, the dharma of the four varnas is universal, entire; thus the Krita Yuga is devoid of the three gunas.

Now listen to the character of the Treta Yuga. In this age, sacrifices are introduced, and dharma decreases by a fourth part. And Narayana, who is the Soul of all creatures, assumes a red colour. And men practise truth, and devote themselves to religion and religious rites; sacrifices and various religious observances come into existence.

In the Treta Yuga, people begin to devise means for the attainment of objects, for possession; and they attain it through karma and dana. However, they never deviate from dharma, and they are devoted to asceticism and to the giving of gifts.

The four varnas adhere to their respective swadharmas, and perform rituals. Such are the men of the Treta Yuga.

In the Dwapara Yuga, the Sanatana Dharma decreases by one half. Now Narayana wears yellow; and the Veda becomes divided into four parts. Now some men retain the knowledge of the four Vedas, and some of three Vedas, and some of one Veda, while others do not even know even the Riks.

Upon the Shastras becoming so divided, karma multiplies. And largely influenced by passion, men still engage in tapasya and dana. But from their incapacity to study the entire Veda, it becomes divided into several parts; and in consequence of the intellect having decreased, few are established in truth.

And when people fall away from the truth, they become subject to myriad diseases; and then lust and natural calamities ensue. Afflicted by these, some men perform penance, while others celebrate sacrifices, yagnas, wishing to enjoy the good things of life, or to attain heaven.

Upon the coming of the Dwapara Yuga, men become degenerate, in consequence of their impiety.

O son of Kunti, in the Kali Yuga only a quarter of dharma survives. And in the beginning of this iron age, Narayana wears a black hue. And the Vedas and the Shastras, and dharma, and yagans, and every religious observance, all these fall into disuse.

Then Iti'[1] reigns, and disease, and lassitude, and anger and deformities, and natural calamities, and anguish, and fear of scarcity. As the yugas wane, dharma dwindles, and all creatures degenerate. As creatures degenerate, their natures deteriorate.

The religious rites performed at the waning of the yugas produce contrary effects. And even those that live for several yugas conform to these changes.

Parantapa, as for curiosity to know me, I say this —why should a wise person be eager to know a superfluous thing? O long-armed, I have told you in full what you asked me regarding the nature of the different yugas.

May good fortune befall you! Now return from where you came.'

Bhimasena says, 'I will not leave without seeing your olden form. If I have found favour with you, show me your pristine self.'

With a smile, the Vanara shows Bhima the form in which he, Hanuman, once leapt across the sea. Wanting to gratify his brother, Hanuman assumes a gigantic body of immeasurable effulgence; the Vanara stands there, covering all the plantain grove, and as lofty as the Vindhya.

Great as a mountain, with coppery eyes and sharp teeth, and a face marked by a dreadful frown, Hanuman stands covering all that grove and lashing his long tail. Bhima sees that gigantic form of his brother, and his hair stands on end in wonder.

Seeing the great monkey ablaze like the Sun, like golden Meru, splendent as the sky, Bhima cannot look upon him and shuts his eyes.

Smiling again, Hanuman says to his brother, 'Anagha, you are able to see my form to this extent. But I can grow on for as long as I wish. Bhima, amidst enemies, my size increases through its own tejas.'

Seeing that wondrous and dreadful body of Hanuman, like the Vindhya mountain, Bhima Vayuputra is bewildered.

Folding his hands, the Pandava says to Hanuman, 'Lord, I have seen the immense dimensions of your body. Awesome one, I beg you make yourself small again, for I cannot look at you, like the sun risen, of measureless power, irrepressible, and resembling the Mountain Mainaka.

O Hero, great is the wonder in my heart today that with you by his side Rama himself needed to encounter Ravana. With your might, you could have annihilated Lanka and all its warriors in an instant, all its horses, elephants and chariots.

Surely, O Vayuputra, there is nothing that you cannot achieve; and in battle, I am certain that Ravana, together with all his Rakshasas, was no match for you, by yourself.'

Hanuman replies in affectionate words, solemnly spoken, 'Mahabaho, O Bhaarata, it is as you say; Bhimasena, that worst of Rakshasas was no match for me. But if I had slain Ravana—that thorn of the worlds—the glory of Raghu's son would have been obscured; and it is for this that I left him alive.

By killing that lord of the Rakshasas and his demons, and bringing back Sita unto his own city, Rama established his fame among men.

Now, O wise one, since you are intent on the welfare of your brothers, and protected by Vayu, travel on a fortunate and auspicious path. Kurusthama, this path will lead you to the Saugandhika forest.

You will see Kubera's gardens, guarded by Yakshas and Rakshasas. Do not pluck the flowers there, for the gods deserve reverence, especially from mortals. Only if they are worshipped with offerings, and homas, and salutations, and the recitation of mantras, do the Devas confer their favour upon men.

So, do not, my child, be rash; do not deviate from your svadharma. Be faithful to your duty, understanding what the highest dharma is. Without knowing your duty and serving the old, even great ones like Brihaspati cannot understand artha and dharma.

One should ascertain with discrimination that circumstance in which vice goes under the name of virtue, and virtue under the name of vice — circumstances in which men who are without intelligence become perplexed.

From religious observances merit ensues; and in merit are the Vedas founded; and from the Vedas, sacrifices come into being; and through sacrifice the gods are established. The Devas are maintained by yagnas prescribed by the Vedas and the Shastras; while men maintain themselves by following the ordinances of Brihaspati and Sukra; and also by these avocations, by which the world is maintained — serving for wages; receiving taxes; merchandise; agriculture and tending kine and sheep.

The world subsists through profession. The study of the three Vedas and agriculture and trade and government constitutes, say the Rishis, the professions of the twice-born; and each varna maintains itself by following the profession prescribed for it. And when these callings are properly pursued, the world itself is maintained with ease.

However, if the people do not lead righteous lives, the world becomes lawless, in consequence of the lack of Vedic merit and government. If the people do not follow their prescribed vocations, they perish; but by regularly following the three professions, they bring about dharma.

The dharma of Brahmanas consists in the knowledge of the soul; and the hue of only that varna is universally the same. The celebration of sacrifices, and study and bestowal of gifts are well-known to be the three duties common to all the orders.

Officiating at sacrifices, teaching and the acceptance of gifts are the duties of a Brahmana. To rule is the dharma of the Kshatriya; and to tend cattle, that of the Vaisya; while to serve the twice-born varnas is said to be the duty of the Sudra.

The Sudras cannot beg alms, or perform homas, or keep vratas; and they must dwell in the homes of their masters.

Your vocation, O son of Kunti, is that of the Kshatriya, which is to protect. Perform your svadharma, with humility and restraining your senses. That king alone can rule who takes the counsel of experienced men, and is helped by honest, intelligent and learned ministers; a king who is addicted to vices meets with defeat.

Only when the king justly punishes and confers favours is order secure in the world. Therefore, it is needful to ascertain, through spies, the nature of a hostile country, its fortified places and the allied forces of the enemy, and their prosperity and decay and the way in which they retain the adhesion of the powers they have drawn to their side.

Spies are among the important instruments of the king; and tact, diplomacy, prowess, chastisement, favour and cleverness lead to success. And success is to be attained through these, either in separation, or combined - namely, conciliation, gifts, sowing dissensions, chastisement, and might.

And, O Bhaarata, politics has for its root diplomacy; and diplomacy is also the main qualification of spies. Politics, if well judged, confers success. Therefore, in matters of polity the counsel of Brahmanas should be taken.

In secret affairs, these should not be consulted - namely, a woman, a fool, a boy, a covetous person, a mean-minded individual, and one that betrays signs of insanity. Wise men only should be consulted, and affairs are to be despatched through officers that are able.

Policy must be executed through persons that are friendly; but fools should be excluded from all affairs. In matters religious, pious men; and in matters of gain, wise men; and in guarding families, eunuchs; and in all crooked affairs, crooked men must be employed. The dharma or adharma of the resolve of an enemy, as also his strength or weakness, must be gauged through one's own as well as hostile spies.

Favour should be shown to honest persons who have prudently sought protection; but lawless and disobedient individuals should be punished. And when the king justly punishes and shows favour, the dignity of the law is well maintained, O son of Pritha.

These are the hard duties of kings, difficult to comprehened. Observe them with equanimity, even as they are prescribed for your Kshatriya varna.

Therefore, heroic Kaunteya, let your meeting with me not be fruitless. As my brother, ask me for a boon. If you wish, I can go to Varanavrata, even now, and kill all Dhritarashtra's insignificant sons. Or if you like I can raze that entire city with rocks; I can bind Duryodhana and bring him before you today, mighty one.'

Listening to that Mahatman, Bhima replies happily, 'Vanarottama, I will think that you have already done all this! May every good fortune befall you, Mahabaho. But what I ask of you is this - be well pleased with me. Mighty one, upon your having become our protector, the Pandavas have found help. Even through your prowess, we will conquer all our enemies.'

Hanuman says to Bhimasena, 'From brotherly love, I will do good to you by diving into the army of your enemies armed with arrows and spears. And, O Kshatriya, when you roar like a lion, I will lend force to your roars.

I will set myself on the flagstaff of Arjuna's chariot and give fierce yells that will terrifry your enemies, so that you can kill them easily.'

Saying this to the Pandava, and also pointing the way ahead, Hanuman vanishes before Bhima's eyes."

Vaisampayana said, "When that greatest of Vanaras has gone, Bhima treads the path across the mighty Gandhamadana. And as he goes along, he thinks of Hanuman's vast body and splendour unrivalled on earth, and also of the greatness and dignity of Dasaratha's son Rama.

Going on in quest of the place of the saugandhikas, Bhima sees enchanting forests, groves, rivers, and lakes whose banks are graced with trees, blossom-laden, and woods of countless flowers and colours.

Bhaarata, he sees herds of wild elephants smeared with mud, resembling massed thunderheads. Graceful Bhima lopes ahead with speed, seeing among the trees around him deer of quick glances, with their mates, and long tufts of grass in their mouths.

Fearless because of his strength, as if invited by the breeze-shaken trees of the forest always fragrant with flowers, bearing delicate coppery twigs, Bhimasena plunges into mountain realms inhabited by bison, bear and leopard.

And on his way, he passes lotus-lakes over which maddened black bees swarm; on those waters it seemed as if the lotus buds were hands reverently folded to him. His provender for his journey is what Draupadi said, and Bhima speeds on, his mind and his gaze fixed upon the slopes of the mountain abloom.

When the Sun passes his zenith, Bhima sees a mighty river in the deer-filled jungle, a river full of fresh golden lotuses, a river crowded with hamsa and karandava, and graced with chakravakas, river which looks like a garland of fresh lotuses put on by the mountain.

In this river, that mighty Kshatriya found banks after banks of Saugandhika lotuses, brilliant as the rising Sun, and absolutely delightful. Seeing the flowers Bhima thinks that he has attained his objective, and in his heart he thinks of Panchali and presents himself before her in his thought, his beloved Krishnaa worn out by their exile."

Vaisampayana said, "In that place, Bheema sees, near the Kailasa massif, that beautiful lotus lake surrounded by lovely woods, and guarded by Rakshasas. He sees that it is fed by waterfalls next to the abode of Kubera. Great flowering trees shade its banks, and green water-lily pads cover its surface.

This unearthly lake is filled with golden lotuses, and swarms with diverse birds; its shallows are crystalline, with no mud at all. This lake is a wonder of the world, health-giving and enchanting. Kunti's son sees that the ambrosial water is cool, lucid, bright and fresh; the Pandava drinks thirstily, profusely, from it.

The lake is covered over with celestial Saugandhika lotuses, and other golden lotuses with stalks of sapphire. Swayed by swans and karandavas brushing past them, the lotuses scatter fresh glimmering pollen.

This lake is where the great-souled Kubera, king of the Yakshas, comes to sport; the Gandharvas, the Apsaras and the Devas hold it in high regard; Devarishis, Yakshas, Kimpurushas, Rakshasas and Kinnaras frequent it. And it is well-protected indeed by Kubera.

Feverish delight sweeps over Bhima as soon as he lays eyes on those waters. Thousands of Rakshasas called Krodhavasas, armed with every kind of weapon, guard that lake, by the command of their lord Kubera.

Bhima of awesome prowess, wearing deerskin, golden armlets, his sword strapped to his side, plunges fearlessly ahead to gather the Saugandhikas.

The Rakshasas see him and shout to one another, 'Let us ask why this man has come here, wearing deerskin and carrying weapons!'

They approach the lustrous Vrikodara of mighty arms and ask, 'Who are you? Answer us! We see you wearing a hermit's garb yet bearing weapons. Intelligent one, tell us why you have come here.'

Bhima says, I am the son of Pandu, and next by birth to Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, and my name is Bhimasena. Rakshasas, I came with my brothers to the Nyagrodha which is called Visala. There, Panchali saw a most excellent Saugandhika, which, of a certainty, was borne thence by the wind from this lake. She wishes to have the flowers in some abundance. Know, Rakshasas, that I have come to fulfil the wish of my wife of faultless features; I have come here to gather flowers for her.'

At which, the Rakshasas say, 'Purushottama, this place is dear to Kubera; he comes to sport here. Mortal men cannot enjoy this place. Vrikodara, the Devarishis and the Devas ask Kubera's leave before they drink this water or swim in it. Pandava, the Gandharvas and the Apsaras also come to please themselves in this lake.

The wicked man who, disregarding the lord of treasures, seeks to enjoy himself here surely meets his death. With no regard for Kubera you seek to take away the Saugandhikas from here by force. How then do you claim to be the brother of Yudhishtira Dharmaraja?

First, seek the permission of the lord of Yakshas, only then drink and pluck the lotuses. If you do not do this, you will not be able to have even a single Saugandhika.'

Bhimasena says, 'Rakshasas, I do not see the lord of wealth here. And even if I did see that Lokapala I would not beg him, for Kshatriyas never beg. This is the eternal dharma, and I have no intention of abandoning Kshatriya dharma.

Moreover, this lotus lake has been formed from the waterfalls of the mountain; it has not been excavated in the palace of Kubera. And so, it belongs as much to every creature as it does to Kubera Vaisravana. Who goes to beg another for such a thing?'

With this, the impatient Bhima wades into the lotus lake.

The Rakshasas, forbid him, crying, 'Desist!' and abuse him roundly from every side. Bhima ignores them, and continues wading into the water.

Their eyes rolling in anger, they arms upraised, they rush at him, roaring variously, 'Seize him! Bind him! Hew him! We will cook this Bhima and eat him!'

Bhima raises his great mace, inlaid with golden plates and like the mace of Yama himself, and turning back to face them, roars, 'Stay!'

Brandishing lances and axes, and other weapons, they run at him. The dreadful Krodhavasas surround Bhima. But he is Kunti's son begotten by Vayu, and he is mighty beyond reckoning and heroic, the slayer of his foes, and always devoted to dharma and satya, no one can vanquish him.

Swiftly, the great Bhima crushes those Rakshasas, beginning with their leader, breaking their arms, killing more than a hundred on the banks of that lake. When they see how strong he is, and that they cannot resist him, the rest of those powerful Rakshasas run in all directions, in bands, so many of them pierced and bleeding.

They fly through the air towards Mount Kailasa. Having beaten his enemy, even as Indra did the armies of the Daityas and Danavas, Bhima plunges into the lake again and begins to gather the golden lotuses as he pleases.

And as he drinks the waters, like nectar, his energy and strength surge back, and he falls to plucking and gathering the fragrant Saugandhikas.

Meanwhile, the Krodhavasas, driven away and terrified by Bhima's onslaught, flee to Kubera, Lord of treasures, and tell him everything that transpired at the lake and especially about Bhima's might.

The Deva smiles, then says, 'I already know what you have told me. Let Bhima take as many lotuses as he likes for Krishnaa.'

Those Rakshasas return to the Pandava and see him alone, enjoying himself in the lake of lotuses."

Vaisampayana said, "Bhima gathers the rare, unearthly and fresh flowers as he pleases, in abundance.

Now a high and violent wind begins to blow, blowing up sand and earth, and portending battle. Ominous meteors fall from the sky, and thunder echoes everywhere. Enveloped in darkness, the Sun grows pale, his rays being obscured.

At Bhima displaying his prowess, dreadful explosions ring through the sky; the earth trembles, and dust falls in showers. The cardinal points of the heavens grow red, and beasts and birds begin to cry out in shrill tones.

All things are enfolded in darkness, and indistinguishable; other evil omens appear there. Yudhishtira Dharmaputra sees the strange phenomena, and says, 'Someone means to attack us. Arm yourselves Pandavas, and may good fortune befall you! From what I see, I believe that the time has come for us to show our strength.'

The king looks around and does not see Bhima. He turns to Panchali and the twins, 'Panchali, has Bhima gone to perform some great feat, or has he done so already? These omens surely portend some grave danger; they foretell a great battle.'

To allay his anxiety, Krishnaa of the sweet smile says, 'Rajan, I showed the Saugandhika which the wind blew here to Bhima. I said to him that if he could find more for me he should bring back as many as he could. Pandava, he must have gone looking for the golden lotuses for my sake. He must have gone north-east.'

Hearing her, Yudhishtira says to the twins, 'Let us follow Vrikodara's path. Let the Rakshasas carry those Brahmanas who are tired and weak. Ghatotkacha, you carry Krishnaa.

I am convinced that Bhima has gone into the jungle, for it is long since he has been gone. He travels as swiftly as the wind, or as Vinata's son, and he will even leap into the sky and alight at his will. Rakshasas, we will follow him through your prowess. He will not do any wrong to the Siddhas in the forest, who are versed in the Vedas.'

Saying, 'So be it,' Hidimba's son and the other Rakshasas, who know the lotus lake of Kubera, set out cheerfully with Lomasa, carrying the Pandavas, and many of the Brahmanas.

Soon arriving at the lake, they see it covered with Saugandhika and other lotuses and surrounded by ethereal woods. On its shores they see the noble and fierce Bhima, as also the slaughtered Yakshas of large eyes, with their bodies, arms and thighs smashed, and their heads crushed.

Upon seeing Bhima standing there like an angry lion, his eyes staring, biting his lip, his mace upraised in both hands, even like Yama at the Mahapralaya, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja runs to his brother and embraces him repeatedly.

Gently Yudhishtira says, 'Kaunteya, what have you done? Ah, may good fortune be with you, but if you love me and wish my welfare never again be so rash, nor offend the Devas!'

Now those godlike ones all begin to sport in those waters and to pluck the Saugandhikas as they please. Suddenly, the immense guardians of the gardens, with rocks for their weapons, arrive there.

Seeing Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, Maharishi Lomasa, Nakula, Sahadeva and the other great Brahmanas, those guardian Rakshasas bow down low in humility.

Yudhishtira pacifies them, and they are gratified. Thus, with Kubera's knowledge, for a short time, those Kurusthamas dwell there in those gardens upon the slopes of the Gandhamadana, waiting for Arjuna," said Vaisampayana to Raja Janamejaya.

Virata Parva

A BRIEF INTRODUCTION

The last complete version of the Mahabharata to be written in India in English prose was the translation by Kisari Mohan Ganguli in the late 19th century. He wrote it between 1883 and 1896. To the best of my knowledge, it still remains the only full English prose rendering of the Epic by any Indian.

More than a hundred years have passed since Ganguli achieved his monumental task. Despite its closeness to the original Sanskrit and its undeniable power, in more than a hundred years the language and style of the Ganguli translation have inevitably become archaic.

It seemed a shame that this most magnificent of epics, a national treasure, an indisputable classic of world literature, believed by many to be the greatest of all books ever written, is not available in complete form to the Indian (or any) reader in modern, literary and easily accessible English: as retold by Indian writers.

So we, a group of Indian writers and editors, warmly and patiently supported by our publisher Rupa Publications India, undertook a line-by-line retelling of the complete Mahabharata, for the contemporary and future reader. Our aim has not been to write a scholarly translation of the Great Epic, but an eminently readable one, without vitiating either the spirit or the poetry of the original, and without reducing its length.

This is not a translation from the Sanskrit but based almost entirely on the Ganguli text, and he himself did use more than one Sanskrit version for his work. However, as will be obvious, the style of this new rendering is very much our own, and our hope is to bring as much of the majesty and enchantment of this awesome epic to you as is possible in English.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Ramesh Menon: he offered me this work; he believed in me even when I did not. Thank you.

Katya Douglas: my friend and first editor; she taught me how to appreciate the beauty and precision of the English language, that less is often more, all this with kindness and generosity. Thank you.

My mother Kausalya: her long discussions with my grandmother and aunt about the Mahabharata and its characters, as if they were familiar people they knew personally, gave me valuable insights into the meaning of honour, integrity and honesty; her joy in what I was doing encouraged me.

My aunt Radha: she shares my sense of devotion to the spirit of the epic and faith in its essence, The Bhagavad Gita; she shared with me her knowledge, gained from years of reading and re-reading this wonderful work; we had some wonderful discussions.

My son Govind: he made none of the demands that a mother expects of a son living on his own in a foreign country, but provided me with a haven in which I did some of my best writing.

My daughter Anuradha: she upheld me and encouraged me, especially at times when I despaired of being able to continue; made molehills of mountains, as is her wont, and made the impossible seem within reach.

My friends in Kodai, particularly Lathika, Zai, Aruna, Minoo, Shezarin, Saku, Radha, Khokon, Shewli, Philippe and Tiku: their broad shoulders, that I often leaned on, their encouragement and their unconditional friendship meant a lot to me whilst I worked on this volume.

Vaisampayana said, "In Gandhamadana, Yudhishtira says to Krishnaa, his brother Bhima and the Brahmanas, 'We have seen a succession of sacred tirthas and enchanting forests, which until now only the Devas and Devarishis have visited; and where Brahmanas have worshipped. We performed pujas with our Brahmanas in many hallowed places and heard them tell of the lives of great sages. In various tirthas, we performed ablutions with the Brahmanas and heard them narrate many tales of ancient Rishis and Rajarishis. We worshipped the Devas with water and flowers, and the Pitrs with whatever fruit and roots we could find. With the exalted ones, we performed ritual purification in the holy mountains, in the lakes and in the sacred ocean. We bathed in the Ila, in the Saraswati and in the Sindhu, in the Yamuna and in the Narmada, and in various other tirthas. As we passed the source of the Ganga, we saw splendid mountains and the Himalayas, inhabited by myriad species of birds, and also the yellow-flowered badari tree Visala, where Nara and Narayana have their asrama. And finally, we have set our eyes on this unearthly lake that is worshipped by the Siddhas, the Devas and the Munis. In fact, we have seen one by one all the most famed tirthas with the illustrious Lomasa.

Now, Bhima, how will we come to the sacred home of Vaisravana, where the Siddhas live? Think of how you will take us there.'

When the king says this, an asariri, a heavenly voice, speaks, saying, 'You will not be able to go to that inaccessible place. Return from this land of Kubera to the place from which you came to Badari—Nara and Narayana's asrama. From there, Kaunteya, go to the hermitage of Vrishaparva, abundant in flowers and fruit, where Siddhas and Charanas dwell. Once you have passed that, go to the asrama of Arshtisena. From there you will be able to see the home of Kubera.'

As this voice speaks, the breeze freshens—cool, redolent with joy and an unearthly fragrance. Flowers rain from the sky at the sound of the celestial voice, and all are amazed, especially the Rishis and the Brahmanas.

The Brahmana Dhaumya says, 'We must do as the voice tells us.'

Yudhishtira returns to the asrama of Nara and Narayana and lives there in contentment, surrounded by Bhimasena, his other brothers, Panchali and the Brahmanas."

JATASURA VADHA PARVA

Vaisampayana continued, "There in the mountains, the Pandavas and their Brahmanas live in contented expectation of Arjuna's return. All the Rakshasas have left with Bhima's son when, one day while Bhimasena is away, a Rakshasa suddenly carries off Yudhishtira, the twins and Krishnaa. This demon has been living amongst the Pandavas in the guise of a high Brahmana, claiming that he is an experienced advisor and well-versed in the Shastras. He wants the bows, quivers, the other weapons and belongings of the Pandavas, and has been waiting for an opportunity to abduct Draupadi. He is the evil Jatasura.

Yudhishtira encouraged him, little knowing that he is like a fire hiding under ashes. And one day when Bhima is out hunting, and seeing that Ghatotkacha and his followers have gone and that those great Rishis of austere tapasya—Lomasa and the others—have gone to bathe and collect flowers for worship, the Rakshasa reveals a monstrous form. He gathers all the weapons of the Pandavas, seizes Draupadi and the three Pandavas, and flees.

Somehow, Sahadeva manages to struggle free and wrenches the sword named Kausika from the Rakshasa. He calls out, running in the direction in which his mighty brother Bhima went.

While being carried off, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja says to the Rakshasa, 'Foolish one, you have lost all the punya you earned. You do not respect dharma. Whether human or of a lower species, everyone is mindful of dharma, particularly Rakshasas because they know virtue better than others. You ought to live by dharma.

O Rakshasa, the Devas, the Pitrs, the Siddhas, the Rishis, the Gandharvas, the animals and even the worms and ants depend for their lives on men; and you do, too. If the human race prospers, your race will, also; if humans suffer, so will you, and even the Devas. The gods thrive on the offerings we make. Rakshasa, we are the guardians, rulers and guides of kingdoms. If kingdoms are unprotected, how can prosperity and happiness exist?

Unless a king offends him, a Rakshasa should not harm one. Cannibal, we have committed no sin. We live on vighasa, the leftovers from oblations, and serve the gods and others as best we can; we are always respectful of our superiors and Brahmanas. A friend, a confidant, he whose food one has shared, and he who has given one shelter, these should never be injured. You have lived happily with us, been duly honoured and, evil one, shared our food. How can you abduct us?

What you are doing is sinful; your maturity in years has given you so little wisdom, and your nature is so evil that you deserve to die; and die you shall today. You are a sinner, so give us back our weapons and fight us; and bear Draupadi away if you win. However, if you are fool enough to do this vile thing without a fair fight, you will reap only curses and infamy. Rakshasa, abducting this woman is like shaking the pot to drink the last drop of poison in it.'

Yudhishtira makes his body heavy, weighing the Rakshasa down, and slowing his pace. To Draupadi and Nakula, and to Sahadeva, who has turned back, Yudhishtira says, 'Do not be afraid of the demon. The son of the Wind is near, and he will be here shortly and the evil one will die.'

Staring at the Rakshasa, Sahadeva says, 'There is nothing more honourable for a Kshatriya than to fall in fight or to defeat an enemy. Parantapa, we will fight; and either this Rakshasa will kill us or we shall kill him. This is the place and the time, Rajan. You of limitless prowess, the time has come for us to display our Kshatriya dharma. We shall either find Swarga through victory, or death in defeat.

This I swear—if the Rakshasa is still alive at sunset, I will not call myself a Kshatriya anymore. Rakshasa, I am Pandu's son Sahadeva. Kill me before you abduct our queen, or be killed and lie dead.'

Madri's son Sahadeva is still speaking when Bhima appears with a mace in his hand, like Vasava himself with his thunderbolt. He sees his two brothers and, on the shoulders of the demon, chaste Draupadi. He hears Sahadeva challenge the Rakshasa, and Jatasura hesitates, perplexed. Bhima sees his brothers and Draupadi in the demon's clutches and wrath surges in him.

He says to the Rakshasa, 'I already knew that you were an evil one when I saw how you looked at our weapons. But I did not kill you because you were no threat to me. You appeared to be a Brahmana, and you said nothing harsh to us. Indeed, you seemed to like pleasing us, and did us no wrong. Furthermore, you were our guest. How could I kill you, who were in the guise of a Brahmana and innocent of offence? He who kills one like this, even while knowing he is a Rakshasa, falls into hell. Besides, no one dies before their time comes.

And for you it has come today—wondrous fate made you think of abducting Krishnaa, and you have taken death's bait. Hoping to live now is as futile for you as for a fish whose mouth is already hooked. You will not go where you intended but to the place where Baka and Hidimba have gone.'

Listening to Bhima, the Rakshasa sets the other Pandavas and Draupadi down and, compelled by inexorable fate, prepares to fight. His lips quiver in anger as he says to Bhima, 'Wretched Bhima, I slowed down for you. Today I will offer your blood to all the Rakshasas you have killed.'

Bhima's rage erupts and, like Yama at the time of the pralaya, wetting the corners of his mouth and staring at Jatasura as he strikes his own arms with his fists in challenge, he rushes at the Rakshasa, who also runs at him, yawning wide his fanged maw, even as Mahabali once flew at Indra.

A dreadful battle begins, and when Madri's twins rush forward in fury, Vrikodara forbids them with a smile, 'Watch me! I swear by my brothers, myself, my punya, and my sacrifices, that I will kill this devil.'

The two grasp each other's arms. Unforgiving, the battle between the enraged Bhima and the red-eyed Rakshasa is like that between a Deva and an Asura. They uproot trees and strike each other with them, roaring like two cloud masses clashing against each other. Both are magnificently strong and charge at each other ferociously, breaking tree after tree over their thighs. The duel continues relentlessly, like the long-ago one between Vali and Sugriva who fought over a woman. They pound each other with massive boles, roaring all the while.

O Bhaarata, when all the trees in that place have been uprooted and smashed to pulp, the two of unbridled strength take up rocks and continue to fight. They are like a mountain and a mighty mass of clouds. Fiery is their wrath, as they cast rocks that resemble brutal thunderbolts. They head-butt each other and seize each other's arms, like two elephants, each raining thunderous blows on the other. They gnash their teeth, like thunder crackling.

Then, with his clenched fist like a five-headed snake, Bhima delivers a mighty blow to the Rakshasa's neck, and Jatasura's knees turn weak. Bhimasena seizes his exhausted adversary.

The godlike son of Pandu lifts him high and smashes him onto the ground, breaking all his limbs. He strikes the Rakshasa's body with his elbow and wrenches his head off, with its bloodied, bitten lips and rolling eyes, like a fruit from its stem. Beheaded by Bhima Mahabaho, Jatasura dies, spouting gore from his open neck.

Bhima presents himself before Yudhishtira, and all those best of Brahmanas begin to praise him, even as the Maruts eulogised Vasava."

YAKSHA YUDDHA PARVA

Vaisampayana continued, “After the Rakshasa’s death, Yudhishtira returns to the hermitage of Narayana and lives there. One day, thinking of his brother Arjuna, Yudhishtira calls all his brothers and Draupadi together and says, ‘We have passed these four years peacefully, wandering in these woods. Bibhatsu has said that in the fifth year he would come to that king of mountains, Sweta, always festive with blossoming plants, singing kokilas and humming black bees, peacocks and chatakas, and inhabited by tigers, boars and buffaloes, gavayas, deer and other wild animals. This sacred mountain is lovely with lotuses of a thousand and one hundred petals, bright with lilies blooming and blue lotuses, and frequented by Devas and Asuras.

In eager anticipation of meeting our brother, we, too, have decided to go there. Partha of matchless strength said to me, “I will stay abroad for five years and hone my skills at arms.” It will be in a place resembling Devaloka that we will see the wielder of the Gandiva, when he returns with the Devastras.’

The Pandava summons the Brahmanas, and the sons of Pritha walk around these ascetics of unflinching austerity, in pradakshina. They tell them their plan to meet Arjuna, to which the Brahmanas give their approval, saying ‘You will prosper. Bhaaratottama, your troubled time will have a happy ending. You will overcome your difficulties and regain the Earth, and rule over her with Kshatriya dharma as your sceptre.’

Bowing to the ascetics, Yudhishtira, scourge of his enemies, sets out with his brothers and the Brahmanas, followed by Ghatotkacha and his Rakshasas, and protected by Rishi Lomasa. With his brothers, Yudhishtira of the dazzling tejas and austere vratas goes on foot wherever he can, and the Rakshasas carry him where he cannot.

The king overcomes every obstacle and travels north, where lions, tigers and elephants roam; on the way, they see Mainaka parvata, the foothills of Mount Gandhamadana, and Sweta, rocky massif. They also see crystal rivulets as they climb to the higher reaches of the mountains, and on the seventeenth day they reach the holy Himalayas.

Rajan, not far from Gandhamadana, on the sacred slopes of Himavan, covered with trees and creepers, Pandu's son sees the holy asrama of Vrishaparva, surrounded by flowering trees that grow near waterfalls. And when those Parantapas have rested and recovered from their tiredness, they go to the Rajarishi Vrishaparva, and greet him. The royal sage receives them as lovingly as if they are his own sons.

Those Kshatriyas spend seven nights here, and are treated with respect and affection. On the eighth day, they take the exalted Vrishaparva's leave to resume their journey. One by one, they introduce all the Brahmanas, who had stayed as friends under his protection in the hermitage. The sons of Pandu entrust all their belongings to Vrishaparva—their sacrificial vessels, their ornaments and jewels. The wise and devout sage, well versed in dharma, and a trikalagyani who sees the future as clearly as he sees the past and the present, advises the Pandavas and the Brahmanas as he would his own sons.

Those heroes set out towards the north. Vrishparva goes a short distance with them, giving the Brahmanas detailed directions of the route they must take; he entrusts the Pandavas into their care and blesses them all before he turns back to his asrama.

Then Yudhishtira of endless might and his brothers set off along the mountain path alive with all kinds of animals. After four days of traversing slopes dense with trees, the sons of Pandu, like a cloud mass, reach the Sweta mountain that flows with countless streams and rich with an abundance of gold and gems.

They follow the route Vrishaparva showed them and pass all the landmarks he mentioned, one after the other. On the way, they see mountains, they cross inaccessible peaks and impregnable caves.

In a group they walk—Dhaumya, Krishnaa, Lomasa and the sons of Pritha—strangely tireless, and finally arrive at the sacred mountain which echoes with the cries of birds and animals. Trees and creepers cover the ground, monkeys are everywhere; enchanting lakes are covered over with lotuses; marshes appear here and there; and the forests are vast.

Thus, their hair standing on end, the Pandavas see Mount Gandhamadana, the home of Kimpurushas, where the Siddhas and Charanas visit, where Vidyadharis and Kinnaras wander, where herds of elephants roam freely, where lions and tigers and wild beasts throng, where the roars of sarabhas fill the air. They enter the denseness of Gandhamadana, as if it were the inviting Nandana grove that delights the soul.

As the Kshatriyas, Draupadi and the Brahmanas enter, they hear bird-song, indescribably sweet and graceful notes, broken only by the sound of animals at play. They see trees heavy with fruit and bent by their weight, and bright with flowers—mango, hog-plum, bhavya and pomegranate; citron, jack, lakucha and plantain; water reed; parvatam, champaka and the lovely kadamba; bilva, wood-apple, rose-apple and kasmari; jujube, fig and cluster fig; banyan, aswattha, kshirika and bhalla; ataka, amalaka and bibhitaka; inguda and karamarda and giant-fruited tinduka; and countless, nameless others clustered with sweet, nectarine fruit, on the slopes of Gandhamadana.

Besides fruit trees, they see champakas, asokas, ketakas and bakulas; punnagas and saptaparnas; karnikaras and petals; beautiful kutajas and mandaras; and lotuses; and parijatas; kovidaras and devadarudras; salas, palmyra palms, tamalas and pippalas; salmalis and kinsukas; sinsapas and saralas. And on these trees live chakoras, woodpeckers, chatakas and various other birds, singing sweetly to please the green world.

They see lakes with water-birds flying overhead, surrounded by kumudas, pundarikas, kokanadas and utpalas; and kalharas and kamalas, and crowded on all sides with mandrakes and red geese; ospreys and gulls; karandavas and plavas; swans; and cranes and cormorants and other aquatic birds.

Those Naravyaghras, tigers among men, see these lakes adorned with endless banks of lotuses, and ringing with the sweet hum of happy bees intoxicated on their nectar and reddened with the pollen falling from lotus cups. In the groves they see peacocks with their hens, driven mad with monsoon lust by the trumpeting of the clouds; and drowsy with desire, dancing with tails spread in iridescent glory, and crying in plaintive, melodious voices. Some of the peacocks sport with their mates on kutaja trees covered by creepers; some sit on the branches, spreading the gorgeous fans that make the trees look as if they are wearing jewelled crowns.

In the glades they see graceful sindhuvaras looking like Kama's arrows. And on the peaks of the mountain they see karnikara trees in bloom, heavy with their yellow flowers that look like golden eardrops. And in the forest they see flowering kurubakas with their cupid's-dart blossoms that strike feverish desire and restlessness into a man. And they see tilakas that look like the sacred mark painted on the forehead of the forest. They see mango trees with their lacy blossoms, and humming black bees hovering over them, and infusing desire.

On the mountain slopes are diverse flowering trees, wild bouquets of blossoms—some golden, some flame orange, some red, some brown and some still blue-green like lapis lazuli. There are rows and rows of sala and tamala, patala and bakula trees—garlands adorning the peaks. They see on the slopes of the mountain so many lotus-laden lakes, transparent like crystal, swans gliding on them, their waters echoing with the cries of cranes, and sensuous to the touch.

Everywhere are delicately fragrant flowers, luscious fruit, romantic pools and rivers and captivating trees; and the Pandavas' eyes widen in wonder at the sights they see as they penetrate into the fastness. As they go, breezes fan them, perfumed by kamalas and utpalas, and kalharas and pundarikas.

A deeply moved Yudhishtira says in some rapture to Bhima, 'Ah, Bhima, beautiful indeed is this forest of the Gandhamadana. Look at these celestial trees and creepers, decked with foliage and fruit; and every tree bears flowers. On this Gandhamadana the leaves and fruit of all the trees are so bright and glossy. And look! See how these lakes, filled with lotuses unfurled and ringing with the hum of black bees, are churned by elephants with their mates. Look at that lake ringed by rows of lotuses, like a second Sri wearing garlands. Bhima, this is such a forest, rich with the heady scent of flowers and the buzzing of black bees. Behold, all around you, the playground of the Devas!

By coming here, we have attained an extra-human condition, and been blessed. Son of Pritha, look how exquisitely flowery creepers embrace the mighy trees. Listen, Bhima, to the notes of the peacocks calling to their hens on the mountain slopes. Watch the birds—chakoras, satapatras, lust-maddened kokilas, and parrots—alight gracefully on branches, where, among the twigs are myriad jivajivakas of scarlet, yellow and red, looking at one another; and the cranes in the green and reddish grass and beside the waterfalls. Bhringarajas, upachakras, and herons pour forth their notes to charm all creatures.

And look! With their mates, four-tusked elephants, pale as cream lotuses, agitate that lake of the colour of lapis. See how torrents as high as several palmyra palms placed one upon another cascade from the cliffs. Ah, brilliant silvery minerals, shining like the Sun, and like autumnal clouds, adorn this incomparable mountain. In some places, the minerals are as black as kohl, in some they are like burnished gold, in others pale yellow, and in some vermilion.

I see caves of red arsenic that look like dark, evening clouds, in some places the caves of red chalk are the colour of the hare. There are places where the minerals are like white and grey clouds; and in others, they are radiant as the rising Sun.

My brother, it is all exactly as Vrishaparva said: Gandharvas and Kimpurushas, with their lovers, are visible on the peaks. And listen, Bhima! Hear the songs in myriad ragas and Vedic hymns that all creatures delight in. Look at heaven's river, the sacred and graceful Mahaganga, with swans upon her, and visited by Rishis and Kinnaras. O Slayer of your foes, behold this mountain with its mines, rivers, forests, beasts, Nagas of different shapes and a hundred heads, Kinnaras, Gandharvas and Apsaras.'

The valiant Parantapas, who have attained a spiritually elevated state, Draupadi and the peerless Brahmanas are enraptured, and cannot have their fill of looking at that greatest of mountains.

Soon they come to the hermitage of the royal sage Arshtisena, and they approach the skeletal form of this bare-bodied Rishi of great tapasya."

Vaisampayana continued, "On entering the presence of the venerable one whose sins have been expiated by his penance, Yudhishtira announces himself and joyfully greets the sage, bowing his head in reverence. Krishnaa, Bhima and the twins do the same, and they all stand around the Rajarishi. The priest of the Pandavas, the virtuous Dhaumya, also approaches the sage who, with his all-seeing mind, already knows that it is the Pandavas who stand before him.

This sage of lofty vows invites them to be seated and receives the king of the Kurus with due respect. After Yudhishtira enquires about his well-being, and the brothers are seated, the Muni says, 'Do your minds turn away from dharma, or are you inclined towards virtue? Kaunteya, has your devotion to your parents decreased? Do you honour all your superiors, the aged and those who know the Vedas? And, O Son of Pritha, do you lean towards sinful deeds? Do you, best of the Kurus, perform spiritually beneficial karma and avoid evil? Are you conceited? Do you gratify the pious and honour them? And even while living in the forests, did you cling to dharma?

Yudhishtira, does Dhaumya ever grieve at how you treat him? Do you follow the customs of your ancestors, in charity and religious rites, in asceticism, purity, truthfulness and forgiveness? And do you follow in the footsteps of the Rajarishis of old? On the birth of a son in their lineage, the Pitrs in their regions, laugh and cry at the same time, thinking Will the sins of this son of our house harm us, or will his righteous deeds augment our welfare?

He that pays homage to his father, his mother, his Guru, Agni and, fifthly, the Atman, conquers both this world and the next.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Worshipful one, the duties you speak of are exemplary and, to the best of my knowledge, I can say that I do discharge them properly.'

Arshtisena says, 'During the parvas, full moons, sages subsisting on air and water come unto this best of mountains, flying through the sky. And on the summit of the mountain one sees amorous Kimpurushas and their lovers, entwined, as well as Gandharvas and Apsaras clothed in white silk, and Vidyadharas wearing garlands, and mighty Nagas, and Suparnas, and Uragas, and other wondrous beings.

And there on the summits, one hears the sounds of kettle-drums, tabors, conch-shells and mridangas. Bhaaratottama, you will hear these from here; do not be tempted to climb all the way there. In fact, it is impossible to go any further. That place is the playground of the Devas and mortals do not have access to it. Bhaarata, there all creatures are hostile to mortals, and guardian Rakshasas punish humans that are presumptuous enough to venture into that place. Beyond the summit of Kailasa is the path of the Devarishis, the celestial sages. If anyone is impudent enough to go beyond this, the Rakshasas will kill him with savage weapons.

There, my child, during the parvas, one can see Vaisravana, who is always borne on the shoulders of Yakshas and Guhyakas, in all his pomp and grandeur, surrounded by Apsaras. And when that lord of all the Rakshasas is seated on the summit, all creatures see him as the rising Sun, O Best of Bhaaratas. That peak is the home of the Devas, the Danavas, the Siddhas, and of Kubera. During the parvas, full moons, the sweet notes of Tumburu, as he entertains Kubera, the lord of treasures, are heard all over Gandhamadana.

Child, Yudhishtira, here, when the moon is full, all creatures see and hear marvels such as these. Pandavas, stay here until you meet Arjuna. Eat luscious fruits and the food of the Munis. Child, having come here, do not show any restlessness. Live here at ease, amusing yourself in any way you choose. Eventually, having first conquered it by the strength of your arms, you will rule the Earth.' "

Janamejaya said, "How long did my great-grandfathers live on the Gandhamadana mountain? What did those splendid Kshatriyas do? What did they eat while they lived there? O excellent Vaisampayana, tell me about these things. Describe Bhimasena's valour and what that Mahabaho did upon the Himalaya mountain. Surely, Brahmanottama, he did not fight with the Yakshas again. Did my grandfathers meet Vaisravana? As Arshtisena said, the lord of wealth must have gone there. Great tapasvin, I want to hear all the details, for I have not had my fill, hearing of their exploits."

Vaisampayana continued, "When the Pandavas hear Arshtisena's peerless advice, they do as he says. They live on Mount Himavan, eating the same food that the Munis do—delicious fruit, various kinds of pure honey and the flesh of deer killed with venomless arrows. In this way they pass the fifth year, listening to sacred legends that Rishi Lomasa narrates. Rajan, Ghatotkacha has already left with the other Rakshasas, saying, 'I will return when you need me again.'

The princes pass many months in the asrama and see many wondrous sights.

One day, as the Pandavas are amusing themselves, some devout and stern ascetics and blessed Charanas of pure souls come to see them. Yudhishtira speaks with them of things lofty and spiritual. A few days pass in this way, when Garuda suddenly seizes a mighty Naga living in the lake in his talons and bears it away. The mountain trembles, and gigantic trees snap in the gale raised by Suparna's awesome wings. The Pandavas and all the creatures there witness the wonder that takes place.

From the crest of that mountain the wind blows in all kinds of fragrant and lovely flowers, and the Pandavas and Krishnaa, with their companions, see some other-worldly five-coloured blossoms.

Krishnaa says to Bhima, as he sits relaxed, 'Best of the Bhaaratas, all the creatures on this mountain see these five-hued flowers, carried by the wind raised by Suparna, raining into the river Aswaratha. In the Khandava vana, your brother Arjuna thwarted Gandharvas and Nagas and Vasava himself and killed fierce Rakshasas, and obtained the Gandiva. You, too, have unquenchable strength and the might of your arms is as irrepressible as Sakra's.

O Bhimasena, terrify all the Rakshasas with the might of your arms, so that they leave the mountain and flee to the ten cardinal points. Only then will we all be free from fear and see the sacred summit of this best of mountains, adorned with the flowers of five hues. O Bhima, I have long cherished the thought of seeing the summit, protected by the might of your arms.'

Like a mettlesome bull wounded, Bhima is stung by what she says; he cannot bear it. And that Pandava who has the gait of a lion, who is graceful and generous, who blazes in golden splendour, who is intelligent and strong, proud, sensitive and heroic, who has red eyes and broad shoulders, who is gifted with the strength of an elephant in musth, who has leonine teeth and a heavy neck, who is tall as a young sala tree, who is honourable, who is handsome in every limb, whose neck has whorls like a shell, whose arms are inexorable, takes up his bow inlaid with gold and his sword. He who has never known fear charges towards the cliff.

All the mountain creatures see him with his bow and arrows, rushing at them like a lion, like a maddened elephant. To Draupadi's delight, Bhima, mace in hand, runs towards that monarch of mountains. Neither exhaustion nor fatigue, nor lethargy, nor the ill-will of others affects the son of Pritha and Vayu as he goes.

He arrives at a rugged pass through which only one person can go. By this narrow way, the irresistible Bhima climbs to the top of the mountain, as high as countless palmyra palms set one on top of the other, and makes Kinnaras, Nagas, Munis, Gandharvas and Rakshasas joyful.

From that summit he sees the home of Vaisravana adorned with gold, and other crystal palaces encircled by golden walls inlaid with radiant gems. So many gardens surround this place taller than a mountain peak, splendid with ramparts and towers, gates and gateways, and row upon row of fluttering flags. Graceful maidens dance while the pennants wave in the breeze.

He leans against his bow and he gazes with wonder at the city of Kubera Vaisravana, lord of treasures. A fine breeze blows gladness into the hearts of all the creatures, wafting sweet perfumes everywhere. Unearthly trees of many colours echo with mellifluous birdsong as the Pandava surveys the palace of the lord of the Rakshasas, which is scattered with piles of gemstones and where many-hued garlands hang in profusion. There stands Bhima Mahabaho, his mind empty of mundane thoughts, steadfast as a rock, with his mace, sword and bow.

Then he blows his conch-shell, making the hair on the bodies of his enemies stand on end; he twangs his bow-string and slaps his arms with his hands, striking terror into the hearts of one and all. Following the direction of the tremendous sounds, the hairs on their bodies standing on end, the infuriated Yakshas and Rakshasas rush at the Pandava. The maces and clubs, swords, spears, javelins and axes in the hands of the Yakshas and Rakshasas blaze and, O Bhaarata, the battle between the Rakshasas and Bhima erupts.

Bhima uses his arrows to cut off the darts, javelins and axes hurled at him by the Rakshasas, who are great mayavis, illusionists. Bhima pierces the bodies of the screaming Rakshasas—those that fly in the sky and the ones that stand on the Earth. Blood sprays from the bodies of Rakshasas and Yakshas and soaks mighty Bhima. Their limbs and hands are struck cleanly off by Bhima's driving weapons.

All the creatures there see the regal Pandava surrounded by the Rakshasas like the Sun darkened by clouds. And just as the Sun sheds his rays over all the Earth, Bhima Mahabaho, of untold prowess, sends his arrows in all directions, decimating his enemies. The Rakshasas still roar menacingly, but Bhima prevails. The terrified Yakshas, their bodies mangled, utter horrible cries and, in sheer dread, fling down their weapons and flee southwards, leaving behind maces, spears, swords, clubs and axes.

Eventually, there is only one warrior left of the Rakshasas—mighty-chested, mighty-armed Maniman, friend of Kubera, his weapons in his hands. He is majestic as he calls out to the fleeing armies, 'When you come before Vaisravana, what will you say to the lord of wealth, when he asks how so many of his warriors were defeated by a single mortal?'

And, truly like an angry elephant, he charges the Pandava, attacking him with all his weapons. Bhimasena stabs his sides with three arrows, and Maniman casts his mace at the human like a thunderbolt. Bhima catches that baleful mace and throws it into the sky. It looks like a shield of lightning and deflects the searing salvo of arrows with which Maniman showers him. The Rakshasa launches an iron club with a golden arrowhead at its tip. It spews flames and roars as it pierces Bhima's arm, felling him.

Wounded sore, Kunti's son takes up his own mace, his eyes now rolling in his head from rage. Taking up his gold-inlaid mace, which terrorises his enemies and crushes them, Bhima flings it surely at Maniman, who cries out in pain at being struck. Roaring, Maniman draws a fiery astra and looses it at Bhima. But Bhima breaks the shaft with a swing of his mace, and that Pandava, best of all mace-fighters, rushes at the Rakshasa, as intent on killing him as Garuda swooping down on a snake.

Then, suddenly, Bhima springs into the sky. He brandishes his mace and, with a reverberant shout hurls it down on his enemy. Like a thunderbolt cast by Indra, the mace flashes; it strikes the Rakshasa squarely on his head, so it bursts apart, and Maniman falls dead. All the others see how Bhima kills the Rakshasa, as a lion does a bull. The other Rakshasas still left alive see their leader slain and run towards the east crying out in fear."

Vaisampayana said, "Below, Yudhishtira, Madri's twins, Dhaumya, Krishnaa, all the Brahmanas and other friends of the Pandavas hear the caves around them echo with awful sounds; they do not see Bhima anywhere and are worried. Leaving Draupadi in the charge of Arshtisena, the maharathas climb the mountain, carrying their weapons.

On reaching the summit, they see Bhima and, all around, the great Rakshasas whom he has felled lying unconscious. Holding his mace and sword and bow, Bhima Mahabaho looks like Indra after he razed the Danava hosts. In exultation, the other Pandavas run to embrace Bhima and then sit on the mountain-top, making the peak look like swarga graced by the Lokapalas.

Yudhishtira sees the abode of Kubera; he sees the slain Rakshasas on the ground, and he says to his brother, 'Either rashness or ignorance has made you commit this sin. Kshatriya, this indiscriminate slaughter is uncharacteristic of you, especially since you now lead the life of a sannyasi. The wise, who know about dharma, say that one must never do anything to provoke the displeasure of a king. But you have, O Bhimasena, you have perpetrated a deed that will offend even the gods. The man who turns to sin, ignoring artha and dharma, reaps the harvest of his wrongdoing. If you love me, never do such a thing again.'

Saying this to his brother, the virtuous Yudhishtira, of the ineffable tejas and unshakeable resolve, well-versed in every detail of artha, sinks into thoughtful reflection.

In the meanwhile, the Rakshasas who survived Bhima's assault have fled to the abode of Kubera, and these swift beings quickly reach Vaisravana's palace, crying in distress, and trembling still in fear of Bhima.

Bereft of their weapons, exhausted, their armour streaked with blood and hair dishevelled, they say to Kubera, 'Lord, all your best Rakshasas have been killed, though they fought with maces, clubs and swords, and with lances and barbed arrows. O lord of treasures, a mere human scaled the mountain, and single-handedly massacred all your Rakshasas of the Krodhavasa clan. And, Lord, all the best of your Yakshas and other Rakshasas are also dead. Only we few escaped, while even your friend Maniman was slain. A mere mortal did all this, O Kubera. Now do what you think is right.'

The lord of all the Yakshas and Rakshasas hears this and his eyes redden. The enraged Kubera says, 'Yoke my horses!'

At once, his attendants yoke the horses adorned with golden ornaments to a chariot big as a hill and the colour of dark clouds. Yoked to the chariot, his superb steeds, each endowed with every noble quality and the auspicious ten curls of hair, of incredible strength and speed, decked with various gems and looking splendid, impatient to be off and fly like the wind, begin to neigh to each other as if they are already victorious.

And the king of the Yakshas rides forth, to the singing of his praises by Devas and Gandharvas.

A thousand foremost Yakshas of huge bodies, red eyes and golden lustre, gifted with enormous strength, strap on their swords and follow their lord Kubera. So swift is the flight of those horses that when they arrive at Gandhamadana it appears as if they have hauled the sky back with their speed.

The hair on the bodies of the Pandavas stands on end when they see the lord of wealth's horses and then the graceful and lustrous Kubera surrounded by the Yaksha host.

Kubera sees the sons of Pandu, maharathas armed with bows and swords, and he, too, is delighted, eager to fulfil the task at hand. The Yakshas, swift as the fastest birds, alight on the summit of the mountain and stand before the Pandavas, with their Lord at their head.

Then, O Bhaarata, because their master is pleased to see the Pandavas, the Yakshas and the Gandharvas stand there calmly. Knowing themselves to be transgressors, the noble Pandavas bow their heads and stand surrounding Kubera with folded hands.

The lord of treasures sits on the remarkable vimana, the elegant Pushpaka, made by Viswakarman and colourfully painted. Thousands of Yakshas and Rakshasas—some with gigantic bodies, some with pointed ears—hundreds of Gandharvas and hosts of Apsaras sit around him, like the Devas surrounding Indra, performer of a hundred sacrifices.

Kubera wears a golden garland around his neck, and has his paasa—his divine noose, his sword and his bow in his hands. Bhima stands gazing at the Lokapala and the sight of the god removes all the pain of the wounds the Rakshasas inflicted on him.

He, who is carried on the shoulders of Yakshas, sees Bhima's naturally warlike stance and his battle-ready weapons, and says to Yudhishtira, 'Kaunteya, all creatures know you as one who wants their welfare. You may live on this summit with your brothers, without any fear. O Pandava, do not be angry with Bhima. These Yakshas and Rakshasas were destined to die; your brother was merely the instrument of their death. There is no need to be ashamed of his impetuousness. The slaying of the Rakshasas was foretold by the gods. I am not angry with Bhimasena. In fact, I am rather pleased with him, Bhaaratottama. What Bhima did has made me happy!'

Now Kubera addresses Bhimasena, 'Child, best of the Kurus, I do not mind what you have done. Since you did it to please Krishnaa and because you depended only on your own strength, even though you disregarded the Devas and me, as well, when you did this reckless thing, I am pleased with you. Vrikodara, today you have freed me from an old curse. The Maharishi Agastya once cursed me in anger for an offence of mine; by what you did, you have liberated me. Pandava, my disgrace at a mortal's hands has long been destined. No offence attaches to you in any way.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Divine one, why were you cursed by the exalted Agastya? I am surprised that you were not consumed in an instant, along with your armies and companions, by the Muni's wrath.'

Kubera says, 'At Kusavati, O King, once a conclave of the Devas was held. I was on my way there with three hundred fierce Mahapadma Yakshas, all carrying various weapons, when we came upon that best of Rishis, Agastya Muni, engaged in severe tapasya on the banks of the Yamuna, where birds sing and trees are full of flowers. We saw him, a mass of blinding light, where he sat facing the Sun with his arms upraised. Out of foolishness, ignorance and arrogance, my friend, the elegant Rakshasa lord Maniman spat on the head of the Maharishi.

The sage's anger blazed up as if to consume the Earth, and he said to me, "Lord of treasures, your friend has insulted me in your presence. So, he, together with your forces, will meet their deaths at the hands of a mortal. And, evil one, you will grieve when they die, but shall be absolved from this curse when you come face to face with that same mortal. However, this curse will not affect the descendants of those of your people who are obedient to you."

This is how I was cursed by the Maharishi, and now, O great king, your brother Bhima has freed me.' "

"The lord of treasures says, 'Yudhishtira, five qualities lead to success—patience, ability, awareness of the right time and the right place, and resolve. O Bhaarata, in the Krita Yuga, men were steadfast and skilled in their respective occupations, and they knew the laws that dictated the wielding of power. And, foremost of Kshatriyas, only a king who is blessed with patience, who understands the importance of place and time, and who is well-acquainted with the laws of dharma, can rule the world for any length of time. In any transaction, he who conducts himself with dharma acquires fame in this world and a lofty place in the next. By having displayed his prowess at the proper place and time, Sakra, with the Vasus, gained sovereignty in Swarga.

He whose vision is clouded by anger and cannot see his coming fall, he who is addicted to sin because of his evil nature, and he who does not know the appropriateness of the time and place for action will meet with destruction both in this world and the next. All the efforts of such a stupid man are futile, because he does not know the when and where of his actions, and he will not escape doom in this world and the next.

Evil and deceitful men, who commit rash deeds, aiming to gain mastery over everything, are actually committing a sin. Bhimasena is fearless, ignorant of his dharma, haughty, immature and impetuous. You must check him.

Return to the asrama of the pious Arshtisena and stay there during the dark fortnight, free of anxiety. Lord of men, at my command, all the Gandharvas living in Alaka, as well as those living on this mountain, will protect you and these good Brahmanas.

Rajan, upbraid Vrikodara for the rashness that led him here. Now on, O King, beings living in the forest will come to you; they will wait upon you and always watch over all of you. My servants will procure delicious meats and drinks for you. Yudhishtira, my son, just as you were born of a Deva, Arjuna was, too, entitling him to the protection of Indra. So, also, is Vrikodara protected by Vayu and the powerful twins by the Aswins. In the same way, now you are all entitled to my protection.

Phalguna, next in line to Bhimasena, and versed in artha and dharma, is well in Devaloka. Dhanajaya was born with all the perfect attributes that are recognised in the world as leading to Swarga. Self-restraint, generosity, strength, intelligence, modesty, fortitude and boundless energy are all found in this one man of the fathomless soul. Jishnu never commits any dishonourable act, even through ignorance. No one can ever say that Partha has uttered a lie.

And now, Bhaarata, honoured by the Devas, the Pitrs and the Gandharvas, that enhancer of Kuru glory is learning the Astra Shastra, the science of weapons, in Sakra's abode. Santanu, who ruled so justly over all the rulers of the Earth, that boundlessly powerful and wise king, your father's grandfather, dwells in Swargaloka and he is extremely gratified in Arjuna, wielder of the Gandiva and the best of his clan.

Living in Indra's celestial abode, your grandsire Santanu, emperor of the unflinching vratas, who worshipped the Devas, the Pitrs and the Brahmanas on the banks of the Yamuna by performing seven Aswamedha yagnas, who has attained Swarga, asks after your welfare.'

The Pandavas are happy to hear Kubera. Bhima lowers his club and mace, his sword and bow, and he bows down low before Kubera. Seeing Bhima prostrate before him, the lord of treasures says, 'May you be the destroyer of the pride of your foes, and the enhancer of the delight of your friends.

Parantapas, live in our beautiful country. The Yakshas will bring you everything you need. Arjuna will return soon, after mastering the Astra Shastra. Indra Maghavat will bid him farewell and Dhananjaya will join you.'

After speaking to Yudhishtira, the lord of the Guhyakas vanishes from the mountain-top. Thousands of Yakshas and Rakshasas follow him in chariots spread with decorated cushions and ornamented with jewels. As the swift horses fly towards Kubera's abode, they are like flocks of birds coursing across the sky. Indeed, these horses are so swift that it seems as if they suck the sky and swallow it as they go.

At Kubera's command, the corpses of the slain Rakshasas are removed from the summit of the mountain. The curse of Maharishi Agastya has ended and, having died in battle, the Rakshasas are freed. The Pandavas remain there for many nights, honoured by the liberated Rakshasas."

Vaisampayana continued, “O Parantapa, at sunrise Dhaumya finishes his daily devotions and comes to the Pandavas with Arshtisena. The sons of Pandu touch the feet of Dhaumya and Arshtisena, and pay homage to all the Brahmanas.

Then, facing the east, Dhaumya takes Yudhishtira’s right hand in his and says, ‘O Great King, Mandara, the king of mountains, is vast and spans the earth right down to the ocean. Indra and Vaisravana protect this place graced with airy woods, forests and mountains. My child, the wisest sages, who know all about dharma, say that this realm is the abode of Indra and Vaisravana. Dvijas versed in varna dharma, Siddhas, Sadhyas and the Devas worship the Sun as he rises from here. Righteous Yama, lord of all living beings, presides over that southern region where the souls of departed beings go.

And this is Samyamanam, the abode of the lord of departed spirits, sacred and wonderful to behold, and crowned with bliss. The all-knowing ones have named this monarch of mountains Asta, and Surya arrives here, always abiding by the truth. Lord Varuna, dwelling here on this king of mountains as well as in the ocean, protects all living beings.

O blessed one, lighting up the northern point is the mighty mountain Mahameru, auspicious and the refuge of those who have attained the Brahman. That is where Brahma holds court, and from where Prajapati created all moving and immobile things of the Earth. Meru is the blissful abode of the seven mind-born sons of Brahma, of whom Daksha is the seventh. Child, it is here that the seven divine Rishis, the Saptarishis with Vasishta at their head, rise and set. Look at the matchless, radiant summit of Meru, where the Pitamaha Brahma sits with the celestials absorbed in the bliss of self-knowledge.

Next to Brahma's dwelling, you can see the home of Narayana, from whom all creation originated, and who has neither beginning nor end. Rajan, that holy place is so concentrated with divine energy that even the gods cannot look at it. By its very nature the abode of Vishnu Mahatman is full of splendour more brilliant than the Sun or Fire, and no one can look at it, not even the Devas or the Danavas. This place lies resplendent, to the east of the Meru, and it is here that the Lord of all creatures, the self-created Creator of the universe, in whom everything is manifested, dwells in a state of illumined grace.

Neither Maharishis nor Brahmarishis have access to this place, only Yatis do. Son of Pandu, in his presence here, the bodies of light cannot shine, because He alone, who is beyond understanding, shines in supreme transcendent lustre.

Here, by virtue of their tapasya and purified by their piety, the Yatis are able to approach Narayana Hari. And, O Bhaarata, once they reach this place and attain the eternal God of Gods, Hari the Self-creator, these spiritual beings, who are free from ignorance and pride, and who have attained perfection through yoga, never return to the mortal world.

Yudhishtira, this place is without a beginning, it does not decay, nor does it end, for it is the very being of Vishnu Narayana. And, O sinless son of the Kurus, the Sun and the Moon circumambulate Meru everyday in pradakshina, in opposite directions. The other planets and bodies of light also travel around this king of mountains.

The Sun God, who dispels darkness, revolves around Sumeru, obscuring other light-giving bodies. The maker of day sets and passes the evening, then takes a northerly course. Always mindful of the welfare of all beings, he turns eastwards again as he nears Meru.

In the same way, the divine Moon goes round this mountain, with the stars, and accurately divides the month into several cantos, marked by his arrival at each parva, each full moon. Unerringly does he circumambulate the mighty Meru and, nourishing all creatures, the Moon returns to Mandara.

The divine Surya Deva, the destroyer of darkness, also moves unfettered on his path, giving life to the universe. When he takes to the south with the intention of causing the rain to fall, winter ensues. And then, when he turns back towards the north, his rays draw out the energy from all beings, mobile and rooted. He makes men perspire, making them tired, lethargic and drowsy. All living things feel drowsy at this time. From here, moving through the mysterious sky, the sacred Sun brings rain and revives the Earth. Having nourished all beings with soothing showers, warmth and winds, majestic Surya begins his course all over again. Kaunteya, with his movements, the Sun unerringly turns the Kaalachakra, wheel of time, with mastery over all created things. His course is unceasing; he never stops to rest, O Pandava. He takes away energy and gives it back again and, dividing time into day and night, kaala and kastha, that Lord, the Sun, gives life and motion to all creation.' ”

Vaisampayana continued, "The noble Pandavas live on this peerless mountain, engaging in the most stringent vratas, enchanted by the place, and diverting their minds while they wait impatiently to see Arjuna again. Many Gandharvas and Maharishis visit these indefatigable ones, of the pure hearts, of immense prowess: embodiments of truth and courage.

Those maharathas are delighted with this wonderful place so full of flowering trees, as pleased as the Marutas were when they arrived in Swarga. In great joy they live on these blossom-rich, colourful slopes that resonate with the cries of peacocks and cranes.

On this peerless mountain, they see lotus-heavy lakes, their shores thick with trees, and haunted at night by karandavas and swans. His luxuriant leisure-grounds, glimmering with gems of many kinds, are enchanting enough to captivate Lord Kubera himslf, and, roaming at will here, the tapasvin Pandavas cannot fathom the awesome significance of the summit, with gigantic trees growing under fleeting clouds.

Here, O Kshatriya, due to its innate magnificence and the brilliance of its plants and trees, there is no difference between night and day. The Sun does not leave this place; he sheds his rays of immeasurable energy over everything, nurturing it all. Because they live on this mountain, where Surya Deva always shines to nourish all things, moving and still, those Kshatriyas see the Sun rise and set in the same place. The Pandavas are inspired by the rising and setting points of the ever-beaming Surya and their locations on the mountain, and the way the Sun's rays fill every little crevice as well as the expansive cardinal points, and all that lies between.

They await their brother, the supreme archer devoted to truth; they chant the Vedas, faithfully perform their nitya karma, and fulfil their holy vratas.

They say, 'Let us all be made joyful by our reunion with the mighty Arjuna!' and become absorbed in yoga. Although they are in charmed forests, every day seems like a year to them, so intensely do they think of him. From the moment when, with Dhaumya's leave, virtuous Jishnu matted his hair and left them to live in the forests, they have known no joy. With thoughts of him filling their minds, how could they know happiness even in this most blessed place?

They were overwhelmed by grief from the moment when, at Yudhishtira's command, Jishnu of the gait of an elephant left for the Kamyaka vana. O Bhaarata, it is with difficulty that the sons of Pandu pass the month on the mountain, thinking constantly of Arjuna Swetavahana, who has gone to Vasava's palace to master the art of weaponry.

Arjuna has now lived five years in the abode of thousand-eyed Indra, and has obtained astras from all the Devas—Agni, Varuna, Soma, Vayu, Vishnu, Indra, Pasupati, Brahma, Parameshti, Prajapati, Yama, Dhata, Savita, Tvashta, and Vaisravana. He bows to Indra of the hundred sacrifices and takes leave of him to come to Gandhamadana."

NIVATAKAVACHA YUDDHA PARVA

Vaisampayana continued, "One day, as those mighty Kshatriyas are thinking of Arjuna, they see Indra's chariot, yoked to horses as bright as lightning, suddenly arrive. Matali drives this vimana that lights up the sky like a great flame, like a meteor flashing down through the clouds. Wearing heaven's garlands and sparkling ornaments, Arjuna Kiriti sits in it. Dhananjaya, equal in prowess to Indra, alights from the chariot, and blazes in beauty.

Wearing his crown, Arjuna bows down at the feet of Dhaumya and then at the feet of Ajatasatru; he touches Vrikodara's feet in respect, while the twins bow to him. He greets Krishnaa, beside herself with joy, and then he stands humbly before his elder brother. Great is the delight of the brothers on being re-united with the resplendent Arjuna. He, too, rejoices at meeting them and praises the king.

The sons of Pritha walk around that chariot, from which the slayer of Namuchi annihilated seven divisions of Diti's progeny, in pradakshina, and honour Matali as if he is Indra himself. Yudhishtira enquires about the well-being of all the Devas; Matali greets him and, having spoken words of advice to them, as a father to sons, he climbs back into the supreme vimana and flies back to the Lord of the Devas.

After Matali has left, Indra's son, first among all Kshatriyas, the noble destroyer of all foes, gives Krishnaa, the mother of Sutasoma, unearthly precious gems and jewellery, that Indra has sent, and which dazzle like the Sun. Then, sitting in the midst of those best of Kurus and Brahmanas, he recounts all that has happened, and he is as bright as Fire or the Sun.

He says, 'I acquired astras from Sakra, Vayu, and Siva himself; and all the Devas were pleased with my humility and concentration.' He tells them of his stay in Devaloka, and that night Kiriti of the unblemished deeds sleeps contentedly with the sons of Madri."

Vaisampayana said, “When day breaks, Dhananjaya and his brothers pay homage to Yudhishtira Dharmaraja. As they do, O Bhaarata, they hear resonant music from the sky, the rumbling of chariot-wheels and the ringing of bells. All the wild beasts and birds echo a chorus in their own voices. Hosts of Gandharvas and Apsaras appear in their vimanas from all around and follow Indra, king of the Devas, in procession. That Lord of all celestials, Purandara, flies down in his chariot decorated with gold and yoked to incandescent horses, landing near the sons of Pritha. He of the thousand eyes descends from his vimana, and as soon as Yudhishtira sees the exalted one, with his brothers he comes before the king of the immortals.

Magnanimous Yudhishtira worships Indra of the immeasurable soul with ceremony that befits his pre-eminence. Then mighty Arjuna bows to Purandara and stands humbly before him, like a servant. Seeing the pure Dhananjaya of lofty punya, with his matted hair, stand in humility before the Lord of gods, Yudhishtira of fearsome tejas sniffs the top of his brother’s head in affection. He is overjoyed to see Phalguna like this, and feels utterly glad as he worships Indra.

The Lord of the Devas says to Yudhishtira, ‘You shall rule the earth, O Pandava; I bless you with prosperity. Return to Kamyaka Vana, O son of Kunti. The learned man who leads a life of brahmacharya for a year, with his senses under control and observing vratas, and keeping in mind this meeting with me, will live in unalloyed happiness for a hundred years, with no anxieties.' "

Vaisampayana continued, “When Sakra has gone back to his own dominion, Bibhatsu, with his brothers and Krishnaa, pays obeisance to Yudhishtira, son of Dharma Deva, who lovingly sniffs the top of Arjuna’s head.

Yudhishtira’s voice chokes with emotion as he says to Arjuna, ‘Oh, how did you spend your time in Indraloka? How did you acquire the weapons, and what did you do to please the Lord of the Devas? Pandava, have you now gained a thorough knowledge of the astras? Did Indra and Rudra give them to you gladly?

How did you see the divine Siva, the Pinakin? How did you get the Devastras? How did you worship them? What service did you perform for that worshipful one of a hundred sacrifices, that he said to you, You have gratified me?

O radiant one, I want to hear about all this, as well as how you pleased Mahadeva and Indra. Tell me, also, about the service you rendered to the wielder of the thunderbolt. Dhananjaya, tell me everything.’

Arjuna says, ‘Mighty king, listen to how I saw him of a hundred sacrifices and the divine Sankara too. O Parantapa, I acquired the Astra Shastra that you instructed me to learn when I went into the forest to perform tapasya. From Kamyaka I went to the Bhrigutunga and spent one night there.

While I sat in dhyana the next day, I saw a Brahmana, who asked me, "Son of Kunti, where will you go?" I told him everything that had happened and he was pleased with me. He praised me and said, "Bhaarata, perform your tapasya, and soon you will see the king of the Devas."

I climbed to the top of Mount Saisiram in the Himalaya, where I began my austerities. For the first month I ate fruit and roots; the second month, I took only water; during the third, I fasted; and the fourth month, I stood with upraised arms. I am amazed that I did not lose any strength.

Rajan, at the end of the first day of the fifth month, there appeared before me a being in the form of a boar, digging the earth with his tusks, stamping his feet and rubbing his belly on the ground, and running here and there in a frightful way. Following him came a hunter, a Vetala with bow and arrows and a sword, and he was surrounded by dark and beautiful women, and the one at his side was especially so.

I took up my bow and my two inexhaustible quivers; and I shot that terrible boar. Simultaneously, that hunter raised his bow and struck the beast even more forcefully, making my heart tremble.

Rajan, he said to me, "Why have you broken the laws of hunting by shooting a beast that was my quarry? I will crush your pride with my arrows."

That great black Vetala rushed at me with his bow stretched. He covered me completely with his arrows, even as a cloud does a mountain with rain; and I enveloped him with a shower of my own shafts. I recited mantras and shot flame-tipped barbs, piercing him as Indra would cleave a mountain with his Vajra.

The Vetala multiplied his body a hundred times, and a thousand times, but I pierced them all with arrows. Then, again, all those forms merged into one, O Bhaarata, and at once, I struck it. He began changing shapes—now, a small body with a huge head, and now a huge body with a small head. Finally, he took his original form and came at me ready to fight.

Invoking the potent Vayavyastra, weapon of the Wind God, I affixed it to my bowstring. Amazingly, even this weapon had no effect on him. With more vigour, I covered that hunter with a profusion of mighty astras. I inundated him with the weapons of Sthunakarna, Varuna, Salabha and Asmavarsha. But, Rajan, he swallowed them all.

When all those had been consumed, I loosed the Brahmastra at him. Arrows of light and flames piled over him, he began to expand. The world was in the grip of that weapon and all the points of the compass were lit up by its brilliance; but that hunter frustrated even the Brahmastra. O Rajan, when Brahma's weapon was quelled, I became afraid.

I took up my bow and my two inexhaustible quivers and shot at him again, but he devoured all those arrows as well. And when he had subdued all my weapons, he and I wrestled. We fought with blows, but I could not defeat him and fell bewildered and senseless on the ground.

That wonderful Vetala laughed delightedly and vanished before my eyes, together with the woman; and my Gandiva and two quivers also disappeared.

Now, that godlike hunter assumed another form, unearthly and wearing shining raiment. He renounced the form of a hunter, that Devadeva, and took his own divine Form, and that God stood there, with his Goddess beside him. The Divine One—whose emblem is the Bull, who wields the Pinaka, who wears coiled serpents for his ornaments, and who can assume any form—appeared before me with Uma. Parantapa, he came towards me while I was preparing to fight on, and the bearer of the trident, Trisulin, said, "I am so pleased with you!"

The Divine One held up my bow and my pair of ever-filled quivers and returned them to me, saying, "Ask for a boon, O son of Kunti. I am delighted with you. Tell me, what shall I do for you? Kshatriya, tell me your wish and I will grant it. Other than immortality, I can give you anything your heart desires."

I was intent on having the astras, so, I bowed down to Siva and said, "O Divine One, if you are pleased with me, grant me this—I wish to acquire mastery of all the weapons that the gods command, the Devastras."

Lord Tryambaka of the three eyes said, "So it shall be. Pandava, my own weapon, Raudra, will always await your call." Now Mahadeva gave me the greatest of all astras, his own Pasupata, and having bestowed it, said, "This must never be used against mortals, for if it is loosed at one of small strength it will consume the very universe. It should be used only in a desperate predicament, when all your other weapons have failed you. Only then may you use my Pasupatastra."

When he that uses the insignia of the Bull had been gratified, there appeared at my side the Devastra of the irresistible power, which can consume all other weapons, kill any truly mighty enemy and raze hostile armies; it is without equal, and even the Devas, Danavas and Rakshasas cannot withstand it.

At Siva's command, I sat down there and, even as I gazed at him, in adoration, the God vanished.' "

"Arjuna says, 'Bhaarata, by the grace of Devadeva, God of gods, the Paramatman Siva, I spent the night in that place; and when day broke and I had finished my morning rituals, I saw the Brahmana whom I had seen before. I told him everything that had happened, about my meeting with Mahadeva.

This pleased him, and he said, "Since you have seen the great God, which no one else can do, you will soon meet Vaivaswata and the other Lokapalas, and the Lord of the Devas, too; and Indra will also grant you astras."

He said this, O King, he embraced me again and again, and that radiant Brahmana went away. Parantapa, that evening, a pure breeze began to blow and seemed to renew the Earth. Near where I was, at the foothills of the Himalaya, all at once fragrant, lovely flowers began to bloom. All around me I could hear an enchanting chorus of hymns being sung in praise of Indra. Hosts of Apsaras and Gandharvas sang to that Lord of celestial hosts. The Maruts and the followers of Mahendra, and other Swargavasis, heaven-dwellers, came in their divine vimanas.

Soon after, Indra Marutvan, accompanied by Sachi and all the immortals appeared in chariots yoked with elegantly caparisoned horses.

He that is carried on the shoulders of men manifested himself in front of me. I saw Yama seated in the south and Varuna and the Lord of the Devas in their respective places.

They greeted me and said, “Savyasachi, look at us seated here. You have been granted this vision of the Lokapalas so that you can perform a task for us. Now receive our astras.”

Lord, I bowed to those foremost of the Devas in reverence and took those divine weapons, upon which they accepted me as one of them. Then, the gods went back to the place from which they had come.

The Lord of the immortals, the divine Maghavat, ascended his glorious chariot and left, saying, “Phalguna, you must visit Devaloka. Even before your arrival I knew that you would come here. I manifested myself to you, O best of the Bhaaratas; and because you have purified yourself with ablutions in many holy tirthas and strengthened yourself with unflinching austerities, you will gain admittance to Devaloka. You will have to practise severe penance again, for you will have to stay there for a time as a mortal. I have told Matali to bring you to our world. All the Devas and great Rishis have already granted you recognition.”

I said, “Divine one, look kindly on me. I wish to learn the Astra Shastra, and beseech you to be my Guru.”

Indra replied, “My child, you will achieve terrible feats with the Astra Shastra, but I will fulfil your desire to acquire this knowledge.”

To this I said, “O Lord, I will never use the Devastras against mortals except when all my other weapons have been repulsed. Therefore, King of gods, grant me the Devastras so that I may attain the realms reserved for Kshatriyas.”

Indra said, “Dhananjaya, it is to test you that I said these words to you. You are my son, and your reply becomes you. Go now, Bhaarata, to my abode and learn all the weapons of Vayu, Agni, the Vasus, Varuna, the Maruts, the Siddhas, Brahma, the Gandharvas, the Uragas, the Rakshasas, Vishnu and the Nairitras. Learn to use all the astras that are mine, as well, O perpetuator of the house of Kuru.”

Saying this, Sakra vanished from where he had stood. Then, Rajan, I saw the fabled and sacred chariot of heaven arrive, drawn by unearthly horses and driven by Matali.

When the Lokapalas had gone, Matali said to me. “O splendid one, the king of the Devas wants to see you. Mighty-armed, achieve supreme competence before you perform your task. Come and see the realms that can only be attained through dharma; enter heaven in your human body. Bhaarata, the thousand-eyed Lord of the celestials wishes to see you."

I took my leave of the Himalaya by walking around the mountain in pradakshina and climbed into the magnificent chariot. The generous Matali, expert sarathy, drove these steeds gifted with the speed of thought or the wind.

When the chariot began to move he saw that I sat steadily and, looking at me in wonder, said, "I find it wonderfully strange that, although seated in this divine vimana, you have not stirred even a little. Bhaaratottama, I have seen that, at the first pull of my horses, the Lord of the Devas sways where he sits. But you have sat unshaken all the while. In this, you are greater than Sakra himself."

Matali soared into the sky and showed me the realms of the Devas and their palaces. The horse-driven chariot flew up, and the celestials and the sages of heaven worshipped it. Manavottama, I saw whole worlds moving anywhere at will; I saw the grandeur of the tejasvins—the Gandharvas, Apsaras and the Devarishis. Sakra's sarathy Matali showed me the Nandana and other magical gardens and groves of the gods.

Then, I beheld Indra's city, Amaravati, adorned with jewels and shining kalpa-vrikshas, trees that bear any sort of fruit that one desires. There the Sun is not hot; no one is affected by heat, cold or fatigue, Rajan. The gods feel neither sorrow nor dispiritedness, nor weakness, nor apathy, Parantapa. Those who live in that place have neither anger nor greed; all are perfectly contented.

There, the leaves on the trees are always green, the branches laden with flowers and fruit; the fragrance of lotuses pervades the numerous lakes. There the breeze is cool and delicious, fragrant and pure, and invigorating. The ground is strewn with all kinds of jewels and with divine blossoms. There countless exotic beasts and birds live, none of our world.

I saw the Vasus, the Rudras, the Sadhyas with the Maruts, the Adityas and the two Aswins, and I worshipped them. And they gave me their blessings, granting me strength and prowess, energy and fame, skill at arms and victory in battle.

Then, I entered that fabled city, so loved by Gandharvas and Devas, and with joined hands I stood before the thousand-eyed Lord of the gods. Sakra, ever generous, offered me half his throne; and Vasava put his hand on me in affection.

Thus, Bhaarata, with the intention of acquiring astras and learning to master them, I began to live in Indraloka, in the company of Devas and Gandharvas of bountiful souls. Viswavasa's son Chitrasena became my friend, and he imparted the entire body of Gandharva gyana to me. I lived happily in Sakra's home, well cared for, having all my desires gratified, learning about the astras, listening to divine songs and music, and watching the most alluring Apsaras dance.

Without neglecting to study the arts, which I did carefully, I devoted my attention to the acquisition of arms. And that Lord of a thousand eyes was pleased with my sense of purpose. Living in Devaloka, O king, thus did I pass my time.

When I had mastered the Devastras and gained the confidence of Indra, whose mount is Uchchaisravas, one day he said, "Now even the gods themselves cannot conquer you, let alone the mortals of the Earth. You have become irrepressible in strength and invincible in battle."

The hair on my body stood on end as Indra continued, "O Kshatriya, you have no equal in battle. You are ever-vigilant, dexterous, truthful, and have your senses under perfect control. You are the protector of Brahmanas; you are a master of weapons, and warlike. Partha, you have obtained the fifteen great Devastras, as well as the five ways of using them. You now stand alone and without any peer. You have perfected the skill of releasing these weapons and their withdrawal.

You have perfected the Prayaschitta, the revival of harmless beings killed by these weapons, and also how to revive the astras themselves if they are rendered ineffective. Now, Parantapa, the time has come for paying the Gurudakshina. Promise to pay it and I will tell you what you have to do."

Rajan, I said to the king of the Devas, "If it is in my power to do what you ask, consider it already done."

At my words, Indra smiled and said, "There is nothing in the three worlds that is beyond your power. My enemies, the Danavas called the Nivatakavachas, live in the depths of the ocean. There are thirty million of them; they are dishonourable, all identical to look at and equally strong and splendid. Destroy them there, Kaunteya, and that will be your Gurudakshina to me."

Saying this, he gave me his resplendent vimana, with Matali driving it, and cushioned with down as soft and lustrous as peacock-feathers. He set this exquisite kirita, this crown, on my head and gave me glittering ornaments like his own for my body. He gifted me an impenetrable armour—the best of its kind and comfortable to wear. Then, he strung the Gandiva with this everlasting bowstring.

I set out in that marvellous chariot from which, in days gone by, the king of the Devas defeated Bali, the son of Virochana. O ruler of men, startled by the rumbling of the ratha, all the celestial ones came out, thinking that I was the Deva king. Seeing me, they asked, "O Phalguna, what are you going to do?"

I told them everything, adding, "I will go into battle. Auspicious ones, I am going forth to kill the Nivatakavachas. Give me your blessings."

They began to praise me in the same way that they eulogised Purandara. They said, "Riding this chariot, Maghavat conquered in battle Sambara, and Namuchi, and Bala, and Vritra, and Prahlada, and Naraka. From this vimana, Maghavat has vanquished thousands of millions of Daityas. O Kaunteya, riding in this chariot even as Indra did long ago, you, too, shall conquer the Nivatakavachas in battle.

Here is the best of all conches; Sakra used it to conquer the worlds, and blowing on it you will also triumph."

Saying this, the gods offered me this shell, the Devadatta, born in the deep; and I took it for the sake of victory. The gods began to extol me then, and impatient for battle, armed with my conch, my armour, my bow and arrows, I flew towards the sinister home of the demonic Nivatakavachas.' "

"Arjuna continues, 'I passed all the places that the Maharishis had spoken highly of and, at last, saw the ocean of Devaloka—the inexhaustible Lord of waters. I saw upon it swelling waves that looked like mountains of water, crashing against each other and then rolling away. I saw thousands of ships filled with gemstones. I saw those great, fabulous fish, timingilas, and tortoises that looked like submerged stone hills. And everywhere in the water were thousands of shells, like stars in a lightly clouded night sky. Thousands upon thousands of jewels floated in clusters and a violent wind whirled them about. O, this was rare and wonderful to see.

As I looked upon the marvellous ocean of the mighty tides, I saw the city of the Danavas, not too far away. Matali, expert sarathy, guided the chariot, and it submerged, and all its embellishments smoothly slid under water. But he sat firmly in his seat and drove the craft with force, frightening all who heard its rumble.

The Danavas heard that sound like clouds rumbling in the sky, and, thinking I was the Lord of the gods, were panic-stricken. They all stood with their bows and arrows, javelins and axes, maces and clubs, terrified. Quickly making arrangements for the defence of their city, the alarmed Danavas clanged shut the gates, hiding everything inside.

I took up my conch, Devadatta of the deafening roars, and blew gleefully on it many times. That sound filled the sky and rang everywhere. Even the mightiest beings were terrified and hid. And then, O Bhaarata, all the Daityas, the children of Diti, the Nivatakavachas shining with ornaments, appeared in their thousands, wearing all kinds of armour, with myriad weapons in their hands.

They had iron javelins, maces and clubs, hatchets, sabres and discs, sataghnis and bhusundis, and colourfully streaked and bejewelled swords. After thinking a moment about which way to go, Matali steered the vimana on to level ground.

O best of the Bhaaratas, the horses were so swift that everything we passed went by in a blur; I could see nothing, and I found this strange. Then the Danavas began to play thousands of oddly-shaped musical instruments, making a discordant, nerve-wracking cacophony. At the awful noise, thousands of enormous fish, that were like hills, streaked away. The stupendous force of demons flew at me, loosing hundreds of thousands of arrows.

O Bhaarata, a savage battle followed between the Danavas and me; I was ready to annihilate the Nivatakavachas. Devarishis, Danavarishis, Brahmarishis and Siddhas came to witness the contention. Eager for my victory, the Munis praised me with the same sweet speeches they had used for Indra in the war of old fought over Tara.' "

"Arjuna continues, 'Bhaarata, the Nivatakavachas, armed to their teeth, rushed ferociously at me. They blocked the path of the chariot and, roaring loudly, surrounded the chariot and covered me with their arrows. Other demons flung darts and hatchets, spears and axes at me. My chariot was enveloped in a blizzard of arrows, maces and clubs. Some truly dreadful-looking Nivatakavachas, armed with bows and heavy arrows, ran at me. I shot ten swift, sure shafts from my Gandiva into each of them, driving them back with those stone-sharpened darts.

My horses, in the skilful hands of Matali, moved like the wind, with incredible agility and speed, trampling the sons of Danu and Diti everywhere. Although thousands of horses were yoked to my ratha, Matali's masterly chariotry made it seem they were only a few, so smoothly did our chariot fly. Hundreds of Danavas fell dead by being trampled under the horses' hooves, by being run over by the chariot wheels, and by my blistering arrows. There were others who, though dead, lay in their chariots with their weapons still strapped on; and their charioteers slain, the horses dragged the chariots chaotically here and there.

Now the greatest Danava warriors came to fight, using sorcerous weapons to cover all sides and directions, and I was hard-pressed. I saw Matali's incredible prowess then, as he steered his fiery steeds, breaking through the net of demon arrows with such ease. Heartened, I killed hundreds of thousands of Danavas with my astras. Parantapa, seeing me range the field and putting forth all my prowess, Sakra's charioteer was pleased.

Some Nivatakavachas were crushed to death by the horses and chariot, some gave up the fight, but others battled on, shooting storms of arrows. I began to kill them with the hundreds of thousands of weapons I could command with mantras of the Brahmastra. Harried by me, enraged, those Asuras attacked me with a torrent of clubs, arrows and swords.

Then, Bhaarata, I invoked Indra's favourite weapon, supreme astra of breathtaking urjas, and loosed it at the attacking Tomara horde, and desiccated the swords and tridents they hurled. When I had destroyed their weapons, I pierced each of them with ten arrows.

Arrows flew from the Gandiva like rows of black bees; and Matali was jubilant. The Danavas showered me with dark shafts, but I deflected them. The Nivatakavachas smothered me in a fog of arrows, and I contained them again with superior astras, swift and fiery, which could baffle other astras; and I killed thousands of demons more. Blood flowed from their torn bodies, like a monsoon waterfall down a mountain slope. My arrows struck them like Indra's thunderbolt, and inflamed them. Their wounds bled copiously; the power of their weapons was diminished; and the Nivatakavachas began to use maya to fight me.' "

"Arjuna says, 'A sudden shower of rocks big as trees rained down on me, but I blasted those boulders with a volley from Mahendra's weapon, almost equal to his Vajra. When the rocks had been powdered, a fire sprang up, and the dust fell like sparks.

A cataract of water now fell, each stream of it as thick as an axle-rod; its massive torrents filled the sky in all the directions. Confusion gripped me at the downpour and the howling of the wind and the roaring of the Daityas. The water fell without pause, filling all the space between earth and sky, and for a moment I stood rooted.

Recovering quickly, I discharged another Devastra I had received from Indra, the Visoshana of fire, and all the water was instantly vapourised. O Bhaarata, when the rocks had been pulverised and the water dried up, the Danavas created illusions of fire and wind. I used a weapon of water to put out the flames, and one that made a wall of stone to shield me from the wind.

Now the Nivatakavachas besieged me with a myriad weapons, of stone, water, fire and wind all together. All around, a thick, gloomy darkness spread and, enveloped in that black night of the world, our horses reared, whinnying in terror; Matali fell from his place, and the golden horsewhip from his hands.

He cried, “Where are you? Where are you?” and dread gripped me as well to see him panic.

Then, he said to me, “Partha, the Devas and Danavas once fought a mighty war over the amrita, and I witnessed that battle. Again, when Sambara was killed, there was a dreadful war; then, too, I was charioteer to the king of the Devas. I was Indra’s sarathy when Vritrasura was killed. I also saw the savage encounters with Virochana’s son Bali, Prahlada and the rest. Oh, I saw all those fearful battles, Pandava, but never before did I lose my senses. Pitamaha Brahma must have ordained the destruction of the universe, for I can see no other purpose for this battle of battles.”

When I heard Matali, I made a great effort to calm myself and thought of how I would dispel the illusions that beset us. I said to the frightened charioteer, “Look at the strength of my arms, the power of my astras and of my Gandiva. I will use magical weapons to dispel this turgid darkness and the other sorceries of the Danavas. Fear not, sarathy; calm yourself.”

Fighting for the Devas, I made an illusion that could stupefy all beings. This dispelled the Danavas’ maya, but some of their most powerful demons attacked me with fresh spells, of different kinds. The world seemed to disappear and appear in flashes; it seemed to be swallowed by darkness, or submerged in water. When the world became visible again, Matali sat in his seat in the chariot with the reins of the horses in his hand, and he began to range across the field, like lightning, making everyone’s hair stand on end. The ferocious Nivatakavachas still assailed me but, seizing every opportunity I found, I sent them, one by one, to Yamaloka.

In the midst of the battle that raged, suddenly the Danavas vanished, cloaked in maya.’ ”

"Arjuna continues, 'Now the Daityas fought unseen, their weapons unseen, while I battled on with weapons in plain sight. Wherever I sensed they were, I sloughed off Asura heads with arrows from the Gandiva. The Nivatakavachas withdrew their maya, and fled into their city.

When the Daityas fled and the world was visible again, I saw that the dead numbered many hundreds of thousands. Near the slain demons lay their splintered weapons, ornaments, armour and severed limbs. The field was so crowded with bodies that our horses could not move freely, and they took to the sky.

Some Nivatakavachas were still hidden from view, and these filled the sky with rock masses. Bhaarata, other Danavas burrowed underground and seized our horses' legs and chariot-wheels. From above and below, they cast down a barrage of rocks on the horses and attacked me and my chariot. The rocks that lay around us and those that continued to fall hemmed me in as if sealing me into a mountain cave.

Matali saw me oppressed by the rocks that fell and his horses being crushed under their weight. He saw that I was afraid and said, "Arjuna, do not be frightened. Loose the Vajra, Purushottama."

I invoked Indra's favourite weapon, the inexorable thousand-jointed thunderbolt. Saying its mantra over the Gandiva, I aimed at the battery of falling crags and loosed iron arrows that bore the Vajra. As they issued from that astra, the iron shafts turned into individual thunderbolts. They pierced the demons' sorcery and struck the Nivatakavachas. From the sky, Danavas big as cliffs fell to the earth, cloven by the fervid power of the Vajra. The thunderbolts blasted the Danavas who had dragged our horses into the entrails of the earth, and despatched them to Yama.

All that place was covered with the mountainous bodies of Nivatakavachas—the dead, the wounded and the unconscious lay there like scattered crags.

Strangely, neither I, nor the horses and chariot, nor Matali were in the least injured. Matali smiled and said, "Not even in the Devas, Arjuna, have I seen prowess such as yours."

When the demon hosts had been destroyed, their women began to wail in their city, like cranes in autumn. Matali and I entered that city, terrifying the Nivatakavacha wives with the rumble of our chariot. The women fled in crowds when they saw our ten thousand horses, lustrous as peacocks, and the dazzling chariot, bright as the Sun. The women's ornaments, falling as they ran, made a sound like that of rocks tumbling down a mountain. The panic-stricken wives of the Daityas fled into their golden palaces that were adorned with countless jewels.

Seeing that incomparable city, even grander than the city of the gods, I asked Matali, "Why do the Devas not live in a place like this? This city seems to be superior to Purandara's Amaravati."

Matali replied, "In days gone by, O Partha, this was the city of our Lord of the Devas. Later, the gods were driven from here by the Nivatakavachas. The Nivatakavachas performed the most stringent tapasya and, when they had pleased Brahma, they asked him for a boon—that they might live here, invincible to the Devas.

Then Sakra addressed Brahma saying, O Lord, do what you consider proper, but keep our welfare in mind. Then, O Bhaarata, the Lord commanded Indra, saying, O slayer of foes, using another body, you will become the nemesis of the Danavas. It was to make this possible that Sakra gave you all the astras. The gods could not themselves slay the demons that you have today. The time had come for you to kill them, and you have done so. Foremost of men, Mahendra gave you these supremely potent Devastras so that you could annihilate the Nivatakavachas."

After killing the Danavas and subduing their city, I returned to Amaravati with Matali.' "

"Arjuna says, 'On my way back, I saw an unearthly city, moving at will, radiant like Fire, or the Sun. In this city were trees made of gems, and sweet-voiced birds of many colours. It had four gates, many gateways and towers, and in that impregnable city lived Paulomas and Kalakanjas. It was exquisitely wrought from all manner of jewels, and was ethereal and wonderful to look at. The trees of jewels bore flowers and fruit; extraordinary celestial birds sang from their branches. Blithe Asuras wandered its streets and gardens, wearing garlands and carrying double-edged swords, bows, arrows, maces and clubs.

Rajan, on seeing that city of Daityas, I asked Matali, "What is this place that looks so marvellous?"

Matali replied, "Once, long ago, a Daitya's daughter named Puloma, and Kalaka, a mighty female of the Asura race, preformed tapasya for a thousand celestial years. At the end of their penance, Brahma, the self-created one, conferred boons on them—that their children would never suffer misfortune; that they cannot be slain, even by the Devas, the Rakshasas and the Pannagas; and that they be given a radiant and incomparable aerial city, furnished with all kinds of gemstones, and impregnable by the Devas, the Maharishis, the Yakshas, the Gandharvas, the Pannagas, the Asuras and the Rakshasas.

Bhaaratottama, this is that flying city, devoid of Devas, which was created by Brahma himself for the descendants of Kalaka—the Kalakeyas.

The city has everything one could ever want, and no illness or grief enters here. It is filled with all things desirable, and disease and suffering are unknown. This celebrated city is called Hiranyapura, peopled by the Paulomas and the Kalakanjas, guarded by those mighty Asuras. And, O King, since they cannot be killed by the Devas, they live happily, free from anxiety and having all their desires fulfilled.

But Brahma has ordained their destruction by a mortal. O Partha, it is you who must use the Vajra and destroy the very race of Kalakanjas."

O lord of men, having found out that they could not be touched by the Devas and the Asuras, I cheerfully said to Matali, "Fly into that city. I will obliterate them that hate the king of the gods. I consider it my dharma to kill any enemy of the Devas."

Matali took me near Hiranyapura in the heavenly horse-driven chariot. Seeing me, those sons of Diti, wearing diverse kinds of clothes, ornaments and armour, charged at me in their chariots. They attacked me with arrows, clubs and double-edged swords, with prowess that defies description.

Rajan, using my knowledge of the Astra Shastra, I resisted the great volley of weapons with a wild shower of arrows, and all the Danavas, attacking me from every side, were bemused. Confounded, they began to attack one another. I struck off hundreds of heads with flaming arrows.

The sons of Diti fled into their city and, with their magical powers, flew high into the sky. I barred their way with a vast web of arrows. However, the Danavas stood firm in their city, which flew wherever they willed, radiant as the Sun. The city plunged down to Earth; it took off again; it flew in an arc; it went underwater.

Parantapa, I never paused my attack on that incredible city that was like Amaravati to behold. I stormed Hiranyapura, and all the Daityas in it, with legion Devastras. Broken by my volleys, the city of the Asuras fell to the earth. Grievously wounded by my weapons of the speed and the sound of thunder, demons wandered about in a daze, without will of their own, as if moved only by destiny.

Matali flew our chariot of solar effulgence into the sky, and then down to land on earth. O Bhaarata, surrounding me were sixty thousand war chariots, with enraged Daityas in them, eager for battle with me, but I killed them all with vulture-feathered arrows. Confident that a mortal could hardly vanquish them, their attack swelled in a surging tide. I loosed the Devastras, one by one. But those Maharathas restrained each one, and on the field I saw hundreds and thousands of mighty demons moving about in their chariots in diverse manoeuvres. They were splendid with the sheer variety of their armour, their ornaments and their flags; they were a delight to the eyes.

Set upon by the innumerable warriors, heavily armed and skilled in battle, I was overwhelmed and fear gripped me. I invoked Rudra, the supreme God and, saying, May welfare attend on all beings, I chanted the mantra for the Raudrastra, scourge of all enemies.

At once, I saw a being with three heads, nine eyes, three faces, and six arms. His hair blazed like Fire or the Sun and, O Parantapa, on his body he wore huge snakes darting out their tongues. Seeing Rudra the Eternal before me, my fear melted away and I set his weapon on the Gandiva, bowed to the three-eyed One of the measureless tejas and released it, willing it to consume the Danavas.

Lord of men, as soon as it was loosed, a multitude of forms were manifested—deer, lions, tigers and bears; buffaloes, snakes and cows; and sarabhas; and elephants, apes, bulls and boars; cats and dogs; ghosts; all the Bhurundas; vultures and Garudas, Chamaras and leopards; mountains and seas; Devas, Rishis and Gandharvas; Pisachas and Yakshas; Asuras, Guhyakas and Nairitras; elephant-mouthed sharks; owls; creatures with the forms of fish and horses, other macabre beings bearing swords and other weapons; and Rakshasas brandishing maces and clubs.

When that weapon was loosed, the whole universe appeared, filled with all these and other beings. These multifarious beings—some had pieces of flesh, fat, bones and marrow sticking to them, others had three heads, or four tusks, or four mouths, or four arms—attacked the Danavas again and again, and held them at bay.

Then, my brother, in a single moment I slew all those Danavas with a swarm of arrows imbued with the hardness of rocks, flaming like Agni or Surya, and lethal as thunderbolts. I saw the Danavas, brought down by the Gandiva, fall from the sky, and bowed once more to the Supreme God, destroyer of the Asuras of Tripura.

The celestial sarathy Matali was delighted to see those Daityas, adorned with ethereal ornaments, annihilated by the Raudrastra. Having witnessed my feat, which even the celestials could not accomplish, Sakra's charioteer paid me homage.

With joined hands, he said, "The gods could not have done what you have today. Indeed, not even the king of Devas himself could have accomplished this. Hiranyapura was invincible, it could not be touched by the Devas or Asuras, but you have destroyed it with your strength and the power of your tapasya, O Kshatriya."

When that ethereal city had been ruined and its demons slain, their wives came streaming out, their hair dishevelled, and keening loudly, like kurari birds. They wailed in grief for the loss of their sons, brothers and fathers; they fell on the ground, crying hoarsely. They beat their breasts for having been widowed, and their garlands and jewellery fell from them.

The golden city of the Danavas, which once looked like a Gandharva city, resounded with lamentation and was denuded of beauty, like a lake without elephants, or a forest stripped of trees. Deprived of its masters, it lost its lustre, and it disintegrated, as if it had been made of clouds.

My task accomplished, Matali took me back to Amaravati, the deathless abode of Indra. Having vanquished and killed the Nivatakavachas, and destroyed Hiranyapura and its Kalakeyas, I came and stood, my head bowed, before Indra. Matali described to him all that I had done, in detail. It was with great delight that the Maruts heard about the destruction of Hiranyapura, the undoing of the illusions and the slaughter of the Nivatakavachas in battle.

Thousand-eyed Purandara was pleased no end, and cried, Well done! and Indra and the Devas applauded, even cheered me for a long time.

Indra said, "You have achieved a feat that neither the Devas nor the Asuras could. O Partha, by slaying my enemies, you have paid my Gurudakshina. Therefore, Dhananjaya, I grant that in battle you will always stay calm and discharge your weapons unerringly, and you will be irresistible to Devas, Danavas, Rakshasas, Yakshas, Asuras, Gandharvas, Pakshis and Nagas.

Through the might of your arms, Kunti's son Yudhishtira will conquer the Earth and rule it," ' says Arjuna."

"Arjuna continues, 'As I stood there, my wounds still bleeding, Indra, king of the Devas, acknowledged me as his own, and said, "Arjuna, all the Devastras are with you, and no man on earth will be able to overpower you. My son, when you are on the battlefield, Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Karna and Sakuni, together with all the other Kshatriyas, will not be equal even to a sixteenth part of what you are."

The lord Maghavat gave me this golden garland and this conch-shell, Devadatta of the mighty roars, and also his unearthly, impenetrable mail. With his own hands, he set this crown on my head. Sakra presented me with these heavenly garments and with rare ornaments of unearthly craft. Thus was I honoured, Rajan, and I lived joyfully in Indra's sacred abode with the children of the Gandharvas. Sakra was pleased, as were the Devas. One day he said to me, "O Arjuna, your brothers pine for you; the time has come for you to leave."

O king, this is how I spent my five years in Devaloka, thinking all the while of the troubles that we now endure because of the gambling. Here I am now, come to the foothills of the Gandhamadana and united again with my brothers.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Dhananjaya, we are fortunate that you have acquired the astras and that you have worshipped the king of the Devas. Parantapa, it bodes well that the Lord Sthanu and his Goddess appeared before you and that you gratified them in battle. You are fortunate to have met the Lokapalas. Partha, we are lucky to have prospered and that you have come back to us. Today I feel elated, as if Dhritarashtra's sons have already been quelled and the Earth, with all her cities, has already become ours.

Bhaarata, I am curious to see these Devastras with which you killed the Nivatakavachas.'

Arjuna says, 'Tomorrow morning, you will see all the divine weapons with which I slew the fierce Nivatakavachas.'

Having thus related all that transpired before his return, Dhananjaya passes the night with his brothers."

Vaisampayana continued, "When day breaks, Dharmaraja Yudhishtira rises and, together with his brothers, performs the dawn rituals, then says to Arjuna, the joy of his mother, 'Kaunteya, show me the weapons with which you slew the Danavas.'

Arjuna observes all the proper rites of purification and then displays the Devastras that the gods gave him. Dhananjaya has the Earth for his chariot, the mountain for its central pole, the base of the mountain for its axle and the clump of elephant-bamboo for its socket-pole. He is resplendent in his unearthly armour as he takes up the Gandiva and Devadatta, and invokes the astras, one by one.

As each weapon is set on the bow, the Earth trembles under the weight of Arjuna's feet; trees shudder; rivers and the immense ocean churn; rocks burst apart; the Sun stops shining; fires stop burning; Brahmanas stop reciting the Vedas; and the very air is hushed.

O Janamejaya, the creatures that live under the earth's crust rise to the surface and surround the Pandava, their faces contorted and their hands folded, quivering in fear. The astras scorch them and they pray to Arjuna to spare their lives. The Brahmarishis, the Siddhas and the Maharishis, indeed, all mobile beings arrive there. The foremost Devarishis, the Devas, the Yakshas, the Rakshasas and the Gandharvas; the Garutmats and other beings of the air also appear. The Pitamaha, the Lokapalas and the divine Mahadeva come with their retinues. Then, O great king, Vayu, the Wind God, comes bearing unearthly flowers and strews them over the Pandava. The Gandharvas sing and Apsaras dance.

Then, Narada arrives and addresses Partha in gentle words, saying, 'O Arjuna, do not loose the Devastras. They should never be released without a proper target; and even when there is one, they should not be used unless every other weapon has failed you. O son of the Kurus, to discharge these astras without legitimate cause is fraught with great evil. Dhananjaya, keeping these weapons as you have been instructed will add to your strength and happiness; but if they are not properly revered, they will become the instruments of the destruction of the three worlds. So, Pandava, never do this again. Yudhishtira, you will see these astras when Partha uses them in battle to raze his adversaries.'

Having stopped Partha from what he was about to do, the immortals and the others who came there go their separate ways. The Pandavas and Krishnaa continue to live in that same forest, in joy and contentment."

AJAGARA PARVA

Janamejaya said, "When that best among Kshatriyas returned from Indraloka, after having mastered the Devastras, how did the sons of Pritha spend their time?"

Vaisampayana said, "Peerless among men and equal to Indra, those Kshatriyas enjoy the pleasure gardens of the lord of treasures, spread over the woods on that incomparable mountain. Kiriti, best among men, wanders through charming glades, full of trees of all kinds, but with his bow in hand and his mind always on the war ahead.

With Vaisravana's generosity and favour, the princes live in that beautiful place, their minds detached from material pleasures. Rather, they enjoy the simple peace of their lives. Having Arjuna back with them makes the time pass quickly; four years seem like one night. For the Pandavas, ten years—these four years and the previous six—drift smoothly by.

One day, at the end of ten years of exile, the impetuous Bhima, son of Vayu, sits with Jishnu and the godlike twins before Yudhishtira, and in pleasing, earnest words says to him, 'It is only to keep your word that we do not leave the forest to kill Suyodhana and his followers. He has deprived us of our happiness.

This is the eleventh year of our exile in the wilderness; it will be easy to go undiscovered by that evil man. Led by you, we have wandered through these jungles, giving no thought to our condition, and free from anxiety. Suyodhana will not believe that we have left this place for a distant land.

Once we have lived there for a year, we can avenge ourselves on that evil one and his followers. We will easily kill that most malignant of men, and reclaim our kingdom.

O Dharmaraja, you must now return to the world below. If we stay on in this heavenly place, we will forget our sorrows, and your fame will wither away like a wilting flower's fragrance and disappear. By gaining the kingdom of the Kuru sires, you will attain glory and perform many yagnas. What Kubera has given you here you can have on your own, Purushottama, and at any time.

Now, O Bhaarata, it is time to concentrate on punishing the enemies who wronged us grossly. Rajan, the wielder of the thunderbolt himself cannot withstand your power. Arjuna has only universal welfare at heart. He has Krishna, whose emblem is Suparna, for his friend, and Sini's grandson Satyaki as well. Arjuna feels no pain, ever, not even in battle against the Devas. He has no equal in strength, and neither do I.

O Yudhishtira, I am as devoted to your good as Krishna and the Yadavas. And the heroic twins are masters of war. When we meet the enemy, we will extinguish him and ensure your return to wealth and prosperity.'

When he hears the course of action they prefer, the bountiful and peerless son of Dharma, who knows all about dharma and artha, whose prowess is limitless, walks around Vaisravana in reverent pradakshina. Dharmaraja Yudhishtira bids farewell to the palaces, rivers, lakes and all the Rakshasas; and he faces the path they took to come here.

Yudhishtira Mahatman looks at the supreme mountain and says, 'O lord of mountains, grant that I, together with my friends, see you again after I have killed my enemies and regained my kingdom; grant that I perform tapasya here with my senses controlled.'

With his brothers and the Brahmanas, the king of the Kurus will return by the same path that brought them to the holy mountain; and Ghatotkacha and his companions will carry them over the mountain's cascades. As they are about to begin their journey, Rishi Lomasa advises them, as a father would his sons, and he departs for Devaloka. Arshtisena, too, gives them wise counsel, and the sons of Pritha begin their journey, and they see many sacred tirthas, asramas and great lakes on the way."

Vaisampayana said, "When they leave their home in the mountain of a thousand waterfalls, and birds, and eight-legged elephants, and Kubera's supernatural attendants, sadness goes with those best of the Bhaaratas. When they have gone some distance, they see Kubera's favourite mountain, Kailasa, like a great white cloud in the sky; and their hearts surge with elation.

Armed with swords and bows, they continue on their way, and they see hills and narrow gorges, dens of lions and craggy pathways, more waterfalls and the plains below. They see other great forests where deer, birds and elephants throng in great numbers. They come upon blithe woods, turquoise rivers, lakes and mountain caverns, which often become their home during the day as well as at night.

After living in all kinds of inhospitable places and crossing Kailasa of the untold majesty, they reach the asrama of Rajarishi Vrishaparva. He receives them warmly and, shedding their fatigue, they tell him the story of their sojourn in the mountains. They stay only one night in this sacred hermitage, which Maharishis and Devas visit, then travel on to the great badari tree Visala.

Here, at Badarikasrama where Narayana dwells, they remain happily for a time, within sight of Kubera's lake that Devas and Siddhas frequent. Just as blemishless Brahmana Rishis attain bliss on reaching the gardens of Nandana, so do the Pandavas shed all grief when they see that lake. The Kshatriyas spend a happy month in Badari, and then resume their journey towards the dominions of Subahu, king of the Kiratas, still treading the path by which they came. They have to cross the difficult terrain of the Himalayas, the countries of Pina, Tushara, Darada, pass through all the provinces of Kulinda, rich in treasures, before they reach Subahu's capital.

Subahu is excited when he hears of their arrival and comes out to meet them. Yudhishtira greets him, and here the Pandavas are joined by all their charioteers led by Visaka, their attendants, Indrasena and the others, their personal servitors and kitchen servants. The company breaks journey here for a night.

Then, giving Ghatotkacha and his followers leave to go, they take their chariots and sarathys and head towards the king of mountains, near the Yamuna River. The range of Himavan abounds in waterfalls, silvery against grey slopes and snow-covered summits. The Pandavas find their way to the great forest of Visakhayupa, which is like the forest of Chitraratha. Here, where wild boars and a variety of deer and birds live, they decide to make their home.

Hunting for their food, the sons of Pritha peacefully live in this forest for one year.

In a cavern of the mountain, Vrikodara's heart fills with grief and he panics, when he comes upon a massive, fierce-looking snake, obviously starving and looking like death itself. Yudhishtira, most virtuous of men, of boundless strength, frees Bhima from the coils of the mighty serpent that holds him fast, when he goes near it.

And so the twelfth year of their sojourn in the forests begins. The scions of the Kuru, blazing in splendour, engaging in the most rigid tapasya, devoted to their daily practice of archery, leave that forest—that is like the Chaitra—and go to the edges of the desert, and from there to the river Saraswati, on whose banks they want to live awhile.

From the Saraswati, they go to the lake in the Dwaita vana. The inhabitants of the Dwaita vana are all ascetics of various religious orders, who practise self-restraint, sitting in deep dhyana and, being toothless, subsist on food ground with stone. On the arrival of the Pandavas, these sadhus bring grass mats and water-pots, and come forward to greet them.

On the banks of nearby golden Saraswati grow myriad trees—the holy pipal, the rudraksha, the rohitaka, the plaksha, the badari, the khadira, the sirisha, the bilva, the inguda, the karira, the pilu and the sami. Wandering contentedly about in the vicinity of the Saraswati, a home of the Devas and the favourite resort of Yakshas, Gandharvas and Maharishis, the princes are at some peace."

Janamejaya said, "How is it, wise one, that Bhima of the mighty prowess, who was strong as ten thousand elephants, was stricken with panic at the sight of that snake? You have described how he was horrified and alarmed, this man who slew hundreds of Yakshas and Rakshasas by the lotus-filled lakes of Kubera's forests, and who, in arrogant defiance, dared Kubera to fight him? I am curious and want to hear about this."

Vaisampayana said, "Rajan, in Vrishaparva's hermitage, those fearful warriors live amidst enchanting glades. Roaming about carefree, bow and sword in hand, Vrikodara comes upon an emerald forest, frequented by Devas and Gandharvas. He sees secret places upon the Himalaya, frequented by Devarishis and Siddhas, and inhabited by Apsaras.

These echo with the sweet warbling of birds—the chakora, the chakravaka, the jivajivaka, the kokila and the bhringaraja—and are lush with shady trees clothed in snow-soft leaves, which bear perennial fruits and flowers. He sees mountain streams whose waters glisten like lapis lazuli, with ten thousand perfectly white ducks and swans upon them, and surrounded by forests of deodar trees that seem to form a net to trap the clouds. He sees other trees—tunga and kaliyaka, interspersed with yellow sandalwood trees. Measurelessly strong, he ranges these uninhabited forests in pursuit of game, shooting animals with purified arrows.

Mighty Bhimasena, strong as a hundred elephants, kills huge wild boar with his bare hands. Blessed with dreadful strength, like some lion or tiger, he who can fight a hundred at once kills antelope and boar and bison and many elephants whose strength is as his own. He uproots trees and breaks them, filling the forests with noise. Ever youthful, proud and fearless, Bhimasena happily rampages through the woods, bellowing his war-cry, striking his arms and clapping his hands. Fierce lions and great tuskers flee in terror at the sound of this boldest of men fearlessly prowling their home in search of game. He penetrates into the depths of the vast forest and terrifies all the animals with his shouts.

Snakes slither into caves for shelter. The godlike Bhimasena sees an enormous Naga coiled in a cave, its gigantic body filling it entirely, so big that it makes one's hair stand on end. Its colossal body is like a yellow and speckled hill; its cave-like mouth is red and has four fangs; its eyes bulge and its forked tongue darts in and out, licking the corners of its mouth. Looking like Yama, it strikes terror into all living creatures, as it hisses at any intruder.

Seeing him approach, in a flash the infuriated snake seizes Bhimasena in its coils. This serpent has a boon, which makes Bhimasena lose consciousness in its clasp. Although Bhima is supremely strong, the Naga overpowers him and he trembles feebly in its gargantuan coils. His shoulders are like a lion's, his strength is that of ten thousand elephants, but Mahabaho Bhima is overpowered by the snake with the boon and, seized by it, all his strength drains from him. He struggles desperately to extricate himself, but cannot."

Vaisampayana continued, "Bhima says to the prodigious snake, 'O Naga, tell me who you are. O foremost of reptiles, what are you going to do with me? I am Bhima, the son of Pandu, and next by birth to Dharmaraja Yudhishtira. I am as strong as ten thousand elephants; how have you overpowered me? I have killed innumerable lions, tigers, bison and elephants; mighty Rakshasas, Pisachas and Nagas cannot withstand the force of my arms. Do you have magical powers, or have you been given a boon, that although I put forth all my strength, you still hold me helpless? Ah, the strength of men is nothing, for, O serpent, you have proved it so.'

When Bhima says this, the snake, which has coiled its body around him and has him at its mercy, releases just his arms and says, 'It is my lucky day that the gods offer you to me as food to appease my hunger after a very long time. Life is dear to all the living; so I will tell you how I came to have this snake's form. Hear, O strongest of men, how I fell into this plight from the wrath of the Maharishis. I want to be rid of the curse, so I will tell you all about it.

You must surely have heard of the Rajarishi Nahusha. He was the son of Ayu, and an ancestor of yours. I am that very man. And today I am a sarpa because Agastya Muni cursed me for, in my hubris, I once insulted the Brahmanas of heaven.

You are my descendant and a joy to see, and I ought not to kill you. Still, I will eat you today. You are fated to die. No creature that comes within my reach at this time of day, be it a bison or an elephant, escapes. It is no Naga that has taken you; I have this form only because of the Rishi's curse.

As I changed form and slid from Sakra's throne, on which I once sat, I said to the worshipful Agastya, "Free me from this curse!"

The compassionate Maharishi said to me, "O king, you will be free after a long time has passed."

I fell down to the Earth as a snake, but I did not lose the memory of my former life. This happened a very long time ago, indeed, but I remember everything that was said.

The Rishi said, "A man who has realised the relationship of his Atman to the Brahman, and who can correctly answer the questions you put to him, will deliver you from my curse. Taken by you, even creatures that are stronger than you will immediately lose their strength."

I heard these words of that kindly sage, who felt affection for me, and immediately, all the Brahmanas vanished.

Having become a serpent, I have lived in hell for an age, waiting for the time of my release to come.'

Bhimasena says to the snake, 'I am not angry, mighty Sarpa, nor do I blame myself. Men are not always in control of their own lives; at times, they have the power to bring about joy or sorrow, and at others, not. There is no point fretting over this. Who can divert destiny, even by the greatest effort? Karma is supreme, and effort is useless. Struck by fate, I lost the might of my arms today.

Look at me; for no apparent reason I have become helpless. However, I am not as sorry for myself that I will die as for my brothers who have been deprived of their kingdom and exiled into the forest.

The Himalaya is inaccessible and crawls with Yakshas and Rakshasas. My brothers will be distracted from their purpose by their search for me. If they know that I am dead, they will give up all their efforts, for, although they are determined, in my desire to regain our kingdom, it is I who keep their resolve alive by my insistent urging.

It may be that Arjuna alone will not grieve for me, because he is intelligent, a great master of astras and cannot be vanquished by Devas, Rakshasas or Gandharvas. By himself, that Mahabaho can defeat even a Deva in battle.

What can I say of the deceitful gambler, the haughty and foolish son of Dhritarashtra, the most detested of all men? I grieve for my poor mother, who loves her sons, who is always eager that we should rise above our enemies in fame. O Naga, all the hope that my sorrowing mother vested in me will be dashed if you devour me.

My twin brothers, the manly Nakula and Sahadeva, follow me, their elder brother, and rely on the strength of my arms for their protection. If I die, they will be grief-stricken and lose their will to fight. This is what I think.'

Such is Vrikodara's heartfelt lament; caught in the coils of Nahusha the snake, all his strength is sapped from his body.

In the meanwhile, Yudhishtira sees sinister omens and is alarmed. The cardinal points blaze, weird jackals come to the hermitage and howl. Horribly deformed vartikas, with one wing, one eye and one leg, face the Sun and vomit blood. Dry winds blow and whip up stony eddies.

In the east, all the beasts and birds begin to cry out; behind him black crows caw, Go! Go! Yudhishtira's right arm, his chest and left leg twitch. His left eye tics in spasms, auguring some great evil.

O Bhaarata, sensing some calamity, Yudhishtira asks Draupadi where Bhima is. She replies that he has been gone for some time. Dharmaraja tells Arjuna to watch over Draupadi, he tells Nakula and Sahadeva to protect the Brahmanas, and sets out with Dhaumya. They leave the asrama and, following Bhima's wild, brash trail, look for him in the dense forest.

Going east, they come across the dead bodies of bull-elephants, leaders of their herds, and see Bhima's footprints on the ground. They see the carcasses of thousands of deer and hundreds of lions, and they know they are on Bhima's trail. They see trees uprooted by him on his heedless way in pursuit of deer.

The trail leads them to a desolate spot. Dry winds blow; the plants are all leafless and thorny; the air is salty; there is no water anywhere; stones, tree-stumps and scrub cover the rough, uneven ground; and a sharp sense of danger invades them. And here, in a mountain cave, Yudhishtira sees his younger brother, held fast by that most powerful of snakes."

Vaisampayana continued, “Yudhishtira finds his beloved Bhima in the coils of the serpent and says, ‘O Son of Kunti, how did this happen? Who is this remarkable Naga, whose body is like a mountain?’

Bhimasena says, ‘My brother, this mighty serpent has caught me for his food. He is the Rajarishi Nahusha cursed to be a Naga.’

Yudhishtira says to the snake, ‘Chiranjeevi, long-lived, free my brother of the immeasurable strength. We will give you some other food to satisfy your hunger.’

The serpent says, ‘This prince came to me of his own accord and provided me with my meal. Go away. You should not stay for, if you do, you will be my meal tomorrow. Mahabaho, this has been ordained—he who comes to where I live becomes my food. You are in my dwelling. I have waited a long time for the meal that is your younger brother. I will not let him go, and I do not fancy any other food.’

Yudhishtira responds, ‘O Sarpa, tell me truly who you are—a Deva, an Asura, an Uraga? I, Yudhishtira, ask this. Why have you taken Bhimasena? What object or knowledge will satisfy you? And what food shall I get you, O Snake? How can I secure my brother’s release?’

The serpent says, ‘O sinless, I am king Nahusha, your ancestor and the son of Ayu, in the fifth generation of descent from Soma, the Moon. By virtue of my tapasya, my yagnas, my spiritual discipline and steadfastness, I earned dominion over the three worlds. But with this authority came arrogance.

I engaged thousands of Brahmanas as my throne-bearers and, intoxicated by power, I insulted them by kicking them with my feet and crying sarpa, sarpa! Hurry, hurry! When my foot touched him, Agastya Muni cursed me, You be a sarpa! and I fell down to the Earth in this form in which you find me.

Even now, I cannot forget my past life. This evening, Agastya's goodwill brought your brother to me for my meal. I have no wish to set him free, and I do not want to eat anything else. However, if you answer my questions, I will let Vrikodara go.'

Yudhishtira says, 'O Serpent, ask whatever you like. I will try to please you with my answers. You have the knowledge of the truly learned. Therefore, Nagaraja, king of snakes, ask and I will answer.'

The serpent says, 'O Yudhishtira, tell me, who is a Brahmana and what knowledge should he have? You speak so eloquently and I can tell that you are highly intelligent. Tell me, who is a Brahmana and what is the final object of all knowledge?'

Yudhishtira says, 'Foremost of serpents, the wise say that he in whom we see truth, charity, forgiveness, good conduct, benevolence, observance of his svadharma and mercy is a Brahmana. The object of knowledge is the Supreme Brahman, the state devoid of joy and sorrow, attaining which frees man from misery.'

The Naga says, 'Yudhishtira, even in a Sudra we find truth, charity, forgiveness, good conduct, benevolence, devoutness, kindness and knowledge of the Veda that regulates the four varnas and provides guidance in religious matters. As for what ought to be known, which you say is a state of no pain or pleasure, it does not exist.'

Yudhishtira says, 'The Sudra who has these qualities is not a Sudra, and the Brahmana who lacks these is not a Brahmana. Sudras and Brahmanas are not classified by birth alone. The wise say that anyone who has these qualities is a Brahmana, and one who does not is a Sudra, even if he is born a Brahmana. Your assertion that all things that exist must feel either misery or happiness, because without both there is nothing, is erroneous. This is only how it seems. Think of this—cold is the absence of heat; and heat is the absence of cold. Therefore, can there not be a state in which both are absent, and a similar state for joy and grief?'

The serpent says, ‘O king, if a man is recognised as a Brahmana because he possesses these characteristics, caste distinctions become relevant only in relation to these qualities.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘Mighty and most intelligent serpent, in human society it is difficult to ascertain a person’s caste because of promiscuousness among the four varnas. This is my opinion. Men of all castes have children by women of all castes. Four aspects of life that all people have in common are language, sexual intercourse, birth and death. Even Rishis have testified to the difficulty of distinguishing caste, by using this sentence at beginning of every sacrifice—‘Whatever caste you may belong to, we celebrate this sacrifice.’ The learned have asserted that character is the only essential requisite for caste distinctions.

The birth ceremony of a male child is performed before the cutting of the umbilical cord. The mother acts as Savitri and the father officiates as priest. The child is considered a Sudra until he is initiated in the Vedas. Because of doubts that have arisen on this point, O prince of serpents, Swayambhuva Manu declared that the mixed castes are better than the upper castes that do not live according to dharma even after undergoing the rituals of purification. Any man who lives by the laws of dharma, I have always considered a Brahmana.’

The serpent replies, ‘O Yudhishtira, you do indeed know what needs to be known and, after having heard you speak, how can I eat your brother Vrikodara?’ ”

"Yudhishtira says, 'In this world, you are most learned in the Vedas and Vedangas; tell me what one should do to attain moksha.'

The serpent replies, 'O scion of the Bhaaratas, I believe that the man who gives alms to deserving people, the man that speaks kindly, the man that tells the truth and the man that abstains from doing injury to any creature attains salvation.'

Yudhishtira asks, 'Which, O Naga, is the higher of the two—truth or charity? Tell me also, which is more important—kindness or the avoidance of doing harm.'

The snake replies, 'The relative merits of the qualities of truth and benevolence, kind words and abstention from harmful behaviour are measured by their results. Truth is sometimes more praiseworthy than some acts of charity; some daana is more laudable than speaking the truth. Similarly, abstaining from causing injury can be more, or less, important than kind speech. It all depends on the effect your actions have.

Ask me anything more you want, and I will clear your doubts.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, O Naga, how to understand the soul's transition to Swarga, about its enjoyment of the rewards it has gained and how it perceives through the senses.'

The snake replies, 'By dint of his own karma, a soul takes birth in one of three conditions—as an animal, as a human, or as a heavenly being. Man leaves his human life and attains Swarga by being diligent and hardworking, by not harming any creature, by being charitable and virtuous. Through the opposite conduct, Rajan, people are reborn as baser humans or as animals. This is particularly true of one who is ruled by anger, lust, greed and malice. This person leaves his human life and is reborn as an animal. Animals can be transformed into the human state, too. The cow, the horse and other beasts have been seen to attain even the divine condition.

My son, living beings transmigrate from one state to the other because of their actions, but the wise man's soul rests permanently in the indestructible Brahman. The embodied spirit, bound by destiny, and reaping the fruits of its karma, undergoes birth after birth; but he that is distanced from his own actions is conscious of the destiny of all beings.'

Yudhishtira asks, 'O Snake, tell me truly and clearly how the spirit that is detached from the body recognises sound, touch, shape, smell and taste. Does one perceive sensations simultaneously? Best of snakes, answer my questions.'

The snake replies, 'The spirit, called Atman, taking existence within a physical body and, manifesting itself in the sense organs, enjoys the perceptions of all objects. Bharatarishabha, the senses, the mind and the intellect, which help the Atman in perception, are called karanas. The eternal spirit leaves its proper place and, assisted by the mind and acting through the senses, perceives all objects with sensory properties. The mind of living creatures is the cause of all perception and, therefore, it cannot recognise more than one thing at a time. This spirit, which resides in the space between the eyebrows, directs the high and low intellect to different objects. The knowledge that Yogis gain from constant use of the higher intellect causes them to finally perceive the Atman.

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me the distinguishing characteristics of the mind and the intellect. Gaining this knowledge is the chief aim of those who meditate on Brahman, the Supreme Spirit.'

The snake replies, 'Through improper understanding, the Soul becomes subservient to the intellect, which, though inferior to the Soul, directs and controls it. The intellect is moved by perception, but the Soul is independent and exists by itself. The intellect does not cause sensation, such as pain or pleasure, the mind does. This, my son, is the difference between the mind and the intellect. You, too, are learned in this; what is your opinion?'

Yudhishtira says, 'Most intelligent one, you have a superior intellect and know all there is to be known. Why do you ask me this question? You are all-knowing; you have performed wonderful deeds; and you have lived in Swarga. How could illusion overpower you? I wonder greatly at this.'

The snake replies, 'Prosperity intoxicates even wise and valiant men. Those who indulge in luxurious lives lose their intellect. I, too, Yudhishtira, was drunk and infatuated with prosperity, and fell from my height.

Having recovered my reason, I speak to you in this manner. O Victorious, you have done me a favour. Conversing with one as virtuous as you has lifted my painful curse.

In the days of old, when I used to live in heaven and ride in a celestial chariot, I was swollen with pride and, unthinkingly, I would accept tribute from Brahmarishis, Devas, Yakshas, Gandharvas, Rakshasas, Pannagas and all who lived in the three worlds. Lord of Earth, such was the spell of my eyes that I instantly destroyed the power of any creature on which I fixed them.

I had thousands of Brahmarishis draw my carriage, and this sin caused my fall. One day Agastya Muni was drawing my carriage when my feet touched his body. He cursed me in anger, saying, "You will be ruined. You will become a snake."

At once, I lost my glory and fell from the chariot, watching myself turn into a snake as I fell. I implored the Brahmana, "I beg you, remove this curse, O divine one. Forgive my foolishness."

Moved by pity as he watched me hurtling down from heaven, he said, "The virtuous king Yudhishtira will release you from my curse. O Nahusha, when you rid yourself of the sin of pride, you will attain redemption."

I was wonderstruck to see the power of his tapasya. That is why I have asked you these questions about the Brahman and Brahmanas, about truth and charity, about self-restraint and penance, about not doing injury to any creature and adhering to dharma. Rajan, it is these qualities, and not the race or family into which he is born, by which a man may attain mukti. May your brother, the mighty Bhimasena, enjoy good fortune; may you be happy, O Dharmaraja. I must leave you now and return to Swarga.'

With these words, king Nahusha sheds his serpentine form and, assuming his celestial one, ascends into heaven. Dharmatma Yudhishtira returns to his asrama with Dhaumya and Bhima, and there he narrates all that has transpired to the Brahmanas, his brothers and Draupadi. They are ashamed when they hear how Bhima behaved. The Brahmanas, with the welfare of the Pandavas in mind, admonish Bhima for his foolhardiness and tell him never to be so rash.

The Pandavas are elated that Bhima has been saved from danger, and they continue to live there happily.”

MARKANDEYA SAMASYA PARVA

Vaisampayana said, "While they live in that place, the monsoon sets in. It cools the air, bringing delight to all the living. Dark clouds rumble and cover the skies entirely, forming an opaque cupola; they pour down rain day and night. The light of the Sun is replaced by the stainless lustre of lightning. The Earth turns fecund and mellow—lush grass grows, insects multiply and abound joyfully, and the world is washed clean and spread over with serenity. Water covers the ground, so that the tallest trees and entire hills are submerged and indistinguishable.

At summer's end, swollen rivers augment the beauty of the forest, looking like snakes as they hiss and turn along their courses. Boars, stags and birds are drenched in the rain and chortle in delight, from within the vana. Chatakas, peacocks, kokilas and frogs are all athrob with excitement.

The Pandavas enjoy the monsoon, in its seething richness, and the sound of thunder above and the lashing rain below, while they live on the higher reaches of the mountain.

Autumn sets in—its floor coverd over with thick new grass, the forest teems with swans, ducks, geese and cranes; rivers flow lucid again and the stars shine brightly in the sky. This is a blissful season for the sons of Pandu, crowded as it is with bright and feral birds and beasts. They revel in the clear night air, cooled by clouds, and the sky adorned by glowing planets, stars and the radiant moon. They see cool rivers and ponds ornamented with lilies and white lotuses.

They roam the river Saraswati's majestic banks, thick with bamboo, and dotted with sacral pools; and great is their exhilaration. Those Kshatriyas are especially glad to gaze at the golden Saraswati, brimming with limpid water, and they spend the holy night of Karthika Poornima beside her. The sons of Pandu spend that auspicious day with pure and benevolent Rishis devoted to tapasya and, as soon as the dark fortnight sets in immediately after, they enter the Kamyaka vana, with their charioteers, cooks and the rest of their entourage."

Vaisampayana said, "O Scion of Kuru, on arriving at the Kamyaka vana, the Rishi of that jungle warmly receives them, and there they live with Krishnaa. While the Pandavas dwell in safety here, many Brahmanas come to visit them.

One of them says, 'Arjuna's beloved friend, Krishna of the lofty intellect, mighty arms and perfect self-control, the Saurin, will come to this asrama. Hari knows that you have arrived here; he always wishes for your welfare and longs to see you. Markandeya, who has lived many ages, who is devoted to profound study and tapasya, will also come to you.'

No sooner are the words spoken than they see Krishna coming towards them in a chariot yoked with the horses Saibya and Sugriva. With Satyabhama beside him, Devaki's dark blue son is like Indra with Pulaman's daughter Sachi, as he comes to visit the Pandavas of dharma.

The omniscient Krishna alights from his ratha and prostrates before Yudhishtira, and then before Bhimasena. He pays his respects to Dhaumya, and the twins prostrate before him. He embraces Arjuna of the curly hair; and speaks comfortingly to Drupada's daughter. Again and again does Krishna, son of the Dasarhas, the slayer of his foes, clasp Arjuna in his arms; it is so long since he has seen his precious friend. Satyabhama embraces Draupadi. The sons of Pandu, with their wife and priests, worship

Krishna, of the eyes like the white lotus, and crowd around him in adoration.

Krishna glows at being re-united with Pritha's son Arjuna, Dhananjaya the winner of wealth; the terror of Asuras acquires the radiant beauty of Siva, the magnanimous Lord of all creatures, when Mahadeva is united with his son Kartikeya. Arjuna Kiriti tells Krishna all that has transpired in the jungle, and asks after Subhadra and Abhimanyu. After he pays due reverence to Yudhishtira and the Brahmanas, Krishna sits down and praises Yudhishtira.

He says, 'O King, dharma is superior to conquering kingdoms, because it is acquired through tapasya. By your adherence to the truth, and with your honesty, you have conquered this world and the next. Through study and faultlessly performing your svadharma, you have mastered the Astra Shastra. You have gained wealth in accordance to the dictates of Kshatriya dharma, and correctly performed the ancient yagnas. You are not addicted to sensual pleasures, nor do you act, Purushottama, from selfish motives. You do not swerve from the path of dharma out of greed for wealth. You are aptly called Dharmaraja, the righteous king.

Even though you have won wealth and kingdoms, you find your greatest joy in charity, truth, penance, forbearance, meditation and patience. When Krishnaa was humiliated in the Kuru sabha, in a shocking and shameful manner, who but you could have silently borne it? You will soon rule justly over men, and all your desires will be fulfilled. We are here and ready to punish the Kurus, as soon as your obligation to them is completed.'

Krishna says to Dhaumya, Bhima, Yudhishtira, the twins and Krishnaa, 'You are all blessed with good fortune to have Arjuna Kiriti, the crowned, back with you after he has mastered the Astra Shastra in Devaloka.'

Krishna now turns to Yagnaseni, 'How fortunate that you are united again with Dhananjaya! Krishnaa, you have the most excellent sons. They are diligent sishyas; they are well-behaved and emulate the conduct of their virtuous friends. Although your father and brothers offered them their kingdom to tempt them to stay with them there, they declined and preferred, instead, to live with us in Anarta, where, in the city of the Vrishnis, they study the Astra Shastra and live happily amongst our people. Subhadra guides them in the same way that you or Kunti would, perhaps with even more love and care.

Rukmini's son Pradyumna, master to Aniruddha, Abhimanyu, Sunitha and Bhanu, is your sons' guru as well. As a good preceptor would, he gives these valiant young lions lessons in the use of maces and swords, in astras, in charioteering and riding horses. Pradyumna is delighted that his training manifests itself in the brave deeds that your sons and Abhimanyu perform. And when your sons go forth in pursuit of sport, chariots, horses and elephants form their retinue.'

Krishna says to Yudhishtira, 'The fighting men of the Dasarha clan, the Kukuras and the Andhakas are at your command, to do whatever you wish. Lord of men, the army of the Madhus, whose bows are as powerful as the wind, led by Balarama, whose weapon is the halayudha, the plough, is eminently prepared for battle. O Pandava, its cavalry and infantry, horses, chariots and elephants are ready to do your bidding. Drive Dhritarashtra's son Duryodhana, the vilest of sinful men, his followers and friends down to the path of the lord Yama, son of the Earth. You, Rajan, can keep the vow you swore in the sabha, but let the city be prepared for your triumphant return when the Dasarha forces have razed your enemies.

Live wherever you please, visit all the places you want to see, be rid of your grief and wash away your sins; you will go to Hastinapura, and rule from there.'

The noble king listens attentively to Krishna and, after some deliberation, folds his hands in reverence and says 'O Kesava, you are the refuge of the sons of Pandu; in you we have our protector. When the time comes, I am certain that you will do as you have said, and even more. We have spent twelve desolate years in the forest, without breaking our oath. We have yet to complete the thirteenth year, of ajnatavasa, and now we place ourselves under your protection, as is right for those who are your friends.

The sons of Pandu and Pritha do not swerve from the path of dharma. We are charitable and pious, and we lay ourselves and our people, our wives and our friends at your feet.'

Bhaarata, while Krishna of the Vrishnis and the pure-hearted Yudhishtira talk, the venerable Rishi Markandeya arrives in their midst. He is many thousands of years old, and has spent his life in the practice of dharma and tapasya. His age is not visible on him and he is immortal. He radiates the beauty of grace, goodness and benevolence, which make him look like a young man of some twenty-five years. When the aged, ageless Markandeya, who has seen thousands of yugas, arrives, all the Brahmanas pay him deep homage, as do Krishna and Pandu's sons.

Having been duly honoured, the Muni sits down, and Krishna says to him, 'The sons of Pandu, these Brahmanas, Draupadi, Satyabhama and I are all anxious to listen to you speak, O Markandeya! Tell us the holy stories of ancient times and the abiding laws of dharma which guide kings, women and sages.'

When they had all taken their seats, Devarishi Narada arrives there. The noble Kshatriyas receive him, washing his feet and offering him arghya. The godlike Narada realises that Markandeya is about to speak and shows his eagerness to do the same.

Immortal Krishna, who knows when the time is ripe for all things, says, 'O Brahmarishi, tell us what you were about to say to the Pandavas.'

Markandeya replies, 'Be patient and I will tell you many things.'

And Pandu's sons and the Dvijas wait silently, watching the Rishi who is as bright as the Sun at noon."

Vaisampayana continued, "Pandu's eldest son realises that the great Markandeya is willing to speak, and begins to put questions to him.

Yudhishtira says, 'You, who are venerable in age, know of the legendary deeds of Devas and Asuras, those of exalted sages and kings. You are worthy of worship, and long have we yearned to see you. We also have with us Devakinandana Krishna. I look at myself, bereft of happiness from no fault of mine; I think of Dhritarashtra's evil sons revelling in my misery; and it strikes me that man is the doer of all things, good or bad, and it is man who reaps the fruit of his actions. I wonder, then, how God becomes an agent.

Brahmanasreshta, how does a man's karma affect him? Is it in this world, or in some future existence? O Dvijottama, how is man connected to his good and evil actions? Is it after death, or in this life? Is what we experience in this lifetime the result of our deeds of this same life? Or will the acts of this life bear fruit in lifetimes to come? Where do the actions of one who is dead find their resting place?'

Markandeya answers, 'Purushottama, this is a worthy question. You know all there is to know; and you ask me this question for the sake of edifying some others who are here. Listen attentively and I will explain how a man experiences pleasure and pain in this lifetime and in those to come.

Prajapati, the Lord of all created beings, first created himself, and then, for all embodied beings, created bodies which were blemishless and virtuous. The men of ancient times had all their desires fulfilled, were given to noble deeds, and were truthful, godly and pure. All were equal to the Devas; they could rise to the heavens and come down again, and go wherever they wanted to, at their pleasure.

They had control over life and death; they had but few sufferings and no fear; their wishes were always fulfilled and they lived trouble-free lives. They could visit the Devas and the Rishis; they were versed in all the religious rites and laws; they were self-disciplined and free from envy. They lived many thousand years and had many thousand sons.

In time, they were restricted to walking only on the surface of the Earth and, overpowered by lust and anger, began to employ lies and deceit to garner what they desired. Greed, envy and ignorance overwhelmed them. Because of their evil deeds, when these men died they went to Naraka, to hell. Again and again, they suffered birth and lived miserable lives in this world.

Their desires remained unfulfilled, their aims unaccomplished, and their knowledge was useless to them. Their minds were clouded by tamas; they were full of fear; and they became the instruments of suffering. Their lives were a series of evil deeds; they were born into despicable families; their minds and bodies were diseased and in a constant state of terror. They did not live long and, during their short lives, paid the price for their sins. They coveted all they saw; and they became Godless and cynical, Kaunteya.

The fate of every being after death is determined by what he does in this world. You have asked me where the repository of the karma of the wise and ignorant is, and where they enjoy the fruit of their good and evil deeds. Listen to the laws that govern this matter.

Man accumulates a great store of good and evil karma in his subtle body, his sukshma sarira created by God. When he dies he leaves his sthula sarira, his gross flesh, and is immediately born again into another order of beings. He is never without a body, not for a single moment. Into this new life, his karma follows him like a shadow, inexorably, making him happy or miserable.

The wise man with spiritual insight knows that all beings are tied by the Destroyer to an unchangeable destiny and that they cannot escape the consequences of their good or evil karma. This, O Yudhishtira, is the fate of all creatures that are steeped in spiritual ignorance.

I will tell you now of the perfection attained by men of spiritual awareness. Such men have great tapasyashakti; they know about all things sacred and are deeply liberal. They are unswerving in their religious duties and devoted to the truth. They honour their Gurus and elders with reverence; they practice yoga; they are forgiving, have their passions and minds under firm control, and are men of extraordinary lustre, piety and energy. In short, they are endowed with all the virtues. They have conquered their passions and subdued their minds; by practising yoga they are freed from disease, fear and sorrow; and their hearts are at peace.

While they are being born, be it premature or in full term, and while they are still in the womb, they see, with the inner spiritual eye, the relationship of the soul to Brahman, the Supreme Spirit. Those high-minded Rishis who were gifted with intuitive knowledge passed through the world of men and returned to Devaloka, home of the gods. O King, it is by destiny or by their actions that men attain joy or sorrow. Do not think otherwise. Yudhishtira, I consider this the highest truth.

Some attain happiness in this world, but not in the next; others do so in the next, but not in this one. Some attain happiness in this as well as in the next world, and others neither here nor in the next world. Those that have vast wealth glitter in their rich ornaments. O slayer of mighty enemies, these are addicted to pleasures of the flesh; they enjoy happiness only in this world but not in the next.

Those who meditate and study the Vedas, who are firm in their asceticism, who use all their energies in the performance of their duties, who have their senses under perfect control, who refrain from killing animals, those men, O Parantapa, attain bliss in the next world but not in this one!

Those who first live a chaste life, then virtuously acquire wealth in due time, and then marry and perform sacrifices find felicity both in this and the next world. However, foolish men who do not acquire gyana, who do not practice dhyana or daana, who do not marry and have children and who do not enjoy the joys this world has to offer, do not attain joy either in this or the next world.

All of you have great knowledge, awesome prowess and celestial energy. You have come from the other world and taken birth in this one to fulfil the purpose of the gods, to exterminate evil. You, who are so valiant, who practice stern tapasya and exercises of self-control, who observe dharma, who are tireless, who have pleased the Devas, the Pitrs and the Maharishis by performing great deeds, will eventually attain rapture in Swarga by virtue of your own actions.

O jewel of the Kurus, do not let your sufferings create any doubt about this in your heart; your afflictions are for your own good.' "

Vaisampayana continued, "The Pandavas say to Markandeya Mahatman, 'We are eager to hear of the greatness of the Brahmanas. Tell us of it, O Mahamuni!'

Markandeya replies, 'A strong, handsome young prince of the Haihaya clan, a conqueror of hostile cities, once went hunting. While roaming in a wilderness of great trees and thickets of tall grass he saw, not far from him, a Muni wearing black antelope skin and, mistaking him for a deer, killed him. When he realised what he had done, he was paralysed with horror and grief. He went to the Haihaya elders and this lotus-eyed prince told them what had happened.

Child, when they heard his story and saw the body of the sage who had subsisted on fruit and roots, they were distraught. They all set out, enquiring everywhere they went, whose son the Muni might be. They reached the asrama of Arishtanemi, son of Kasyapa. They reverently greeted the great sage, who sat in resolute tapasya, and remained standing while he received them formally.

The Haihaya elders said to the illustrious Muni, "By a freak of fate, we are no longer worthy of your welcome, because we have killed a Brahmana!"

The illumined Rishi said to them, “How did you happen to kill a Brahmana? Tell me where he is, and you will see the power of my tapasya!”

The Haihayas related everything to him, exactly as it had occurred. They went back but did not find the body of the dead Rishi where they had left it. They scoured the place, without success, and, ashamed and dazed, returned to the Muni.

The son of Kasyapa said to them, “O Ksatriyas, could this be the Brahmana that you killed? This Brahmana, who has acquired great power from his tapasya, is my son.”

When they saw the Brahmana, they were astonished, and said, “This is incredible! How has one who was dead come to life again? Is it the power of his tapasya that has revived him? We are agog to hear this, O Rishi, if it can be explained.”

The Rishi replied, “Death has no power over us. I will explain why this is so. We perform our sacred dharma and so we have no fear of death; we speak well of Brahmanas and never think ill of them and so death holds no terror for us. We entertain our guests with food and drink, make sure our dependants eat well and we, finally, eat what is left. Therefore, we are not afraid of death. We lead strict and peaceful lives, we are charitable and tolerant, we visit holy shrines and live in sacred places; thus, we have no fear of death. We live amongst people of great spirituality and so death holds no dread for us. This is only a brief explanation. Now return to your home, without vanity and fear of sin.”

Saying Tathaastu, so be it, and saluting the great Muni, the princes returned to their country, Bhaaratottama.’ ”

"Markandeya continues, 'I will tell you more about the glory of the Brahmanas! The Rajarishi Vainya was once performing an Aswamedha yagna, when Atri decided to go to him for alms. However, later, Atri of shining tejas renounced his desire for wealth and wanted to live in the forest.

He called his wife and sons together and said to them, "We will attain perfect tranquillity and fulfilment if we live in the forest. I hope you will agree to live like that and earn spiritual merit."

His wife, a woman of dharma, said to him, "Go to Rajarishi Vainya and beg him for wealth. The royal sage is performing the Aswamedha yagna, and will give you what you ask. Once you have the wealth, you can distribute it amongst your sons and those who serve you and then go wherever you please. Men who are wise in matters of religion say that this is the highest dharma."

Atri replied, "Virtuous one, the exalted Gautama has told me that Vainya is a pious man, devoted to Truth, but there are Brahmanas in his asrama who are jealous of me. So I had better not go to Vainya. If, while I am there, I speak pious words that promote spiritual liberation, they will contradict me with arguments that have no substance or goodness. Yet, I see the wisdom of what you say, and I will go to Vainya; he will give me cattle and riches."

Atri of great punya went straight to Vainya's sacrifice and, reaching the yagnasala, he paid obeisance to the king, praised him with eulogies and said, "Blessings be upon you, O king! You are the best of the rulers of the Earth. Sages admire you; there is no one who knows as much about dharma as you."

Rishi Gautama, lustrous tapasvin, indignantly responded, "Atri, you seem to have lost your reason. In this world, Mahendra alone is the foremost of all sovereigns!"

Atri said to Gautama, "Just as Indra, the lord of all creatures, controls our destinies, so does this king! It is you whose mind has been clouded by ignorance."

Gautama replied, 'I know that I am right and that you are mistaken. You flatter the king in the presence of his courtiers only to please him. You have no idea what the highest dharma is, nor do you feel the need for it. Despite your great age you are like an ignorant child."

While these two were arguing before the Munis who were conducting the yagna, Vainya asked, "Why do they speak so fiercely?"

Kasyapa, irradiant in his piety and learned in all things religious, approached the disputants and asked them what the problem was. Gautama addressed that assembly of great Munis, "Listen, O Dvijottamas, to the point of dispute between us. Atri says that Vainya is the ruler of our destinies, and I doubt this greatly."

The sages went to Sanatkumara, who was a master of dharma, to clear their doubt. This sage, of fathomless spirit, heard about the dispute and, in words laden with significance, said to those sages, "The power of a Brahmana combined with that of a Kshatriya is as potent as the fire fanned by wind, which burns down forests; it can consume all enemies. Like Indra, the king is the giver of laws and the protector of his subjects; like Sukra, he establishes the code of dharma; like Brihaspati, he is a counsellor. Therefore, he is indeed the ruler of men's destinies.

Is there a man who thinks he is above worshipping Prajapati—Creator of all beings; or Virata—royal emperor; or Kshatriya—lord and protector of the Earth, ruler of men?

Because he is the law-giver the king is the guardian of the order of the varnas. He is the upholder of honour in battle and the keeper of peace; he is the ever-vigilant, the contented, the sovereign, the guide to spiritual bliss, the easily victorious, Vishnu-like, and of effective anger. He is the winner of wars and the embodiment of devotion to sanatana dharma. The Rishis entrusted Kshatriyas with temporal power because they were afraid of committing sin.

Even as the Sun destroys evil in heaven, the king burns sin on this earth. The king's greatness is confirmed by the Shastras, and I must rule in favour of those that give praise to the king."

Greatly pleased, Vainya said to Atri, who had praised him, "O illumined sage, you have declared me the greatest and most excellent of men, and compared me to the gods. I will give you vast and varied wealth, for to me you seem all-knowing. I will give you, O well-clad and well-adorned one, a hundred million gold coins and ten bharas of gold."

Thus feted, Atri of the stern tapasya and vast spiritual power humbly accepted all the gifts and returned home. He gave the wealth to his sons and went carefree to the forest to live the life of a sannyasi.' "

"Markandeya continues, 'O conqueror of hostile cities, listen to what Saraswati said when the illumined Tarkshya asked her about how a man may acquire punya through his actions.

Tarkshya asked, "Great Devi, what is the best thing for a man to do, and how must he do so, that he may live a virtuous life? Tell me, most beautiful one, so that I can live by your advice and not fall from the high path of truth. When and how must one offer oblations to the sacred fire, and when must one worship so that dharma remains intact? Tell me this, so that I can live in this world, free of passion, craving and desire."

Saraswati saw that Tarkshya was sincere, and also intelligent.

She said to him, "He who devotes himself to studying the Vedas and, while in a state of purity and equanimity, sees the Brahman, attains the supreme bliss of the immortals and attains Swarga. There, he sees that great and sacred lakes abound, full of fish, flowers and golden lilies. They are like shrines and to look at them suffices to remove all grief. Holy men live in peace on their shores, worshipped by golden-skinned Apsaras.

He who gifts cows to Brahmanas attains the highest spiritual state; by giving bullocks he reaches the solar regions; by giving clothes he goes to the lunar world; and by giving gold he attains the world of the immortals.

He who gifts a beautiful cow with a fine calf, and plentiful in milk, and which will not run away, will live in celestial realms for as many years as there are hairs on the body of that animal.

He who gives a strong, powerful, young bullock that can pull a plough and carry heavy burdens reaches the realms attained by men who give ten cows. When a man bestows a well-caparisoned kapila cow with a bronze milk-pail, along with gold, he will find that the cow will return to him, because she is the giver of boons.

He who gives away cows reaps the rich harvest of his daana, which is measured by the hairs on the body of the animal. He also saves his sons, grandsons and his descendants for seven generations from damnation. He who gives a Brahmana sesame seeds formed in the shape of a cow with golden horns, with a bronze milk-pail, and gold as well, easily attains the realm of the Vasus.

Through his own actions a man descends into the dark, lower regions, infested by the evil spirits of his own passions, and lives in turmoil like a ship tossed by a storm on the high seas; but the gift of cows to Brahmanas saves him in the next world. He who gives his daughter in marriage to a Brahmana, in Brahma vivaha, who bestows land on Brahmanas, and who gives other gifts, goes to the world of Purandara. O Tarkshya, the virtuous man who offers oblations to the sacred fire for seven years, without remit, sanctifies seven generations above and below him by what he does."

Tarkshya said, "Lovely Devi, tell me about the laws for keeping the sacred fire lit, as dictated by the Vedas. I want to learn those timeless laws from you."

And the Mahadevi Saraswati expatiated on those laws from the Vedas, in detail.' "

"Yudhishtira asks the Brahmana Markandeya, 'Will you now tell us the story of Vaivaswata Manu?'

Markandeya replies, 'Rajan, there was a great Rishi named Manu. He was the son of Vivaswan and was equal to Brahma in glory. He was stronger, more powerful, wealthier and more spiritually disciplined than his father and grandfather. Manu performed the most stringent tapasya in the forest of badari trees known as Visala. There, with head bowed down, and unblinking eyes, he sat in unflinching penance for ten thousand years.

One day, while he was at tapasya, wearing wet clothes and matted hair, a fish swam up to the banks of the river Chirini and spoke to him. It said, 'Rajarishi, I am a helpless little fish and afraid of the larger fish. Would you be my protector, great and pious sage, since big fish devour smaller ones? Will you save me from drowning in this river of terrors? I will repay you for your help."

Vaivaswata Manu was overcome by pity and he took the fish out of the water with his hands and put it into a clay water-pot. The fish's body glistened as if it was the reflection of the moon he had taken from the river. Manu reared it lovingly as if it was a child, and that fish grew apace. After a time, it became so big that the water-pot could not contain it.

It spoke to Manu again, "O Rajarishi, please me find a bigger home."

Manu took it out of the clay pot and put it into a large tank. There, too, the fish continued to grow rapidly. Although the tank was two yojanas long and one yojana wide, soon there was no room in it for the fish to swim and frolic.

It saw Manu and spoke to him once more. It said, "Holy and adored father, take me to the Ganga, the favourite wife of Sagara the Ocean, or take me elsewhere, as you like. O Anagha, because of you I have grown so much, and I will gladly go wherever you take me."

Manu took the fish to the Ganga and slipped it into the river. There, O desiccator of your enemies, the fish grew again and, after a very short time, said to Manu, "Lord, my body is so big that I find the Ganga restricts me. I beg you, take me to the sea!"

Son of Pritha, Manu took it out of the Ganga and had it borne to the sea. Despite its great size, Manu moved it easily, and its touch and smell were pleasant to him. When Manu cast it into the sea, it said to him, with a smile, "Revered one, you have protected me with such love; listen while I tell you what you should do in the future. O most blessed one, a Pralaya is at hand, the dissolution of the world is near. What I am going to tell you is for your weal.

Mobile and motionless creation faces doom. You must build a strong, vast ship and tie a long rope to it. O Mahamuni, you and the Saptarishis must take all the seeds that the Brahmanas of antiquity listed, preserve them separately and carefully in this boat. In it, you must all wait for me and I will appear to you as a horned creature. That is how you will know me. I leave you now. Do as I tell you because, without my help, you cannot save yourself from the Pralaya."

Manu said to the fish, "I will do as you say, great one."

They both went their separate ways. Manu procured all the different seeds, as the fish said, and set sail in a most excellent ship on the billowing sea. He thought of the fish. Knowing his thought, the fish appeared before him, with horns on its head. Purushavyaghra, Manu saw the horned fish rising from the ocean like a sculpted mountain and he lowered a noose around its head. Yoked to the ship, the fish easly towed the craft through the salt waters and took them across the roaring, heaving sea.

O Parantapa, tossed by the tempestuous ocean, the vessel reeled like a drunken tramp. There was no land to be seen anywhere. There was only water; it covered the sky and heaven too. And, O bull of the Bhaaratas, when the world was inundated, none but Manu, the seven Rishis and the fish were visible.

Rajan, the fish untiringly pulled the ship through the flood for countless years and then it towed the vessel towards the highest peak of the Himavat and told the Rishis to tie it to the summit. Obedient to the fish, they moored the ship on the peak of the mountain. That peak, Kaunteya, is still called Naubandhanam, or harbour.

The fish addressed the Rishis, “I am Brahman, the Lord of all creation; there is none greater than I. Assuming the form of a matsya, I have saved you from the Pralaya. Manu will create all beings again—Devas, Asuras and Manavas; and all the animate and inanimate things of the universe. He will find the power to do this through tapasya, and my blessing will protect him. Maya will assail him but I will protect him from it.” So saying, the fish vanished.

Vaivaswata Manu felt the urge to create the world. During this act of creation, illusion affected him but he overcame it with his tapasyashakti and resumed his task of creating all the beings of the world, in their proper order.

This legend that I have just told you, which destroys sin, is the legend of the Fish, the Matsya Avatara. The man who listens every day to this primeval tale of Manu attains happiness and everything he wants, and then Swarga.’ ”

"Yudhishtira humbly asks the illustrious Markandeya, 'Mahamuni, you have seen many thousands of yugas. Best of Mahatmas, there is no one in this world who has lived as long as you, other than Brahma of the fathomless mind, who lives in the holiest of realms.

Only you, O Brahmana, will worship Brahma at the time of the dissolution of the universe, when this earth is without a sky and without Devas and Danavas. And when that Pralaya ends and Narayana awakes, you alone, O enlightened one, will see Brahma re-create the four orders of beings after filling the void with air and restricting the endless waters with shores.

You, Brahmanottama, have worshipped Brahma in his body, your soul rapt in dhyana, and have been lost in him. You have often been witness to the primeval acts of creation; you have surpassed the Prajapatis in the depth of your tapasya; in the next world, you are revered as one who is nearest to Narayana.

Long ago, you beheld Mahavishnu, not with your bodily eyes but in a pure state of the Spirit, with your blemishless, lotus-like heart—the only way in which the manifold Vishnu of universal knowledge can be seen!

This is why, most learned Rishi, God's grace is upon you, and neither Death the universal destroyer nor old age, the cause of bodily decay, has any power over you.

When neither the Sun nor the Moon, nor Fire, nor Earth, nor Air, nor Sky remains; when the world, on the brink of extinction, is one vast ocean, Ekarnava; when the Devas and Asuras and the great Nagas are gone; and when Brahma of the fathomless mind, Lord of all creatures, sleeps in a lotus, you alone will remain to worship him.

Brahmanottama, you have seen all that has happened before. You alone have seen many things with your mind's eye. Indeed, there is nothing you do not know, and I want to hear you explain why all things happen as they do.'

Markandeya replies, 'I am happy to tell you what you want to know. First, I must worship the Svayambhuva, the self-existent, primordial Being, who is undecaying, indestructible and inconceivable, and who is saguna and nirguna, both possessed of and without attributes.

Janardana, who wears golden raiment, this Pitambara, is the creator and mover of all things; he is within and outside all things, and he is the Lord of all. He is also called the Great, the Incomprehensible, the Wonderful and the Immaculate. He has no beginning or end; he pervades all the world; he is constant, unchangeable and ageless. He is the creator of all, but is himself Un-created; he is the source of all power. His knowledge is greater than that of all the gods together.

O best of kings and men, after the dissolution of the universe, all this wonderful creation again comes to life. The Krita yuga comes first, and lasts for four thousand years of the Devas, including four hundred years of rising and setting. The Treta yuga is next and lasts three thousand years of the gods, three hundred being its rising and setting. Next is the Dwapara yuga, which is for two thousand years; its rising and setting take two hundred years. The next is the Kali yuga, which is one thousand years long, and its rising and setting take one hundred years. After the Kali yuga is over, the Krita yuga dawns again.

A yugachakra consists of twelve thousand years of the Devas. One thousand such cycles constitute one day of Brahma. Naravyaghra, when the universe is withdrawn into its home, which is the body of Brahma, that withdrawal of all things is called Pralaya, the dissolution.

In the last and short Kali yuga, men become addicted to lying; yagnas, gifts and vratas are performed by representatives rather than by the ones who should be performing them. Brahmanas do work meant for Sudras, and Sudras begin earning wealth. Kshatriyas conduct religious rites in the Kali yuga, while Brahmanas abandon the performance of yagnas and Vedic study; they give up their deer-skin, their staffs and begin eating meat. In the Kali yuga, Brahmanas neglect their japa and dhyana, and Sudras undertake to do them. Everything is lopsided in the world order, and this foreshadows the apocalypse.

O lord of men, in that time, Mlechcha kings rule over the earth! Those sinful monarchs reign using false precepts. The Andhras, the Sakas, the Pulindas, the Yavanas, the Kambojas, the Bahlikas and the Abhiras become bold sovereigns of the earth. This is the state of the world by the end of the Kali yuga!

Not a single Brahmana adheres to his dharma; the Kshatriyas and the Vaisyas also follow practices contrary to their svadharma. Men have short lives, are weak, with little srength and small bodies, and are dishonest in the extreme.

Human population dwindles, great tracts of the Earth become deserts, and wild animals and beasts of prey roam everywhere. During this age, the recitation of the Vedas is futile; Sudras address Brahmanas with a disrespectful "Bho", while the Brahmanas speak to the Sudras with respect. At the end of the yuga, animals increase in vast numbers, perfumes do not please the senses, and food lacks all taste.

Rajan, women have many children at each birth, and these are physically small, coarse and ill-behaved. Men and women use their mouths for sexual intercourse, famines ravage the country, women of vile character haunt the roads, and all women are immodest and disobedient to their men.

In this Kali yuga cows give little milk; trees swarm with crows and do not produce full yields of flowers and fruit. Dvijas tainted with the sin of killing Brahmanas accept gifts from dishonourable kings. These Brahmanas are greedy and ignorant and, wearing religious symbols, harass and threaten the people while begging for alms.

Grihastas, householders, find the burden of taxes impossible to bear, and resort to deception, and the basest Brahmanas don the garb of ascetics, let their nails and hair grow long, but earn riches by trade. Narapumgava, from their lust for wealth, so many Brahmanas become false Sannyasis.

At this time, men behave in ways that go against their svadharma. They become addicted to intoxicating drinks and violate the beds of even their gurus. Their desires are worldly, and they avidly pursue sensual pleasures.

Hermitages are full of sinful, insolent men who advocate a life of dependence.

Indra does not send down rain in its season, and seeds that are sown do not sprout, O Bhaarata. Men of unholy thoughts and deeds take pleasure in indulging envy and malice. And, Anagha, all the earth is a hotbed of sin.

In the Kali yuga, the virtuous do not live long, and the Earth is amost entirely bereft of dharma. Dishonest merchants and traders sell large quantities of goods, using false scales and measures. The good do not prosper; only the sinful succeed. Dharma has no value, while sin waxes day by day. Men that are devoted to truth and virtue become poor and die young; those that lead immoral lives prosper and live long.

Sin is seen everywhere, even in public places. Men use only evil means to achieve their ends. Even small fortunes intoxicate them with pride. O king, many appropriate wealth that has been left with them for safe-keeping, and then deny that it was given to them at all.

Wild animals and birds of carrion live in public places and in temples. Girls of seven and eight years of age conceive, and boys of ten or twelve years become fathers. By the age of sixteen, men begin to age and soon die. Living such short lives, boys act like old men, indeed bearing all their characteristics. Women become immoral; they deceive even the best of husbands and have sexual relations with servants, slaves and even animals. Even the wives of Kshatriyas form friendships with other men and have liaisons with them while their husbands still live.

Towards the end of the thousands of years that make up the four yugas, and when the lives of men have become short, a drought comes that lasts for many years. Men and creatures of little strength and vitality die of hunger, in their millions.

And then, lord of men, seven blazing Suns appear in the sky and suck up all the waters of the Earth—from the rivers and seas. All things made of wood or grass—wet and dry—are reduced to ashes.

Fanned by high winds, the fire called Samvartaka flares up on an Earth already dried by the seven Suns. In moments, Samvartaka rages through the Earth and deep into it, terrorising the Devas, the Danavas and the Yakshas. In a flash, the fire destroys everything upon and below the Earth's surface.

Samvartaka, fanned by ill winds, consumes this world, all the hundreds and thousands of yojanas. Lordly in its power, and blazing in brilliance, it consumes the universe—all the Devas, the Asuras, the Gandharvas, Yakshas, Nagas and Rakshasas.

Cloud masses like herds of elephants decked with garlands of lightning fill the sky, and they are wonderful to see. Some are the hue of the blue lotus, some pale like the water-lily, others resemble lotus stamens, yet others are purple, or turmeric yellow, or crow's-egg blue. Some are bright as lotus petals, and some red as vermillion. Some look like the skylines of palaces and cities, some like herds of elephants; some are shaped like lizards, or crocodiles, or sharks. And, O King, these clouds are terrifying to behold and, streaked with lightning, roar frightfully.

These rain-charged masses quickly cover all the sky and flood the Earth—her mountains, forests and mines—with water. Impelled by the Supreme Lord, the clouds inundate the entire surface of Bhumi with great downpours and douse the raging fire.

The clouds bring rain without let for twelve years, flooding the Earth. And then, Bhaarata, the Ocean breaks his shores, flashing over the continents; the mountains shatter into fragments and the Earth sinks under the Deluge.

A sudden mighty wind springs up, and the clouds scud swiftly across the sky and disappear. The Self-created Lord, the origin of everything, whose home is the Lotus, swallows that frightful wind and now falls into sleep, O Bhaarata!

When the universe becomes one vast expanse of water, when all mobile and motionless creatures have been destroyed, when the Devas and the Asuras cease to be, when the Yakshas and the Rakshasas are no more, when man is gone, when trees and beasts of prey have disappeared, when the firmament itself has ceased to exist, I alone, O Lord of the Earth, wander in affliction. And wandering over that dreadful expanse of water, my heart is sore from not being able to see another living being.

I roam without stopping, for a long, long time, and become exhausted, but find no resting place. Then, in that single unending expanse of waters, I see a vast and spreading banyan tree, and a boy sitting on a cot overlaid with celestial bedclothes and attached to a long branch of the tree. His face, great king, is as fair as the lily, as radiant as the moon, and his eyes are as large as petals of a fully-opened lotus blossom!

My heart fills with wonder at this sight, Rajan, and I ask myself, How does this boy sit here when the world has been destroyed? Although I know all there is to know about the past, the present and the future, I still cannot understand this, even with deep meditation.

The boy glows with the lustre of the atasi flower and bears the hallowed mark of the Srivatsa. He seems to embody the Devi Lakshmi. That boy with the Srivatsa, of the lotus-petal eyes and dazzling radiance speaks to me with sweet words.

He says, “Sire, I know that you are tired and need to rest. O Markandeya of Bhrigu’s race, rest here as long as you wish. Best of Munis, enter into me and rest there. I have assigned my body to be your home, for I am pleased with you.”

When the boy speaks, I feel a complete disregard for my life as a man. The boy opens his mouth and, powerless to stop myself, I enter into it.

I enter the boy’s belly and see the Earth there, all her cities and kingdoms. And, Purushottama, while wandering through the belly of that exalted One, I see the rivers Ganga, Satudru, Sita, Yamuna and Kausiki; the Charmanwati, Vetravati, Chandrabhaga, Saraswati, Sindhu and Vipasa; the Godavari, Vaswokasara, Nalini, Narmada and Tamra, the beautiful and sacred Vena, the Suvena, the Krishnavena, the Irama and the Mahanadi; the Vitasti, the great Kaveri, the Visalya and the Kimpuna I see.

I see all these and many other rivers that flow across the Earth. And, Parantapa, I also see the Ocean, home of all waters, with its crocodiles and sharks and its precious gems. I see the Sky, too, adorned with Sun and Moon, and it blazes with the brilliance of fiery Surya.

And I see Bhumi as well, graced with woods and forests. I see many Brahmanas busy with their yagnas, Kshatriyas fulfilling their responsibilities to the other castes, Vaisyas farming, and Sudras devoted to the service of the higher varnas.

Rajan, while wandering through the belly of the boy, that Mahatman, I also see the mountains Himavat, Hemakunta, Nishada and silver-rich Sweta. I see the mountains Gandhamadana, Mandara and the massive Nila; golden Meru and Mahendra and the excellent Vindhyas; Malaya and Pariyatra. These and many other mountains, all bejewelled, do I see within the boy’s stomach.

While wandering through his belly, I see lions, tigers, boars and, indeed, all the Earth’s other animals. Naravyaghra, as I roam I see the whole pantheon of Devas, with their king Sakra; I see the Sadhyas, the Rudras, the Adityas, the Guhyakas, the Pitrs, the Uragas and the Pannagas, all the Garutmats of the air, the Vasus, the Aswins, the Gandharvas, the Apsaras, the Yakshas, the Rishis, the hordes of Daityas and Danavas, and the Nagas. I see the sons of Simhika and all the other enemies of the gods; I see everything that exists on Bhumi, mobile and immobile.

I eat fruits and live inside the boy's body for many centuries, but despite wandering over the entire universe inside it, I cannot see how far it extends. When I fail to measure the limits of that sacred body, I prayerfully invoke the boon-bestowing Paramatman and bow to his preeminence. No sooner have I done this than I am shot out of his mouth by a gust of wind.

And, Rajan, I find myself outside once more, looking at the branch of the same banyan tree, at the same being, the boy of blinding tejas and with the sacred mark of the Srivatsa, who has swallowed the universe. And that boy of blinding radiance, clad in fulvid robes, enthralls me with what he smilingly says.

"Markandeya, best of Munis, wandering inside my body has exhausted you, but still, I will speak to you."

At the very moment that he says this to me, I acquire a new sight, which enables me to realise that I have gained true knowledge and been freed from illusion. And, having witnessed the inexhaustible power of that Being of energy beyond measure, I worship his hallowed, beautiful feet—their soles bright as burnished copper, their reddish toes—by placing them carefully on my head and joining my palms together in humility. Then I look up at him with utmost reverence, that Divine Being who is the soul of all things and whose eyes are like lotus petals.

With hands still folded, I address him, "O Divine One, I wish to know you and this wondrous illusion. I saw the entire universe in your belly. The Devas, the Danavas, the Rakshasas, the Yakshas, the Gandharvas and the Nagas, indeed the whole universe of mobile and immobile creation, are all within your body! Although I travelled all through your body at great speed, by your grace, I have not forgotten anything I saw. And, Great Lord, I have come out of your body because you willed it, not because I wanted to.

O lotus-leaf eyed, I want to know about you, who are perfect! Why do you sit here in the form of a boy after having swallowed the universe? You must explain it to me. Why, O Anagha, is all the universe inside you? How long will you stay here? Lord of gods, my curiosity is not improper for a Brahmana, and I would so like to hear all this from you, in detail and exactly as it happens. What I have seen is wonderful and incomprehensible!'

The Devadeva, of the refulgent splendour and ineffable beauty, that most eloquent among of all speakers, pacified me with these words.' "

"Markandeya continues, 'The hallowed being said, "O Brahmana, even the gods do not really know me! However, since I am pleased with you, I will tell you how I created the universe. Regenerate Rishi, not only are you devoted to your ancestors, you have also sought my protection. You have, besides, seen me with your eyes, and your punya is great.

In time before memory, I gave the waters the name Naara; and because the waters have ever been my ayana, or home, I am called Narayana. Brahmanottama, I am Narayana, the source of all things, the eternal, unchangeable One. I am the creator of all things, as well as the destroyer of all.

I am Vishnu, I am Brahma and I am Sakra the king of the Devas. I am Vaisravana, and I am Yama the lord of the dead. I am Siva, I am Soma, and I am Kasyapa the lord of the created. I am Dhatri, and also Vidhatri, and I am Yagna embodied.

Fire is my mouth, the Earth my feet, and the Sun and the Moon are my eyes; Heaven is the crown of my head, the Sky and the Cardinal Points are my ears; the Waters are born of my sweat. Space is my body, and Air is my mind.

I have performed many hundreds of yagnas at which I have given bountiful gifts. I am always present at the sacrifices of the gods; and all those who perform Vedic sacrifices make their offerings to me. On Earth, it is me that the Kshatriyas and Vaisyas worship at the yagnas they perform to attain Swarga, heavenly bliss.

Assuming the form of Sesha, I hold upon my head this Earth bounded by the four seas and adorned by Meru and Mandara. O Dvija, long ago I took the form of a Boar and raised this Bhumi that had sunk in the water. It is I who, becoming the fire that spews out of the horse's mouth, drain the waters of the ocean and create them again.

It is from my vitality that Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras sprang from my mouth, my arms, my thighs and my feet. It is from me that the Rig, the Sama, the Yajur, and the Atharva Vedas arose, and it is into me that they all merge when the time comes.

Brahmanas devoted to sannyasa, who value peace as the highest attribute, who have their souls under complete control, who yearn for knowledge, who have shed lust, anger and envy, who are detached from the material things of the earth, whose sins have been washed away, who are gentle and virtuous, who have no pride and who truly know the Self, they worship me with profound dhyana.

Named Samvartaka, I am the Flame, the Fire, the Wind and the Sun. Dvijottama, what you see and know as stars in the sky are the pores of my skin. The gem-rich Ocean and the four Cardinal Points are my robes, my bed, and my home. I have distributed them over the Earth in order to serve the purposes of the gods.

Manavottama, lust, anger, joy, fear and confusion, which cloud the intellect, are all different forms of me. I reward men for practising satya, daana, tapasya, shanti and ahimsa towards all creatures, and for other benign deeds. Men wander within my body, under my control, their senses overwhelmed by me. They move not by their will but by mine.

Brahmanas who have thoroughly studied the Vedas, who have tranquil minds, and who have subdued their anger earn great rewards through their numerous sacrifices. These rewards, however, are unattainable by evil men who are overtaken by covetousness, men with dark souls, unblessed and impure.

Know, therefore, Brahmana, that the benefits obtained by men who have disciplined their souls bear great merit, and they are out of the reach of the ignorant and the foolish.

At the times in human history when dharma and truth wane and sin and adharma rise, I incarnate myself in new forms. O Muni, when fierce and malicious Daityas and Rakshasas, who cannot be slain by even the Devas, are born on Earth I am born in human form into the families of virtuous men and restore dharma by exterminating evil.

Powered by my own maya, I create Devas and Manavas, Gandharvas and Rakshasas, and all unmoving things, and then destroy them all at the appropriate time. For the preservation of righteousness and honour I assume a human form, and keep that form until the time for deeds comes, when I assume my incomprehensible, inconceivable Viswarupa.

In the Krita yuga I am white, in the Treta yuga I am golden-yellow, in the Dwapara I am red and in the Kali yuga I become dark in hue. In the Kali yuga, evil is four times as powerful as goodness. At the end of the yuga I assume the form of Death and destroy the three worlds, with all their moving and motionless things. With three steps I cover the entire universe.

I am the essence of the Universe; I am the source of all happiness; I am the humbler of pride; I am omnipresent; I am infinite; I am lord of the senses; and great is my power. O Brahmana, it is I that set the Kaalachakra, the wheel of time, in motion. Foremost of Rishis, I am formless; I am the Destroyer; and I am the impetus of any effort in all my creatures.

My spirit infuses all beings, but none know me. It is me that the pious and the devout worship in all the worlds.

Sinless one, whatever pain you felt while inside my belly was for your future happiness and good fortune. Whatever mobile and immobile objects you have seen in the world, all that was ordained by my Soul, which is the well-spring of all existence.

The progenitor of all creatures is half my body. I am called Narayana, and I am bearer of the conch-shell, the discus and the mace. Great Rishi, for a period equal to a thousand yugas, I, the universal Soul, sleep, drawing all creatures into that same nidra. I remain here through all time in the form of a boy, though I am the most ancient One, until Brahma awakes.

I am pleased with you and I, who am Brahman, have granted boons to you who are worshipped by revered sages. You were struck by melancholy when you saw the vast expanse of water and realised that all mobile and immobile beings had been destroyed. I knew this, and I showed you the universe within my body.

And while you were inside my body beholding all creation, you were filled with a wonder that stabbed your senses. O Rishi, that is why I expelled you through my breath.

I have now told you about the Soul which cannot be fathomed, even by the Devas and the Asuras. And as long as that glorious tapasvin, holy Brahma, remains asleep, you can live here in peace and bliss. When that ancestor of all creatures awakens, I will then create all creatures with physical bodies, the Sky, Earth, Light, Air, Water and, indeed, everything else that you may see!"

My son, with these words, that wonderful, hallowed Being vanished from my sight, and I then saw this varied and wondrous universe begin to take birth. O best of the Bhaaratas, most virtuous among men, I witnessed this wonder at the end of the yuga.

The Deity, of the eyes as large as lotus leaves, whom I saw so long ago, is this tiger among men, this Janardana who has become your kinsman. It is because of the boon he granted me that I remember everything clearly, and also why my life is so long and death under my control.

That ancient and supreme Lord Hari of mysterious soul has been born as Krishna of the Vrishnis. This Mahabaho seems to sport playfully in this world. He is Dhatri and Vidhatri, the destroyer of the eternal, the bearer of the Srivatsa mark on his breast, the Lord of the lord of all creatures, the highest of the high, also called Govinda! Seeing him, this greatest of all gods, this ever-victorious one clad in yellow robes, this lord of the Vrishnis, my memory returns to me.

Krishna is the father and mother of all creatures. O bulls of the race of Kuru, seek refuge in him, the Protector!'

The sons of Pritha, the twins and Draupadi bow deeply to Krishna; and that tiger among men speaks words of great sweetness to them."

Vaisampayana said, "Yudhishtira repeats his question to Markandeya about how the Earth will be ruled.

He says, 'Most eloquent of all speakers, O Muni of Bhrigu's race, amazing indeed is what you have told us about the destruction and re-creation of all things at the end of the yugas. Now I am eager to know what will happen in the next age, the Kali yuga.

When dharma no longer exists, what will remain? What will men be capable of in that yuga? What will people eat? How will they entertain themselves? What will man's longevity be at the end of the yuga? And how long will the yuga last, after which another Krita yuga dawns?

Tell me as much as you can, O Muni; what you say is so fascinating.'

That best of sages begins his discourse again, much to the delight of the tiger of the Vrishnis, and of the sons of Pandu as well. Markandeya says, 'Listen, Rajan, and I will tell you all that I saw and heard; Yudhishtira, listen to everything that, by the grace of God, I gained intuitive knowledge of. Listen while I tell you the way the world will be during the Kali yuga.

The Krita yuga was free from deceit, guile, avarice and acquisitiveness; dharma was a bull with four strong legs, and it walked among men. In the Treta yuga, sin deprived the bull of dharma of one of its legs. In the Dwapara yuga, evil and goodness reigned equally, and dharma was left to limp on two legs. In the dark age, the Kali yuga, dharma is made of three parts of evil and one part of goodness, and exists thus amongst men. Dharma now depends on man as it cannot support itself on its one remaining leg.

Man's lifespan, his energy, his intellect and his strength dwindle with each yuga. Pandava, in the Kali yuga, Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras will make a hollow show of being virtuous, only to deceive the world. Men with false reputations of being learned will constrict and hide the truth.

The shortened lifespan of man will prevent him from gaining true knowledge; and because he has little gyana, he will lack wisdom. Covetousness and greed will overwhelm him. Under the sway of avarice, wrath, lust and ignorance, men will hate and want to kill each other.

With their virtue reduced, and without austerity and truth, Brahmanas, Kshatriyas and Vaisyas will be like Sudras. Men of the lowest varnas will rise to displace those higher-born than themselves, who then sink to the bottom of the social order. Yudhishtira, this will be the state of the world at the end of the yuga.

Flax will be the best material for clothing, and koradusaka, wheat, the best grain. In the Kali yuga man's only friend will be his wife. The people will live on fish and the milk of goats and sheep, for cows will be extinct. Towards the end of the yuga, even those who observe religious rituals and vows will only do so to gain material wealth.

Animosity will prevail between men and they will be filled with murderous intent towards one another. Without yoga, communion, men will become atheists and thieves. The land will lose its fertility and, in desperation, men will dig the banks of streams with spades and sow seeds there. But even those places will prove barren for them.

Even devout men who perform ceremonial rites to honour the Pitrs and the Devas will become avaricious and take what belongs to others. The father will enjoy what belongs to the son; and the son, what belongs to the father. Men will take pleasure from things forbidden by the scriptures. Brahmanas will speak contemptuously of the Vedas and will not keep any vratas; their understanding will be clouded by disputation and dialectical sophistry, and they will no longer perform yagnas or homas. Deceived by false teachings, they will be attracted to all things base and low.

Men will till low-lands for cultivation and use cows and yearling calves as beasts of burden and to draw the plough. Sons will kill fathers, and fathers their sons, with impunity. They will revel in these killings, which will frequently become the means of assuaging anxiety.

The whole world will be filled with the coarse ways of the Mlechchas, their ideas, laws and rituals. Yagnas will no more be performed, and joy will disappear. Men will steal from the weak, friendless and helpless, as well as from the wise. Evil men will give gifts with contempt, which the people of the Kali yuga will readily accept, reduced as they are in gyana and tejas, and prone to greed, folly and sin. The kings of the earth, their hearts in thrall to sin, ignorant while boasting of wisdom, will constantly challenge one another from naked bloodlust.

At the end of the Kali yuga, Kshatriyas will become as thorns of the Earth. They will be filled with greed and puffed up with pride and vanity. Unable and unwilling to protect their subjects, they will revel in inflicting savage punishments on them. The Kshatriyas of this age will repeatedly attack the good and the honest and, pitiless even in the face of their grief-stricken cries, they will forcibly seize their wives and their wealth.

No one will ask for or give a girl's hand in marriage, but girls will choose their own husbands, when the end of the yuga comes. And the kings of the earth, their souls steeped in ignorance, and their hearts in discontent, will rob their subjects in every way they can.

The whole world will be reduced to the level of the Mlechcha. When the end of the yuga comes, the right hand will deceive the left, and the left, the right. Vile men pretending to be learned will abbreviate Truth; the old will exhibit youthful folly, and the young will not respect age. Cowards will be known as brave men, and the courageous will be cast down as cowards.

Towards the end of the yuga men will stop trusting one another; the greedy world will live on one kind of food; sin will increase and prosper, while dharma will fade away; Brahmanas, Kshatriyas and Vaisyas will disappear, leaving no trace of their castes; all men will become members of one common order, without distinction; fathers will not forgive sons the least folly, and sons will not forgive their fathers.

As the end draws near, wives will not wait upon and serve their husbands; men will want to live in countries where wheat and barley form the staple food; both men and women will become entirely licentious and intolerant.

O Yudhishtira, all the world will be a Mlechcha universe. Men will no longer please the gods by offerings of sraddhas; no one will listen to the words of another because none will see another as his Guru. Ruler of men, intellectual darkness will envelop the Earth; sixteen years will be man's span on earth, after which he will die. Five- and six-year old girls will give birth, and boys of seven and eight will be fathers. Tiger among kings, when the end of the yuga comes, wives will never be content with their husbands, nor husbands with their wives.

Men will possess little; they will wear the marks of religion outwardly, while their hearts are full of darkness; envy and malice will fill the world; men will not give each other anything. Drought and famine will stalk the land; lustful men and wanton women will wander the streets; and wives will abhor their husbands.

All the people will adopt the ways of the Mlechchas—they will become omnivorous without distinction; their actions will be infused with cruelty—when the end of the Kali yuga comes.

Bhaaratottama, urged by avarice, men will be deceitful in trade and commerce. Without any knowledge of the laws that govern rituals, men will perform ceremonial rites and then behave in any way they please. When the end of the yuga comes, the dispositions of men will be such that they will tend naturally towards cruelty; they will speak ill of one another; and they will fell trees and despoil gardens without a thought. Men will be constantly anxious about their livelihood.

O King, greed will rule all of mankind and make men kill even Brahmanas in order to have their possessions. The twice-born varnas, oppressed by the Sudras, will wander in fear over the face of the earth, unprotected and crying Oh! and Alas! When men begin to kill one another, when they become utterly evil and violent, when they have no regard for animal life, then the yuga's end nears.

The best of high-born men will cry like crows and fly in terror when set upon by robbers, and seek refuge beside rivers and on mountains and in other inaccessible places. The first among the twice-born will, Bhumipala, lose his fortitude and become a servant of Sudras, in those terrible times.

Sudras will interpret the scriptures, while Brahmanas wait upon them and accept their duties as guided by these base interpretations. The low will become the high, and everything will be the opposite of what should be.

Men will renounce the gods and will worship bones and other occult relics in secret, inside their homes. At the end of the yuga, Sudras will not wait on Brahmanas. In the asramas of great Rishis, in the gurukulas of Brahmanas, in places sacred to the gods, in sacrificial compounds and in holy tanks, the Earth will be disfigured with tombs, with pillars containing skeletal relics, rather than graced with temples dedicated to the Devas.

All this will come to be at the end of the yuga, and they are the signs that the yuga draws to a close.

When all men become vicious, destitute of virtue, carnivorous and addicted to intoxicating drinks, the yuga comes to an end. O Monarch, when flowers form within other flowers, and fruit within other fruit, then will the yuga come to an end. The clouds will pour rain out of season as the end of the yuga approaches.

The ceremonial rites of passage will not follow one after the other in the proper order; Sudras will take up arms against Brahmanas as the end of the yuga draws near.

The Earth will be full of Mlechchas, and Brahmanas will flee in all directions to escape having to pay inordinate taxes. All men will conduct themselves uniformly; and the people will flee into woods and forests, to escape from the work assigned to them, and subsist on fruit and roots.

The world will be so diseased that honourable conduct will not be seen anywhere. Sishyas will not value the teachings of their Acharyas, and even try to harm them. And men will take no notice of true teachers, all of these by now impoverished. Friends and relatives and kinsmen will offer false friendship for the sake of the person's wealth. When the end of the yuga comes, everybody will be direly needy.

All the points of the horizon will be ablaze, the stars and constellations will no longer shine, and the planets and all their movements will turn inauspicious. Wild winds will blow chaotically, at all times, and countless meteors will flash across the sky, foreboding the darkest evil.

Seven suns will appear in the sky. Bedlam and anarchy will be everywhere, and fires will abound. And the Sun will be in eclipse from dawn to dusk, in an unnatural, perennial night. And the god of the thousand eyes will lash down unseasonable rains.

When the end of the Kali yuga comes, crops will be sparse. Women will speak sharply; they will be hard-hearted, prone to weeping, and they will disobey their husbands in all things. And at the end of the yuga, sons will kill their fathers and mothers; women, living uncontrolled lives, will kill their husbands and sons. And, O King, at the end of the yuga, Rahu will swallow the Sun, causing eerie and untimely eclipses.

Fires will burn all around. Unable to find food, drink or shelter, even when they ask for these, wayfarers will lay themselves down in resignation, on roadsides, and ask for nothing anymore.

When the end of the yuga comes, crows, snakes, vultures, kites and other animals and birds of prey and carrion will utter frightful cries. When the end of the yuga comes, men will shun their friends, relatives and followers. Men will leave the towns and cities where they live and work, and go in search of new ones. And the people will wander over the Earth, calling out heartrendingly to their loved ones whom they have lost.

When those terrible times are finally over, creation will begin anew. Men will be created again and divided into the four varnas, beginning with the Brahmanas. And, to make men prosper, Providence will smile on them. When the Sun, the Moon and Brihaspati enter the same sign of the zodiac, with the nakshatra Pushyami, the Krita yuga will begin again.

Once more, the clouds release their waters in proper season, and the stars and their movements become auspicious. The planets revolve in their true orbits, and turn gentle and benign. There will be prosperity and plenitude, health and peace everywhere.

In time, a Brahmana named Kalki will be born. He will worship and glorify Vishnu, and have untold energy, great intelligence and mighty prowess. He will be born in the town of Sambhala, into a devout Brahmana family. Chariots and weapons, warriors and arms, and coats of mail shall be available to him as soon as he thinks of them.

By dint of his dharma, he will be a king of kings and ever-victorious. He will restore peace and order to a world thronging with fell creatures and plunged in chaos. Kalki of dazzling tejas will first destroy all things—he will be the universal Destroyer, and only then will he inaugurate a new yuga.

Surrounded by Brahmanas, he will seek out and kill all evil men and women, wherever they may try to hide.' ”

"Markandeya continues, 'Having annihilated thieves and bandits, Kalki will, at a great horse-sacrifice, make a gift of the Earth to the Brahmanas and, having established again the sanatana dharma ordained by the Self-Created One, illustrious Kalki, of the sacred deeds, will retire into a mystic forest.

The people of this world will emulate whatever he does and, when the Brahmanas have finally rid the Earth of criminals and sinners, prosperity will sprout everywhere. The countries of the Earth will be subjugated one after the other, and then, that tiger among Brahmanas, Kalki, will shed his deer-skins, lances and tridents, and roam the world, adored wherever he goes by the greatest sages, showing his reverence for them, while doing away with sinners of every kind. Kalki will kill the evil ones amid piteous cries like Oh, father! Oh, mother! Oh, son!

Bhaarata, when sin has been rooted out and dharma re-established at the beginning of the Krita yuga, men will begin to observe true religious rites once more. In the second Krita yuga that sets in, lush gardens, ponds, large tanks, temples, yagnasalas and centres of teaching devoted to the study of Brahmanical lore, will reappear and flourish, everywhere.

Ceremonial rituals and sacrifices will be performed. Brahmanas will return to the ways of goodness and honesty, and the Dvijas—the three twice-born varnas—will once again devote themselves to austerities and become true Munis. The asramas of Rishis, hitherto filled with vile men, will become homes to men devoted to truth. All the people will begin to live honourable lives in perfect dharma.

All seeds sown in the ground will sprout and every kind of crop will grow all year round. Men will be charitable and observe stern vratas; and the Brahmanas, devoting their lives to meditation and sacrifice, will be pure-hearted and always happy.

The sovereigns of the earth will rule their kingdoms with dharma. In the Krita yuga, Brahmanas will adhere to their six-fold duties—to study, teach, perform sacrifices, officiate at sacrifices performed by others, and to give and receive charity; Kshatriyas will devote themselves to acquiring strength and performing feats of prowess; Vaisyas will till the land and engage in honest trade, and Sudras will occupy themselves in serving the other three castes.

These, O Yudhishtira, are the ways of the Krita, Treta, Dwapara and Kali yugas. I have now told you everything about the yugas. I have also told you, O Son of Pandu, the span of each of them. So, you know all that I do, pertaining to the past and the future, as narrated by Vayu Deva in his Purana, which is revered by the wisest sages. My immortality has allowed me to see, many times, the birth, life and death of the world; and all that I have seen and know I have shared with you.

Now, glorious one, with your brothers, listen to something else I have to say, to clear any doubts you may have about dharma. You should always focus your soul on virtue because, Rajan, a man of high principles attains bliss in his lifetime and after.

Anagha, listen also to these other propitious words—never humiliate a Brahmana, for an angry Brahmana can destroy the three worlds with a curse.'

Hearing Markandeya's words, the king of the Kurus, Yudhishtira of the great intellect and radiant lustre, says to the illumined sage, 'O Muni, by what code should I live if I want to protect my subjects? And how should I conduct myself so that I do not stray from the dharma of a Kshatriya?'

Markandeya says, 'Be merciful to all creatures and devote yourself to their welfare. Love all creatures and scorn none. Speak only the truth, be humble, keep your senses under control and always concern yourself with the protection of your people.

Be ethical, abjure sin, and worship your ancestors and the gods. If you have been guilty of wrongdoing from ignorance or carelessness, give charity to wash away your sins. Renounce arrogance and vanity; clasp humility and goodness to you. Gain control over all the Earth; rejoice and be happy. This is the virtuous life.

What I have told you was true in the past and holds good for the future. There is nothing of the past or the future that you do not know. Therefore, child, do not let your hardships shake you. The wise are never crushed by time's trials and persecutions. Mahabaho, even the Swargavasis, the heaven-dwellers, are not impervious to time. Kaala afflicts all the created.

Sinless, do not doubt the truth of what I have told you; if you let doubt enter your heart, your high-mindedness will be diminished. Bharatarishabha, you are born into the illustrious family of the Kurus and should do as I have told you, in thought, word and deed.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Brahmanasreshta, I will do as you command and live by the wisdom that you have given me, in words so pleasing to hear. Dvijottama, of avarice and lust I have none, and no fear, pride or vanity. Lord, I shall keep dharma close and do whatever you have told me to.'

Having listened to the enlightened Markandeya, the Pandavas and Krishna, wielder of the bow Saranga, all those bulls among Brahmanas, and the others that are there, are filled with joy. Having heard hallowed words of great antiquity from the Muni, they are full of wonder."

Janamejaya said, "O Vaisampayana, mighty pauranika, I beg you, relate in full the greatness of Brahmanas, just as Markandeya told it to Pandu's sons."

Vaisampayana said, "The eldest son of Pandu asks Markandeya, 'Tell us more of the greatness of Brahmanas.'

Markandeya says, 'Listen, O King, to how the Brahmanas conducted themselves in ancient times.

In Ayodhya, there was once a king of the Ikshvaku dynasty named Parikshit. One day, Parikshit went hunting and was in pursuit of a deer, which led him deep into the forest, far from human habitation. Tired by the long ride, hungry and thirsty, he saw a pool in the dark, dense jungle in which he found himself. He led his horse to it and refreshed himself and his mount. Then, he laid some lotus fibres and stems on the ground by the side of the pool and sat down on them.

While he rested there, he heard melodious strains of music and wondered where the music came from and who sang, as he had not seen any evidence of people near the pool. The king then saw a most beautiful maiden, gathering flowers and singing.

She came before him, and he asked her, 'Blessed one, who are you, and to whom do you belong?

She replied, ‘I am a kanya.’

And the king said, ‘Will you be mine?’

The maiden answered, ‘I will agree only if you promise me one thing.’

The king asked what it was, and the girl said, ‘Promise me that you will never make me cast my eyes on water.’

The king agreed, saying, ‘So it shall be,’ and he married her and knew her with profound rapture. Later, as he sat quietly with her, his soldiers arrived in that place and, seeing their king, stood surrounding him. The king was happy to see his men and, escorted by them, he rode home with his new bride in a grand chariot.

On arriving at his capital, he secluded himself with her, completely obsessed. Even those closest to the king could not get an audience with him, or speak to him. His chief minister asked the women who attended on the royal couple, “What goes on here?”

And the women replied, “The queen is a devi of unparalleled beauty. The king married her with a promise that she would never look at water, and he is joyful with her.”

On hearing this, the minister had a forest created, full of trees with a profusion of flowers and fruits, and on one side of it, in a secluded place, he had a large pond dug and filled with water as sweet as nectar. He had the pool covered with a net of pearls.

One day he managed to see the king privately, and said to him, “There is a fine vana with no water in it. Enjoy yourself there.”

The king took him at his word and went into the forest with his adored wife, and they sported together in that delightful place. Tired and spent with lovemaking, hungry and thirsty, the king went into an arbour of fragrant Madhavi creepers that he saw nearby.

Entering that bower with his beloved, he saw a pond full of water that was transparent and bright as nectar. The king sat on its bank with her and encouraged her to bathe in that lovely pool. At his word, she plunged into the water, but then she did not surface again. The frantic king dove in and sought her under the water, but he found no trace of her.

He ordered the waters of the tank drained and, at the bottom, sitting at the lip of a hole in the ground, was a frog. The king was furious when he saw the frog, and issued a dreadful edict againt their species.

“Let every frog in my kingdom be killed! Anyone who wants an audience with me must come with a tribute of dead frogs.”

When frogs began to be killed everywhere, the terrified creatures told their king what had happened. The king of the frogs assumed the appearance of a sadhu and came to Parikshit of Ayodhya.

He said, “O King, do not let anger rule you; instead, be inclined to grace. It is not right that you kill innocent frogs.”

The king of the frogs, in sadhu’s guise, chanted in a low voice: “Unfadingly glorious, slay not the frogs; pacify your wrath; the artha and punya of ignorant souls will diminish. Swear you will renounce your wrath against frogs. Why do you sin? Slaying these creatures serves no purpose.”

King Parikshit, who was broken-hearted because of the vanishment of his wife, whom he had loved so dearly, answered the frog king, “I will not forgive the frogs. I will kill them. The wretched frogs swallowed my wife, and all frogs deserve death at my hand. Do not intercede on their behalf, learned one.”

Hearing Parikshit’s words, the king of the frogs said in a voice filled with pain, “Be gracious, O King. I am Ayu, the king of the frogs. Your wife was my daughter, Susobhana. What she did to you was not dharma. She has deceived many kings in the same way.”

The king said to him, “I desire her. Give her to me.”

The king of the frogs then bestowed his daughter on Parikshit with the injunction that she wait upon and serve him. He said angrily to her, “You have deceived many kings, and because of your sin your children will disgrace themselves by being disrespectful to Brahmanas.”

Regaining her, Parikshit was so overwhelmed by infatuation that he felt as if he had conquered the three worlds. He bowed down to the king of the frogs and worshipped him. Crying for joy, he said, “Truly, have I been blessed.”

The king of the frogs bid his daughter farewell and returned to where he had come from. Time went by and king Parikshit and his queen had three sons, whom they named Sala, Dala and Bala. In due course, the king installed the eldest of them on the throne and, setting his heart on tapasya, retired into the forest.

One day when Sala was out hunting he saw a deer and pursued it in his chariot. The king urged his sarathy to go faster, but the charioteer said to his king, “It is pointless chasing the deer; you cannot catch it. If your chariot had been drawn by horses of the Vami breed, you could have overtaken it.”

The young king said, “On pain of death, tell me all about Vami horses.”

The charioteer became alarmed. He was afraid of the king but on the other hand he was more frightened of Vamadeva's curse and would not tell the king anything. The king lifted his sword and said to him, "Tell me now, or I will kill you."

Fear overcame him, and the sarathy said, "The Vami horses belong to Vamadeva; they are swift as the mind."

Immediately, the king ordered him to take him to Vamadeva's asrama, and when they arrived there, he said to the Rishi, "Holy one, I am in pursuit of a deer that I wounded. You must help me catch up with it by giving me a pair of Vami horses."

The Rishi replied, "I will give you my pair of Vami horses but, when you have achieved your purpose, you must return my horses to me."

The king took those horses and, taking his leave of the Rishi, pursued the deer in his chariot now drawn by Vami steeds. After he left the hermitage he said to his charioteer, "Brahmanas do not deserve to possess such horses. We need not return these two to Vamadeva."

He now easily overtook the deer, slew it and, returning to his capital, stabled those horses in his palace.

Meanwhile, the Rishi reflected, "The prince is young. Having obtained the two excellent steeds, he rides them happily and will not return them to me. What a pity."

After a month elapsed, he said to one of his disciples, "Go, Atreya, and say to the king that if he has finished with the Vami steeds he should return them to me."

Atreya went to the king and spoke to him as he had been instructed; and the king replied, "These horses, jewels of great value, deserve to be owned by a Kshatriya, and not a Brahmana. What need do Brahmanas have of horses? Return in peace."

Atreya went back and told his Acharya what had happened, and Vamadeva was enraged. He went himself to the king and demanded that his horses be returned to him.

The king refused, and the Rishi Vamadeva said, "Bhumipala, give me back my Vami horses. You have used them to accomplish a task which was otherwise impossible for you. O Kshatriya, do not break both Brahmana and Kshatriya dharma and invite death to yourself by Varuna's curse."

The king answered, "Vamadeva, this pair of excellent and docile bulls are suitable animals for a Brahmana like you. O Rishi, you are great indeed.

Take them; you can ride them to any place you choose. What need do you have of horses when the Vedas themselves would carry a saintly man like you."

Vamadeva said, "O king, the Vedas do, indeed, carry ones like us, but that is in the hereafter. In this world, animals like my Vami horses carry me, men like me, and others as well."

The king said, "Let four donkeys carry you, or four mules of the best kind, or even four horses that are as swift as the wind. Take any of these. These Vami horses, however, deserve to be owned by a Kshatriya. Accept that these are not for you."

Vamadeva said, "O king, stern vows have been ordained for Brahmanas. This I swear, that if I have lived in their observance, four dreadful Rakshasas, their bodies like iron, will hunt and kill you, and bear you on their lances, after cutting your body into four parts."

The king said, "Vamadeva, these soldiers of mine, armed with bright spears, know that you are a Brahmana who wants to take a king's life. They will bring you and your disciples to your knees before me."

Vamadeva said, "O king, when you received my horses you swore you would return them. You must give them back to me to save your life."

The king said, "Hunting deer is not an occupation fit for Brahmanas, but I will not punish you for straying from your svadharma. From this day, by obeying all your commands, I will, O Brahmana, attain bliss in Swarga. But the Vami horses remain with me."

Vamadeva said, "A Brahmana cannot be punished in thought, word or deed. The man who learns that a Brahmana has strayed from his dharma does not achieve a lofty position in this world. But now meet your death."

When Vamadeva said this, Rajan, four Rakshasas of horrible appearance, with lances in their hands, set upon the king, to kill him.

The king cried out, "O Brahmana, even if all the descendants of the Ikshvakus, my brother Dala, and all these Vaisyas tell me to, I will not yield the Vami steeds to you, for then these men will be stripped of their dharma."

Even as these words came out of his mouth, the Rakshasas killed king Sala, and the lord of the Earth lay on the ground. The Ikshvakus installed Dala on the throne.

The Brahmana Vamadeva went to the court of the Ikshvakus and addressed the new monarch, "O king, all the sacred books declare that men should give freely to Brahmanas. If you fear sin, give me the Vami horses without delay."

Angrily did the king hear these words of Vamadeva's, and he said to his charioteer, "Bring me an arrow from my quiver, one which is beautiful to look at and tipped with poison. Let it strike Vamadeva and let him fall down in agony and be torn apart by our dogs."

Vamadeva responded, "I know that you have a ten-year-old son named Senajita, by your queen. My word can command your arrow to kill the boy!" '

Markandeya continues, 'Rajan, the fierce arrow that the king shot flew to the inner apartments of the palace and killed the prince playing there.

When Dala heard of this, he said, "People of the Ikshvaku race, I will deliver you by killing this Brahmana and grinding him into the Earth. Bring me another arrow of blazing energy. Lords of the world, witness my might."

Vamadeva said, "This venomous arrow that you aim at me will not fly a true path; why, you will not be able to release it from your bow."

Now the king confessed, "O Ikshvakus, I find I cannot loose the arrow I have in my hand, and I have failed to kill this Brahmana. Let Vamadeva live and be blessed with a long life."

Vamadeva said, "You may expiate your sin of trying to take the life of a Brahmana by touching your queen with this arrow."

King Dala did as he was told, and the queen then said to the Rishi, "O Vamadeva, give me leave to teach this ignorant and foolish husband of mine daily, and give him wisdom. O Dvija, let me always wait upon and serve Brahmanas and thus acquire sacred realms after I die."

Hearing the queen, Vamadeva said, "Beautiful-eyed one, you have saved this royal race. Ask me for an exceptional boon, for I will grant whatever you ask for. Faultless one, rule over your clan and this great kingdom of the Ikshvakus!"

The queen said, "O lambent one, free my husband from his sin, and direct your mind to the well-being of his son and kinsmen. This is the boon I ask, Brahmanottama."

The Muni said, "Tathaastu, so be it."

King Dala was extremely glad and, bowing in reverence, gave the Muni his Vami steeds,' says Markandeya."

Vaisampayana said, "The Rishis, the Brahmanas and Yudhishtira then ask Markandeya, 'How did the Rishi Baka have such a long life?'

Markandeya says, 'The Rajarishi Baka is a great tapasvin and was, indeed, blessed with long life; but do not ask why.'

Hearing this, O Bhaarata, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja and his brothers say to Markandeya, 'We have heard that Baka, as well as Dalbhya, both illumined souls, are immortal and that they, who are universally revered, are dear to the king of the Devas. We would like to hear about the meeting of Baka and Indra, the story that is, at once, sad and happy. Tell it to us in brief.'

Markandeya says, 'When the great war between the Devas and the Asuras was over, Indra became sovereign of the three worlds. The clouds brought plentiful rain and the people on Earth enjoyed rich harvests; they became contented and lived virtuous, peaceful lives.

Everyone lived according to their svadharma, at peace with each other and the world; and seeing serenity prevail, Indra, slayer of Bala, was filled with joy.

Seated on his elephant Airavata, he of the hundred sacrifices surveyed his subjects. He looked at the Rishis' asramas, at the sacred rivers, at prosperous towns and villages, at the plenitude of the countryside. He saw kings, living by dharma, ruling justly over their subjects. He looked at tanks and reservoirs, wells, lakes and ponds full of water, beside which devout Brahmanas lived, keeping excellent vratas.

And Indra came down to the felicitous Earth, Rajan, and went to a blessed asrama set in a charming grove on the eastern shore. There, in that asrama, where many animals and birds lived, and trees grew in profusion, Indra saw Baka. Overjoyed to see Indra, Baka received him worshipfully—he washed his feet with water, offered him arghya, spread a carpet for him to sit on and served him fruit and roots to eat.

When he was comfortably seated, the divine ruler of the immortals asked Baka, 'Sinless Muni, you have lived for a hundred years. Tell me, O Brahmana, what are the sorrows of those that are immortal?'

Baka answered, saying, "Living with those one dislikes, separation from loved ones and good men, living amongst the wicked—these are the evils that the immortals have to bear. Among the worst sorrows they have to endure is the death of sons, wives, relatives and friends; and the pain of dependence on others. In my opinion, there is nothing more pitiful than a poor man being insulted by a rich one.

Other iniquities that the immortals have to witness are the acquisition of high status by those that do not have or deserve it; the loss of it by those that do; disharmony and discord; how the wealthy gain all that they want despite not having honour—those that live forever have to see all this, O Lord of the hundred yagnas.

What can be sadder than the calamities and reverses experienced by Devas, Asuras, Gandharvas, Manavas, Nagas and Rakshasas? Those of noble birth suffer by becoming subjects of the low-born, the poor are humiliated by the rich—these are distressing conditions.

The world is replete with such injustices. The foolish and the ignorant are cheerful and glad while the learned and the wise endure misery. There is so much sorrow and pain, and the deathless have to see it all and they suffer."

Indra said, "Blessed one, tell me, what are the joys that the immortals enjoy, which are also enjoyed by the gods?"

Baka answered, "There is none happier than the man who cooks, even a scanty meal, in the eighth or twelfth hour of the day, and the man who has no evil friends. True happiness belongs to one who does not eat too much, or voraciously, the man who cooks even a few meagre vegetables and fruit that he has earned through his own effort and prepared in his own house.

Such a man is worthy of respect. A man who eats food in another's house, given to him in contempt, does a despicable thing, even if the fare is rich. That is why the wise never touch the food of men that eat in another's house, like dogs or Rakshasas.

There is no better thing than for a good Brahmana to eat what remains after feeding his guests and servants and offering food to his ancestors. No food is sweeter or more sacred. There is nothing more delicious or more sacred than food of which the first serving is given to a guest. Every mouthful of rice that the Brahmana eats after having served his guest is as blessed as giving away one hundred cows, and will wash away whatever sins he committed in his youth. If a Brahmana sprinkles water over the one who serves him such food, that person is cleansed of his sins."

After speaking of these and other matters with Baka, the Lord of the Devas returns to Indraloka.' "

Vaisampayana said, "The sons of Pandu say to Markandeya, 'You have told us of the greatness of Brahmanas. Now we want to hear of the glory of the royal caste, the Kshatriyas.'

Maharishi Markandeya says to them, 'Listen while I tell you of the eminence of the Kshatriyas.

A king named Suhotra, of the Kuru clan, went on a journey to visit the great Rishis. As he was returning, he came upon king Sibi, the son of Usinara, riding in his chariot. As they approached one other, each greeted the other in a way he thought most fitting; but neither would give way to the other's chariot as each considered himself the other's equal.

At this moment, the Devarishi Narada appeared there and, seeing them, demanded, "Why are you both blocking each other's way?"

The kings said to Narada, "Holy One, do not ask. The sages of old have declared that the one who is superior or more able should have right of way. We are equal to each other in every respect and neither of us can be judged to be superior to the other."

Hearing this, Narada recited three slokas—"O Kurunandana, the arrogant man treats everyone, even humble folk, with cruelty; one who is humble behaves with modesty and candour to all, even to those who are unprincipled. He who is honest behaves honestly, even towards the dishonest; why then would he not behave honestly with those who have integrity? The honest man thinks of any service done to him as being a hundredfold. Is this not how the gods are?

It is the royal son of Usinara who is a better man than you. One should win over the mean-minded with charity, the untruthful with truth, the wicked with forgiveness, and the dishonest with honesty.

You are both large-hearted. Keeping these slokas in mind, one of you must give way to the other."

Narada fell silent and, hearing what the Rishi said, the king of the Kurus walked around Sibi in pradakshina, praised his many achievements and allowed him to pass. Then he went on in his way. Narada uses this story to illustrate the greatness of the Kshatriyas.' "

"Markandeya continues, 'Listen now to another story. One day, as king Yayati, the son of Nahusha, was sitting on his throne, surrounded by his people, there came to him a Brahmana begging for alms on behalf of his guru.

He approached the king and said, "O king, because of my vow to him, I beg for alms for my guru."

The king said, "Holy one, tell me what your vow is."

The man said, "O king, in this world, men are contemptuous of one who begs them for alms. With what feelings will you give me what I ask for, on which I have set my heart?"

The king replied, "Once I give something away, I never boast of it. I do not entertain requests for things I cannot give, but I do hear requests for those that I can; and giving them makes me glad. I will give you a thousand cows. The Brahmana that asks me for a gift is always dear to me. I am never angry with the man who begs alms of me and I am never sorry for having given away anything!"

And the Brahmana then got one thousand cows from the king and went away.' "

Vaisampayana said, "The Pandavas address the Rishi once more and say, 'Tell us more about the honour of the Kshatriyas!'

And Markandeya says, 'There were two kings, named Vrishadarbha and Seduka, and both of them were learned in dharma and in the Astra Shastra, and the ways of attack and defence. Seduka knew that Vrishadarbha had sworn a silent vow in his childhood, to give no metal to Brahmanas other than gold and silver.

One day, a Brahmana who had completed his Vedic studies came to Seduka and, blessing him, begged him for alms for his guru, saying, "Give me a thousand horses."

Seduka said to him, "I cannot give your guru what you ask. Go to Raja Vrishadarbha, O Brahmana. He is a virtuous king. If you ask him, he will give you a thousand horses, for that is his vow."

The Brahmana went to Vrishadarbha and begged him for a thousand horses. The king responded by striking the Brahmana with a whip, at which the Brahmana said, "Why do you attack an innocent man?"

The Brahmana was on the point of cursing him, when the king said, "O Brahmana, do you curse the man who does not give you what you ask for? Is this the dharma of a Brahmana?"

And the Brahmana said, “Rajadhiraja, king of kings, I came to beg from you because Seduka sent me here.”

The king said, “I will give you whatever tribute I receive today. How can I send away empty-handed the man I have whipped?”

And the king gave that Brahmana all the proceeds of the day, which was more than the value of a thousand horses.’ ”

"Markandeya says, 'One day the gods decided to come down to Earth and test the dharma of king Sibi, the son of Usinara. Agni and Indra descended to Bhumi, and Agni took the form of a pigeon flying away from Indra, who pursued him as a hawk. And the pigeon fell into King Sibi's lap while he sat on his throne.

The Rajapurohita, the royal priest, said to the king, "This pigeon is afraid of the hawk and has come to you for refuge. Wise men say that a pigeon falling on one's lap is a bad omen and forewarns of some grave danger. You are a king and understand signs; so, give the pigeon to the hawk in charity and save yourself from the danger indicated."

The pigeon spoke to the king, "I am afraid of the hawk and have come to you to save my life. I am, actually, a Muni; I have taken the form of a pigeon and come to you for protection. You hold my life in your hands.

I am learned in the Vedas, I am a brahmachari with self-control, and a tapasvin. Further, I have never spoken disrespectfully to my guru, and I possess every quality of the pure-hearted. I chant the Vedas; I know the poetic form and metre of all their verses; I am letter-perfect in the Vedas. And I am not a pigeon.

Oh, do not give me up to the hawk. Giving up a learned and chaste Brahmana never makes a good gift."

Now the hawk addressed the king, and said, “Creatures are not always born on the Earth in the same form. In some former life you may have been a child of this pigeon. It is not proper for you, O king, to interfere with my procuring food by protecting the pigeon, even though he might have been your father.”

The king said, “Has any one ever heard birds speak the pure language of men? Hearing what the pigeon and hawk had to say, how can we tell what is the right thing to do? He that surrenders a frightened creature, which seeks his protection from its enemy, does not get protection when he himself needs it. Indeed, the clouds do not send rain for him; the seeds he sows do not sprout for him.

He that gives up an afflicted creature seeking protection from its enemies will see his children die in their infancy. The ancestors of such a man will never attain bliss in heaven. The gods do not accept the libations of ghee that such a man pours into the sacred fire. He that gives up a frightened creature which has come to him for refuge from its enemies is struck by a thunderbolt cast by the gods, with Indra at their head.

The food he eats is unclean and he, of the small soul, falls from grace. O hawk, let the people of the Sibi clan place before you a bull cooked with rice, in place of this pigeon. And let them carry an abundance of meat to your home, wherever you live.”

The hawk said, “O king, I do not ask for a bull or for any other meat, nor do I ask for anything more than this pigeon, which the gods have given me. The pigeon’s death has been ordained and it is my meal for today. So, O Rajan, give it to me.”

The king replied, “My men will bring a live bull to your home. Consider the bull the ransom for this terrified bird, and I will myself supervise its being fetched to your dwelling. Don’t kill the pigeon. I will surrender my own life before the pigeon’s.

Do you not see how like a sacrifice dabbed with Soma juice this pigeon looks? Blessed one, do not be obstinate. I can in no way give the pigeon to you.

Command me to do something else that pleases you and satisfies you, something which I am able to do, of which the men of the Sibi clan will be proud and praise me for. I promise to do what you ask.”

The hawk said, “Rajan, if you give me flesh cut from your right thigh, that is equal to the weight of the pigeon, you can save him. This would please me and be praiseworthy.”

The king agreed to this and, cutting a piece of flesh from his right thigh, weighed it against the pigeon. But the pigeon was heavier. The king carved out another piece of his flesh, but still the pigeon was heavier. Then the king cut pieces of flesh from all parts of his body and placed them on the scale, but the pigeon continued to weigh more than all of them. Finally, the king, cheerfully and without a trace of regret, climbed bodily onto the scales, and the hawk vanished from there, exclaiming, Saved!

The king said to the pigeon, “O pigeon, tell us who the hawk is. No one other than the Lord of the universe could do as he did. Exalted one, answer me.”

The pigeon said, “I am the smoke-bannered Agni, also called Vaiswanara. The hawk is Sachi’s lord, the wielder of the thunderbolt. Son of Suratha, you are a bull among men. We came to test you. These pieces of flesh, Rajan, that you have cut from your body with your sword to save my life, have made deep wounds. I will sanctify them; your scars will be the colour of gold and fragrant. You will earn great fame and the gods will honour you.

Long will you reign over your subjects, and you will father a son who will be called Kapotaroma. O King, this child will be born from your body, and you will see him become the best of the Surathas, a prince who will blaze with fame, valour and beauty,” says Markandeya.’

Vaisampayana said, "The son of Pandu addresses Markandeya once again, saying, 'Tell us more about the greatness of the royal caste of kings.'

And Markandeya says, 'King Ashtaka, descendant of Viswamitra, conducted an Aswamedha yagna, which many kings attended, including his brothers, Pratardana and Vasumanas, and Usinara's son Sibi. After the sacrifice was completed Ashtaka was travelling in his chariot with his brothers when they met Narada coming towards them. They greeted the Devarishi and said to him, "Come; ride on our chariot with us."

Narada agreed, saying, Tathaastu, and climbed into the chariot. After paying their respects to Narada, one of the kings said to him, "O Illustrious, I want to ask you something."

The Rishi gave him permission and that king said, "All four of us are blessed with long lives and every virtue. We shall, therefore, go to heaven and live there for a long time. Which of us will be the first to fall?"

The Rishi Narada said, "Ashtaka will be the first to come down."

And the king who had asked the question said, "For what reason?"

And the Rishi answered, "I lived for a few days in Ashtaka's palace. One day, he took me out of the city in his chariot and, there, I saw thousands of cows, all of different colours. I asked him whose they were and he told me that they were cattle he had given away, thus praising himself. It is because of his answer that he will have to come down from Swarga."

One of the kings, again, asked Narada, "Of the three of us who remain in heaven, who will be the first to fall to Bhumi?"

And the Rishi answered, "Pratardana".

When asked why, the Rishi related this incident. He said, "I lived for some days in Pratardana's household. One day, when I was riding with him in his chariot, a Brahmana stopped him and asked for a horse. Pratardana said he would give him one when he returned home, and the Brahmana urged him to do it soon. Because the Brahmana was impatient, the king gave him the horse that was yoked to the right wheel of the chariot.

We met another Brahmana who, also, wanted a horse. The king said the same thing to him and, in response to the Brahmana's impatience, gave him the horse that was yoked to his chariot's left wheel. The king continued on his way and soon came upon a third Brahmana, who asked him for a horse. The king gave him one more of his horses, and we proceeded on our journey. We met a fourth Brahmana who asked for a horse, and the king gave him the one that was yoked to front left of his chariot. A fifth Brahmana came to the king as we rode along and asked for a horse. This time, the king said he would give him one as soon as he returned home. But, because the Brahmana urged him to do this soon, the king gave him the last horse, unyoking it, and leaving the chariot horseless. The king picked up the yoke of his chariot himself and began to pull it along.

As he pulled his chariot, he said, "Now I have nothing to give Brahmanas." The king had, no doubt, given all his horses away, but his charity was diminished somewhat by his less than wholehearted attitude. Therefore, he is the next to come down from heaven.

Of the two kings who would remain in heaven, one asked, "Which of the two of us will fall first from heaven?"

Narada said, "Vasumanas," and when the king asked for the reason, narrated another incident. He said, "In course of my roving, I arrived at the home of Vasumanas, at the time when the Brahmanas were performing the ceremony of Swativachana on a flower chariot. I came, unseen, into the king's presence and, after the Brahmanas had completed the ceremony, made myself visible. When I praised the chariot, the king said to me, Holy one, you have admired this chariot, so let it be yours.

Sometime later, when I needed another chariot, I went once more to Vasumanas. Again, the king gave me the chariot I admired. I went to the king a third time and admired one of his chariots. This time the king showed the chariot to his Brahmanas and, looking at me, said, Sublime Sage, you have been generous in your praise, but did not give me the chariot. For this he will fall down from heaven."

One of them said, "One of us will go with you to heaven. Of the two of us, who will come down to earth, and who will continue to dwell in Swarga?"

Narada answered, saying, "Sibi will be the one who stays in heaven, and I the one who falls." When asked the reason for this, Narada said, "I am not the equal of Sibi. Hear why I say this. One day a Brahmana came to Sibi and said, O Sibi, I come to you for food.

Sibi responded, Tell me what to do; I am yours to command.

The Brahmana answered, Kill your son, named Brihadgarbha, and cook him for my meal.

I waited to see what would happen. Sibi killed his son and cooked his flesh, then, putting the food into a serving dish, carried it on his head and went in search of the Brahmana. While he was looking for him, someone told him that the Brahmana he was searching for had gone to the city and, in a frenzy of rage, was setting fire to his house, to his treasury and arsenal, to the women's apartments and to the elephants' and horses' stables. Sibi heard all this, calmly.

He went into his city, found the Brahmana and said to him, Holy one, the food is ready. The Brahmana became speechless with surprise and lowered his gaze in discomfiture. Sibi, trying to please the Brahmana, said, Holy one, here, eat this.

The Brahmana glanced at Sibi and said, Eat it yourself. Promptly, Sibi took the serving dish from atop his head and was about to eat, when the Brahmana caught hold of his hand and said, You have conquered anger. There is nothing that you will not give a Brahmana.

Saying this, that Brahmana worshipped Sibi, and when Sibi looked up he saw his son standing before him like a divine child, decked in ornaments, and a heavenly fragrance emanating from his body. Finally, the Brahmana revealed his true self; he was none other than Vidhata, who had come in that guise to try the king.

When Vidhata had left, the king's ministers said to Sibi, When you know everything, why did you do all this?

And Sibi answered, It was not for fame, wealth or from the desire to acquire material enjoyment that I did all this. What I did is not sinful, therefore I did it. The path taken by the righteous is praiseworthy, and I have always leaned towards the virtuous course of action. '" Narada said.

I know this instance of Sibi's goodness, and I have narrated it,' says Markandeya."

Vaisampayana said, "The Pandavas and the Rishis then ask Markandeya, 'Is there anybody blessed with longer life than you?'

And Markandeya answers them, 'There was a Rajarishi named Indradyumna, whose virtue had diminished. He fell from heaven, crying, "All that I have achieved is for nothing."

He came to me and asked, "Do you recognise me?"

I said, "From our anxiety to acquire religious merit, we do not have permanent homes. We stay for only one night in any village or town. People like us, therefore, cannot possibly know who you are. The fasts and vows we observe make us physically weak and unable to follow any worldly pursuits."

He then asked me, "Is there anyone who has a longer life than you?"

I answered him, "On Himavat Mountain there lived an owl by the name of Pravarakarna. He is older than me; he may know you. The place on Himavat where he lives is very far from here."

At this, Indradyumna became a horse and carried me to where that owl lived. And the king asked the owl, "Do you know me?"

The owl reflected for a moment and then said to the king, "No, I do not know you."

Indradyumna asked the owl, "Is there anyone who is older than you?"

And the owl answered, “There is a lake called Indradyumna, in which there lives a crane named Nadijangha. He is older than me. Ask him.”

King Indradyumna took me and the owl to that lake where the crane Nadijangha lived, and we asked, “Do you know Raja Indradyumna?”

The crane thought for a while and then said, “I do not know king Indradyumna.”

We asked the crane, “Is there anyone who is older than you?”

And he answered, “There lives, in this very lake, a tortoise named Akupara. He is older than me. He may know something of this king. Ask Akupara.”

The crane spoke to the tortoise and said, “We want to ask you something. Please come to where we are.”

Obligingly, the tortoise came out of the lake to the bank where we were, and we asked him, “Do you know this king Indradyumna?”

The tortoise reflected for a moment. His heart was moved and his eyes filled with tears; he trembled all over with powerful emotion and nearly lost consciousness. He joined his hands and said, “Do I not know this king! He has planted the sacrificial stake a thousand times for kindling the sacrificial fire. It is the cows that this king gave to Brahmanas that were used to excavate this lake. I have lived here ever since.”

No sooner had the tortoise said this, than a chariot flew down from heaven and a voice spoke from the skies to Indradyumna, “Come! Take your rightful place in heaven. Great are your achievements. Come joyfully to your place in Swarga.”

Listen to these slokas—Reports of virtuous actions spread over the earth and reach heaven. The doer of these actions stays in heaven for as long as these reports last. The man whose evil deeds are talked about will descend to the lowest regions and live there for as long as this talk goes on. Therefore, a man who wants to go to Swarga should be honourable and ethical. He should shun evil and seek refuge in goodness.

Hearing these words, the king said, “Let the chariot remain here and take these old people back to where they came from.” Then, he took the owl and me back to our homes and returned to his own place.

Because I have lived for so long, I saw all this,’ says Markandeya.

Markandeya tells these stories to the Pandavas and, when he has finished, they say to him, ‘Blessings be upon you. You did the right thing to make Indradyumna regain his rightful place in Swargaloka, from which he had fallen.'

Markandeya says, 'Similarly, Devaki's son Krishna raised the Rajarishi Nriga, who had sunk into Naraka, and restored him to Swarga.' "

Vaisampayana said, "Yudhishtira hears the illustrious Markandeya's story of how the Rajarishi Indradyumna regained his place in heaven, and he asks the Muni, 'Mahamuni, how should a man practise charity in order to gain admission into Indraloka? Is it by practising charity while leading a domestic life, in boyhood, in youth, or in old age that he goes to Indraloka? O, tell me what each is worth.'

Markandeya says, 'There are four kinds of life that are useless. So too, there are sixteen kinds of charity that are futile. These men live in vain—he who has no son; he who is corrupt; he who lives on food made by others; he who cooks but does not give first to the Devas, Pitrs and Sadasyas.

The first two kinds of gifts that are worthless are these—those given to a sinful person; and those which have been earned wrongfully. The gift to an adharmic Brahmana, to a thief, to a teacher who is false—these gifts are worthless, too. Also worthless are gifts to a liar, to a sinner, to an ingrate, to one who officiates at sacrifices performed by all classes of people in a village, to one who teaches the Vedas for a fee, to a Brahmana who cooks for a Sudra and to a Brahmana who does not follow the svadharma of a Brahmana. The gift given to one who has married a girl after she has attained puberty, to a female, to one who plays with snakes and to one who is employed in a menial job, is also in vain. These sixteen kinds of charity earn the giver no punya.

The distressed man who gives from fear or anger enjoys the merit of such gifts while he is in the womb of his mother. The man who makes gifts to Brahmanas, under circumstances other than those listed earlier, enjoys the fruit of his charity in old age. Therefore, O king, the man who wishes to pave his way to heaven should, under all circumstances, give everything he wants to give away to Brahmanas.'

Yudhishtira says, 'How do Brahmanas, accepting gifts from people of all four castes, save others as well as themselves?'

Markandeya says, 'They do this by japa, mantras, homa and the study of the Vedas. With these as tools, the Brahmanas construct a Vedic boat in which they rescue others and themselves from the sea of samsara. The gods are pleased with the man who gratifies the Brahmanas, and a man may attain Swarga at the command of a Brahmana.

You will, Rajan, certainly gain the place of everlasting bliss by virtue of your worship of the Pitrs and Devas, and by your reverence for Brahmanas, even though your body may be filled with contagious phlegm, and be dull and lethargic!

He who wants to be virtuous and find Swarga should worship Brahmanas. He should feed Brahmanas with care during sraddhas. On such occasions, he should exclude those that are cursed or have lapsed in dharmic ways; who are very fair or very dark; have dirty nails; are lepers; are deceitful; have been born illegitimately to widows or married women; and who live as mercenaries.

An impure sraddha consumes the performer like fire consuming fuel. If blind, deaf or dumb people are to be employed at sraddhas, care should be taken to employ them along with Brahmanas conversant with the Vedas.

Yudhishtira, listen now while I tell you who the deserving recipients of your gifts are. He that knows all the Vedas should give only to a Brahmana who has merited the ability to save himself and the giver, for only such a man can be thought of as truly able. Son of Pritha, the attentive care of Sadasyas gratifies the sacred fire more than does the pouring of ghee or offering of flowers and sandalwood paste. Therefore, strive to look after your guests. Rajan, they that give guests water to wash their feet, butter to rub on their tired legs, light during the night, food and shelter, do not have to face Yama.

The removal, after worship, of flowers offered to the gods; the removal of the remnants of a Brahmana's feast; waiting upon a Brahmana with scented pastes; and the massaging of a Brahmana's limbs are each more deserving of merit than the gift of cows.

The gift of a Kapila cow saves the giver from sin. So, foremost among kings, one should gift a Kapila cow decked with ornaments to Brahmanas. Bhaarata, these are the kinds of people one should give to—a person of good lineage who has knowledge of the Vedas; the poor; a grihasta, a householder burdened with the care of a wife and children; a person that worships the sacred fire every day; and a person who has not done you any service. You should always give to such people, not to them that have wealth, for there is no point in it, Bhaaratottama.

One cow must be given to one Brahmana, and not to be shared by many because, if this shared cow is sold, the giver's family will suffer for three generations. Such a gift would definitely not save the giver or the recipient.

Giving eighty ratis of pure gold is as beneficial as giving a hundred pieces of gold, into eternity. He that gives away a strong bull capable of drawing the plough is rescued from all difficulties and finally goes to Swarga. He that gives away land to a learned Brahmana has all his desires fulfilled.

That man who, when asked by an exhausted traveller with tired legs and dusty feet, tells him the name of a person who will feed him, gains as much merit as the giver of food himself. Therefore, give food, rather than any other gift. There is no better gift than food. The man, who, according to his means, gives well-cooked and clean food to Brahmanas, earns the companionship of Prajapati Brahma.

There is nothing superior to food. Thus, food is seen as the first and best of all things to give away. It has been said that food is Brahma. Prajapati is regarded as the year; and the year is yagna. Everything begins with sacrifice, for it is from sacrifice that all creatures, animate and inanimate, are created. That is why food is the foremost of all things.

They who give lakes, tanks, wells, shelter and food; they who speak sweetly to everyone will not hear Yama's accusing voice. Bhumi Devi, the Earth, is pleased with him who gives wealth, earned by his labour, and rice to pious Brahmanas; and She showers him with wealth. The giver of food walks first, next the speaker of truth, and next the one who does not beg, although all three go to the same place.'

Hearing all this, Yudhishtira and his brothers are curious and ask the high-souled Markandeya, 'Great Muni, how far is Yamaloka from Bhumi? How large is it? How do men escape going there? O, tell us all this.'

Markandeya says, 'O king, most virtuous of men, your question is related to a great mystery. It is sacred and treasured by the Rishis. As it has to do with dharma, I will tell you about it.

The distance of Yama's world from the world of men is eighty-six thousand yojanas. The way is over waterless space, and is terrible to behold. Nowhere on that road is there the shade of a tree, any water, or any resting-place for the weary traveller. Men, women and all beings that live on Earth are forcibly led along this way by Yama's messengers, his dutas.

Yama's servitors and they that have given horses and other means of transport to Brahmanas ride on horseback and on chariots. They that have given parasols have parasols to protect them from the sun's rays as they walk to Yamaloka. They that have given food walk without hunger, while they that have not go hungry. They that have given clothes go clothed, while they that have not go naked. They that have given gold go cheerfully, decked in ornaments; they that have given land proceed with all their needs gratified; and they that have given grain go along the way without any wants.

They that have given houses go on chariots; those men that have given something to drink go cheerfully, unaffected by thirst; and they that have given lights go happily, the way lit before them. They that have given cows go in good cheer, freed from all their sins; they that have fasted for a month go on a craft drawn by swans; and they that have fasted for six nights, ride on blithe chariots drawn by peacocks. And, Pandava, he that has fasted three days, on only one meal, goes to a realm free from disease and anxiety.

Water possesses the uncanny quality of creating happiness in Yamaloka, and they that give water on earth find themselves by a river there, named Pushpodaka. These people drink cool, ambrosial draughts from that stream, while they that are evil only have recourse to flowing pus. That river serves all purposes. Therefore, Rajan, show due reverence to the Brahmanas that are with you.

His legs fatigued by the distance he has walked, his body covered in the dust of the highway, the wayfarer asks for the name of the man who will give him food and goes expectantly to his house. Attend to him reverently because he is a guest and a Brahmana. Indra and the Devas walk behind him and, if he is cared for, they are pleased. If he is not, the celestials and their Lord are unhappy. Therefore, O best of kings, worship these Brahmanas.

I have spoken on a hundred subjects. What else do you want to hear from me?'

Yudhishtira says, 'Mahamuni, you know all there is to know about dharma and punya. I do not want to stop listening to you speak of them.'

Markandeya says, 'Rajan, I will now tell of another sacred subject of eternal interest, which is capable of washing away all sins. Listen attentively to me.

Bhaaratottama, merit equal to that of giving away a Kapila cow in the tirtha called Jyeshtha-Pushkara accrues from washing the feet of Brahmanas. As long as the earth is wet with water in which a Brahmana's feet have been washed, so long do the Pitrs drink water out of lotus-leaf cups.

If a guest is welcomed, the deities of fire become glad; and if he is offered a seat, it is the god of the hundred sacrifices who is gratified. If a guest's feet are washed, it is the Pitrs who are delighted; and if he is fed, it is Prajapati who is pleased.

One should whole-heartedly give away a cow while she is giving birth, when the feet and head of her calf are visible, and before her delivery is complete. A cow with her calf in the air, in the course of falling from the womb to the earth, is equal to the Bhumi Devi herself. The man who gives away such a cow reaps the benefit of giving away the Earth. And he is adored in Swarga for as many thousands of yugas as there are hairs on the bodies of the cow and her young one together.

Bhaarata, the man who, having accepted a gift, gives it away immediately to a good and honest person, gains great merit. Indeed, he reaps the benefit of giving away all the earth with her oceans and seas, caves and mountains, forests and woods.

A Brahmana who eats in silence, keeping his hands between his knees, gains the ability to save others. A Brahmana who abstains from drink and is regarded as faultless, and who reads the Samhitas everyday, also gains this ability. Butter and food given to a Brahmana who is learned in the Vedas are as beneficial as when they were poured into fire.

A Brahmana's weapon is anger, not arms made of iron. A Brahmana can kill a man with his anger as effectively as Indra slays Asuras with his

Vajra.'

Markandeya's discourse on the twin themes of punya and dharma is finished, and the Munis of the Naimisha vana are filled with joy on having heard it. They are freed from grief and anger by listening to it, and also purged of their sins and liberated from the cycle of birth and rebirth.

Yudhishtira asks, 'What does a Brahmana have to do to become, and remain, pure? I want to hear about this from you, most virtuous one.'

Markandeya answers, 'There are three kinds of purity—purity of speech, purity of action and purity achieved through the use of water. The man who practises all three surely attains Swarga.

Brahmanas who adore the goddess Sandhya in the morning and evening, and meditatively recite the sacred mantra of Gayatri, who is the mother of the Vedas, are sanctified by her and freed from all their sins. Even if they accept the very Earth and her oceans as gifts, they do not suffer the least unhappiness. Inauspicious conjunctions of the Sun and other planets become favourable, and auspicious conjunctions become even more propitious to such Brahmanas, because of their conduct.

Fearsome Rakshasas, gigantic and savage, that subsist on the flesh of animals, are unable to defeat the Brahmanas who practise these purifications. These Brahmanas are like blazing fires. They do not acquire the blemishes of teaching, of officiating at sacrifices, and of accepting gifts from others.

Whether a Brahmana knows the Vedas or is ignorant of them, whether his soul is pure or tainted, you should never insult him, for Brahmanas are like fire. Just as the fire that burns on a funeral pyre is not considered impure despite its function, so too is the Brahmana considered pure even if he is ignorant. He is great and godlike.

Cities that are adorned with numerous walls, gates and palaces are bereft of beauty if they have no Brahmanas in them. O king, only a city where Brahmanas, accomplished in the Vedas, duly observing their dharmic duties, and possessing learning and tapasya-shakti reside, is really a city. Son of Pritha, any place where learned Brahmanas live, be it a forest or pasture, is a city. Why, that place becomes a tirtha.

By going to a king who offers protection and to a Brahmana of ascetic merit, and by offering worship to both, a man instantly gets rid of his sins. Wise and learned men have said that bathing in the sacred tirthas, reciting the names of the great Rishis, and talking with good and pure-hearted people, are all acts worthy of praise. They that are virtuous and honest consider themselves sanctified by the holiness of companionship of others like themselves, satsangha, and by the holy water of pure and godly conversation.

The carrying of three staffs, the vow of silence, matted hair, the shaving of the head, the wearing of bark and deerskin, the practice of vows and ablutions, the worship of fire, living in the forest, the emaciation of the body—all these are useless if the heart is not pure. The indulgence of the six senses is easy if purity is its aim. Abstinence, however, which is difficult anyway, is even more so without purity of aim. Rajan, among the six senses the mind is the most dangerous!

True tapasya is purity of heart and soul, thought, word and action, rather than fasting and penances that result in a wasted body. He who has no compassion for relatives cannot be freed from sin even if his body is pure. His hard-heartedness is the enemy of his asceticism.

I say again, asceticism is not mere abstinence from worldly pleasures. He that is always pure and decked with virtue, he that practises kindness all his life, is a Muni even though he may lead a domestic life. Such a man is purged of all his sins. Fasts and other penances cannot destroy the effect of sin, however much they may weaken and dry up the body.

The man whose heart is without piety suffers torture by undergoing penances in ignorance of their meaning. He is never freed from sin by such hollow acts of reparation. The fire he worships does not consume his sins. It is only piety and virtue that give men access to the hallowed regions, and make fasts and vows effective.

Subsistence on fruit and roots, the vow of silence, living on mere air, tonsuring the head, giving up a fixed home, wearing matted locks, sleeping out in the open, daily fasts, the worship of fire, immersion in water and lying on bare ground—these by themselves cannot produce results. Only they that have true piety succeed, through knowledge and their actions, in conquering disease, decrepitude and death, and acquire spiritual elevation.

Just as seeds that have been scorched by fire do not sprout, so discomforts that have been burnt by knowledge cannot affect the soul. The body is like a block of wood and, when destitute of a soul, is as impermanent as foam in the ocean.

The man who catches a glimpse of the universality of his own soul by reciting one or even half a line of the Vedas needs nothing more. Some succeed in identifying themselves with Brahman, the Supreme Soul, from just two letters, and some from hundreds and thousands of verses. The knowledge of one's identity with the Parabrahman is the route to salvation.

Men of ancient times, who were distinguished for their knowledge, have said that a man who is plagued by doubt can never attain bliss, in this world or the next. The belief of oneness with Brahman is the way to mukti. He that knows the true meaning of the Vedas and understands their true purpose fears mere Vedic ritual, like a man at the sight of a forest fire.

Give up dry debate, take up the study of sacred knowledge by way of Sruti—recitations of sacred sounds, and Smriti—reading sacred texts; use your intellect, and seek knowledge of the eternal Brahman. One's search becomes futile from lack of means. Therefore, one should carefully strive to obtain that knowledge with the help of the Vedas. The Vedas are Brahman—they are His body; they are the Truth. The soul that is restricted by its bodily confines cannot know Him in whom all the Vedas merge; He can only be known by the pure intellect.

The existence of the gods as taught in the Vedas, the power of action and physical prowess are distinct in every yuga. One can gain freedom from these by purifying the senses. So, the suspension of sensory function is true fasting. One may attain Swarga through asceticism, one may obtain objects of enjoyment by the practice of charity and one may purge himself of his sins by bathing in hallowed tirthas, but it is knowledge alone that can confer complete emancipation.'

When Markandeya has said this, Yudhishtira of great renown says, 'O illustrious one, I want to hear about the laws that govern charity, which make it meritorious.'

Markandeya says, 'Yudhishtira, I highly regard the laws of charity that you wish to hear from me. Listen now to their mysteries, as expounded in the Sruti and the Smritis.

A man who performs a sraddha in the place called Gajachaya, at a spot fanned by the leaves of the aswattha tree, enjoys its rewards, Yudhishtira, for a hundred thousand kalpas. He that establishes a dharmasala and appoints a person to look after all who come there is crowned with the benefits of all the sacrifices. He that gives away a horse at a tirtha where the current of the stream runs in the opposite direction to the river's course gains unending merit.

The guest that comes to one's house for food is none other than Indra himself. If he is entertained with food, Indra bestows an excellent and inexhaustible reward. Just as boats take men safely across the water, the givers I have spoken of are saved from retribution for their sins. What is given to Brahmanas produces, like a gift of curds, endless punya.

A gift given on particular phases of the Moon's orbit results in twice the reward as on other days; given in a certain season it is ten times as powerful; and in a particular year its value is increased a hundredfold. The rewards earned by a gift made on the last day of the last month of the year never expire. The gift made on the days of the Sun's solstice, one made on the last day of the Sun's path through the constellations of Thula, Mesha, Mithuna, Kanya and Meena[1], and the gift made during eclipses of the Moon and the Sun reap limitless merit.

Learned men say that gifts given during the seasons produce merit that is multiplied ten times, a hundred times if made during the cusp of the seasons, and a thousand times if made when Rahu appears in the sky, and greater than at any other time. The gift made on the last day of the Sun's course through Thula and Mesha produces merit that never decreases.

Rajan, one cannot enjoy owning land unless one gives away land, and one cannot enjoy travelling in chariots and other vehicles unless one gives these away. A person is reborn with the enjoyment of the goals he had in mind at the time he gave a gift to a Brahmana.

Gold has sprung from Fire, the Earth from Vishnu and the cow from the Sun. So, he that gives away gold, land and cows reaches the abodes of Agni, Vishnu and Surya Deva. Nothing is as eternal as the act of giving a gift. What can be more auspicious, in all the three worlds? That is why, O king, those of fathomless intelligence say that there is nothing nobler or greater in the three Lokas as a gift.' "

Vaisampayana said, "Glorious king, Yudhishtira hears from Markandeya the story of how Indradyumna attains heaven and asks that magnificent, blemishless Muni, 'Virtuous one, you know the entire pantheon of the Devas, the Danavas and the Rakshasas. You can trace the genealogies of kings and Rishis. Brahmanottama, there is nothing in this world that you do not know! You also know, Mahamuni, many delightful stories about Manavas, Nagas and Rakshasas; about Devas, Gandharvas and Yakshas; and about Kinnaras and Apsaras. I long to hear these from you.

Why did Kuvalaswa, the unvanquished king of the Ikshvakus change his name to Dhundhumara? Best of the descendants of Bhrigu, I want to know in detail how and why the intelligent Kuvalaswa changed his name.'

The Maharishi Markandeya begins the tale of Dhundhumara.

Markandeya says, 'Yudhishtira, listen and I will tell you everything you wish to know. The story of Dhundhumara is a moral one, so listen to how king Kuvalaswa of the Ikshvaku dynasty came to be known as Dhundhumara.

Bhaarata, there was a well-known Rishi named Utanka, whose asrama was set in a charming wilderness. Rishi Utanka performed a most severe tapasya, and for countless years, with the aim of obtaining the favour of Vishnu. Pleased with his tapasya the illustrious Lord Vishnu appeared before Utanka. Beholding the Deity, the Rishi in all humility began to glorify Him with hymns of adoration.

He said, “O Effulgent Lord, you have made all creatures - the Devas, Asuras and Manavas, all things mobile or immobile, even Brahma himself, the Vedas and all things that can be known. The Sky is your head, O Lord, the Sun and the Moon are your eyes. You who know no decay, the Winds are your breath and Fire your energy. The directions of the horizon are your arms and the great Ocean your belly. The hills and mountains are your thighs and the Air your hips, Madhusudana. The Earth makes up your feet, and plants the hair on your body.

O Lord, Indra, Soma, Agni and Varuna, indeed all the Devas, Asuras and great Nagas humbly wait upon you and sing hymns in adoration of you. Lord of the Universe, you pervade all creation. The great Rishis of immense tejas, endlessly plunged in dhyana, always worship you. When you are gratified the Universe is at peace; when you are angry terror grips every soul. You are the dispeller of fear.

You are the one, supreme Purusha. You are the cause of happiness of gods and men. O Lord, you covered the three Lokas with three strides. It was you that destroyed the Asuras when they were at the height of their power; it is your prowess that brought peace and joy to the Devas; it was your anger that destroyed hundreds of great Daitya lords. You are the Maker and Destroyer of the world’s creatures. It is by worshiping you that the gods attain felicity.”

Thus, Yudhishtira, the high-souled Utanka praised the Lord of the senses. And Vishnu said to Utanka, “I am pleased with you. Ask for a boon.”

Utanka said, “Seeing you before me is the greatest boon, Hari, Eternal Being, Lord of the Universe.”

Vishnu said, “I am happy with your lack of desires and with your devotion, Manavottama, best of men. But, Brahmana, you must let me give you some boon.”

When Lord Vishnu insisted, Utanka said with folded hands, “O illustrious, lotus-leaf eyed Lord, if you are pleased with me, then let my heart always dwell on virtue, truth and contentment. And let my heart always turn to you in bhakti.”

Hearing Utanka’s words, Vishnu said, “Brahmana, by my grace, I grant all you have asked for. I also bestow on you yogic power, with which you shall achieve a great thing for the Devas as well as for all the inhabitants of Triloka. Even as I speak, a great Asura named Dhundhu is performing a tapasya of fierce austerity with the object of destroying the three worlds.

Let me tell you who will kill that Asura. A king of invincible energy and prowess will be born into the Ikshvaku line, and he will be known by the name of Brihadaswa. He will have a son named Kuvalaswa, who will be endowed with great piety, self-control and fame. This best of kings will be blessed with yogic power that springs from me and, commanded by you, O Rishi, that king will be the slayer of the Asura Dhundhu."

Having spoken to the Brahmana, Vishnu vanished.' "

"Markandeya says, 'O king, after the death of this king of the Ikshvakus, a king of great dharma named Sasada ascended the throne of Ayodhya and ruled the earth. Sasada's son was the powerful Kakutstha, and Kakutstha's son was Anenasa. Anenasa had a son named Prithu, whose son was Viswagaswa, and from Viswagaswa was born Adri.

Adri's son was Yuvanaswa, Sravastha was born to Yuvanaswa and it was he who built the city of Sravasthi. Sravastha had a son named Brihadaswa to whom Kuvalaswa was born. Kuvalaswa had twenty-one thousand sons and all these sons were fierce and powerful, and mastered every skill.

Kuvalaswa himself excelled his father in every way and, when the time came, his father Brihadaswa installed the brave and exemplary prince on the throne. Having handed over the throne to his son, king Brihadaswa retired to a life of sannyasa in the forest.'

Markandeya continues, 'When Rajarishi Brihadaswa was preparing to retire into the vana, Utanka heard of it, and the sage of the dazzling tejas and immeasurable soul came to see Brihadaswa, that best of Kshatriyas. Rishi Utanka tried to persuade him to refrain from taking sannyasa.

Utanka said, "O king, it is your dharma to protect your people. Free us from our anxieties by being our protector. Because you are a great soul, the Earth will be safe under your guardianship. It is not right for you to take up sannyasa in the forest. Great merit attaches to the karma of protecting the people of this world, punya which you cannot have by living as a sannyasin. Turn your heart away from this course.

Brihadaswa, the merit that the Rajarishis of old acquired was incomparable. The king should always protect his subjects, and it is what you should do. Bhumipala, I cannot perform my tapasya in peace these days. Near my asrama there is a desert named Ujjalaka, which is flat and arid and many yojanas in length and width. In it dwells Dhundhu, a Danava chieftain, the son of Madhu and Kaitabha.

He is savage and powerful, and lives under the ground. You must first kill him before taking to sannyasa.

The Asura is quiet now because he is engaged in the most fierce tapasya; his aim is to rule over the Devas as well as the three worlds. Because of a boon granted to him by the Pitamaha, the Grandsire of all creatures, Dhundhu cannot be slain by Daityas, Rakshasas or Gandharvas. Kill him, Rajan, and be blessed; set your heart firmly on this deed. By killing the Asura you will achieve unequalled greatness and enjoy undying fame.

When, at the end of every year, that malignant Asura, who lies covered with sand, wakes up and begins to breathe, all the Earth with her mountains, forests and woods begins to tremble. His breath blows up clouds of sand and shrouds the Sun; for seven days without let does Bhumi Devi quake; sparks and tongues of smoky flame are everywhere. O king, I have no peace in my asrama. Kill Dhundhu for the good of the world. When that Asura dies the three Lokas will have peace and joy again.

I believe that you have the power to kill this Asura. Vishnu will infuse you with his energy, for long ago Vishnu swore that the king who killed this great Demon would have Narayana's own strength to use. Rajan, imbued with Vishnu's inexorable might, slay the savage Daitya. Dhundhu is so powerful that no one who has any less prowess than the Lord's own, can destroy him, even if he were to try for a hundred years," ' says Markandeya."

"Markandeya says, 'Kurusthama, at Utanka's words, that unvanquished royal sage joined his palms and said to him, "Your visit will not be in vain. Holy one, this is my son Kuvalaswa, who is strong and steadfast. His prowess is unsurpassed on earth. He will undoubtedly accomplish what you ask, with the help of his heroic sons whose arms are like iron maces. Give me leave to go to sannyasa, Brahmana, for I have given up my weapons."

The Muni replied, saying, "Tathaastu, so be it."

Rajarishi Brihadaswa commanded his son to fulfil Utanka's plea and, saying Do what needs to be done, he retired to the forest.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Holy one, who was this powerful Daitya? Whose son and whose grandson was he? I have not heard of this mighty Daitya before. I want to know everything, and in detail, O illumined Sage.'

Markandeya says, 'Then listen to everything just as it happened, O ruler of men!

When the world became one immense expanse of water and all the mobile and immobile creatures were destroyed, when all creation ended, Vishnu the Eternal, the Ever-lustrous, the Source of the universe, He whom sages have named the Supreme Lord of the Universe, that sacred Being, lay in Yoganidra, yogic sleep, upon the coils of the Naga Sesha. Vishnu of the infinite tejas, that blessed and holy Hari, who knows no decay, lay on coils that encircled the Earth and, as the Deity lay asleep on his serpentine bed, a lotus of shimmering beauty, radiant as the Sun, sprang from his navel.

And from that sublime lotus emerged Pitamaha Brahma, the Lord of the worlds, the embodiment of the four Vedas, four-formed and four-faced, invincible by his own energy, mighty of strength and prowess. Lord Hari of the wondrous body, lustrous, adorned with a crown and the Kaustubha jewel and clad in fulvid silk, lay with his body stretched across many yojanas on the superlative snake bed, protected by the hood of the snake that extended wide and far, O king, ablaze with beauty, illustrious as a thousand massed Suns.

When he had been in repose for some time, two mighty Danavas named Madhu and Kaitabha saw him and, seeing Hari in that posture, and seeing lotus-leaf-eyed Brahma sitting on the lotus, Madhu and Kaitabha were excited. Brahma became terrified at their boisterousness and trembled on his seat. The stalk of the lotus on which he sat began to quiver, waking the sleeping Kesava.

Awakened from his slumber, Govinda saw those awesome Danavas and said to them, "Welcome, mighty ones. I am pleased with you, and I will grant you excellent boons!"

Rajan, the proud and mighty Danavas laughingly replied to Hrishikesa, "You may ask boons of us, O Divine! Supreme God, we would like to grant you a boon. In fact we will indeed grant a boon. Therefore, ask us for anything that comes to your mind."

Hari said, "Valiant ones, I will accept a boon from you. There is something I want. Both of you have ineffable tejas. There is no man to equal either of you. Submit yourselves to be killed by me—that is the boon I ask for the good of the world."

At this, Madhu and Kaitabha said, "We have never before told a lie, even in jest, let alone seriously. Purushottama, we have always been steadfast in the path of truth and morality. In strength, in physique, in beauty, in virtue, in asceticism, in charity, in conduct, in goodness and in self-control we have no equal. Kesava, we face grave danger; accomplish what you have said.

No one can prevail over destiny but, Lord, there is one thing that we ask you to do. Best and first of all Gods, you must kill us at a place that is absolutely uncovered; and O Lotus-eyed, we also wish to be born as your sons. This is the boon that we ask, O Devadeva! Do not break the promise you first made to us."

The Divine One replied, "I will do as you ask. Everything will be as you wish." '

Markandeya continues, 'Govinda searched in his mind for a suitable place, but he could not think of any uncovered space. Failing to discover an absolutely open place, he noticed that his thighs were uncovered and cut off Madhu and Kaitabha's heads on them with his Sudarshana Chakra.' "

"Markandeya says, 'Dhundhu was the son of Madhu and Kaitabha. He was a Demon of immense energy and prowess, and he performed austere tapasya. He stood on one leg and reduced his body to a mass of only veins and arteries, and Brahma, gratified with him, gave him a boon. The boon he asked of Prajapati was that no one would be able to kill him, not the Devas, the Danavas, the Rakshasas, the Nagas or the Gandharvas.

The Pitamaha granted him his wish and the Danava went his way, after reverently worshipping Brahma by placing the God's feet on his head. With this boon in hand, Dhundhu hurried to Vishnu, thinking of how Vishnu had killed his father. Wrathfully, he began wreaking havoc, first conquering the Gandharvas and then the Devas with Vishnu at their head. Finally, O bull of the Bhaaratas, that black-souled Asura arrived at the Ujjalaka desert and began to violate Utanka's asrama.

The fierce Dhundhu, son of Madhu and Kaitabha, lay in his cave under the sands in dread tapasya with the object of destroying the three worlds. It was during this time that the Rajarishi Kuvalaswa set out for that asrama with his troops, accompanied by all his sons and by the Brahmana Utanka.

of Utanka and impelled by the desire to render a service to the three worlds. As Kuvalaswa proceeded, a loud voice spoke from the sky, repeatedly saying, “Blessed and unslayable, you will become the destroyer of Dhundhu today.”

The gods showered divine flowers on him; and the celestial drums began to sound reverberantly, although none played upon them; and during the march, cool breezes began to blow; and the king of the gods sent down gentle rain to moisten the dust on the roads; and, Yudhishtira, the chariots of the celestial ones hovered high over Dhundhu’s subterranean cavern of tapasya.

The Devas, Gandharvas and great Rishis, urged by curiosity, came there to watch the encounter between Dhundhu and Kuvalaswa. Kuvalaswa, bristling with Narayana’s urjas, and his sons with him, soon surrounded the desert and ordered that it be excavated. After seven days of digging in the sand, the king’s sons unearthed the mighty Asura Dhundhu, whose massive body lay nestled, radiant with his own energy, like the Sun himself. He covered the entire western quarter of the desert as he lay.

Kuvalaswa’s sons encircled him and attacked him with arrows and maces, with short, heavy clubs and axes, with iron spikes and darts and with glistening, keen-edged swords. The towering Danava rose in rage from his supine position and began to swallow all the weapons that were hurled at him, and then spat flames from his mouth, flames like those of the fire called Samvartaka that burns at the end of the yuga. The Asura consumed all the king’s sons in his flames, even like the Lord Kapila burnt the sons of king Sagara long ago.

In a mere moment, the furious Asura engulfed the three worlds with the flames that shot out of his mouth in endless tongues.

Bhaaratottama, when all those sons of Kuvalaswa were consumed by the Asura’s angry fire, the king, filled with divine power, approached the Danava, who confronted him, like mighty Kumbhakarna on waking from his slumber.

From the body of the king a jet of water gushed, which quickly extinguished the flames loosed by the Asura. The royal Kuvalaswa, filled with yogic power, slew the Demon with the Brahmastra, which is invoked to relieve Triloka of its fears. Once Rajarishi Kuvalaswa had killed the immense Asura, that foe of the Devas and slayer of all his enemies, with the exceptional weapon, he became like a second king of the three worlds. And from then on the noble Kuvalaswa came to be known by the name of Dhundhumara for having slain Asura Dhundhu, and came to be regarded as being invincible in battle.

The Devas and the Rishis who had come to witness the encounter were so delighted with him that they said to him, “Ask us for a boon.”

The king bowed to them and, filled with joy, said with hands joined in reverence, “Let me always be able to give wealth to devout Brahmanas. Let me be invincible to all my enemies. Let Vishnu always be my friend. Let me love all creatures. Let my heart always turn towards dharma, and let me live in Swarga forever.”

The Devas, the Rishis and the Brahmana Utanka were extremely pleased and said, “It shall be as you wish.” O king, they bestowed many other blessings on him, and the Devas and Maharishis went away to their respective abodes.

Yudhishtira, after the slaughter of his sons, king Kuvalaswa had only three sons left, and they were called Dridaswa, Kapilaswa and Chandraswa. It is from them, Rajan, that the illustrious line of Ikshvaku kings, all of immeasurable prowess, has sprung.

This was how the great Daitya Dhundhu, the son of Madhu and Kaitabha, was killed by Kuvalaswa, and this was why that king came to be known as Dhundhumara.

I have now told you all that you asked—about the One whose deeds made the story of Dhundhu’s death famous. He that listens to this sacred narrative of Vishnu’s glory becomes virtuous and is blessed with children. By listening to this story on particular days of the month, one is blessed with longevity and prosperity, and is freed from all anxiety and fear of disease.’ ”

Vaisampayana said, "Yudhishtira then asks the illustrious Markandeya a difficult question about dharma.

He asks, 'Holy one, I want to hear about the high and excellent virtue of women. I want you to tell me, Brahmana, about the subtle truths of dharma. By divine ordinance, the Sun, Moon, Wind, Earth, Fire, one's father and mother, and one's guru appear to us as living embodiments of God. All these are worthy of our reverence. So, too, is the woman who faithfully adores one lord. The worship that chaste wives offer to their husbands seems to be fraught with great difficulty.

Worshipful one, speak to us of the virtue of chaste wives, who have their senses and hearts under perfect control and look on their husbands as gods. This cannot be easy to do. The worship that sons offer to their parents and that wives offer to their husbands seems difficult. I do not think there is anything more formidable than the stern virtue of chaste women. Brahmana, the dharma that good women discharge with care and the conduct of good sons towards their parents must be the hardest to observe.

A woman who is devoted to only one lord, a woman who always speaks the truth, a woman who carries a child in her womb for a full ten month term - there can be no conduct more arduous, O Brahmana, than hers.

Women give birth to their children at great risk to themselves and with intense pain, and then raise them with great love.

Even persons who invoke hatred in others because of their cruelty do succeed in accomplishing their svadharma, which, in my opinion, is a difficult thing. Dvija, tell me the true duties of Kshatriyas. It is not easy for high-souled men to acquire virtue when their dharma obliges them to perform inhuman acts. Holy one, you have the knowledge to answer all questions; and I wish to hear you speak on these subjects. Best of Bhrigu's clan, you of the lofty vows, I wait respectfully to listen to what you say.'

Markandeya says, 'Bhaaratottama, I will tell you all this, however complex the answers to your questions may be. Listen well.

Some regard the mother as the superior parent, some the father. It is the mother that gives birth to and rears the child, which is more demanding than the father's role. Fathers wish for children by observing vratas and by tapasya, by worshipping the gods, by the reverence shown to them, by bearing cold and heat, by mantras and by other means.

When they have children, after these painful observances, they, too, O Kshatriya, are always anxious about their sons' futures. Bhaarata, both parents desire fame, success, prosperity, progeny and virtuousness for their sons. The good son is he who realises these hopes of his parents. Great king, that son with whom his father and mother are gratified achieves eternal fame and everlasting virtue in this world and the next.

When it comes to women, neither yagnas, nor sraddhas, nor vratas are of any use. The only way they can attain the bliss of Swarga is by serving their husbands. Yudhishtira, bear this in mind while I tell you about the chaste woman's dharma.' "

"Markandeya says, 'There was, Bhaarata, a pious ascetic named Kausika, who had great tapasyashakti and who was devoted to the study of the Vedas. He was an excellent Brahmana, and studied all the Vedas with the Angas and the Upanishads. One day as he sat reciting the Vedas at the foot of a tree, a female crane that was on that tree sullied him with her droppings. He looked at the crane in anger, and this was enough to make the crane fall dead to the ground.

Seeing the fallen krauncha under the tree, the Brahmana was moved to pity and began to lament the dead crane saying, "Alas, urged by anger and malice, I have done a sinful thing!"

Having repeated this lament many times, that learned Brahmana went to a village to beg for alms. Bharatarishabha, in course of making his rounds of the houses of noble families, the Brahmana entered one such house that he knew. As he entered the house he said, Give, and a woman from inside answered, Wait.

Bhaaratottama, while the housewife was cleaning the vessel from which alms are given, her husband suddenly came home and he was very hungry. The chaste housewife saw her husband and, ignoring the Brahmana, gave her lord water to wash his feet and face, and a seat. After that the black-eyed lady served him savoury food and drink, and humbly stood beside him in ready attendance.

Yudhishtira, that woman was an obedient and chaste wife. She always ate the leftovers from her husband's plate, she was ever respectful of her lord's wishes and commands, and she was devoted in her love for him. Her conduct was always pious; she was skilful in all domestic duties, attentive to all her relatives and always did what was pleasing and beneficial to her husband. She was devout in the daily puja and heedfully saw to the wants of guests and servants, as well as of her mother-in-law and father-in-law.

While this woman of the lovely eyes was busy waiting on her husband, she noticed the Brahmana waiting for alms and remorsefully remembered that she had asked him to wait. This lady, who was well known for her chasteness, took something to give the Brahmana and went out to where he stood.

When she came before him the Brahmana said, "Best of women, blessed one, I am surprised at your behaviour. Having asked me to wait you did not dismiss me, but kept me waiting!"

Lord of men, seeing the Brahmana blazing in anger, the chaste woman tried to pacify him. She said, "O Learned one, it is proper for you to forgive me. My husband is my supreme god. He came home hungry and tired, and I was serving him."

Hearing this, the Brahmana said, "You do not seem to consider that Brahmanas deserve more respect. Do you dare to exalt your husband above them? Are you so involved in your life as a wife that you disregard Brahmanas? Indra himself bows down to them, let alone humans on Earth. Proud woman, do you not know this? Have you never heard that Brahmanas are like fire and can consume all the earth?"

The woman answered, "I am no she-crane, O Rishi! You that are endowed with the wealth of tapasya, cast off your anger. Enraged as you are, what can you do to me with your angry looks? I do not disrespect Brahmanas; blessed with great souls, they are like gods. O Sinless, if I have been remiss, you must forgive me.

I know the mental energy and pride of wise Brahmanas: their anger made the waters of the ocean salty and undrinkable. I know also the power of Munis whose souls are under complete control: they are aflame with tapasyashakti. The fire of their wrath has still not been extinguished in the forest of Dandaka.

It was because of his disrespect towards Brahmanas that the great Asura, the evil Vatapi, was eaten by Agastya. I have heard that the powers earned by high-souled Brahmanas are great indeed, but, O Brahmana, they are as great in forgiveness as they are in anger. Therefore, O Anagha, it is proper that you forgive me my offence.

I favour the punya that serving my husband, whom I consider the highest god, gives me, and what you see is my worship of him and the virtue that accrues from it. I know that you have scorched a she-crane with your anger; Dvijottama, best of the twice-born, a man's greatest enemy is his anger.

The gods only consider a Brahmana the man who has shed his anger and passion, who always speaks the truth, who always pleases his teacher and who, though wounded by another, never retaliates. The gods consider a Brahmana the man who has his senses under control, who is virtuous, pure and devoted to the study of the Vedas, and who has mastered anger and lust.

The gods consider a Brahmana the man who knows dharma and is rich in tejas of mind, who is devout, who looks upon all as his equals, who studies and teaches others, who performs sacrifices himself and officiates at the sacrifices of others, and who gives as much charity as his means allow. The gods consider a bull among the Dvijas, a Brahmana who practices brahmacharya, who has liberated his soul, who is devoted to the study of the Vedas and who always begins his studies with a recitation of the ideals of Brahmanas. The hearts of such men only ever find joy in truth, but never in falsehood.

O Dvijottama, they say that the study of the Vedas, tranquillity of soul, simplicity of living and repression of passion are the eternal duties of the Brahmana. Those that know about dharma have said that truth and honesty are the highest virtues, and that they are not easy to comprehend. Virtue is eternal and is difficult to attain, but whatever kind it is, it is based on truth. The ancients have declared that dharma, because it depends on Sruti, is of many kinds and too subtle to understand. Holy one, you are virtuous, pure and devoted to Vedic study. I think, however, that you do not know the real essence of dharma.

Go to the city of Mithila, where a virtuous butcher lives, and ask him if indeed you really understand true goodness. This butcher is truthful and devoted to the service of his parents, and has his senses under complete control. He will tell you about dharma. Go there if you like, O faultless one.

Forgive me if what I have said is distasteful, for those who are earnest about acquiring dharma must never injure women."

The Brahmana replied, "I am pleased with you; blessings be upon you. My anger is gone, beautiful one. Your censure serves me well. I will go now and do what is good for me." '

Markandeya continues, 'Dismissed by her, Kausika, that best of Brahmanas, left her house and, berating himself, returned home.' "

"Markandeya says, 'Reflecting upon that wonderful discourse of the woman, Kausika began to reproach himself and, meditating on the subtleties of dharma, felt guilty.

He said to himself, "I should respectfully accept what the good woman said and go to Mithila. I am certain that there lives in that city the butcher who has his soul under control and has fathomed the mysteries of dharma. I will go there this very day and ask that great tapasvin about virtue."

He was convinced by the chaste woman's words because she knew about the she-crane, and because of the import of her words. So, Kausika set out for Mithila, humbly contemplating all that she had said, and filled with curiosity. On the way he passed through forests, villages and towns, and at last, reached Mithila, which was ruled by Janaka.

He saw the magnificent city adorned with the flags of various clans and it echoed with the sounds of yagnas and festivities. There were splendid gateways and palaces, many marvellous buildings, and it was protected by walls on all sides.

The city was full of chariots on its many well laid roads and streets, which were lined with a variety of shops. Warriors, horses and elephants shared the roads with the chariots, and everywhere healthy, happy people thronged the streets in festive mood. And there the Brahmana saw many other things.

He enquired about the virtuous butcher and two Brahmanas directed him to his house. He went there and the Brahmana saw the shaunika in his yard, selling venison and buffalo meat. Because there was such a crowd of people waiting to be served, Kausika waited at a distance, but the meat vendor, realising that the Brahmana had come to see him, rose from his seat and went to where the Brahmana stood.

He said, "Salutations, holy one! Welcome, O best of Brahmanas! I am the butcher. Blessings be upon you. Tell me what I can do for you. I know that the good lady told you to come to Mithila, and also why you have come."

The Brahmana was surprised at these words and thought, "O this is the second wonder that I see!"

The butcher said to the Brahmana, "You are standing in a place that is scarcely proper for you, Anagha. Come, let us go to my house." '

Markandeya continues, 'Saying Tathaastu, so be it, the Brahmana gladly walked ahead as the butcher led him to his home. Entering his pleasant house, the butcher reverently offered his guest a seat and gave him water to wash his feet and face, which the Brahmana accepted and then sat at ease.

He said to the butcher, "Your profession does not seem fitting for you. I feel sad that you practise such a cruel trade."

The butcher said, "This is the profession of my family, which I have inherited from my father and grandfather. Dvija, do not grieve; I am only living by the dharma of my birth. By discharging the duties preordained for me by the Creator, I serve my superiors and the elders. Brahmanottama, I always speak the truth, I never envy others and I give to the best of my ability. I live upon what remains after serving the gods, my guests and my dependants; I never speak ill of any creature, big or small. Best of Brahmanas, the actions of your former life always follow you into subsequent lives. In this world there are three main professions—agriculture, cattle-rearing and trade. In the other world the three Vedas, knowledge and morality are important. Service to the three superior castes is assigned to the Sudra, agriculture to the Vaisya, battle to the Kshatriyas, and the practice of brahmacharya, celibacy, asceticism, recitation of mantras and truthfulness to the Brahmanas.

The king should rule justly over his subjects who adhere to their proper duties, and should return those that have fallen from their dharma to it. The king must inspire fear, as he is the lord of his people. He checks his subjects who neglect their dharma, just as he would stop a deer with his arrows.

O Rishi, Janaka is such a king; there is not one subject of his who does not live according to the dharma of his birth. Best of Brahmanas, here all four orders rigidly adhere to their respective duties. King Janaka punishes evil, even if the criminal is his own son, but he never inflicts pain on the virtuous. He uses reliable and good scouts and keeps an impartial eye on all. Prosperity, dominion and the power to punish rest with Kshatriyas. A king who is virtuous craves prosperity. The king is the protector of the four varnas.

As for me, O Brahmana, I always sell pork and buffalo meat without slaughtering the animals myself. I sell the meat of animals that have been killed by others. I never eat meat myself; I never go to my wife except in her season; I always fast during the day and eat at night. Even though the actions expected of a man by his dharma are cruel, the man can be good. A man can be virtuous, although he may be a slayer of animals by profession.

Virtue diminishes and evil prospers because of the sinful deeds of the king; his subjects become corrupt, and they decline. It is then, O Brahmana, that ugly monsters and dwarves, hunch-backed and huge-headed people, men that are blind or deaf, those that are cross-eyed or impotent are born.

It is because of the sins of the king that his subjects suffer. But our king Janaka virtuously watches over his subjects and is always compassionate. On their part, his people always keep to their svadharma. As for me, I try to please everyone, regardless of whether they speak well of me or not. The king that lives in accordance to his dharma, who is always righteous and honest, who has his soul under control and who is always prepared and earnest need not depend on anyone for support.

There are certain attributes that find their place only in a man who desires worldly detachment: giving of food to the extent that one can afford, endurance of heat and cold, steadfastness in virtue and compassion for all creatures. One should avoid telling lies and should do good deeds without being asked.

One should never allow lust, anger or malice to get the better of virtue; one should never give in to extremes of joy and sorrow in good times and bad; one should never feel depressed or abandon the path of righteousness when overtaken by poverty. One must never repeat a wrong; one should always turn to conduct that benefits others; one should never repay wrong with wrong, but behave honestly with those that have wronged him.

The wretch, who leans towards sin, destroys himself. By doing wrong, one only imitates those that are evil, who abandon dharma and mock the good and the pure in the belief that there is no goodness, and who, therefore, will surely be destroyed. The sinful man bloats like a leather bag puffed up with wind.

The thoughts of these vain and stupid ones are feeble and worthless. The inner soul recognises his foolishness as easily as sunlight reveals everything. The fool does not shine merely because he praises himself; the learned man, however, even if he is not good-looking, shines by not speaking ill of others and well of himself. However, there is no person in this world who has all these attributes.

Repentance washes away the sin of the wrong-doer. The determination never to repeat the sin saves him from future sin as surely as the methods prescribed by the scriptures. This is the Sruti of virtue—the sacred, recited strictures. The good man who commits a sin unknowingly can destroy the sin, for his virtue cleanses him of the sin committed in ignorance.

After committing a sin, a man should no longer consider himself a man. Man cannot conceal his sins: the gods and the man's conscience see what he does. The person, who, with piety and without hatred, conceals the errors of honest and wise men, as he would hide the holes in his clothes, finds salvation.

If a man seeks redemption after having committed a sin, he is purged of all his sins; he looks bright, like the moon emerging from behind clouds. A man who truly wants redemption is washed of all his sins, and, renewed, shines again like the rising sun dispelling the darkness of the night.

O Dvijottama, it is temptation that is the basis of sin. Men that are ignorant commit sin by giving in to temptation. Sinful men generally put on a cloak of virtue, like a well whose mouth is hidden by grass. Outwardly they seem to be self-controlled and devout; they preach virtue which, coming from them, is meaningless. In fact, they are anything but virtuous."

Markandeya continues, 'At the butcher's words, that wise Brahmana asked, "How will I recognise true dharma? You are blessed, and I want to hear this from you, best of virtuous men. Tell me what you know."

The butcher replied, “Five sacred ingredients make up dharma: yagna—sacrifice, daana—charity, tapasya—asceticism, the Vedas, and satyam—truth. Having quelled lust and anger, pride, avarice and crookedness, they that delight in dharma for dharma’s sake are the truly virtuous and praiseworthy. Those who perform sacrifices and study the Vedas have no other way of life other than dharma. They follow only righteousness, and this is the second attribute of the virtuous.

Waiting upon superiors, truth, freedom from anger, and charity—these four, O Brahmana, are integral to dharma. The only way a person can lead a righteous life is by practising these four. The essence of the Vedas is Truth; the essence of Truth is self-control; and the essence of self-control is abstention from worldly pleasures. One sees all these in the conduct of a good man.

They that follow fools who mock men’s virtue walk a sinful path and are dragged down to perdition. They that are virtuous and conscientiously observe vratas, who are devoted to the Srutis, who abstain from worldly pleasures, who tread in virtue’s path and follow the true dharma; they that are obedient to their gurus, and who contemplate the meaning of the scriptures with patience and concentration, are the truly virtuous. Brahmana, these qualities guide their intellect.

Avoid atheists and men that live on the edge; stay away from wicked and sinful men; rather, acquire knowledge and revere good men. Lust and temptation are like sharks in the river of life, whose waters are the five senses. Cross to the other side of this river in the boat of patience, avoiding the shoals of rebirth into this world.

The supreme dharma, consisting of the exercise of the higher intellect and dhyana, when gradually added to virtuous conduct, becomes revealed in beauty, like coloured dye on white fabric. Truthfulness and non-violence are benign qualities. Of these, non-violence is a cardinal virtue, and based in Truth. The mind works effectively when the foundation of its activity is Truth, the noblest value. Pure conduct is the characteristic of all good men; they that are distinguished for saintliness are men of dharma.

All creatures set principles for themselves based on their inherent nature. The sinful man, who has no control over himself, acquires lust, anger and other vices. It is an immortal truth that virtuous actions are those that are founded on justice; also, sages have declared that all deviant conduct is sin.

Those who are not swayed by anger, pride, haughtiness and envy, and those who are quiet and straightforward, are naturally virtuous in conduct. Those who are diligent in performing the rites prescribed in the three Vedas, who are wise and of pure and good conduct; those who exercise self-restraint and are attentive to the needs of their superiors, are men of dharma.

The ways of great men like these are difficult to emulate. Their sins are washed away by the sanctity of their actions. This piety is wonderful; it is ancient, immutable and eternal; and wise men who lead lives of dharma attain Swarga. Men who believe in God, who have no false pride, who are well-versed in the scriptures, and who respect Dvijas, the twice-born, find heaven for themselves.

Among holy men, dharma is threefold—the supreme dharma that the Vedas teach; the dharma that the Dharmashastras preach; and good conduct. Good karma is the acquisition of knowledge, making pilgrimages to sacred tirthas, truthfulness, forbearance, purity and honesty.

Virtuous men are always kind to all creatures and hold Brahmanas dear; they practise ahimsa by abstaining from doing injury to any creature; and they are always polite. Wise men who know the consequences of their good and evil karma are held in high esteem by the sages. Those who are just and good-natured, and blessed with virtue, who wish all creatures well, who walk steadily on the path of righteousness, conquer Swargaloka.

Godly people praise those who are charitable, unselfish and of unblemished character, who help the distressed, who are learned and respected, who practise stern tapasya, and who are kind to all creatures.

The generous man earns prosperity in this world and bliss in the next; so does the man who, when asked by good men, gives as much as he can, even depriving his family and dependants. Good men act in this way, thinking about dharma and their own welfare, and knowing the ways of the world; and their goodness grows, endlessly.

The good, who are wedded to Truth, who try not to injure any creature, who are honourable, who avoid evil, who are humble, modest and self-restrained; they who are accepting of destiny, wise, free from malice and lust: these are the witnesses of the world.

These three conditions are said to be the perfect way of dharma: a man must not wrong another, he must bestow alms, and he must always be truthful. High-souled men of honourable convictions and righteous conduct, who are kind to all and full of compassion, leave this world with contentment.

Freedom from malice, patience, peace of mind, contentment, pleasant speech, renunciation of desire and anger, conduct and actions disciplined by the dictates of the scriptures, make for pure goodness. Those who are steady in virtue follow these ways and, having reached the pinnacle of knowledge, and having learnt how to distinguish good from bad, escape putting their souls in grave danger.

O Great Brahmana, I have told you about dharma, as I know it and as I have heard," said the butcher,' says Markandeya."

"Markandeya continues, 'Yudhishtira, the pious butcher then said to the Brahmana, "My actions are cruel but, Brahmana, destiny is powerful and it is difficult to evade the consequences of your past actions. This is karmic evil arising out of sins I committed in a previous life. O Brahmana, I am always punctilious in avoiding evil.

God takes away life; the executioner is merely an instrument; and we, too, are karmic agents. The animals whose meat I sell also acquire karma, because they give pleasure to gods, guests and servants when they are served as well-prepared dishes, thereby propitiating the spirits of their ancestors.

It is said authoritatively that herbs and vegetables, deer, birds and wild animals are the food of all creatures. King Sibi, the son of Usinara, of great forbearance, reached heaven, which is not easy, by giving away his own flesh.

In olden times, two thousand cows and two thousand other animals were slaughtered every day in King Rantideva's kitchen, and he acquired unrivalled fame by distributing food with meat, daily. Animals have to be sacrificed for the performance of the quarterly rites. The saying that the sacred fire is fond of animal flesh has come down to us from ages past. At yagnas, animals are invariably killed by Brahmanas, and these animals, purged of sin by the chanting of mantras, find Swarga. O Dvija, if the sacred fire had not been so fond of animal flesh in ancient times, meat could not have become a part of our diet.

As regards meat, this rule has been laid down by sages: whoever partakes of animal food after having first offered it respectfully to the Devas and the Pitrs, is not polluted by what he does, and such a man is not considered to have partaken of the meat in the same way that a brahmacharin who has intercourse with his wife during her menstrual period is nevertheless considered to be a good Brahmana. This law has been declared after deliberations on its propriety, Dvijottama.

King Sudasa, when suffering from a curse, often used to prey upon men; what is your opinion of this? And, good Brahmana, I know that my life is a consequence of my own karma, and I obtain my livelihood from this profession. To forsake one's inherent occupation is considered a sin; whereas pursuing one's svadharma is, definitely, meritorious.

The karma of a former life is inescapable, and in determining the consequences of one's karma, the Creator has maintained this law. A person living out the results of his evil karma must always think about how he can atone and extricate himself from doom. The karma that follows evil can be expiated in many ways. Accordingly, Brahmanasreshta, I am charitable, truthful, and assiduously do I serve my superiors; I am respectful and devoted to Brahmanas, and do not indulge in pride or idle gossip.

Farming is considered a praiseworthy occupation, but it is well-known that even there, great harm is done to animal life because, in the process of ploughing the earth, numberless small creatures living underground are killed. Do you not agree? O Brahmana, vrihi and other types of rice are all living organisms. What is your opinion?

Men hunt wild animals, kill them and eat their meat; they cut down trees and herbs; but, Brahmana, there are countless living things in trees, in fruits and in water. Do you not think so?

All creation, Dvija, is full of animal life, sustaining itself with food derived from living organisms. Have you not noticed that fish prey upon fish, that animals prey upon other species, and that other species eat their own kind? While walking, men trample and kill uncountable living creatures. Even wise and enlightened men destroy life in various ways, while sleeping or resting. What do you say to this? The earth and the air swarm with living creatures, which are unknowingly killed by men. Is this not so?

The injunction that people should not harm any creature was ordained long ago by men who were ignorant of the true facts. Brahmana, there is not a man on the face of this earth who is innocent of injuring living creatures. I have thought deeply about this and have come to this conclusion. Even the Rishi, good Brahmana, whose vow is to do no harm to any creature, inflicts injury on animal life, except that the harm is less.

Kshatriyas of great qualities defiantly do evil, of which they are not ashamed. Good men acting in an exemplary way are not praised by other good men; nor are bad men acting in evil ways praised by their evil peers; friends are not pleasant to friends, despite their noble qualities; and foolish pedants denigrate the virtues of their teachers. This reversal of the natural order of things, O excellent Brahmana, is common. What do you think about all this?

There is much that one can say about the integrity or vileness of our actions. All said and done, whoever adheres to his dharma surely acquires renown," says Markandeya.' "

"Markandeya continues, 'O Yudhishtira, the good and compassionate butcher then said to the Brahmana, "Our elders have handed down to us, by word of mouth, the wisdom of the Sruti, which says that the ways of dharma are subtle, diverse and infinite.

When life is at stake and in the matter of marriage, one is permitted to tell an untruth. Untruth sometimes leads to the triumph of truth but, conversely, truth can also maintain lies. Whichever is most conducive to the good of all creatures is considered the truth. Dharma is thus perverted; mark its subtle ways.

Man's actions are either good or bad, and he surely reaps their fruits. The ignorant man, having reached a miserable state, abuses the gods, not knowing that his condition is the consequence of his own evil karma. The foolish, the scheming and the fickle, good Brahmana, always attain the opposite of happiness; they find misery. Neither learning nor morals, nor personal exertion can save them. If the fruits of our efforts were not dependent on anything else, people would gain the object of their desire merely by striving for it.

Able, intelligent and diligent persons are frustrated in their efforts and do not obtain the fruits of their actions. On the other hand, those who live by deception, and who harm others, thrive. There are some who achieve prosperity without trying too hard; and there are others, who, even with the utmost effort, are unable to achieve their ends.

Misers worship the gods and practise severe austerities with the object of having sons, and those healthy sons, born in full term, turn out to be a disgrace to their family; whereas others born under the same circumstances live decent and comfortable lives, enjoying the wealth passed down to them by their ancestors.

The diseases that a man suffers from are undoubtedly the result of his own karma, which traps him, like a small deer in a hunter's hands; and he suffers agony. And, O Brahmana, just as a hunter cuts off the flight of his quarry, skilful physicians check the progress of the disease with their medicines.

The most devout and knowledgeable men say that those who have the wherewithal to enjoy the good things that life has to offer are prevented from doing so because of chronic bowel disorders; they say that many that are strong and powerful suffer and have great difficulty earning a livelihood; they say that every man is helpless, overcome by sorrow and illusion, and repeatedly tossed about and dragged under by the powerful current of his own actions, his karma.

If there were absolute freedom of action, no creature would die, none would decay, none would have to await his doom, and every man would attain the object of his desire. Everyone wants to outdistance his neighbours in the race of life, and men strive to the utmost of their power to this end; but the result is unpredictable.

Many are born under the influence of the same star and the same astrological concatenations; but there is great diversity in the maturity of their actions. Dvijottama, no person can be the dispenser of his own lot. The actions done in a previous existence bear fruit in our present life. The soul is eternal and everlasting, but the physical body is impermanent and is destroyed in this world. So, when life is extinguished it is only the body that is destroyed; the soul, bonded to its actions, lives on to take birth in another body."

The Brahmana replied, "O learned one, you have grasped the mysteries of karma, and are expert at discourse. I want to know how the soul becomes immortal."

The butcher replied, "The spirit does not die, it only rehouses itself. Those who foolishly say that all creatures die are mistaken. The soul fits itself to another frame, and its change of home is called death. In the world of men, no man lives the consequences of another man's karma; he reaps the consequences of what he does.

The consequences of actions, once done, cannot be avoided. The virtuous become endowed with great virtues, and sinful men become the perpetrators of evil deeds. Men's karma follows them and influences the conditions of their rebirth."

The Brahmana asked, "Why does the spirit take its birth, and how does it become sinful or virtuous? And how, excellent one, does it come to belong to a sinful or virtuous man?"

The butcher replied, "This mystery has to do with procreation. I shall briefly describe to you, Brahmanottama, how the soul is born again with its accumulated load of karma, the righteous soul in the virtuous and the evil soul in the sinful. Through the performance of virtuous actions it reaches the state of the celestials, and by a combination of good and evil it acquires the human condition; by indulging in sensual and base ways it is born into the lower species of animals; and by outright sin it goes to naraka, to hell.

Afflicted with the miseries of birth, death and old age, man is fated to rot from the consequences of his own actions. Passing through thousands of births, and through naraka, our spirits wander, bound by ropes of their own karma.

Animate beings become miserable in the next world because of their own actions, and as a result of those miseries, they assume lower births and go on to accumulate new karma. They suffer again, like sickly men eating unwholesome food; and although they are thus afflicted, they think they are happy and at ease, and consequently their fetters remain in place and more fresh karma builds. Suffering from all kinds of grief, they spin about dizzily in this world like a loose wheel.

If they shrug off their bonds and purify themselves by their actions, and if they practise penance and tapasya, then, O Brahmanottama, they attain mukti. By casting off their karmic fetters and through purifying deeds, men reach that blissful state where misery is unknown. The sinful man, who is addicted to vice, never stops being iniquitous. So, must we strive to do what is good and desist from doing what is wrong.

The person who, with whole-hearted gratitude and free from malice, strives to do good attains the four purusharthas: dharma, artha, kama and moksha. Those who are purified of sins, wise, forbearing, steadfast in dharma and self-restrained enjoy uninterrupted well-being in this world and the next. Man must live by the standards of the good and emulate the righteous: there are many learned and virtuous men who are versed in the Shastras. It is man's dharma to follow his own inherent vocation, his svadharma, which prevents confusion.

The wise man delights in virtue and lives by righteousness. Brahmanottama, such a man, with his acquired wealth of righteousness, waters the root of the particular plant of dharma in which he finds the most virtue. Thus does the godly man calm and still his mind. He is pleased with his friends in this world and also attains happiness in the next. Virtuous persons, excellent one, acquire authority and enjoy the pleasures of beauty, flavour, sound and touch as they wish. These are the rewards of dharma.

However, excellent Brahmana, the enlightened man is not satisfied with reaping the fruits of righteousness. Not content with that, and with the light of spiritual wisdom that resides in him, he becomes indifferent to pain and pleasure; and he is unaffected by evil. He chooses to give up worldly pursuits, but he does not forsake dharma.

Realising that everything in the world is transient, he attempts to renounce it all. He does not rely on chance, but designs the means of attaining his salvation. So, renouncing all worldly pleasures and avoiding sin, he becomes pure and, at last, attains moksha.

Spiritual wisdom is the main requirement for man to attain salvation, and surrender and patience are its roots. By this means he achieves all that he desires. By subduing the senses and by a life of truthfulness and fortitude, he attains, O Brahmana, the supreme state of Brahman."

The Brahmana asked, "O most devout of men, what are these senses you speak of, and how are they subdued? What does one gain by subduing the senses, and how does one get the benefits of it? I want to know about these things," ' says Markandeya."

"Markandeya continues, 'Hear, O Yudhishtira, what the virtuous butcher said when the Brahmana questioned him.

He said, "Men begin by bending their minds to the acquisition of knowledge. Once that end is met, they work on great tasks and then indulge their desires and the pleasures of the senses—beauty, taste, and so on. Dharma, artha and kama.

Attachment follows, then envy, then avarice, and the light of spirituality is extinguished. When men are influenced by avarice, and overcome by envy and attachment, dharma no longer guides their minds, and their lives become a mockery of virtue. Practising dharma with hypocrisy, they are content to acquire wealth dishonourably and, with this ill-gotten wealth, their minds become enamoured of evil ways, and they are filled with a desire to sin. And, good Brahmana, when their friends and wise men try to dissuade them, they answer with sophistry, neither sound nor convincing.

Their addiction to evil makes them sin in thought, word and deed, and kills all their good qualities, and these evil men cultivate other evil ones as friends. They suffer misery in this world as well as in the next. This is the sinful man's nature.

Now hear about the man of virtue. He discerns evil with spiritual insight, and is able to discriminate between joy and grief; he is respectfully attentive to men of wisdom and from practising virtue, his soul leans towards dharma."

The Brahmana said, "You have explained dharma to me in a way that no one else could. Your spiritual power is great; you seem to be a great sage."

The butcher replied, "We worship the great Brahmanas with the same honour that we give our ancestors, and we always propitiate them, before anyone else, with offerings of food. In this world, wise men put their hearts into doing what pleases them. I will now describe to you what pleases them. But first I will bow in reverence to Brahmanas as a varna. Learn the Brahmana dharma from me.

This whole Universe is unconquerable in its totality and is made of the panchamahabhutas, the five great elements; it is Brahman, and there is nothing higher. The Earth, Air, Water, Fire and Sky are the mahabhutas; and form, odour, sound, touch and taste are their characteristic properties. These properties, too, have their own properties.

Three qualities characterise each property and, of them, consciousness, also called the mind, is the most important. In seventh place is intelligence and after that comes egoism; then come the five senses, then the soul, then the moral gunas—sattva, rajas and tamas. These seventeen are the abstract, or incomprehensible, qualities.

Now that I have described all this to you, is there anything else you want to know?" said the vendor of meat.' "

"Markandeya continues, 'O Bhaarata, the Brahmana, who found the meat-seller's discourse so pleasing, said, "Devout one, you said that there are five great elements; do describe fully all the lakshanas or properties of any one of the five."

The butcher replied, "Earth, Water, Fire, Air and Sky all have properties that overlap each other. I will describe them to you. Earth, O Brahmana, has five qualities; Water has four, Fire three and Air and Sky together have three. Sound, touch, shape, smell and taste are the five lakshanas of Earth; sound, touch, shape and taste belong to Water; sound, touch and shape are the three properties of Fire; Air has two properties—sound and touch; and sound alone is the Sky's.

O Brahmana, these fifteen properties that are inherent in the five elements exist in everything of which this Universe is made. They are not opposed to one another, but co-exist in combinations. When the Universe is cast into chaos, then every physical being, in its proper time, assumes a new physical body. Each of these bodily receptacles come to life and die in their due order.

There are five elementary substances of which all the mobile and immobile world is composed. Whatever the senses can perceive is called vyakta, knowable or comprehensible, and whatever is beyond the reach of the senses and can only be perceived by the imagination is known as avyakta.

When a person sets out on the quest for Atma gyana, knowledge of the Self, after having subdued the senses, which have their own roles to play in relation to the external world, then he sees his own soul pervading the Universe, and the Universe reflected in himself. The man who is bound to his previous karma, though learned in the highest spiritual wisdom, can only know his soul's objective existence; but he whose soul is unaffected by the conditions around him is never subject to sorrow, because his soul has absorbed the spirit of Brahman.

When a man has overcome the influence of illusion, his human virtues, consisting of the essence of spiritual wisdom, turn to spiritual enlightenment, which illumines the minds of all beings. The omnipotent Spirit regards such a man as one who is without beginning or end, who is self-existent, unchangeable, without material form, and incomparable.

This, O Brahmana, is the result of self-discipline; and this self-discipline can only be acquired by subduing the senses. It cannot be otherwise, because heaven and hell are both dependent on our senses. When subdued they lead to Swarga; when indulged in they lead to ruin. This subjugation of the senses is the highest path to spiritual enlightenment.

Our senses are at the root of our spiritual advancement as well as of our spiritual downfall. By indulging them, a man becomes addicted to vice, and by subduing them, he attains salvation. The self-restrained person who acquires mastery over the six senses is never tainted with sin, and evil has no power over him.

Man's physical body has been compared to a chariot, his soul to a charioteer and his senses to horses. A dexterous man drives about without confusion, like a confident charioteer with well-broken horses. That man who knows how to wield the reins of spirited horses—the six senses inherent in our nature—is an excellent charioteer.

When our senses become uncontrollable, like swift horses given their heads on the open road, we must patiently rein them in for, with patience, we can bring them under control. When a man's mind is overpowered by any one of the senses, running wild, he loses his reason and becomes like a ship tossed by storms on the high seas.

Men allow illusion to deceive them, with the hope of reaping the fruit of those six senses. The effects of these six are studied by men of spiritual insight, and they are the ones who reap the rewards of their clear perception," said the meat vendor.' "

"Markandeya continued, 'Bhaarata, the Brahmana listened attentively to the meat-seller's discourse and asked him, "Describe the qualities of sattva, rajas and tamas to me."

The butcher replied, "I will describe each of their characteristics separately. Listen.

Tamas is characterised by spiritual delusion; rajas incites men to action; sattva is of great splendour and the greatest of the three.

He who is spiritually ignorant, foolish and a dreamer, who is idle, apathetic and swayed by anger and arrogance, is under the influence of tamas. The man who speaks pleasantly, who is thoughtful and free from envy, and who is industrious because he wishes to benefit from his hard work, and who is compassionate, is influenced by rajas. He who is resolute and patient, who has no anger, who is free from malice, and who is wise and forbearing, who does not work out of a desire to benefit from his work, is said to be under the influence of sattva.

When a sattvic man allows himself to be influenced by worldliness he is unhappy; but he shuns it when he realises its significance. Then, he begins to feel indifferent to worldly matters; his pride decreases, and righteousness increases; and he reconciles the values that are in conflict within him. Conscious self-restraint becomes unnecessary. A man may be born a Sudra, but if he has sattva, he can attain the level of a Vaisya or of a Kshatriya; and if he is steadfast in dharma, he can become equal to a Brahmana.

I have described the gunas to you; is there anything else you wish to know?" said the meat vendor.'

'The Brahmana asked, "How does Fire, the vital force, combine with Earth, matter, to become the physical body which houses living spirits? And how does prana, the life-force, give the parts of the body in which it resides impetus to act?"

The butcher replied, "Prana, the vital spirit, manifesting itself in the seat of consciousness, sparks the body into action. It is the soul, which is present in both, that acts. The past, the present and the future are inseparable from the soul, and it is the highest aspect of any being. It is the essence of the Supreme Spirit, and we adore it. It is the life-giving principle of all creatures, and it is the eternal spirit—Purusha. It is splendid.

It is the intelligence and the ego; it is the seat of all elements. It is sustained by that subtle life-force, prana, while it inhabits a corporeal frame, in all its internal and external interactions with mind or matter.

Each being, however, goes its own way by the action of another subtle force called samana. Samana transforms itself into apana, or air, and, supported by the top of the stomach, carries the body's waste to the kidneys and intestines.

This same force is present in the three elements—effort, exertion and power—and men learned in science have named it udana. When it manifests itself at the energy centres of the human system it is known as vyana. Vyana disperses heat into the tissues and muscles of the body to transform food and fluids into energy. Vyana combines with prana and the other forces to produce heat, the body's internal energy, which causes digestion.

The energy produced by the combination of prana and apana reacts within samana and udana to generate the physical growth of the body that consists of the seven substances—bones, muscles and the rest.

Apana is that portion of its seat extending as far as the rectum; from there, arteries spread in the five forces, of which prana is one. Heat acts on prana, which strikes the extremity of the apana region and recoils, to react on the heat.

Above the navel is the region of undigested food and below it the area of digestion. Prana and all the other forces of the body are seated in the navel. The arteries coming from the heart run upwards, downwards and obliquely, carrying the essence of our food. The arteries are controlled by the ten pranic forces.

Yogis, who have overcome every obstacle, and who view all things objectively and impartially, whose souls are in their intellect, find the Supreme Spirit.

Prana and apana are present in beings. The soul or atman is clothed in corporeal disguise, and is present in the eleven elemental physical aspects of life forms. Although eternal and undying, its normal state is altered by its habitat, just as fire burns in a fireplace, constant, yet taking the shape of its container.

The soul, which is divine, is related to the body in which it lives in the same way as a drop of water that rolls on the sleek surface of a lotus leaf.

Sattva, rajas and tamas are the attributes of all life; life is the attribute of the soul; and the soul is an attribute of the Supreme Brahman. This living principle, which is active in itself and induces activity in its attributes of sattva, rajas and tamas, is anchored in inert matter. It is that Brahman by which the seven worlds are incited to action and is called the most high by men of spiritual insight.

In all these elements, the eternal spirit does not show itself, but can be known by those who are learned in Atma gyana, who have extraordinary vision. A pure-minded man, by purifying his heart, can destroy the good and evil karmic effects of his actions and attain eternal bliss by the enlightenment of his inner spirit. That state of peace is compared to the sound sleep of an innocent, happy person, or the steady light of a lamp trimmed by a skilful hand.

A pure man, living on a frugal diet, perceives the Supreme Spirit in his own soul, and by meditating in the evening and the small hours of the night, he sees the Nirguna Paramatman, the Supreme Spirit, by the light of his heart, shining like a bright lamp, and so he attains moksha.

Greed and anger must somehow be subdued, because self-restraint is the most sacred virtue that a man can practise. It is considered the means by which a man can cross the sea of misery. A man must protect his righteousness from being swallowed by the evil consequences of anger; he must safeguard his virtues from his pride; he must protect his learning from vanity, and his own spirit from illusion.

Liberality is the best of virtues, and forbearance is the most powerful; the knowledge of our inner spiritual nature is the best of all knowledge, and truthfulness the best of all religious duties. Speaking the truth is good and so is the knowledge of truth, but the greatest good of all creatures is brought about by what we know as the Highest Truth.

He whose actions are not performed for the sake of reward or blessing, he who has sacrificed everything to achieve renunciation—this man is a real Sannyasin and is truly wise. No one can teach a man to commune with Brahman, not even his spiritual Guru. To solve the eternal mystery the Guru can only set us on the path, which is to renounce the material world through yoga.

We must not harm any creature and must live in peace and friendship with all. In our present existence, we must not avenge ourselves on any creature. Self-denial, peace of mind, renunciation of hope, and equanimity are the ways by which enlightenment can be reached. The knowledge of the Self is the highest knowledge.

In this world as well as hereafter, a man must fulfil his dharma by renouncing all worldly desires and developing an attitude of stoicism and detachment, by which suffering is stilled.

The Muni who wants to have Moksha, salvation, which is so difficult to attain, must observe constant austerities, patience and self-restraint; he must give up attachment, which binds him to people and material things. These practices are the attributes of the Brahman. The gunas that we are conscious of reduce themselves to agunas, non-attributes, in Him, the Supreme Spirit.

He is not bound by anything, and is seen only by the development of spiritual vision. As soon as the illusion caused by ignorance is dispelled, supreme unalloyed joy is attained. By giving up the objects of pleasure and pain, and by severing the bonds to the things of this earth, a man may attain Brahman, and Moksha.

Brahmanottama, I have explained this to you in brief, as I have heard it. What else do you wish to know?" said the meat-seller.' "

"Markandeya says, 'Yudhishtira, when the Brahmana heard the explanation of this subtle mystery of Mukti he was overjoyed, and he said to the butcher, "All that you have explained is sound, and it seems to me that there is nothing you do not know about the mysteries of true religion."

The butcher replied, "Good and great Brahmana, you will see for yourself the truth of all that I have told you, because of which I have attained this blissful state. Come into the inner apartment of my home; you should meet my parents."

The Brahmana went in and saw a fine, beautiful mansion. It was a magnificent house divided into four suites of rooms. The Devas had admired this house and indeed it looked like one of their own palaces. It was furnished with fine chairs and beds, and sweet perfumes hung in the air. The meat-seller's parents, clad in white robes, had finished their meal and were seated at ease. The butcher prostrated himself before them and touched his head to their feet.

His elderly parents said to him, "Rise, O pious one; may dharma shield you. We are always pleased with your goodness; may you be blessed with a long life, knowledge and keen intelligence; may all your desires be fulfilled.

You are a good and dutiful son, and you look after us so well. Indeed, you do not worship any god as you do us.

By constantly controlling yourself, you have gained the discipline and power of a Brahmana. Your ancestors are gratified by your self-restraint and by the way you worship us. In thought, word and action, your attention to us never flags and it seems that you never have any thought in your mind except how to please us. Son, you work as hard to please us as Rama, the son of Jamadagni, did to please his old parents, even more."

Then the butcher introduced the Brahmana to his parents, and they received him with the customary salutation of welcome. The Brahmana, accepting their welcome humbly, enquired if they, their children and servants were in good health, and happy.

The aged couple replied, "O Brahmana, we are all well. Were you able to reach this place without much difficulty?"

The Brahmana replied that he had. Now the meat vendor said to the Brahmana, "Worshipful one, my parents are the idols that I worship; whatever is due to the gods, I do for them. Just as men worship the thirty-three Devas with Indra at their head, I worship my aged parents. Just as Brahmanas strive to procure offerings to make to their gods, I work diligently to make offerings to these two deities of mine.

My father and my mother, O Brahmana, are my supreme gods, and I want to please them always, with offerings of flowers, fruit and jewels. To me they are like the three sacred Agnis that learned men speak of, like the Yagnas, or the four Vedas.

My five pranas, my wife, children and friends are all dedicated to their service. With my wife and children, I always attend on them. Brahmanottama, with my own hands I assist in their bathing; I wash their feet and give them food; and I speak to them only of pleasant matters and never what is unpleasant. I consider pleasing them to be my highest dharma, even if what that entails might not be justifiable. And I am always diligent in serving them.

One's parents, the sacred fire, the soul and the spiritual Guru—these five, good Brahmana, are worthy of the highest reverence by a person who seeks prosperity. By serving them properly, one acquires the punya of perpetually keeping the sacred fire burning. It is the eternal duty of all grihastas," said the vendor of meat.'

"Markandeya continues, 'Having introduced his parents to the Brahmana as his highest gurus, the butcher said, "Now you see the power of my dharma, which has enhanced my inner spiritual vision. It is for this purpose that the lady, who is self-restrained, truthful and devoted to her husband, told you to come to Mithila to meet the butcher who would explain the mysteries of religion to you."

The Brahmana said, "Pious one, so steadfast in fulfilling your dharma, I remember what that chaste devi said, and I am convinced that you are truly endowed with every fine quality."

The butcher replied, "I have no doubt that the good woman explained all this to you. Now listen to me and I will tell you what will benefit you.

Brahmana of impeachable character, you have wronged your father and mother by leaving home without their permission, in order to study the Vedas. You have not acted properly in this matter, because your sannyasin parents are old and have been blinded by their grief at losing you. Return home to console them, and may this always stand you in good stead. You have a noble mind and great tapasyashakti, and you are devout; but these qualities have not benefitted you. Go back immediately and comfort your parents.

Take my advice seriously, because what I say is for your weal. Brahmana, go home today."

The Brahmana said, "Surely, you speak the truth. May you prosper, pious one; I am pleased with you."

The butcher said, "Brahmana, your perseverance in the practice of the divine and ancient sanatana dharma, which even the pure-minded find so difficult to attain, makes you seem like a god. Return to your parents' side and waste no time in adoring them. I do not know of any higher dharma than this."

The Brahmana said, "It is my singular good fortune that has brought me here, and I am lucky to have met you. It is very difficult to find, in our midst, one who can explain the mysteries of dharma; there is hardly even one man in a thousand who is so knowledgeable about dharma.

I am glad, O great one, to have your friendship. May you prosper. You have pulled me back from the brink of hell. I know this is my destiny because of the manner in which you came into my life.

You have saved me just as his grandsons saved the fallen king Yayati. I will follow your advice and honour my father and mother. I know you are pure-hearted because no man whose heart is sullied could unravel these subtle intricacies of dharma. It is difficult indeed for a Sudra to understand these profound and complex concepts; and this puzzles me. You must have been born a Sudra because of your past karma. Most generous one, I am eager to know the truth about this. Tell me about it, as you see fit."

The butcher replied, "Good Brahmana, I revere Brahmanas. Listen, sinless one, to the story of my previous life. In my last life, I was a Brahmana, well-read in the Vedas, and an accomplished student of the Vedangas. It is my own fault that I have been degraded to my present condition.

A king, a skilled archer who was accomplished in dhanurveda, the science of archery, was my friend; and from being his companion, O Brahmana, I, too became a good archer. One day, the king, with his ministers and best warriors, went hunting. He killed a large number of deer near a hermitage.

I, too, good Brahmana, shot a swift, fierce arrow, which wounded a Rishi while his head was bent in prayer. He fell down on the ground, screaming, and he cried, 'I have done no harm to anyone. What sinful man has done this to me?'

My lord, I assumed I had shot a deer and went up, only to find the Rishi, his body pierced by my arrow. I was dismayed by the evil thing I had done, and said to that sage of great punya, who lay wailing on the ground, 'I did this unwittingly, O Rishi. You must forgive me my sin.'

But, O Brahmana, the Rishi said to me, 'You will be born as a cruel butcher in the Sudra caste,' " said the meat-seller.'

'The butcher continued, "Cursed by the Muni, I tried to pacify him, 'Forgive me, O Muni, I did not do this on purpose. Worshipful one, do not be angry.'

The Rishi replied, 'I cannot withdraw the curse I have pronounced, but out of compassion for you I will do you a favour. Though born in the Sudra varna, you will be a pious man and worship your parents. And, by worshipping them, you will attain great punya. You will remember your past life, and you will go to Swargaloka. When you have been redeemed from this curse, you will become a Brahmana once more.'

Manavottama, thus did the powerful Rishi curse me and thus did I atone for my sin and placate him.

Then, excellent Brahmana, I drew out the arrow from his body and took him into the asrama; he was alive and he recovered. This is what happened to me long ago, in my last life, and I have told you how I will find heaven in the hereafter."

The Brahmana said, "O knowing one, do not grieve, for all men are subject to joy and sorrow. It is in keeping with your dharma that you slaughter animals and sell their meat, but you are always devoted to the path of virtue and learned in the mysterious ways of the world. What you do is your duty, and the taint of evil karma will not attach to you. After a short time, you will regain your Brahmanic status. In fact, I consider you a Brahmana even now. I have no doubt about this.

The Brahmana who is vain and haughty, who is addicted to vice and wedded to evil, shameful practices, is like a Sudra. On the other hand, a Sudra who wears virtue, self-restraint and truth like ornaments is like a Brahmana. A man becomes a Brahmana by dint of his character; and by his own evil karma, a man invites doom. I believe that your sin has now been wiped away. You must not grieve, for men like you, who are so good, and learned in the subtleties of philosophy and the ways of the world, can have no cause for grief."

The butcher replied, "Physical illnesses should be cured with medicines, and mental ones with spiritual wisdom. This is the power of knowledge. Knowing this, wise men should not behave like callow boys. Only men of little intelligence are overpowered by grief when something unpleasant happens to them, or when something desirable does not.

All beings are subject to feelings of grief or joy; it is not unique to any single species of creature or class of men. Knowing that this is so, people quickly change their ways; and if they recognise it early, they can cure themselves of it altogether.

Men who worry about this make themselves unhappy. Wise men, whose knowledge has made them contented, and who are indifferent to sorrow and joy alike, are truly happy. The wise are always contented and the foolish always discontented. There is no end to discontentment; contentment is the highest form of happiness. People who have found the perfect path do not grieve; they are aware of the final destiny of all creatures.

One must not give way to discontent. It is a noxious poison: it kills those who have not developed their intellect, like a snake kills a child. The man who lacks wisdom, and who is confused when he finds himself in a situation where he has to exercise his intellect, is hardly a man.

All our actions have their consequences. The man who lives a life of passive indifference to what happens around him achieves nothing. Instead of merely grumbling, one must try to find the way to gain freedom form spiritual bondage; and when the means to salvation are found, he must free himself from his dependence on the senses.

The man who has attained a high state of spiritual knowledge is always conscious of the impermanence of all phenomena. He keeps the final destruction of everything in mind and never grieves. I, too, O sage one, do not grieve; I am biding my time while I live out this present life. Purushottama, that is why I am not plagued by uncertainty."

The Brahmana said, "You are wise and evolved; great is your intellect. You, who know the sacred scriptures, are content with your spiritual wisdom. I can see no faults in you. Farewell, O best of the pious; may you prosper; may righteousness be your armour; and may you be constant in dharma." '

Markandeya continues, 'The butcher said to the Brahmana, "Tathaastu, so be it."

The Brahmana walked around the meat-seller in pradakshina and left. The Brahmana went back home and was conscientious in his attention to his elderly parents.

This story I have told you, and which you wanted to hear, Yudhishtira my son, is replete with wisdom: the virtues of women's devotion to their husbands and of filial worship.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Mahamuni, you have narrated this wonderful story and, listening to you made the hours pass as if they were a mere moment. But, I am not yet satiated with listening to your discourse.' "

Vaisampayana continued, "The noble Yudhishtira listens to this superb religious discourse, and he says to Rishi Markandeya, 'Why did Agni Deva, the Fire God, hide himself in water, and why did the splendid Angirasa become Agni to convey the oblations when Agni had disappeared into the water? Fire is one, but it seems to divide itself and become many. Worshipful one, I want to know about this and other things, as well.

How was Kumara born? How did he come to be known as the son of Agni? How was he born to Rudra, Ganga and Krittika? Holy Bhrigunandana, I am eager to learn how these things happened. Great Muni, I am curious about all this.'

Markandeya replies, 'There is an ancient tale told, about how Agni Deva, the conveyor of oblations, went in a temper to the forest in order to perform a penance. Angirasa transformed himself into Agni and freed the world from darkness and anguish with his warmth.

Long, long ago, Mahabaho, the great Angirasa performed a wonderful tapasya in his asrama. He was more splendid than the bearer of oblations, Agni Deva, and lit up the Universe. Agni was performing a penance at the same time and was annoyed by Angirasa's brilliance. Depressed and not knowing what to do, that god thought to himself, "Brahma has created another Agni for the world. Because I have been at tapasya, my services as the Deity of fire have been dispensed with."

He thought about how he could re-establish himself as the god of fire. He saw the great Muni Angirasa warming the whole Universe, as fire does, and approached him slowly and fearfully.

Angirasa said to him, "Re-establish yourself quickly as the life-giving fire of the Universe. Everyone in Triloka knows that you were created by Brahma to dispel the primeval darkness. O Destroyer of darkness, occupy your proper place."

Agni replied, "My reputation is tarnished now, and you have become the Fire God. People will know you, and not me, as Agni. I have relinquished my status of being Fire God. You be the primeval fire, and I shall officiate as the second, or Prajapatyaka Agni."

Angirasa said, "You must re-instate yourself as the God of fire and the Destroyer of darkness, and resume your duty of ensuring that the people have a clear path to Swarga. Lord, make me have your first child." '

Markandeya continues, 'Hearing Angirasa's words, Agni complied and Angirasa had a son named Brihaspati. The Devas knew that he was Angirasa's first son, born of Agni, and, O Bhaarata, they came to probe the mystery; and they accepted Angirasa's explanation of how this had happened.

Now I will name and describe all the different types of fire, as the Brahmanas know them, and their uses.' "

"Markandeya continues, "O gem of the Kurus, Angirasa was the third son of Brahma and he had a wife named Subha. Hear about the children he had by her. Rajan, his son Brihaspati's fame was legend; he was generous and powerful. His intelligence and learning were profound, and he had a great reputation as a counsellor.

Angirasa's eldest daughter was Bhanumati; she was the most beautiful of all his children. His second daughter was called Raga, so named because she was loved by all creatures. Sinivali was his third daughter; her body was so slender that she was visible from certain angles and invisible from others; and for this reason she was compared to Rudra's daughter. Archishmati was his fourth daughter, and she was so named because of her radiance. His fifth daughter was Havishmati, so named because she accepted havis, oblations. The sixth daughter of Angirasa was called Mahishmati, and she was very devout. The intelligent Mahamati was his seventh daughter; she is always present at sacrifices of great grandeur. This revered daughter of Angirasa, who is known to be without rival, and about whom people utter the words kuhu kuhu, is also known as Kuhu Kuhu.' "

"Markandeya continues, 'Brihaspati had a wife named Tara, who was from the Moon. She had six of his sons, born of six different fires, and one daughter.

Brihaspati's son Sanju was a great tapasvin; he is the fire in whose honour ghee is offered at the Paurnamasya yagna and other sacrifices. At the Chaturmasya yagna and Aswamedha yagna, animals are offered in his honour, and we know him by the way he manifests himself in multiple flames. Sanju's wife was called Satya; she was of matchless beauty and was born from Dharma, to embody truth. Sanju's son was the whole, blazing fire, and he had three deeply religious daughters.

The fire which is honoured with the first oblations at all sacrifices is his first son, named Bharadwaja. Sanju's second son is called Bharata, in whose honour ghee is offered with the sacrificial ladle, the sruk, at all the full-moon—Paurnamasya—sacrifices. Beside these, there were other sons of whom Bharata was the eldest; and he had a daughter called Bharati.

Bharata is the son of Prajapati Bharata Agni. And, Bhaaratottama, because of the honour accorded to him, he is also called "Great".

Vira is Bharadwaja's wife; and her son is also named Vira. The Brahmanas say that he is worshipped with the same hymns as Soma is, and with offerings of ghee. Joined with Soma during the second round of ghee oblation, he is also called Rathaprabhu, Rathadhwana and Kumbhareta. He had a son named Siddhi by his wife Sarayu, who outshone the Sun in splendour. As the presiding deity of the fire sacrifice, he is always named in the hymns of praise to Fire.

The fire named Nischayavana only praises the Earth; his good name, splendour and prosperity never wane. The sinless fire, named Satya, blazing with pure energy, is Nischayavana's son. He is free from all impurities and is not defiled by sin; he is the regulator of time. This fire has another name, Nishkriti, because he brought about the Nishkriti, redemption, of all creatures. When properly worshipped, he guarantees good fortune. His son is Swana, the generator of all diseases; he inflicts intense suffering, making his victims cry out aloud. He lives in the intelligence of the Universe.

Brihaspati's third son is called Viswajit by men of spiritual wisdom. The fire that manifests as the internal heat of the body, which digests the food of all creatures, is the fourth son of Brihaspati, known throughout all the worlds, O Bhaarata, as Viswabhug. He is self-restrained, of great dharma, and a brahmacharin; Brahmanas worship him at the Paka yagna. The sacred river Gomati is Viswabhug's wife, and all pious men perform their sacred rites on her banks.

That apocalyptic water-drinking sea fire called Badava is Brihaspati's fifth son. This Brahmic agni has a tendency to move upwards and is, therefore, called Urdhvabhaga. Its home is the vital air, the life force called Prana. The sixth son is Svishtakrit; through him oblations became svishta, or properly offered. The udagdhara oblation is always made in his honour. The fire called Manyuti becomes enraged when the Earth's beings become peaceful.

The inexorable and most volatile fire is Brihaspati's daughter, and is known as Swaha; she is present in all matter. Swaha had three sons by the three gunas, Sattva, Rajas and Tamas. By Sattva she had a son whose beauty had no equal in Devaloka. The gods named him Kama Agni. By Rajas she had a son named Amogha, the invincible fire, the destroyer of his enemies in battle. He is sure of victory, and so, he curbs his anger. He is armed with a bow and sits adorned with flower garlands on a chariot.

By Tamas also Swaha had a son, the great Uktha, the means to salvation, who is praised by the three Ukthas. He is the originator of the sacred words of the Veda, and is, therefore, Samaswasam, or the means to Moksha,' says Markandeya."

"Markandeya continues, 'Uktha performed a severe penance lasting for many years, with the aim of having a son as pious as a Brahmana. He invoked, with Vyahriti hymns, the five sacred fires—Kasyapa, Vasistha, Prana, Angirasa's son Chyavana, and Shuvarchaka.

The flames emitted a form of bright and vivacious energy in five different colours. The head of this form was the colour of a raging fire; its arms dazzled like the Sun; its skin and eyes were tawny gold; and its feet were black, O Bhaarata. The five who were invoked were of great tapasyashakti and gave the form its five colours, and that is why the celestial being that emerged from the fire is described as being one with these five. This being, Tapa, is the progenitor of the five tribes.

The penance continued for ten thousand years and an awesome, dreadful fire blazed forth, that was born of the Pitrs in order to begin the work of creation. From his head and mouth he created day and night—Brihad and Rathantara—who are the thieves of life. He created Siva from his navel, Indra from his strength, Vayu and Agni from his soul, and from his two arms the hymns Udatta and Anudatta. He produced the mind, and the five senses, and everything else as well.

Next, he created the five sons of the Pitrs: Pranidhi was the son of Brihadratha, who was Kasyapa's son. Bhanu was the grandson of Chyavana; Saubhara was Suvarchaka's son; and Anudatta was the son of Prana. He is said to have created these twenty-five beings.

Tapa created fifteen other gods who obstruct sacrifices. They are Subhima, Atibhima, Bhima, Bhimabala and Abala, Sumitra, Mitravanta, Mitragna, Mitravardhana, Mitradharma and Surapravira, Vira and Suresha, Suvarchasa and Surahantara. These are divided into three classes of five each and, living in this world, they destroy the sacrifices of the Devas in Devaloka. They frustrate their goals and spoil their oblations of ghee. They do this only to spite the sacred fires that convey these offerings to the gods.

If the officiating priests are watchful, they place oblations in honour of these despoilers outside the sacrificial altar, and this prevents them from entering the place where the sacred fire is lit. They convey the oblations on wings. When appeased with hymns, they do not spoil the sacrificial rites.

Brihadukta, one of Tapa's sons, belongs to the Earth. He is worshipped here in this world by pious men performing Agnihotra sacrifices. Another son, Rathantara, accepts oblations on behalf of Mitravinda. The renowned Tapa was very happy with his sons.' "

"Markandeya continues, 'The fire named Bharata was governed by strict laws of tapasya. He is also called Pushtimati because, when he is propitiated satisfactorily, he guarantees Pushti, prosperity. He is called Bharata because he nurtures all creatures.

The other fire is named Siva because he is devoted to the worship of Shakti, the feminine energy of the forces of Nature; and because he always alleviates the sorrows of all creatures that are troubled, he is called Siva, the giver of weal.

When Tapa had acquired great ascetic wealth by his tapasya, he had an intellectually brilliant son named Purandara, to inherit this wealth. He had another son named Ushma, who is the fire that is present in matter when it vaporises. A third son was Manu, who officiated as Prajapati. Brahmanas who are learned in the Vedas speak of the exploits of his sons, the fires Sambhu and the effulgent Avasathya.

Thus did Tapa give birth to five Urjaskara agnis, all bright as gold, that take the Soma rasa during sacrifices.

The great Sun God, when tired after his day's labours, is the fire known as Prasanta. He created the Asuras and other terrible creatures. Angirasa created Prajapati Bhanu, one of Tapa's sons. Brahmanas learned in the Vedas refer to this son as Brihadbhanu, the great Bhanu. Bhanu married Supraja, the daughter of Surya Deva. She and Brihadbhanu gave birth to six sons. Let me describe their children for you.

There is the fire who gives strength to the weak, and he is called Balada, the giver of strength. He is the first son of Bhanu. Then there is the fire that looks dreadful when the world is in a state of tranquillity. He is called Manjuman, and he is the second son of Bhanu. Next is the fire in whose honour oblations of ghee are poured during the Darsa and Paurnamasya yagnas, who is known to the people of the world as Vishnu. He is the third of Bhanu's sons, and he has two names, Angirasa and Dhritiman.

Then there is the fire to whom, with Indra, the Agrayana oblation is given. He is named Agrayana, and he is Bhanu's fourth son. The fifth son of Bhanu is Agraha, from whom the daily oblations made for the performance of the Chaturmasya yagna are taken. And Stubha is the sixth son of Bhanu.

Nisa was another wife of Manu's, and she, too, is named Bhanu. She had one daughter, two Agnishomas, and also five other agnis, fire gods. The effulgent Fire God who is honoured with the first offerings, along with Indra, god of the clouds, is Vaiswanara. The second son of Manu and Bhanu is the agni called Viswapati, the lord of all the worlds. The daughter of Manu is called Svishtakrit, because one earns great punya by offering oblations to her. Rohini is her other name, and though she was the daughter of Hiranyakasipu, she became his wife because of her evil deeds. She is, however, one of the Prajapatis.

And that other fire which inhabits the life-breaths of all creatures, and which gives them life, is called Sannihita. He makes our senses recognise sound and shape. Then comes the divine spirit, whose path is stained with black and white marks, who fans fire, and who, though sinless, is responsible for evil karma. The wise regard him, the fire Kapila, as a great Rishi. Kapila is the propounder of the system of Yoga called Sankhya.

The fire through which the elemental spirits always receive Agra, or offerings, which people make at the performance of all special rites, is called Agrani.

There are the bright fires, known the world over, which were created for the rectification of the Agnihotra rites when they were marred by any defects. If fires overlap because of the wind, they must be set right by performing Ashtakapala puja in honour of the fire Suchi.

If the southern fire comes in contact with the two other fires, then the rectifying Ashtakapala rites must be performed in honour of the agni Viti. If the fires called Nivesa, burning in its allotted place, comes into contact with the fire called Devagni, then the Ashtakapala rites must be performed in honour of the fire Suchi.

If the constant fire is touched by a woman during her menstrual period, then the Ashtakapala rites must be performed in honour of the agni called Vasuman. If, during the performance of Agnihotra pujas, anyone speaks of the death of any creature, or if an animal dies, the rites can be purified by means of the Ashtakapala rites in honour of the Surabhiman agni.

The Brahmana who, because he is ill, is unable to offer oblations to the sacred fire for three nights, must make amends by performing the Ashtakapala rites in honour of the northern fire. He who has performed the Darsa and the Paurnamasya rites must make any necessary rectifications with the performance of the Ashtakapala rites in honour of the Patikrit fire.

If the fire of a birthing room comes in contact with the undying sacred fire, it must be purified by performing Ashtakapala rites in honour of the Agniman agni,' says Markandeya."

"Markandeya continues, 'Mudita was the favourite wife of the fire Saha. She used to live in water. And Saha, who was the lord of earth and sky, had a son, the sacred fire named Adbhuta, with her. Learned Brahmanas believe that this fire is the ruler and inner soul of all creatures. He is worthy of worship, resplendent, and the lord of all the mahabhutas, the elements. And this fire, also called Grihapati, is worshipped at all sacrifices and is the instrument by which all oblations made in this world are conveyed to the gods.

This son of Saha, Adbhuta, the great fire, is the soul of the waters; he is the prince and ruler of the sky and the lord of everything great. His son, the Bharatagni, consumes the dead bodies of all creatures. His first offering, Kratu, is known as Niyata at the performance of the Agnishtoma yagna. That mighty elemental fire, Saha, is always missed by the Devas because when he sees Niyata approaching him he hides in the sea from fear of contamination.

On one occasion, the Devas searched for him everywhere but could not find him.

The fire saw Atharva and said to him, "Valiant being, perform the oblations for the Devas. I am disabled and weak. Take the form of the red-eyed fire and do me this favour!"

Having made this request of Atharvan, the fire went away to hide. But the fish revealed his hiding place and the furious fire cursed them in anger, saying, "You shall be the food of all creatures in various ways."

Then that fire, Saha, the conveyor of oblations, spoke to Atharva again and made the same request. The Devas pleaded with him, but he refused to bring them their havis. He lost consciousness and died.

Leaving his material body, he entered the bowels of the earth, and wherever he met the earth, he created different metals. Energy emanated from him: earthly perfumes were created from his pus; the deodar, the cedar, sprang from his bones; glass emerged from his phlegm; the emerald came from his bile, and iron from his liver. Ever since, the Earth has been enriched with these three substances, wood, stone and metal. The clouds were made from his nails, and corals from his veins. And various other metals were produced from his body, O king.

After shedding his physical body, he remained absorbed in dhyana. When Bhrigu and Angirasa performed their penance, they succeeded in waking him and, gratified by their tapasya, he burned with intensity. But as soon as he saw Rishi Atharva, he dove into his watery hideout again.

At this extinguishing of the fire, the whole world was frightened, and sought the protection of Atharva. The Devas and other beings began to worship him. Atharva searched the sea while those anxious beings looked on in eager anticipation. He found the fire and began the work of creation. This is the story of how the fire was destroyed and then called back to life by the venerable Atharva. Now he carries the offerings of all creatures; and, living in the sea and always on the move, produced the various fires mentioned in the Vedas.

The mothers of the fires are the rivers: Sindhu, and the five rivers; Devika and Saraswati; Ganga, Satakumbha, Sarayu, and Gandaki; Charmanwati, Mahi, Medha and Medhatithi; the three, Tamravati, Vetravati, and Kausiki; Tamasa, Narmada and Godavari; Vena, Upavena, Bhima and Vadava, O Bhaarata; Bharati, Suprayoga, Kaveri and Murmura; Tungavena, Krishnavena, Kapila and Sona: these rivers are said to be the mothers of the fires.

The Adbhuta agni had a wife called Priya, and Vibhu was the eldest of his sons by her.

There are as many kinds of Soma yagnas as the number of fires. All this race of fires, first born of the spirit of Brahma, also sprang from Atri. Atri conceived them as his sons, in his own mind, out of a desire to enhance creation. By this act, the agnis emerged from his Brahmic body.

I have told you the story of the origin of these fires. They are great, glorious and unrivalled in power; they are the dispellers of darkness. The powers of these fires are equal to that of the Adbhuta, as the Vedas tell us, because all these fires are one and the same. The adored and exalted being, the first Agni, must be thought of as the unity of all fires because, like the Jyotishtoma yagna, he issued from Angirasa's body in myriad forms.

This, that I have narrated to you, is the history of the great race of Agni who, when worshipped with various hymns, carries the offerings of all creatures to the gods.' "

"Markandeya continues, 'Sinless scion of the Kurus, I have given you a detailed history of the many branches of the Agni clan, and I will now tell you the story of the birth of Kartikeya of the great intelligence. I will tell you about that wonderful and illustrious tejasvin, the son of the Adbhuta agni, born to the wives of the Brahmarishis.

In ancient times, the Devas and Asuras were always at war, and the terrible demons always defeated the gods. Indra saw how the Asuras decimated his armies and made up his mind to identify a leader for the armies of Devaloka.

He thought to himself, "I must find a powerful one who can rally and lead Swarga's army that has been devastated by the Danavas."

He went to the Manasa mountains and was absorbed in thought when he heard the heartrending cries of a woman, who said, "May someone come and save me by finding me a husband, or let him be my husband himself."

Purandara said to her, "Have no fear, devi," and, at once, he saw a Kesin, an Asura, wearing a crown and holding a mace in his hand, standing by her, and her hand in his rough grip. And he looked like a distant hill clad in metallic armour.

Indra addressed the Asura, saying, "Why do you behave so insolently towards this lady? Be aware that I am the god who wields the thunderbolt.

Desist from doing her any violence."

Kesin replied, "You leave her alone, Sakra; I want her for myself. Do you really think, O Slayer of Paka, that you will return home alive today?"

And he hurled his mace at Indra. Vasava dissected it in flight with his thunderbolt. Kesin, furious, flung a huge rock at him, which he of the hundred sacrifices shattered with his Vajra. A large piece of the rock fell on Kesin and, grievously injured, he fled, leaving the woman.

When the Asura had gone Indra said to the woman, "Who are you, and whose wife are you, beautiful one? What brings you here?"

The woman replied, "I am a daughter of Prajapati Brahma, Lord of all creatures, and my name is Devasena. My sister Daityasena has been ravished by Kesin. We sisters would both take our father's permission and come regularly, with our sakhis, to these Manasa mountains.

The Asura Kesin used to court us every day. My sister Daityasena succumbed to him, but I did not. He took her away, but you have rescued me with your might. And now, Lord of Devas, I want you to find an invincible husband for me."

Indra replied, "You are my cousin—your mother and my mother Dakshayani are sisters. Tell me about your strengths."

The woman replied, "Mahabaho, I am Abala, weak, and so my husband must be powerful. The strength of my father's boons will ensure that Devas and Asuras will respect him."

Indra said, "Faultless creature, tell me, what sort of power do you want your husband to have?"

The devi said, "My husband must be a manly and celebrated one, who is devoted to Brahma, and who is able to conquer all the Devas, Asuras, Yakshas, Kinnaras, Uragas, Rakshasas and evil Daityas, and subdue all the worlds with you." '

Markandeya continues, 'Indra was troubled when he heard this, and he thought, "There is no one who fits this description, to be this woman's husband."

Just then Indra, resplendent as the Sun, saw Surya Deva rising on the Udaya mountain and radiant Soma Deva merging into him. It was the day of the new moon, and the inauspicious moment of Raudra. He of the hundred sacrifices, Satakratu, saw the Asuras and Devas battling for dominance on the Udaya Mountain.

He noticed that the dawn was tinged with red clouds, and saw that Varuna's oceanic abode had turned the hue of blood. He saw Agni entering the orb of the Sun, conveying the oblations that Bhrigu, Angirasa and others had offered, to the accompaniment of hymns.

He also saw the twenty-four parvas, the hours adorning Surya Deva, and the fearsome Soma also present in the Sun.

Sakra looked at the awesome union of the Sun and the Moon and he thought, "This terrible conjunction of Soma and Surya forebodes a fearful battle tomorrow. The river Sindhu flows with fresh blood, and red-faced jackals drink her waters and howl to the Sun.

This conjunction of Sun, Moon and Agni is as dreadful and powerful as it is wondrous. If Soma gives birth to a son now, that child can become a suitable husband for this woman. Agni has a lineage similar to Soma's, and he, too, is a Deva. If these two have a son together, that boy can surely become this woman's husband."

Thinking thus, Indra took Devasena with him and went to Brahma. He greeted the Pitamaha and said to him, "Find an illustrious warrior to be this woman's husband."

Brahma replied, "Danavasudana, slayer of Danavas, it shall be as you wish. The children born of such a marriage will be mighty and ever-victorious. Her husband will be joint leader of your forces with you."

Indra and Devasena bowed to Brahma and went, then, to where those great Brahmanas, the powerful Devarishis, Vasistha and the others, lived. Other Devas followed Indra to the Rishis' asramas, where they were conducting their yagnas, to have a share of the Soma rasa that would be offered. Those exalted Maharishis performed the yagna with towering fires and offered the burnt offerings to the gods.

They invoked Adbhuta, the agni that carries the havis, with mantras. That great fire emerged from the Sun and silently appeared at the yagna.

Bhaaratottama, Adbhuta entered the sacrificial flames that the Rishis had lit, and into which they had poured various offerings to the chanting of hymns, and he took these offerings to the Swargavasis, the dwellers of heaven.

On his return, he saw the wives of those Devarishis sleeping peacefully on their beds. These finest of women had skins that shone like altars of gold, and the blemishless radiance of moonbeams. They sparkled like fiery stars. Adbhuta looked at the wives of the illustrious Brahmanas with lustful eyes; his mind became agitated, and their beauty stabbed him with desire.

Considering it improper for him to be in such turmoil, he quieted his heart, saying to himself, "The wives of these great Brahmanas are chaste and faithful, and beyond the reach of other men's desires. I long to possess them, but since I cannot look at them in this way or touch them, I will become their household fire, Grihapatya and gratify myself by being able to see them every day." '

Markandeya continues, 'Adbhuta transformed himself into a household fire, and was glad indeed, seeing those gold-complexioned women and touching them with his flames. In thrall to their beauty, he lived there for a long time, filled with intense love for them and giving them his heart. Eventually, unable to win the hearts of those Brahmanastris, his own heart tortured by love, he made his way to a forest with the intention of killing himself.

Just before this, Swaha, the daughter of Daksha, had lost her heart to him, and she waited to catch him in a weak moment. She could not find any chink in the cool and apparently passionless Agni.

But now that the god had gone into the forest, tormented by pangs of love, she thought, "I am in an anguish of love; I will assume the guise of the wives of the Saptarishis and, in that guise, go to the Fire God who is so smitten with their charms. He will be gratified, and my desire, too, will be slaked," ' says Markandeya."

"Markandeya continues, 'Lord of Men, the beautiful Sivaa was the wife of Angirasa, one of the Saptarishis, and she had a virtuous, unblemished character.

Swaha disguised herself as Sivaa and went to Agni and said, "O Agni, I am tortured with love for you. You must satisfy my passion. If you do not, I will kill myself. I am Sivaa, the wife of Angirasa, and I have come here on the advice of the wives of the other Rishis, who have sent me to you after much thought."

Agni replied, "How did you know that I was suffering with love, and how could the others, the beloved wives of the seven Rishis, know this?"

Swaha replied, "You are a favourite with us, but we are in awe of you. The other wives guessed what was in your heart and sent me to you. I have come here to satisfy my desire. Make me happy quickly; my sisters-in-law are waiting for me to return." '

Markandeya continues, 'Filled with delight, Agni and the disguised Swaha made rapturous love together. While having intercourse, she caught and held some of his seed in her hand. To avoid bringing disgrace to the Brahmana women and Agni if she was seen in that disguise while she walked back through the forest, she turned herself into a bird and flew through the forest.

She came to Sweta, the White Mountain. Here the land was covered with grass, shrubs, plants and trees, and the mountain was guarded by strange seven-headed, venomous serpents. There were Rakshasas, male and female Pisachas, dreadful spirits and all kinds of birds and animals. Swaha quickly climbed a peak and dropped Agni's seed into a golden lake.

After this, she took the form of each of the wives of the illustrious Saptarishis, one by one, and had intercourse with Agni. The only one she could not disguise herself as was Arundhati, whose devotion to her husband, Vasistha, protected her. O Kurusthama, on days of the new moon, the Devi Swaha cast Agni's semen six times into the golden lake, and a boy child of great prowess was born from it. Because the Rishis considered him as "cast off", this baby was named Skanda.

The child had six faces, twelve ears, eyes, hands and feet, one neck and one stomach. On the second day after the semen was thrown into the water, it took the form of a baby; he grew into a boy on the third; and Skanda's limbs developed on the fourth day. Red clouds flashed with lightning over the lake and the boy shone like the Sun rising in the midst of a mass of red clouds.

He grasped the wonderful, immense bow that Siva, Destroyer of the Tripura, used to destroy the enemies of the Devas, and that mighty being uttered such a terrible roar that the three worlds, with their animate and inanimate beings, were struck with terror.

The great Nagas, Chitra and Airavata, heard the sound that was like the thundering of massed thunderheads, and trembled with fear. Seeing how distraught they were, the radiant, sun-like boy held them in two of his hands. In one hand he held a spear and in another a sturdy, red-crested rooster, and with these the mighty-armed son of Agni romped noisily.

Holding a beautiful conch in two of his hands, that mighty one blew on it, terrorising even the most powerful creatures. He swatted the air with two hands and played on the hilltop, and Mahasena of unmatched prowess looked as if he was about to devour the three worlds. He shone like Surya Deva at his zenith in the sky.

This wonderful, incomparably strong being sat on the top of the mountain and, with each of his many faces pointing in different directions, roared again and again. All kinds of creatures heard those roars and fell to the ground in fear and, terrified, they begged for protection. All those of different castes, who asked this great god for refuge, and who followed him, became Brahmanas.

The God rose from his seat and reassured all of them; then, he drew his bow and shot his arrows in the direction of the White Mountain. The arrows split Krauncha Hill, the son of Himavat, in two, making the swans and vultures that lived there fly away to the Sumeru Mountains.

Sorely wounded, the Krauncha fell, groaning fearfully in agony. Seeing him fall, the other hills began to scream, and that mighty being of unrivalled prowess heard the groans of the wounded hills but was unmoved. Instead, he lifted his mace and, with a war cry, hurled the lustrous weapon at the White Mountain and cleaved one of its peaks.

The Sweta, pierced by him, became frightened and, with other mountains, uprooted himself from the earth and fled. The wounded earth gaped, bereft of her ornaments and, in her distress, went to Skanda, who granted that the mountains may return without fear.

Once more Bhumi Devi shone in splendour, and the mountains bowed to Skanda and returned to take their old places. Since then, all creatures celebrate the worship of Skanda on the fifth day of the lunar month.' "

"Markandeya continues, 'When great Skanda was born all kinds of strange phenomena were seen. There was an uncanny reversal in nature: of male and female, of heat and cold, and of other pairs of opposites. The Planets, the Cardinal Points and the Sky shone with light, and the Earth began to rumble. The Rishis, always working for the world's welfare, saw these signs and were worried. Anxiously, they began to restore equilibrium.

Those who lived in the Chitraratha vana were convinced that the unnatural conditions were the consequence of Agni's intercourse with the six wives of the Saptarishis. Others, who had seen the goddess as a bird, said that the evils were the work of the bird. No one imagined that Swaha was the author of that mischief.

Swaha heard that the child was hers, and she went to Skanda and told him that she was his mother. The seven Rishis heard that a son of great power had been born to them, and they abandoned their wives, except the adored Arundhati, because all the forest-dwellers said that these six women had been instrumental in the birth of the child.

O king, Swaha protested that this was not so, and tried, repeatedly, to convince the seven Rishis that the child was hers and not their wives'.

Earlier, when the seven Rishis had concluded their yagnas, the great sage Viswamitra had followed the god of fire, unknown to him, and had seen how he had been roiled by lust. So, he knew everything, just as it had happened, and he was the first to seek the protection of Skanda Mahasena.

He offered divine prayers to Mahasena and performed all the thirteen rites of passage, such as the Jatakarma, for him. For the good of the world he proclaimed the virtues of the six-headed Skanda and performed ceremonies in honour of the rooster, the Devi Shakti and Skanda's first followers. For this reason, Viswamitra became a great favourite of the divine youth.

Viswamitra told the seven Rishis how Swaha had transformed herself and declared the innocence of their wives; nonetheless, the Rishis abandoned their spouses unconditionally.'

Markandeya continues, 'The Devas heard of Skanda's might and said to Vasava, "O Sakra, Skanda's prowess is unbearable; you must kill him immediately. If you do not, he will conquer the three worlds and us; he will overpower you and make himself king of the Devas."

Sakra said to them, "This child is endowed with unmatched prowess; he can defeat the Creator himself in battle. I dare not fight him."

The Devas said, "You are cowardly, Sakra! Let the Mothers of the Universe go to Skanda. They can summon endless shakti at will. Let them kill this terrible child."

The mothers agreed and left; but when they saw the incomparable boy, they were disheartened. Convinced that he was invincible, they asked for his protection, "Mighty One, become our son. We love you and want to suckle you. See how the milk flows from our breasts."

Hearing this, Mahasena Skanda wanted to feed at their breasts and, receiving them with respect, drank. Then, he saw his father Agni coming towards him. Along with his mothers, Skanda honoured him who is the doer of all that is good; and Agni Deva and the mothers remained by their son's side to look after him.

The devi who, amongst the Matrikas, was born of Anger, watched over Skanda with a spear in her hand, just as a mother would guard her own child. And that moody, red-hued daughter of the Sea, who lived on blood, hugged Mahasena to her breast and nursed him, tenderly as a mother would.

Agni transformed himself into a goat-faced teacher of the Vedas and, followed by many children, delighted his son with marvellous toys, in their mountain home,' says Markandeya."

"Markandeya continues, 'The Planets with their satellites, the Rishis and the Matrikas, Agni and numerous other brilliant courtiers, and many other fearsome looking Swargavasis waited on Mahasena, along with his mothers. Indra, Lord of the gods wanted to vanquish Skanda. But, being unsure of victory, he mounted his elephant Airavata and, accompanied by the other Devas, he advanced cautiously towards Skanda.

The mighty Indra, followed by all the Devas, and armed with his Vajra, wanted to kill Mahasena. He marched with the splendid celestial army, flying a variety of standards and sounding a shrill war cry. The warriors wore armour of different kinds; they were armed with bows and rode many different mounts.

When Mahasena saw the gloriously decked Sakra, wearing his best raiment, coming to kill him, he went forward to meet the king of the Devas. O Kaunteya, the mighty Vasava shouted to exhort his warriors. He now rode swiftly with his forces, death to Agni's son on his mind; all this to the praises of the Tridasas and the great Rishis.

At last, he reached the home of Kartikeya, and he and the other gods shouted out to him. In response Guha roared deeply like the roaring of the sea. On hearing that sound, the Deva army became agitated, like a churning ocean, and stood stunned and rooted.

The son of the Fire God saw the Devas coming to kill him and was filled with rage. He breathed flames from his mouth onto the celestial legions, leaving them writhing on the ground. Their heads, their bodies, their arms and the animals they rode were all consumed by that fiery breath, flaring briefly like stars removed from their proper places. The gods abandoned Indra and took refuge with Skanda, instead, and peace was restored.

Forsaken by his Devas, Sakra hurled his thunderbolt at Skanda. It pierced him in his right side, Rajan, and passed through his body. From where the Vajra struck, there sprang from Skanda's body another being—a youth with a club in his hand, and adorned with a divine amulet.

Because he was born from the piercing of the thunderbolt, he was named Visakha. When Indra saw that another being, as fierce as the God of Fire, had been created, he was afraid and, with his hands joined together in worship, asked Skanda for refuge. Skanda told him to cast off his fear, and all the gods were joyful.' "

"Markandeya continues, 'Now hear about those macabre and grotesque followers of Skanda. Skanda gave birth to a number of male progeny when Indra's thunderbolt struck him, horrific creatures that spirit away little children, whether born, or still in their mother's womb. Skanda had a great many incredibly strong daughters, too. These children adopted Visakha as their father.

The agile, goat-faced Bhadrasakha was surrounded by all his sons and daughters, whom he protected carefully, along with their mothers. It is this quality of his that earned Skanda the name Kumarapitra, or father of children. Those who want to have a son worship Rudra, in his form of Agni, and Uma, in her form of Swaha. This ensures the birth of a son to them.

The daughters, who were born to Tapa, also named Hutasana, went to Skanda, who asked what he could do for them.

Those girls replied, "Bless us so that we may become good and respected mothers of the world."

The generous one replied, "Tathaastu, so be it," and repeatedly said, "You shall be divided into Sivas and Asivas, good and evil."

The mothers left after establishing Skanda as their son. They were seven mothers—Kaki, Halima, Malini, Brihata, Arya, Palala and Vaimitra—who gave birth to Sisu through Skanda's blessings. Sisu was red-eyed, fearful looking and volatile. He is known as the eighth hero born of the mothers of Skanda, but he is sometimes considered the ninth when the Goat-faced is counted as one.

Skanda's sixth face was that of a goat. That face, O king, is in the middle of the six, and his mother looks at it constantly. That head, by which Bhadrasakha created divine energy, is meant to be the best of all his heads. Rajan, these great and wonderful events occurred on the fifth day of the bright half of the lunar month and, on the sixth, a fierce and terrific battle was fought in the same place.'[2]

[2]There are many stories about the birth of Skanda. One of the most popular is that he was born to kill Tarakasura, who had a boon that only a son born to Siva (who has lost Sati and not yet married Parvati) could kill him. So the Devas persuade Sati to be born as Himavan's daughter.

"Markandeya continues, 'Skanda was adorned with a golden amulet and wreath; his forelock and crown were of gold; his eyes were golden-hued; his teeth were sharp; and he wore a red garment. He was handsome and cut the most splendid figure. Endowed with all the noblest qualities, he was the favourite of the three worlds. He granted boons to anyone who asked; he was brave, youthful, and wore bright earrings.

One day, when he was resting, the goddess of wealth, Sri, looking like a lotus and taking a human form, came to him and gave herself to him. On possessing the Devi, the slender Skanda glowed with the beauty of the full moon.

Exalted Brahmanas worshipped him, and Maharishis said, "O you born of the golden seed, may you prosper, and may you be the instrument of the welfare of the Universe. Devottama, best of gods, although you were born only six days ago, the Universe has already come under your dominion, and you have removed its fear. Therefore, you have become the Indra of the three worlds, and they have no cause to be afraid anymore."

Skanda replied, "Mighty Tapasvins, what does Indra do with the three worlds? How does the king of the Devas constantly protect all the other gods?"

The Rishis replied, "Indra is the giver of strength, power, children and happiness to all creatures and, when propitiated, bestows his devotees with all they wish for. He destroys the wicked and fulfils the desires of the righteous; the slayer of Bala allots their svadharma to all creatures; he acts as Sun and Moon in places where they are absent; and when the occasion demands it, he even assumes the roles of Fire, Air, Earth, and Water. These are Indra's tasks, and great are his capabilities. You, too, are mighty. Therefore, Sreshta, great one, become our Indra."

Sakra said to Skanda, "Mighty one, make us glad by becoming our king. You are worthy of that honour and we will anoint you today."

Skanda replied, "You must continue to rule over the three worlds with equanimity and with your heart set on conquest. I will remain your humble servant; I do not want sovereignty."

Sakra replied, "Your prowess is unrivalled; O heroic one, defeat the enemies of the Devas. People are wonderstruck by your strength, especially since you vanquished me and stripped me of my power. If I were to be Indra now, I will not command the respect of all creatures, and they would split their loyalties between us and causing dissent. When they have formed themselves into two factions, they will have war between them. And in that war, you would undoubtedly defeat me easily and become the Lord of all worlds."

Skanda said, "Sakra, you are my lord, as well as Lord of the three worlds. May you prosper. Command me and I will obey."

Indra replied, "At your behest, I will continue as Indra. If your purpose is true and what you said is in earnest, I will tell you how you can fulfil your wish to serve me. Mighty one, be the Senapati of the armies of Devaloka."

Skanda replied, "Install me as Senapati, for the demolition of the Danavas, the welfare of the Devas, and for the well-being of Brahmanas and sacred cows." '

Markandeya continues, 'Skanda was anointed by Indra and all the other Devas; the Maharishis honoured him, and he looked splendid. The golden parasol that was held over his head looked like a halo of fire. The lustrous Indra, the conqueror of the three worlds, fastened the celestial garland of gold, created by Viswakarman, around his neck.

Conqueror of your enemies, Mahadeva Vrishadhwaja—the one with the emblem of the Bull—arrived with his consort, Parvati, and honoured Skanda with a jubilant heart.

The Fire God is also called Rudra, and, therefore, Skanda is called the son of Rudra. The White Mountain was formed from Rudra's semen, and the sexual indulgences of the Fire God with the Krittikas took place on that same Sweta parvata; all the dwellers of heaven saw Rudra heaping honours on Skanda. For these reasons he was known as the son of Rudra.

The child Skanda was born by Rudra entering into the being of the Fire God, and this is also why Skanda is known as the son of Rudra. And, Bhaarata, because Skanda was born of the union between Rudra and Swaha and the six wives of the seven Rishis, he is known as the son of Rudra.

This son of Agni was clad in red cloth and looked resplendent, like the Sun emerging from behind a mass of red clouds. The Fire God assigned the red rooster as his mascot, and perched on the top of his chariot, it blazed like the fire of the Pralaya. His vanguard was the embodiment of the power that is invested in the Devas to give them victory, which is the impetus of all creatures, and which is their glory, their support and their refuge.

A mysterious enchantment entered into his very being, whose prowess is manifested in battle. Beauty, righteousness, strength, vigour, might, radiance, truthfulness, rectitude, devotion to Brahmanas, freedom from illusion, absence of perplexity, protection of his followers, destruction of his foes, and care of all creatures—these, great lord of men, are the intrinsic qualities of Skanda.

Anointed by all the gods, he looked pleased and contented; grandly attired, he was as beautiful as the radiant full moon. The sacred incantation of Vedic hymns, the music of the celestial musicians and the songs of the Devas and Gandharvas filled the air.

The son of Agni, surrounded by Apsaras, many joyful Pisachas and hosts of gods, shone in splendour. Mahasena, anointed as Senapati of the Devas, looked like the Sun rising to extinguish darkness. The forces of Swarga, looking upon him as their leader, surrounded him in their thousands. All creatures followed him in adulation, eager to obey his commands, praising and worshipping him, and he responded with encouraging words.

The performer of a thousand sacrifices then remembered Devasena, whom he had rescued earlier and, considering Skanda as destined by Brahma himself to be the husband of this devi, summoned her to come there, wearing her best ornaments. Indra said to Skanda, "Best of Gods, even before you were born, Brahma ordained that this devi was to be your bride. Accept her lotus-like right hand with the invocation of the marriage mantras."

Accordingly Skanda married Devasena, and the learned Brihaspati performed the necessary prayers and oblations. She, who is named Shashti, Lakshmi, Asha, Sukhaprada, Sinivali, Kuhu, Sadvritti and Aparajita, is Devasena, the wife of Skanda. Then Skanda was united with Devasena by the indissoluble bonds of matrimony, and the goddess of prosperity faithfully served him, embodied in her own form.

Because Skanda's anointing occured on the fifth day of the moon, that day is called Sripanchami, the auspicious fifth day, and because he obtained his goal on the sixth day, that lunar day is considered to be entirely auspicious.' "

"Markandeya continues, 'The six wives of the Saptarishis went to Skanda's abode as soon as they heard about his good fortune and that he had been made General of the celestial armies. These virtuous women of great punya had been disowned by the Rishis and they lost no time in calling on Mahasena, the Senapati of the divine forces.

They said to him, "Son, we have been unjustly cast out by our godlike husbands. Some persons spread the rumour that we had given birth to you and, believing this, they were angry and banished us from our rightful places. Now you must redeem us from our disgrace. We want to adopt you as our son and secure eternal bliss. You must do this for us."

Skanda replied, "Good Devis of unblemished character, I hereby declare that you are my mothers. I am your son and you shall attain all that you desire." '

Markandeya continues, 'Sakra indicated that he wanted to say something to Skanda and, when Skanda asked what it was, Vasava said, "Devi Abhijit, the younger sister of Rohini, was jealous of her elder sister and has gone into the forest to perform tapasya. I cannot find a substitute for my fallen star.

Skanda, ask Brahma about how we can fill the empty space created by the absence of this nakshatra. Brahma created Dhanishta and the other asterisms, and Rohini used to be one of them, making their number complete."

Accordingly, Skanda sent Krittika to a place in the heavens, and there she shines with Agni's grace as if she has seven faces.

Vinata said to Skanda, "To me you are the son who performs the funeral rites. I want to live with you always, my son."

Skanda replied, "So be it. I honour you as my mother. Guide me with a mother's love and, honoured by your daughter-in-law, you shall always live with me." '

Markandeya continues, 'The great Matrikas said to Skanda, "Learned men have described us as the mothers of all creatures. However, what we want really is to be your mothers. Do us the honour of accepting us."

Skanda replied, "You are all mothers to me, and I am your son. Tell me what I can do to please you."

The Matrikas said, "In days of old, the Devis Brahmi, Maheswari and others were appointed as universal mothers. Sreshta, we want them to be removed from that position and for us to have their places; we want to be worshipped in their stead by the world. Restore those children of ours that they made you deprive us of."

Skanda said, "I cannot take back what I have given away, but I can give you other children, if you wish."

The mothers said, "We want to live with you and we want to be able to assume different shapes and to devour the children of those mothers as well as their guardians. Grant us this."

Skanda said, "I can grant you progeny, but I am pained by what you ask. May you be prosperous! I honour you, Devis, and promise to protect your children. I leave them in your care.

The mothers declared, "We shall protect them, Skanda, as you want. May you prosper! Still, we want to live with you, always, mighty one."

Skanda said, "Until human children are sixteen years old, you shall be able to afflict them in your various forms. I hereby confer on you a fierce and inexhaustible energy, with which you shall live happily, worshipped by all."

And from Skanda's body emerged a powerful, fiery being whose purpose was to devour the children of mortals. This being fell on the ground, unconscious and hungry. Skanda gave the evil force a horrific form, known by Brahmanottamas as Skandapasmara.

Vinata takes the form known as Sakuni Graha, or evil spirit. She, who the learned Brahmanas know as Putana Rakshasi, is the evil force Putana. The fierce and hideous Rakshasa is the pisacha form, Sita Putana. That terrible spirit causes abortions in women. Aditi takes the form known as Revati, and her evil spirit is called Raivata; she is a dreadful Graha that afflicts children. Diti, the mother of the Daityas, is the form called Mukhamandika; and this terrible creature is partial to the flesh of little children.

O Kuru, male and female children, who are said to have been fathered by Skanda, are spirits of evil, and they kill the foetus in the womb. They, the Kumaras, are the husbands of these devis, and children are caught unawares by these evil spirits. Rajan, the wise say that Surabhi, the cow mother, has the evil spirit Sakuni as her rider; and the two of them together devour children on this Earth. Sarama, the dog mother, habitually kills human beings while they are still in the womb.

She who is the tree mother, who lives in a Karanja tree, grants boons; she has a pleasant face and is always kind to all creatures. They that want to have children bow down to her.

These eighteen evil spirits are fond of meat and wine, and haunt birthing rooms for ten days. Kadru introduces herself in a sukshma rupa into the body of a pregnant woman and there she destroys the foetus and makes the mother give birth to a Naga instead. The mother of the Gandharvas takes away the foetus, and that is how women have abortions.

The mother of the Apsaras removes the foetus from the womb, and such conceptions are said to be still-born.

The daughter of the goddess of blood is said to have nursed Skanda, and she is worshipped as Lohitayani, on kadamba trees. The role of this goddess, Arya, is the same for women as Rudra's is for men. She is the mother of all children and is especially worshipped for their well-being.

These that I have described are the evil spirits presiding over the destinies of young children and, until children reach their sixteenth year, these spirits wield their dark powers, but after that their influence works for the good.

All the male and female spirits that I have described are always counted as the spirits of Skanda. One propitiates them with burnt offerings, ablutions, salves, and sacrifices and other offerings, and by worshipping Skanda. O king, when one reverently honours and worships them they bestow on men whatever is good for them, as well as courage and long life.

I bow now to Maheswara, before I describe the nature of those spirits that affect the destinies of men after they are sixteen years old.

The man who sees gods, whether while asleep or awake, loses his sanity, and the spirit who is responsible for these hallucinations is called the Deva bhuta. When a person sees his dead ancestors while he is seated at ease, or lying in his bed, he loses his mind, and the spirit which causes this illusion is called the ancestral or Pitr bhuta.

The man who shows disrespect to the Siddhas, and who is cursed by them in return, soon goes mad; the evil force which makes this happen is called the Siddha bhuta. The spirit which makes a man smell a sweet scent and recognise various tastes is a tortured spirit called the Rakshasa bhuta.

And that spirit, which gives Gandharvas, the minstrels of heaven, the ability to insinuate themselves into the bodies of human beings, is called the Gandharva bhuta. The evil spirit, in the form of a Pisacha that torments men is called the Paisacha bhuta. The Yaksha spirit, that accidentally enters a human being, making him lose his mind, is known as the Yaksha bhuta.

The man, who loses his senses on account of a demoralising addiction to vices, becomes quickly insane, and his illness must be remedied according to methods prescribed in the Shastras. Men also turn mad from confusion, from irrational fear and from having seen ghastly sights. The cure for them lies in quieting their minds.

There are three classes of spirits: some are playful, some are greedy and some sensual. Until men attain the age of seventy, these evil spirits have the power to plague them, and after that, fever is the only evil spirit that afflicts them. These evil spirits always avoid those who have subdued their senses, who are self-restrained, who have good habits, who are god-fearing, and who are free from sloth and the touch of evil.

I have now described to you the evil spirits that mould the destinies of men. Rajan, you who are ever devoted to Maheswara, are immune to them.'

"Markandeya continues, 'When Skanda had bestowed these powers, Swaha appeared to him and said, "You are my natural son and I want you to grant me great happiness."

Skanda replied, "What kind of happiness do you wish to enjoy?"

Swaha said, "I am Daksha's favourite daughter Swaha. From the time I was young, I have been in love with Hutasana, the Fire God, but, my son, he does not know of my feelings. I want to live with him as his wife, forever."

Skanda said, "From this day, Devi, all offerings that good men, who adhere to the path of dharma, make to the Devas or the Pitrs to the accompaniment of purifying mantras chanted by Brahmanas will be made jointly to Agni and Swaha. In this way, Devi, you always live with Agni Hutasana." '

Markandeya continues, 'Swaha was immensely pleased with the boon that Skanda had given her, and with her husband Pavaka, the Fire God, she worshipped Skanda in return.

Then Brahma, the Lord of all creatures, said to Mahasena, "Go and visit your father Mahadeva, the conqueror of Tripura. Rudra, Agni, Uma and Swaha have worked together for the welfare of all creatures and made you invincible. The hiranyaretas of Rudra, the highest, cast into Uma's yoni, was cast back onto this hill, and the twins, Minjika and Minjika came into being. A portion of it fell into the Sea of blood, another fell into the rays of the Sun, another fell upon the Earth, and thus it was distributed in five portions. These fierce-looking followers of yours, who live on the flesh of animals, were born from that golden semen."

Saying, "It shall be done", Mahasena worshipped his father Siva with a son's affection.'

Markandeya continues, 'Men who want to acquire wealth and those who wish to alleviate illness should worship these five kinds of spirits, born from Mahadeva, with offerings of the sunflower. Those that desire the well-being of their children should worship the twins, Minjika and Minjika, also fathered by Rudra; and those who want children born to them must always worship the female spirits that live in trees, eating human flesh. All Pisachas are divided into innumerable types.

And now, O king, listen and I will tell you how the banners and bells of Skanda came into being. Indra's elephant Airavata had two bells, both named Vaijayanti. The clever Sakra had them brought to him, and personally gave them to Guha. Visakha took one of those bells and Skanda Kartikeya the other. Both standards, Kartikeya's and Visakha's, were red. Mahasena was pleased with what the gods had given him. Surrounded by hosts of Devas and Pisachas, and seated on the Golden Mountain, he was radiant in the splendour of his prosperity.

The mountain was covered with lush forests and, like Mandara with its abundance of caves, shone in the rays of the Sun. This mountain's lustrous beauty was enhanced by Mahasena's presence. The White Mountain, Sweta, was adorned with vast woodlands and covered with blossoming santanaka trees, forests of karavira, parijata, papa, asoka and kadamba trees. Herds of unworldly deer roamed its hillsides, and flocks of celestial birds flew overhead. The rumble of clouds sounded like musical instruments, like the soft murmur of the sea, and to this the Gandharvas and Apsaras danced. A joyous sound of merriment rose from the creatures there.

The whole world, with Indra himself, seemed to have moved to the White Mountain. Everyone was satisfied and none tired of looking at Skanda.'

Markandeya continues, 'After installing the lambent son of Agni as the leader of heaven's army, joyous Siva, shining like the Sun, rode with Parvati on his chariot and went to Bhadravata. Kala was his charioteer and thousands of lions drew it. They flew swiftly through akasa, as if they would devour the sky. Striking terror into the hearts of all the animate beings of the worlds they passed, the maned beasts growled ferociously. Mahadeva, Lord of all creatures, sat in that chariot with Uma, like a flare of lightning flashing in a mass of clouds arched over by the rainbow, the Indradhanush.

Before him went the venerable Lord of wealth, riding on the backs of his human bearers, with his attendant Guhyakas riding in his exquisite vimana, the Pushpaka. Bringing up the rear was Sakra, the granter of boons, on his elephant Airavata, accompanied by the Devas and marching at the head of his celestial army. On Mahadeva's right flank was the great Yaksha, Amogha, with his attendants, the Jambhaka Yakshas, and accompanied by Rakshasas wearing flower garlands. Also on the right flank were many Devas of wonderful battle prowess, along with the Vasus and the Rudras.

Beside him marched the terrible Yama, with his companion, Mrityu, death, followed by hundreds of dreadful diseases. Behind Mahadeva, the sharp-pointed, adorned Vijaya, Siva's trisula, was borne; and Varuna, Lord of the waters, marched slowly alongside the Vijaya, carrying his own weapon, the Paasa, and surrounded by his aquatic subjects. Immediately to the rear of the trident, Rudra's other weapon, the Pattisa, was carried, guarded by maces, marvellous cudgels and other weapons. Following the Pattisa was Rudra's brilliant parasol and his Kamandalu with their attendant Maharishis, and with Bhrigu, Angirasa and others. Behind all these rode Rudra in his white chariot, providing heartening cheer with a display of his powers.

In his train were the rivers, lakes and seas; Apsaras, Rishis, Devas, Gandharvas and Nagas; the stars and planets; the children of the gods; and many women. The women scattered flowers around them as they walked; and the clouds bowed in obeisance to Mahadeva, who was armed with his bow, the Pinaka. Some of the clouds held a white parasol over his head; and Agni and Vayu waved feathery chamaras.

Mahadeva, the God with the Bull for his emblem, was followed by the glorious Indra, accompanied by the Rajarishis singing his praises. Gauri, Vidya, Gandhari, Kesini, Mitra and Savitri made up Parvati's train, along with all the Vidyas—the deities of all the branches of knowledge. Advancing ahead of the whole formation was the standard-bearer, the Rakshasa spirit that delivers, to all the different aksauhinis, commands that Indra and the other Devas implicitly obey.

And skipping merrily, in and out and through the procession, was that best of Rakshasas, Pingala, who is Rudra's friend, always busy in smasanas, crematoria, and charming to everyone.

Good deeds are the offerings with which mortals worship Rudra, who is also called Siva. He is the omnipotent Deity, the wielder of the bow Pinaka; he is worshipped in his many forms; he is Maheswara.

Mahasena, the son of Krittika, the Senapati of the Deva army, who reveres Brahmanas, followed the Lord of gods, surrounded by the deva legions. Mahadeva said to Mahasena, gravely, "Command the seventh aksauhini of the army with careful attention."

Skanda replied, "My lord, I will command the seventh legion. Is there anything else you would have me do?"

Rudra said, "You will always find me in the field of war. You will gain great punya by looking up to me and serving me with devotion."

Then Maheswara embraced him and gave him leave to go. Rajan, after Skanda left, the Devas were shaken by many fell omens. The sky and its stars blazed with fire, and all the Universe was plunged in chaos. The Earth quaked and rumbled, and darkness covered the whole world. Seeing these terrible phenomena, Sankara, the blessed Uma, the Devas and the great Maharishis were distressed.

While they were bewildered, there appeared before them a savage host of mighty Danavas, armed with a myriad of weapons and looking like a mass of thunderheads and hills. Those Demons could not be counted and spoke legion languages. They moved purposefully to where Sankara stood with the Devas, and into the ranks of the army of Swarga they shot flights of arrows in all directions, masses of rock, maces, sataghnis, prasas and parighas.

The onslaught threw heaven's army into disarray and their ranks wavered. The Danavas fetched havoc by hewing down soldiers, horses, elephants, chariots and weapons. The disheartened troops of the gods seemed as if they were about to turn their backs upon the enemy. Vast numbers of them fell, slain by the Asuras, like large trees burnt down in a forest fire. The Swargavasis fell with their heads separated from their bodies. There was no one to lead them in that fearful battle, and they were mown down by the enemy.

Indra, the slayer of Bala, saw his forces besieged and tried to rally them. He said, “Do not be afraid, O Heroes. May success reward your efforts! Take up your weapons and keep your courage. You will not face any further misfortune. Crush these evil ones. Come, let us attack the Danavas together and may we find success!”

The dwellers of heaven were reassured and, under Indra’s lead, rushed against the Danavas. Thirty-three thousand gods, all the powerful Maruts and Sadhyas, and all the Vasus returned to battle. They loosed arrows that drew blood from the Daityas, their horses and their elephants. The sharp shafts penetrated their bodies and fell on the ground, looking like snakes dropping down the hillside. Pierced by those arrows, the Daityas fell on all sides, and they looked like many small banks of clouds. The Danava host was panic-stricken at the charge of the Devas; they withered before that attack.

Their weapons still at the ready, the gods gave loud vent to their exhilaration; and the heavenly bands struck up joyful music.

The encounter took a dreadful toll on both sides. The battlefield was covered over with blood and strewn with the bodies of Devas and Asuras. The victory of the Devas was short-lived, because the Danavas rallied and flew back into battle, bringing bloody havoc to the forces of Devaloka. This time, the Asuras beat their drums, blew ringing blasts on their bugles and roared their nerve-shattering war cry: Boomba! Boomba!

Now a mighty demon, the greatest of them, seized a great crag in his hands and rushed out of that dreadful Daitya army, looking like the Sun flaring out from behind dark clouds. The Devas saw that he was about to hurl that enormous rock at them and fled. The Danava, Mahisha, pursued them and flung the crag at them. Lord of the world, ten thousand warriors of the Deva army were crushed under that immense stone. So Mahisha struck terror into the hearts of the Devas and, with his Danavas, he fell upon them like a lion at a herd of deer.

When Indra and the other gods saw Mahishasura leading the charge against them they abandoned their banners and their weapons and fled. Mahisha, full of wrath swiftly caught up with Rudra’s chariot and seized its central pole with both his hands.

When he had seized Rudra’s chariot, the Earth began to groan and the great Rishis fell unconscious. Massive Daityas, like thunderheads, became boisterous with joy, thinking that victory was theirs. Although Rudra, highest of the high, was in that plight, he did not think it worthwhile to kill Mahisha, for he remembered that Skanda would deal that deathblow.

Meantime, the fiery Mahisha, contemplating his prize of Rudra's chariot with satisfaction, sounded his war-cry, terrorising the Devas but filling the Daityas with joy.

The Devas were in this plight when the mighty Mahasena, burning with anger, and ablaze with Sun-like splendour, came to battle. He wore fiery red and was bedecked with a wreath of red flowers. Encased in golden armour, he rode in a golden chariot, bright as the Sun and drawn by glossy chestnut horses. At the sight of him, the Daityas army grew instantly dispirited.

Skanda discharged one blinding shakti at Mahisha, which beheaded the Demon, and he fell dead. His massive head, as big as a small hill, fell to the earth and, extending sixteen yojanas in length, barred the entrance to the country of the Northern Kurus. Now, however, people of that country pass easily by that way, for flesh and gristle have long since turned to bones, and Earth has covered them.

The Devas and the Danavas saw Skanda hurl his shakti again and again on the field of battle, and it returned to his hands after killing thousands of the enemy's forces. The wise Mahasena's arrows brought down numbers of Danavas beyond count, and they were seized by panic. Skanda's followers killed them, then drank their blood and ate their flesh. Joyfully, they exterminated the Danavas in a short time, just as quickly as the sunrise does darkness, or as a great fire consumes a forest, or as the wind drives away clouds.

Thus did the illustrious Skanda slaughter all his enemies. The Devas eulogised him and he, in turn, paid his respects to Siva Maheswara. And Krittika's son shone in glory, like Surya Deva at his zenith.

When Skanda had completely annihilated the enemy and when Maheswara had left the battlefield, Purandara embraced Mahasena and said to him, "You have slain Mahisha, who was made invincible by the grace of Brahma. First of warriors, to him the Devas were as easy to mow down as blades of grass. Mahabaho, you have removed a thorn from the flesh of the gods.

You have killed hundreds of Danavas, all equal in valour to Mahisha, all hostile to us and who always harassed us. And your followers have devoured hundreds of them. You are, O mighty one, invincible in battle, even like Uma's lord; this victory will be celebrated as your first achievement. Your fame will last forever in the three worlds; all the Devas will pledge their fealty to you.”

Saying this to Mahasena, the husband of Sachi left, accompanied by his Devas, and with the leave of Siva, the three-eyed Devadeva. Rudra returned to Bhadravata and all the celestial ones to their respective homes.

Rudra addressed the gods, saying, “You must give your allegiance to Skanda just as you do to me.”

The son of Pavaka the Fire God slaughtered the Danavas and conquered the three worlds in a single day; and the greatest Rishis worship him. The Brahmana who reads this story of Skanda’s birth gains untold prosperity in this world and the companionship of Skanda in the next,’ says Markandeya.

Yudhishtira says, ‘O most venerable Brahmana, I want to know the different names of this loftiest of gods, by which he is celebrated through the three worlds.’ ” Vaisampayana continued, “Thus addressed by the Pandava in that conclave of Rishis, the worshipful Markandeya of great tapasyashakti responds by listing the sacred names of Kartikeya.

He says, ‘Agneya, son of Agni; Skanda, the cast off; Diptakirti, of blazing fame; Anamaya, always healthy; Mayuraketu, the one with the peacock banner; Dharmatma, the one with the noble soul; Bhutesa, Lord of all beings; Mahishardana, slayer of Mahisha; Kamajit, one who has conquered desire; Kamada, fulfiller of desires; Kanta, the handsome one; Satyavak, speaker of truth; Bhuvaneswara, Lord of the jungle of the world; Sisu, child; Sighra, the swift; Suchi, the pure; Chanda, the fiery; Diptavarna, the bright-complexioned; Subhanana, the beautiful; Amogha, who cannot be baffled; Anagha, sinless; Rudra, the terrible; Priya, the loved; Chandranana, of the face like the moon; Diptasakti, wielder of the burning shakti; Prasantatma, tranquil-souled; Bhadrakrit, doer of good; Kutamohana, holder of even the wicked; Shashthipriya, the favourite of Shashthi; Pavitra, holy; Matrvatsala, one who adores his mother; Kanyabharta, protector of virgins; Vibhakta, diffused over the universe; Swaheya, son of Swaha; Revatisuta, child of Revati; Prabhu, the Lord; Neta, the leader; Visakha, raised by Visakha; Naigameya, born of the Veda; Suduschara, difficult to propitiate; Suvrata, of excellent vows; Lalita, the beautiful; Balakridanakapriya, fond of toys; Khachari, ranger of the skies; Brahmacharin, chaste; Shura, the hero; Saravanodbhava, born in a clump of reeds; Viswamitrapriya, the favourite of Viswamitra; Devasenapriya, the lover of Devasena; Vasudevapriya, beloved of Vasudeva; and Priyakrit, doer of pleasing deeds.

These are the divine names of Kartikeya. Whoever repeats them will secure fame, wealth and salvation.'

Markandeya continues, 'Valiant son of the Kurus, listen to me sing the other names of the mighty, six-faced, valiant Guha, who has no rival, whom Devas and Rishis venerate. Listen well to my stuti.

O devoted to Brahman, born from Brahman, learned in the mysteries of Brahman, Brahmesaya, foremost of those in whom Brahman resides, fond of Brahman, austere like the Brahmanas, knowledgeable in the great mystery of Brahma, leader of Brahmanas! You are Swaha; you are Swadha; you are the holiest of the holy. O invoked in mantras, celebrated as the six-flamed Fire.

You are the year, the six seasons, the months, the fornights, the solar declinations and the cardinal points of space. O Lotus-eyed, O Lotus-faced, O thousand-faced, thousand-armed, Ruler of the Universe, great oblation, life-giving soul of the Devas and Asuras, mighty Leader of armies; Prachanda—furious, Lord, master and conqueror of your enemies; Sahasrabhutva—of many forms; Sahasratushti—content a thousand-fold; Sahasrabhuk—devourer of everything; and Sahasrapad—thousand-legged.

You are the very Earth; you are the one of infinite forms, of one thousand heads and of awesome strength. You can appear, at will, as Ganga's son, as Swaha, as Mahi, or as Krittika. O Six-faced God, your playmate and mount is the rooster; you can assume different forms at will.

You are Daksha, Soma, Maruta, Dharma, Vayu, the prince of mountains, and Indra, for all time. O most eternal of all the eternal ones, O Lord of all lords, you are the mainspring of Truth, the destroyer of Diti's progeny, and the great conqueror of the enemies of the gods; you are the personification of dharma; you are, at once, vast and minute; you know the highest and the lowest of virtuous actions; the mysteries of Brahma reside in you.

O first among Gods, O exalted Lord of the Universe, your tejas pervades creation.

With this prayer, made as best I can, I salute you of the twelve eyes and many hands. All the rest of your attributes defy the scope of my intellect.'

The Brahmana who reads this story of Skanda's birth, or narrates it to Brahmanas, or hears it being told by twice-born men, gains wealth, long life, fame, children, victory, prosperity, contentment and the companionship of Skanda,' says Markandeya," said Vaisampayana.

DRAUPADI SATYABHAMA SAMVADA PARVA

Vaisampayana continued, "When the Brahmanas and the noble sons of Pandu are seated, Draupadi and Satyabhama enter the hermitage. Their hearts filled with rare bliss, the two princesses laugh merrily and sit together at their ease. Rajan, these devis, who always speak sweetly to each other, are meeting after a long time and begin to exchange many heroic and delightful tales of the Kurus and the Yadus.

The slender-waisted Satyabhama, favourite wife of Krishna, and daughter of Satrajit, speaks privately to Draupadi and says, 'Daughter of Drupada, how do you manage to rule the sons of Pandu, the strong and handsome Kshatriyas who are like lords of the Earth? Lovely one, how are they so obedient to you and never angry with you? Pandu's sons are always submissive to you and ever eager to do your bidding. Tell me how this is so.

Do you practise vratas, or tapasya; do you chant mantras or take secret herbs during your menstrual period; is there something that you do; or is it the effect of your youthfulness? Do you chant hermetic incantations and bewitchments, or perform special homas, or use medicated salves and potions? Tell me, princess of Panchala, what auspicious means I can use to make Krishna ever obedient to me?'

Chaste Draupadi says to the illustrious Satyabhama, 'You asked me, Satyabhama, about the means that base women use. How can I tell you what these are? It is not fitting, devi, to answer these questions or for you to doubt me, because you are intelligent and Krishna's favourite wife. The husband who discovers that his wife uses incantations and intoxicating physics begins to be in dread of her, as if she were a serpent hiding in his bedchamber. How can a man who is beset with fear have peace, and how can one who has no peace have happiness? A wife can never ensure her husband's obedience by chanting mantras.

We hear of painful diseases being transmitted by our enemies. Indeed, they that want to kill others send poison disguised as gifts, so that the man who imbibes the drug so sent, by tongue or skin, soon dies. Women have been known to cause the body to bloat through the retention of fluids, leprosy, anaemia, impotence, insanity, blindness and deafness in men by administering drugs to them. These evil and sinful women sometimes disable their husbands for good. The wife should never do the least injury to her lord.

But listen now to the way I conduct myself with the great-souled sons of Pandu. I set aside vanity and, controlling desire and anger, I serve them with devotion. I control my envy and, with deep, heartfelt love, and without feeling that the duties I perform are degrading in any way, I wait upon them. I never say anything that is evil or false, I am careful never to sit or look or walk with impropriety; I am always careful never to let my eyes reveal what is in my heart. This is how I serve Pandu's sons, my Kshatriya husbands who are like the Sun or Fire; they are radiant as the Moon, and they are endowed with fierce energy and prowess and can kill their enemies with a mere look.

My heart does not turn towards any other, be he Deva, Manava or Gandharva; whether he is young or decked with ornaments, wealthy or handsome. I never bathe or eat or sleep before my husbands have, in fact, not until after our attendants have done so. Wherever they may be returning from, be it field, forest or town, I quickly get up and greet my husband with water to wash and a seat to rest on.

I always keep the house and all the things in it, and the food, tidy and clean. I am careful in preparing the rice and serve them food at the proper time. I never use angry words or sulk, and I never imitate women that are wicked. Setting aside sloth, I always do what pleases them. I never laugh falsely, but only at something genuinely amusing, and I never loiter by the gate. I never stay long in the bathing room or in the gardens attached to the house. I always refrain from laughing too loudly; I never indulge in uncontrolled passion; I avoid everything that may offend.

Satyabhama, I am in constant attendance on my lords. I am never happy when apart from them. When my husband leaves home to see a relative, I renounce flowers and perfumes and keep vratas. Whatever my husband does not drink or eat, or enjoy, I do not either. Beautiful princess decked in ornaments, guided constantly by the instruction imparted to me by my elders, I devotedly seek the welfare of my lords.

My mother-in-law Kunti told me of my duties with regard to many aspects of married life: with regard to relatives, alms-giving, offering worship to the gods, oblations to the diseased, boiling food in pots on auspicious days to offer to ancestors and guests. She taught me about reverence and service to those that deserve our attention. These and all else that I know about, I observe and practice conscientiously, day and night. Fixing my heart on humility and the lawful path of dharma, I serve my gentle, truthful and virtuous husbands, thinking of them as snakes that can flare up in anger at the least provocation.

The wife's virtue is based on her devotion to her husband. The husband is the wife's god and her refuge. Indeed, there is no other refuge for her. Under these circumstances, how could a wife hurt her lord, even in the smallest way?

I never act against the wishes of my husband, in sleeping or eating or in the way I adorn myself; I am always guided by them and never speak ill of my mother-in-law. Blessed one, my husbands have become obedient to me because of my diligence, my alertness, and because of the humility with which I serve my betters.

Every day, I myself serve Kunti, revered and truthful mother of these Kshatriyas, with food and drink, and fetch her clothes for her and help her dress. Never do I indulge in my own preferences over hers in food or in dress; never do I reprove that princess who is as forgiving as the Earth herself.

Yudhishtira used to feed eight thousand Brahmanas every day in the palace, on golden plates. He used to care for eighty thousand Snataka Brahmanas leading the lives of grihastas, with thirty serving-maids assigned to each. Besides these, he used to send sattvic food, in plates of gold, to ten thousand celibate Yatis. I would worship all these Brahmanas who recited the Vedas, with food, drink and clothing, taken from our stores after dedicating a portion to the Viswadeva.

The illustrious son of Kunti had a hundred thousand finely attired personal serving-maids, wearing lambent bracelets and golden necklaces, colourful garlands and a profusion of resonant jewellery, and anointed with sandalwood paste. The gold-bedecked maids were all skilled in singing and dancing. I knew their names and recognised them all; I knew who they were and what their duties were. Kunti's most inelligent and brilliant son also had a hundred thousand maid servants to take care of feeding his guests, with plates of gold in their hands.

While Yudhishtira lived in Indraprastha a hundred thousand horses and as many elephants would follow him in his entourage. These were the possessions of Yudhishtira when he ruled the world.

It was I, princess, who regulated their number and framed the rules by which they lived. I listened to any complaints about them. I knew everything that the maid-servants of the palace did or did not do, and about the other servitors, including the royal cowherds and shepherds. Blessed and noble one, I alone kept the accounts of the king's income and expenditure and the sum of his wealth. Those bulls among the Bhaaratas gave me the responsibility of looking after all their dependants, who paid me their respects.

This burden, which was heavy and could not be borne by someone with an evil heart, I shouldered day and night, sacrificing my own ease and remaining lovingly devoted to my husbands all the while. And while my husbands were engaged in the pursuit of dharma, I managed their treasury that was as inexhaustible as Varuna's ever-brimming ocean.

Often knowing hunger and thirst, all day and night I would serve the Kuru princes, and I knew no difference between night and day. I was the first to awake and the last to sleep. This, O Satyabhama, is the charm I used to make my husbands obedient to me. This is what I know. Never have I resorted to the spells or intoxicants of wicked women, nor do I ever wish to use them.'

Quickly contrite now, Satyabhama says, 'O Panchali, among friends, light-hearted conversations happen naturally and without forethought. Yet, I am to blame. Yagnaseni, forgive me!' "

"Draupadi says, 'I will teach you how to capture your husband's heart without deceit. Beloved friend, if you do as I say, you will draw your lord away from other women.

In all the worlds, including Devaloka, there is no god equal to one's husband. When he is pleased with you he will grant you all your wishes, but when he is angry you will lose them all. It is the husband that gives the wife her children, and he gives her the things that she enjoys. He gives soft beds and comfortable chairs, clothes and garlands, perfumes, great fame, and heaven itself in the hereafter.

As a wife, it is not easy to find happiness. Indeed, the chaste woman always gains happiness through hardship. Always adore Krishna by offering him your friendship and love, and by cheerfully accepting physical hardship. Make him sit comfortably in a well-wrought seat, bring him the best garlands and perfumes, serve him promptly, and by this he will devote himself to you, realising that you love him truly.

As soon as you hear your lord's voice at the gate, rise from your chair and stand in readiness in your chamber; and as soon as you see him enter, worship him by leading him to a soft chair and fetching him water to wash his feet. Even when he commands a maidservant to do something, get up and do it yourself. Let Krishna understand your mind and know that you love him with all your heart.

Satyabhama, do not talk to others of anything your lord says to you, even if it is nothing that needs to be kept secret, for if any of the other wives were to speak of it to him, he might become annoyed with you. Do whatever is in your power to make those he loves happy, and always work for his benefit. Take care to stay away from those who oppose him, who want to hurt him and from deceitful persons in general.

Remain composed and alert at all times, without showing any emotion, in the presence of men. Mask your feelings with silence; do not stay alone, or have private conversations with any man, not even your sons Pradyumna and Samba. You should cultivate friendships only with women that are of noble birth and pure hearts, who are devoted to their lords; shun women that are bad-tempered, addicted to wine, gluttonous, who are prone to stealing, or wicked and fickle.

Such conduct is reputable and augurs prosperity. It can allay hostility, and it leads to Swarga. So, deck yourself in garlands and ornaments, rub unguents and perfumes on your body, and worship your husband.' "

Vaisampayana said, "By this time, having spoken of many pleasant matters with the noble Pandavas and the Brahmanas with Markandeya at their head, and having bid them farewell, Krishna mounts his chariot and calls for Satyabhama.

Satyabhama embraces Draupadi lovingly and says to her, 'Krishnaa, let there be no anxiety or grief for you! You have no reason to spend sleepless nights, because you will surely regain the Earth that your godlike husbands will subdue. O black-eyed one, women who have your character and the auspicious marks that you do, can never suffer misfortune for long. I have heard it said that you and your husbands will surely enjoy this Earth, in peace and freed from all troubles!

Draupadi, you will see Yudhishtira ruling the world after he has slain the sons of Dhritarashtra and avenged their cowardly deeds. You will soon see those Kuru wives, who laughed shamelessly at you when you were going into exile, reduced to helpless despair. Be aware, Krishnaa, that all those that hurt you in any way while you were in that miserable condition have already died.

Your valiant sons, Yudhishtira's Prativindhya, Bhima's Sutasoma, Arjuna's Srutakarma, Nakula's Satanika and Sahadeva's Srutasena are well and have become skilled warriors. Like Abhimanyu they all live happily in delightful Dwaravati. Subhadra cares for them with all her heart and rejoices in them even as you do. She grieves when they are sad and she is joyful when they are. Pradyumna's mother, too, loves them dearly.

Krishna and his son Bhanu, and all the others, watch over them with special affection. My mother-in-law Devaki does not spare any effort in feeding and clothing them; the Andhakas and Vrishnis, including Rama and others, have great fondness for them. Lovely one, all these love your sons as much as they love Pradyumna.'

Having spoken thus, with warm sincerity, Satyabhama makes her way to Krishna's chariot. She first walks around the Queen of the Pandavas in pradakshina and then climbs into the wonderful ratha. The greatest of the Yadavas comforts Draupadi with a smile and, bidding the Pandavas to return to their house, sets out for his own city, in his chariot yoked to swift horses."

GHOSHA YATRA PARVA

Janamejaya said, "After they reached the lake in Dwaita vana, how do those best of men, Pritha's sons, pass their days in that forest, exposed to the inclement winter and summer, and to the Wind and the Sun, O Brahmana?"

Vaisampayana said, "When the sons of Pandu arrive at that lake, they choose a place to set up their dwelling far from human habitation. They explore the delightful woods, pristine mountains and picturesque river valleys. Once they have established their dwelling, many venerable Rishis, learned in Vedic lore, visit them regularly. Those Purushottamas always receive these Rishis with the utmost reverence.

One day, there comes to the home of the Kaurava princes a certain Brahmana who is known for his eloquence. He converses with the Pandavas for a while, and then, leaves them and goes to the court of the Dhritarashtra, son of Vichitravirya. The old king of the Kurus receives him with respect, and when the Brahmana is seated, asks him about the sons of Dharma, Vayu and Indra, and about the twins, sons of the Aswins.

The Brahmana tells him of their pitiful state, emaciated from their hardships and by the wind and Sun. The Brahmana also tells the king about Krishnaa, how intense her suffering is, and says that she is bereft of protection although she has those splendid Kshatriyas for husbands.

When he hears what the Brahmana says Dhritarashtra's soul contracts in grief at the thought of those royal princes drowning in a river of sorrow.

Trembling and sighing, he calms himself with great effort, and remembers that he himself is responsible for their plight.

Dhritarashstra says, 'O, how does Yudhishtira, the eldest of our sons, who is truthful and pious, who is righteous in all that he does, Ajatasatru who has not a single enemy, who is accustomed to sleeping on beds made of soft Ranku skins, sleep now on bare ground? O, he who used to be woken every morning by the melodious sound of sutas and magadhas singing his praises, that prince of the Kurus who is like Indra himself: he now rises from his rough bed, woken in the small hours by the harsh-throated birds of night.

How does Vrikodara, reduced by exposure to the elements, and full of rage, sleep on the floor in the presence of the princess of Panchala? He should not suffer so. Perhaps, the intelligent Arjuna does not sleep at night although he is one who can bear any pain, and who, though obedient to Yudhishtira, is pierced to the core by the memory of his elder brother's mistakes. I am certain that, seeing the twins and Krishnaa and Yudhishtira and Bhima plunged in misery, Arjuna sighs deeply, like a fierce serpent, and that his anger keeps him awake through the night.

The twins, too, who are like a pair of gods, and who deserve great happiness, are plunged in woe and pass their nights in restless wakefulness, only prevented by dharma and satya from avenging the wrongs done to them. The mighty son of Vayu, who is equal to his father in strength, no doubt sighs like a serpent as well, and restrains his fury, held fast by his elder brother with bonds of truth. The mightiest of warriors in battle, he now lies quietly on the ground, though fury roils his tameless heart. Burning to kill my children, he bides his time.

The cruel words that Dussasana spoke after Yudhishtira was deceitfully beaten at dice have sunk deep into Vrikodara's heart and consume him, as a bundle of straw set alight engulfs a faggot of dry wood.

Dharmaputra never acts sinfully, and Dhananjaya always obeys him; but Bhima's wrath, stoked by his life in exile, flares up like flames fanned by the wind. That Kshatriya wrings his hands and breathes hot, fierce breath, as if to consume my sons and grandsons with them.

When they are angry, Arjuna and Vrikodara are like Yama and Kaala. They loose their swift arrows like so many thunderbolts, in all directions and raze their enemies in battle. Sadly, when Duryodhana, Sakuni, the Suta's son and evil Dussasana robbed the Pandavas of their kingdom by cheating at dice, they saw only the honey on the tree and not the terrible ruin what they did would inexorably bring.

Man knows that his actions, good and evil, will bear their different fruit, but he is sometimes confouded by fate. How, then, can man, find salvation? Even if the earth is well tilled and the seed sown in it, and even if Indra sends his showers at the right time, the crop may still not grow. This is what we often hear. How could this saying be true unless, as I have come to realise, Destiny is the ultimate master?

The gambler Sakuni cheated the son of Pandu, who is always honest; and out of blind affection for my sinful sons, I, too, was guilty of vile deceit. It is for this that the Kurus now face their hour of nemesis. Or, perhaps, the inevitable must come to pass, for it is fated and more myterious than we can know. The wind blows, whether made to or not; the woman that conceives will have a child; darkness will be dispelled at dawn; and daylight vanishes at dusk!

When the time comes, whatever material wealth we earn, whether it is spent or saved, brings us misery. Why, then, are men so anxious to garner wealth? If what we acquire is the result of fate, do we need to safeguard it from being divided, or from being frittered away, or from being spent all at once? If left unprotected, it may dwindle into a hundred portions. But whatever the nature of our possessions, our actions in the world are never lost.

Think of the power of Arjuna, who went to Indraloka from the forest. Having mastered the four kinds of Devastras, he has come back into this world. What man is there who, having gone to Indra's world in his human form, wishes to come back? He has returned because he sees that the destruction of the Kurus is imminent. Destiny's instrument is Arjuna, the ambidextrous archer. His bow is the Gandiva, which has no equal, besides which he now has other unearthly weapons. Who is there that can withstand the might of these three?'

After listening to the king, Subala's son goes to Duryodhana, who is sitting with Karna, and tells them all that he has heard. And even the heedless Duryodhana is filled with grief."

Vaisampayana said, "After hearing what Dhritarashtra says, Sakuni waits for his opportunity and, advised and abetted by Karna, speaks to Duryodhana.

He says, "You have, with your power, sent the heroic Pandavas into exile. Bhaarata, you rule this earth unchallenged, just as the slayer of Sambara rules Devaloka. The kings of the East, the South and the West pay tribute to you. Prosperity once paid court to Pandu's sons, but now she is the vassal of you and your brothers. My king, not so long ago, with heavy hearts we saw Prosperity sitting beside Yudhishtira in Indraprastha, but today she is yours. You have snatched her away from Yudhishtira by dint of your intelligence. All the kings of the earth are now your subjects and at your command, even as they were previously Yudhishtira's and waited on his word.

Boundless Bhumi Devi, girdled by her seas, adorned by her mountains and forests, her towns, cities and mines, and decked with woodlands and hills, is now yours!

Brahmanas adore you; kings worship you; and you blaze, Rajan, with the splendour of your prowess, like the Sun among the Devas. Surrounded by the Kurus, like Yama by the Rudras, or like Vasava by the Maruts, you shine, like the radiant Moon among the stars. Suyodhana, let us go and look at the sons of Pandu, who never obeyed anyone's commands and who never owed you subjection, who are now divested of their prosperity.

We have heard that the Pandavas are living on the shore of the lake in Dwaita vana, with many Brahmanas; the wilderness is their home. Go there, vested in great fortune, and scorch the sons of Pandu with the brilliance of your glory, just as the Sun burns everything with his hot rays. Enjoy the sight of yourself as a king and of them stripped of their sovereignty; of yourself in opulence and of them divested of it; of yourself with wealth and of them in poverty. Let Pandu's sons see you, looking like Yayati, the son of Nahusha, accompanied by a multitude of followers and enjoying great bliss.

O king, true prosperity is that which both friends and foes see. What jubilation can be more complete than that which a man enjoys when he himself is prosperous while his enemies are plunged in adversity? It is like the man, who from his position on the mountain-top, looks down on the man that grovels on the plain below. Tiger among kings, the exhilaration that a man derives from seeing his enemies in grief is greater than what he does from acquiring wealth or dominion.

How euphoric is he who looks upon Dhananjaya wearing tree-bark and deer-skin, while he himself is cloaked in robes of richness. Let your wife, grandly attired, go and see the woeful Krishnaa clad in bark, and add to Draupadi's sorrow. Let Drupada's impoverished daughter be filled with regret, seeing your wife decked in priceless ornaments, grief far greater than what she felt in the sabha when Dussasana dragged her there.'

Having spoken thus to Duryodhana, Karna and Sakuni both fall silent, O Janamejaya, their counsel ended."

Vaisampayana said, "Duryodhana is delighted with what Karna says. But quickly, he becomes melancholy again and says, 'O Karna, I have been thinking about what you said, but I will not be allowed to go where the Pandavas live. Dhritarashtra grieves for those Kshatriyas. Indeed, he thinks the sons of Pandu have become more powerful than before because of their austere lives and their tapasya. Even if the king understands my motives, he will think of future consequences, and never grant me leave. He will know that we have no other business in that forest than the humiliation of the exiled Pandavas.

You know what Kshatta Vidura said to me, to you and to Subala's son Sakuni during the game of dice. Bearing his words in mind, as well as the lamentations that he and others indulged in then, I am doubtful about whether or not to go and ask the king. I shall most certainly be gratified to see Bhima and Phalguna living in misery with Krishnaa in the jungle. The joy that I will feel in gaining sovereignty of the whole world is nothing compared to the rapture that will be mine on seeing Pandu's sons wearing tree-bark and deer-skin. Is there a greater joy than will be mine, Karna, on seeing Draupadi in the wilderness, dressed in rags?

Only when Yudhishtira and Bhima see how I am graced with vast wealth, will my life's ambition be fulfilled. Yet, I do not see a way in which I can convince the king to let me go to the forest.

You, Subala's son and Dussasana must devise a clever plan by which we can go. I, too, will decide today, whether or not I should go, and see the king tomorrow. When I am sitting with Kurusattama Bhishma, it is then that you and Sakuni must propose the plan you have concocted. I will listen to what the king and Bhishma have to say and settle the matter by pleading with our grandfather for permission.'

Saying S*o be it*, they all go away to their respective mansions.

In the morning, Karna comes to Duryodhana and, with a smile, says to him, 'I have a plan. Listen to it, O lord of men. Our herds of cattle are in the woods that fringe Dwaita vana. I am sure that we can go there under the pretext of inspecting the herds, for it is fitting for kings to go frequently to their cattle stations. If you give this as a reason, your father will surely give you leave to go.'

Sakuni says to them, 'This is the simple, cunning plan that I, too, had in mind. The king will definitely give his approval for our visit to Dwaita vana. Our herds all wait there, expecting you. We will surely be able to go to the cattle station, on the pretext of inspecting our herds and counting their numbers.'

The three men laugh in glee and clasp each others' hands. Having decided on this plan, they go to meet the king of the Kurus."

Vaisampayana said, “Janamejaya, as planned, they go to see king Dhritarashtra, and when they are in his presence they ask solicitously about his welfare. In return, he asks after theirs. The three connivers have enlisted the services of a cowherd named Samagna to help them and, as instructed, Samagna approaches the king and tells him about the cattle, and that they need to be counted.

At this point, Karna and Sakuni say to Dhritarashtra, ‘O Kaurava, our herds are kept in a most pleasant place. This is the time for branding the calves; it is also an excellent time for the prince to go hunting. You must give him leave to go.’

Dhritarashtra says, ‘A deer hunt and an inspection of our cattle are excellent ideas, my child; it is not wise to trust the herdsmen completely. But we have heard that those Purushavyaghras, the Pandavas, now live in the vicinity of our herds. I think it is best that you do not go on your own.

The Pandavas live in the forest because they were defeated deceitfully at dice, and they suffer greatly. Karna, they are mighty warriors and they have devoted themselves to severe tapasya. Yudhishtira will not allow his anger to flare, but Bhimasena is naturally volatile and Yagnaseni is fire personified. You are proud and foolhardy, and are bound to offend them. She will burn you with the power of her tapasyashakti, and make ashes of even armed Kshatriyas.

I am also of the opinion that injuring them using a large force of warriors is sinful, besides I do not think you will succeed. Arjuna has returned to join them in the forest. Even before he had acquired mastery of the divine Astra Shastra, he subdued the earth. Mighty Kshatriya that he is, and now a master of the Devastras, will he not slay you all?

Even if, in obedience to my words, you conduct yourselves carefully while you are there, you will have no peace of mind because you will be constantly watchful. Or, some soldier of yours may, even unwittingly, do some harm to Yudhishtira, for which you will be held responsible.

No, let some of our trusted men go for the inspection and see to the branding of the calves. Bhaarata, you must not go there yourself.'

Sakuni says, 'Pandu's eldest son is well-versed in dharma. He made a pledge, which our entire sabha witnessed, that he would live for twelve years in the forest; and the other sons of Pandu are obedient to Yudhishtira. Yudhishtira will never be angry with us. We want, very much, to go hunting and we will use that opportunity to supervise the counting of our cattle.

We have no intention of seeing the Pandavas. We will be careful not to go near their dwelling; there will be no misdemeanour on our part.'

Now Dhritarashtra gives his consent, albeit unwillingly, for Duryodhana and his companions to go to the forest. Permission gained, the son of Gandhari sets out, accompanied by Karna and a large army. Also with him are Dussasana, many of his other brothers, Subala's son, the clever Sakuni, and thousands of princesses.

And as this prince of the mighty arms sets out for Dwaita vana, the citizens of Hastinapura, accompanied by their wives, follow him. Eight thousand chariots, thirty thousand elephants, nine thousand horses and many thousands of foot-soldiers are in his train, as well as moving shops and pavilions, traders, bards and hundreds of thousands of trained hunters.

As Duryodhana begins his journey followed by this massive entourage the uproar they make resembles the roaring of stormy monsoon winds. When they reach the forest, Duryodhana, with his followers, his chariots and laden carts, makes camp four miles from the lake in Dwaita vana."

Vaisampayana said, "Duryodhana passes through different parts of that forest and finally arrives at the cattle station and settles his troops there. His attendants select a familiar and pleasant wood that has plentiful water and is lush with trees, a place convenient for constructing living quarters for the king. Not too far from the royal residence, they also erect separate dwellings for Karna, Sakuni and the king's brothers.

The king sees his cattle, hundreds and thousands of them; he examines their legs and their identifying marks, and supervises their counting. He supervises the branding of the calves and makes a note of those animals that need to be broken in; and he counts those cows whose calves have not yet been weaned.

Once he has marked and counted every calf less than three years old, the Kuru prince, surrounded by the cowherds, begins to amuse himself in the forest. His people and his soldiers enjoy themselves, even like the Devas, doing as they please. The herdsmen, who are skilled in singing, dancing and playing instruments, and young maidens decked in ornaments pander to the pleasures of Dhritarashtra's son, who, surrounded by the women of the royal household, cheerfully distributes wealth, food and drink amongst those who minister to him.

The king and his followers hunt and kill hyena, bison, deer, ox, bear and wild boar. The king shoots thousands of those animals in the deep forest, and he snares deer in the more light woods. Bhaarata, drinking milk and enjoying all kinds of delicious food, and travelling through many charming groves and woods swarming with bees drunk on the honey of flowers and echoing with the cries of the peacock, Duryodhana eventually reaches the sacred lake of Dwaita vana.

The place where the king arrives is full of bees inebriated with pushpamrita, flower nectar, and resounds with the sweet notes of the blue jay; the glade is shaded by saptacchadas and punnagas and bakulas. The King, mantled in his bounty, enters that place looking like Indra, the wielder of the Vajra and king of the Devas.

O Kurusattama, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, of the mighty intellect, is at the time living close to that lake and is, with his wife Draupadi, celebrating the daily sacrifice called Rajarishi in accordance with the precepts laid down for Devas and forest dwellers.

Duryodhana arrives near this very spot and commands his men, 'Build pleasure palaces here without delay.'

The king's loyal servants say Tathaastu and come to the lake's shore to build the edifices that the king wants. As these hand-picked soldiers reach the shore of the lake and are about to enter the forest, a number of Gandharvas, led by their lord, appear before them and bar their way.

Rajan, the Gandharva with his followers has already come here from Kubera's kingdom; and, accompanied by the several tribes of Apsaras and by the sons of the Devas, he has come for his own entertainment. He has occupied the vana and closed it to all others.

The attendants of the Kuru king, finding that the Gandharva king has barred entry to the lake, go back to Duryodhana. Haughty Duryodhana hears what they say and despatches a troop of his best warriors, difficult to defeat, and commands them to drive the Gandharvas away.

These warriors, who form the vanguard of the Kuru army, come to the lake and say to the Gandharvas, 'The mighty king Duryodhana, son of Dhritarashtra, is coming here. Make way for him.'

The Gandharvas laugh in their faces and reply roughly, 'Your evil king must have lost his mind. Why else would he command Swargavasis, as if we were his servants? How foolish of you to rush here at his word to meet your deaths; you are impetuous fools to dare to bring us his message. Return at once to the king of the Kurus, or else go even now to Yamaloka.'

Frightened by the majesty and brilliance of the Gandharvas, that force flees back to where Dhritarashtra's son Duryodhana waits impatiently."

Vaisampayana said, “Rajan, those soldiers return to Duryodhana and tell him what the Gandharvas said. Dhritarashtra’s powerful son is furious.

He growls, ‘Even if they have come to sport with all the Devas and with him of the hundred sacrifices, kill the impudent Gandharvas.’

Dhritarashtra’s sons and the commanders of his army—mighty warriors all—and thousands of foot-soldiers arm for battle. They fill the air in the ten directions with loud roars and, rushing at the Gandharvas who guard the entrance, enter the vana. Even as the Kuru soldiers step into the forest, the fallen guards are replaced by other Gandharvas, who appear as if by magic and forbid them to advance.

Although the Gandharvas speak politely, the Kuru soldiers disregard them and begin to make their way into that deep vana.

When the sky-rangers find that Dhritarashtra’s warriors and their king cannot be stopped by words they go to their king Chitrasena and tell him what has happened. In rage, Chitrasena commands his followers, ‘Punish these wretches!’

The Gandharvas take up their weapons and charge Dhritarashtra’s troops. Seeing the celestial elves rushing towards them, weapons raised, the Kuru warriors flee in all directions, even as Duryodhana looks on. Only Karna remains, undeterred, while all the others turn their backs on the enemy and fly from the field.

Karna stops the Gandharva force with a perfect storm of arrows. With amazing lightness of hand, the Sutaputra strikes hundreds of Gandharvas with kshurapra arrows, bhallas and weapons made of bone and iron. In no time, mighty Karna makes the heads of many Gandharvas roll, and Chitrasena's forces begin to scream in anguish, in their musical voices.

They are slaughtered in great numbers by Karna of the great intellect, but the Gandharvas return in hundreds of thousands. Swarms of Chitrasena's warriors, rushing headlong into battle, soon cover the field, and the Earth itself seems to be filled by the unearthly host.

Then, led by Karna, prince Duryodhana, Sakuni, Dussasana, Vikarna and the other sons of Dhritarashtra, riding chariots, the clamour of whose wheels is like the raucous cries of Garuda, attack the elves and begin to raze the Gandharva host. Eagerly behind Karna, these princes assault the Gandharva army with a great force of chariots and cavalry.

Now all the Gandharva forces come to the fight against the Kauravas, and the encounter that takes place between the opposing armies is so fierce that it makes one's hair stand on end.

At last, afflicted by the arrows of the Kuru army, the Gandharvas appear to be exhausted, and seeing how spent the enemy is, the Kauravas send up a loud cheer.

Chitrasena sees his host yielding to fear, and angrily leaps up, determined to annihilate the Kuru army. Using his sublime mastery at arms and his powers of maya, he continues the battle. The Kaurava warriors are bewildered by the illusions that Chitrasena invokes, which, Bhaarata, makes them believe that they are being attacked by ten Gandharvas each.

The Kuru host is struck by panic, and all those who want to live, run from the field. While the entire Kaurava army breaks up and flees, Karna, son of Surya Deva, stands resolute, as immovable as a hill.

Duryodhana, Karna and Sakuni also fight the Gandharvas, although every one of them has been sorely wounded. The Gandharvas rush in one massed force of hundreds of thousands against Karna, bent on killing him.

They surround the Sutaputra and assail him with swords, battle-axes and spears. Some dissever the yoke of his chariot, some bring down his flagstaff, some his ratha's shaft, some cut down his horses and some strike his sarathy.

Some fell his regal parasol, some pulverise the wooden fender around his chariot, and some its joints. Thousands of Gandharvas attack his ratha in unison and smash it into little pieces. With his sword and shield, Karna leaps out of that ruined ratha, mounts Vikarna's chariot and lashes the horses away to save himself."

Vaisampayana said, "O king, when the Gandharvas succeed in chasing great Karna from field, the Kuru army scatters in panic, in the very sight of Dhritarashtra's son. Although he sees his troops fleeing the battle, their backs to the enemy, Duryodhana stands his ground. He sees the mighty Gandharva warriors rushing towards him and showers them with a deluge of arrows. But the Gandharvas unconcernedly brush off his shafts and surround his chariot.

With their own arrows, they chop its yoke into pieces; they shatter the shaft, the fenders, the flagstaff, the triple bamboo poles and the axle of his ratha; and they kill his charioteer and horses.

Chitrasena sees Duryodhana flung from his ruined chariot onto the ground. The Gandharva king rushes at him and seizes him with such violence as if to wring life out of him. The Kuru king taken, the Gandharvas surround Dussasana and capture him. Some Gandharvas seize Vivimsati, some take Vinda and Anuvinda, while others take all the Kuru princesses and women of the royal household.

Duryodhana's personal guard quickly joins the men who have already fled the battle, and together they hasten to the Pandavas, who are living nearby. After Duryodhana's capture by the Gandharvas, his men who are left alive place the Kuru chariots, mobile shops, pavilions, carriages and draught animals under the protection of the Pandavas.

The Kaurava soldiers sob, ‘The handsome, mighty-armed son of Dhritarashtra has been taken captive by the Gandharvas. The Gandharvas are hauling away Dussasana, Durvisha, Durmukha and Durjaya in chains, and taking all the royal Kuru women as well. O sons of Pritha, rescue them!’

Wailing, Duryodhana’s attendants go to Yudhishtira and beg him to save their king.

Bhima says to Duryodhana’s men, who are bowed with grief, ‘The Gandharvas have done our work for us. They have done what we should have done. The Kurus came here with some other vile purpose in mind but have been thwarted by circumstances they did not foresee. This is the result of the evil intention of a deceitful king.

It is said that the enemy of a powerless man is overthrown by others. The Gandharvas have, in an extraordinary way, illustrated the truth of this adage before our eyes. It appears that someone in this world still wants our welfare, and has assumed that pleasant responsibility, though we sit doing nothing.

The wretch came here to gloat over us—he wallowing in prosperity, and we sunk in poverty and emaciated by our austere life and the harsh elements. Those who behave like the evil-souled and wretched Kaurava are now witness to his disgrace. And he who persuaded Duryodhana to come also sinned. I say to you, it is not the sons of Kunti who are evil or sinful.’

Yudhishtira says sharply to Bhima, ‘This is not the time for such cruel words.’ ”

"Yudhishtira says to his wild brother, 'Child, why do you speak so harshly to the frightened Kurus, who are now in adversity and who have come to us for protection? Vrikodara, dissent and dispute often happen between blood relatives; hostilities such as these do go on, but the honour of the family must never suffer.

If a stranger insults the honour of a family, good men do not tolerate it. The king of the Gandharvas knows that we have been living here for some time. Yet, he chooses to ignore us and does something that we abhor. My brother, Duryodhana's capture and the insult to the women of our house by a stranger have tarnished our family honour.

Tigers among men, rise and arm yourselves without delay, we must rescue our kin, who ask for our protection, and protect the honour of our kula. Purushavyaghra, Arjuna, the twins and you, all valiant and undefeated, must free Duryodhana who has been taken prisoner.

These grand chariots, equipped with golden flagpoles and with weapons of all kinds that belong to Dhritarashtra's sons are here. Take them, and use Indrasena and the other skilled sarathys to drive them; use all your might to quell the Gandharvas and rescue Duryodhana.

Even an ordinary Kshatriya would do his utmost to protect one who comes to him for refuge; Vrikodara, from you I can expect no less. Who amongst us is so ignoble as to ignore the plea of even our enemy when we find him begging for help with joined hands? The bestowal of a boon, sovereignty and the birth of a son are sources of great joy. But, Pandavas, rescuing an enemy from peril is equal to all three put together.

What can be a source of greater joy to you than Duryodhana, plunged in distress, depending on your prowess for his life? Vrikodara, if the tapasya that I am now engaged in had been complete, I would have rushed to help him myself. Do your very best, O Bhaarata, to rescue Duryodhana by placating the Gandharvas. If, however, the king of the Gandharvas spurns your efforts at conciliation, then you must free Suyodhana by means of a small fight. If the lord of the Gandharvas does not release the Kurus even then, you must rescue them by crushing the enemy by any means at your disposal.

Bhima, I cannot say anymore, for my tapasya has begun and has not ended yet.' "

Hearing Ajatasatru, out of reverence for his elder brother, Arjuna instantly swears to liberate the Kauravas. He says, 'If the Gandharvas do not free the sons of Dhritarashtra peacefully, the Earth will drink the blood of their king today!'

When the Kauravas hear Arjuna, they regain their composure."

Vaisampayana said, "Listening to Yudhishtira, those bulls among men, led by Bhimasena, arise, their faces beaming. Those mighty warriors put on impenetrable armour inlaid with gold, and arm themselves with unearthly weapons of all kinds. The Pandavas mount the Kaurava chariots with their flagstaffs, and with their bows and arrows they blaze in fiery splendour.

Riding those chariots drawn by the swiftest steeds, those tigers among warriors ride forth. Seeing the Pandavas riding to rescue Duryodhana, the Kuru army lets out a great cheer.

Soon, the Gandharvas, the sky-rangers flushed with victory, see the sons of Pandu coming after them fearlessly through the forest. The Gandharvas see the four sons of Pandu riding to battle on their chariots, and they turn back to face the Kshatriyas. The residents of Gandhamadana see the Pandavas like the radiant Lokapalas, guardians of the world, inflamed and eager for a fight.

O Bhaarata, in obedience to the wise Yudhishtira's command, the first encounter is a mere skirmish. Arjuna Parantapa realises that it has not succeeded. He says to the Gandharvas in a conciliatory tone, 'Release my brother Suyodhana.'

The Gandharvas laugh aloud and reply, 'Young man, there is only one lord whose orders we obey, and under his rule we pass our days happily. Bhaarata, we do only what he says, and none can command us except him.'

Arjuna says to them, ‘Contact with other men’s wives and a fight with mortal men are reprehensible in a king of Gandharvas. Release the mighty sons of Dhritarashtra. Set the women free as well, as Yudhishtira Dharmaraja commands. If you Gandharvas do not release the sons of Dhritarashtra peacefully, I will use all my prowess to rescue Suyodhana and his people.’

With that the ambidextrous Arjuna unleashes a shower of arrows on the Gandharvas. The Gandharvas respond with an equal torrent of shafts, and the Pandavas retaliate in return.

Bhaarata, fierce is the battle that rages between the agile and effervescent Gandharvas and the now impetuous sons of Pandu.”

Vaisampayana said, "Decked in golden garlands, and masters of the astra of heaven, the Gandharvas blaze their arrows at the Pandavas from every side. Since the sons of Pandu number only four and the Gandharvas are thousands, the battle that ensues is extraordinary. The Gandharvas try to shatter the chariots of the four Pandavas as they did the Kauravas'. But these tigers among men easily resist the hosts of elves who rush at them.

Those formidable rangers of skies are arrested on all sides and cannot come near the Pandavas.

Arjuna, provoked, prepares to loose his Devastras at the enraged and frustrated Gandharvas. His Agneyastra sends a hundred thousand Gandharvas to Yamaloka. Bhima, foremost of all warriors in battle, kills hundreds of elves with razorlike arrows. And the powerful sons of Madri, battling with scarcely credible energy, encounter hundreds of Gandharvas, O king, and kill them all.

As the Gandharvas are razed by the Pandavas with divine astras, they fly up into the sky, taking the sons of Dhritarashtra with them. But seeing them go, Arjuna shrouds them with a net of magic arrows, trapping them like birds in a cage. In fury, they cast maces, spears and swords down at Arjuna, but he, the master of astras, easily repels the attack; Dhananjaya retaliates, mangling Gandharva limbs with his crescent-tipped barbs.

Heads, legs and arms begin to fall from the sky in a cascade, and the sight strikes the enemy with panic. The Gandharvas now rain a downpour of shafts on Arjuna, who stands on the ground. That Kshatriya stills the elven shower of arrows with his own, also gravely wounding the Gandharvas.

Arjuna summons all his famed astras: Sthunakarna, Indrajala, Saura, Agneya and Saumya. The Gandharvas are consumed by the fiery weapons of Kunti's son and suffer great losses even as the sons of Diti did when they were torched by Sakra's thunderbolt. When they attack Arjuna from above, his thick mesh of arrows contains theirs; when they attack him from all sides on the ground, his crescent-tipped arrows hold theirs off.

Chitrasena sees that the Gandharvas are terrified by Kunti's son and, Bhaarata, rushes at Dhananjaya with his mace.

As the king of the Gandharvas hurtles down on Arjuna from above, mace in hand, Arjuna splits that mace into seven pieces with his immaculate archery. Chitrasena resorts to maya and continues the fight, now invisible to the Pandava. Arjuna uses many a Devastra to repel all the unworldly weapons that the Gandharva casts at him and, when Chitrasena, mantled in maya, now appearing, now disappearing, sees that the son of Kunti still confounds him, the Gandharva vanishes entirely.

Seeing the lord of the Gandharvas vanish, Arjuna, chanting the proper mantras, invokes an astra to rend Chitrasena's cloak of invisibility. Dhananjaya of the many forms, full of rage, fetches the Gandharva lord back into plain sight with the weapon Sabdaveda.

Assailed by the illustrious Arjuna, his beloved friend Chitrasena reveals himself and says, 'Behold, it is your friend who fights you!'

Arjuna sees that Chitrasena is tired and withdraws his astras. Seeing this, the other Pandavas hold their wind-swift horses and check their weapons, and put away their bows.

Chitrasena, Bhima, Arjuna and the twins sit on their chariots and solicitously enquire about one another's welfare."

Vaisampayana said, "Arjuna smiles and says to Chitrasena who now stands in the midst of his Gandharva host, 'My friend, what do you achieve by punishing the Kauravas? Why do you chastise Suyodhana and his wives?'

Chitrasena replies, 'Dhananjaya, long before I arrived here, I knew why the evil Duryodhana and the wretched Karna were coming here. They knew that you are exiles in the forest and that you suffer, as if you had no one to protect you. These vile men wanted to enjoy the sight of your adversity while they themselves are flush with prosperity. They came here to mock you and the chaste Draupadi.

The Lord Indra divined their purpose, too, and he said to me, "Go and bring Duryodhana to me in chains, along with his confederates. Always protect Dhananjaya and his brothers in battle, for Arjuna is your dear friend and disciple."

At the behest of the king of the Devas I came here at once. I have the unscrupulous prince in chains, and I will take this sinner now to Devaloka, to Devendra.'

Arjuna says, 'O Chitrasena, if you want to please me, set Suyodhana free, for this is the wish of my brother Yudhishtira Dharmaraja.'

Chitrasena says, 'This sinner is always full of vanity. He does not deserve to be released. Arjuna, he has deceived and wronged both Yudhishtira and Krishnaa. The Dharmaraja does not know why this wretch came here. Let the king do as he likes, but only after he knows everything.'

All of them go to Yudhishtira Dharmaraja and tell him about Duryodhana. Ajatasatru hears everything that the Gandharvas say and asks them to set the Kauravas free.

He says, 'How fortunate we are that you did not kill the son of Dhritarashtra and all his advisors and kin, though, with your powers you could easily have done so. O Gandharvas, you have done me a great kindness; you will restore the honour of my clan by releasing this evil man.

I am happy to see you. Command me; tell me what I can do for you. You can return to your home on high once you have what you wish.'

The Gandharvas are pleased with what the wise Pandava says and Chitrasena leads his Gandharvas and Apsaras home. The Lord of the Devas comes there and revives the Gandharvas that the Kauravas killed in battle by sprinkling divine amrita over them.

The Pandavas are gratified that they have freed their cousins, their other relatives and the women of the royal household. Those awesome Kshatriyas glow in splendour, like fires blazing in a yagnasala, as the Kurus, their wives and sons pay homage to them.

Yudhishtira then addresses Duryodhana in the midst of his brothers, saying affectionately, 'Child, never do such an imprudent thing again. Bhaarata, a rash man never achieves happiness. Kurunandana, may you and your brothers be blessed! Go back to your capital whenever you wish, without sorrow or despair.'

When the son of Pandu gives him leave to go, Duryodhana salutes Yudhishtira Dharmaraja and, his heart torn with shame, sets out woodenly for Hastinapura, like one whose very life has left him. After the Kaurava prince has gone, the Brahmanas adulate the noble Yudhishtira and his heroic brothers, even like the Devas worship Sakra; and surrounded by those Brahmanas rich in tapasyashakti, Yudhishtira passes his days contentedly in Dwaita vana."

Janamejaya said, "After his defeat and capture by the Gandharvas, and his rescue by the illustrious sons of Pandu, it seems to me that the entry into Hastinapura of the proud, evil, vicious, insolent Duryodhana, who so enjoyed insulting the Pandavas and bragging about his own superiority, must have been difficult. Describe it to me in detail, O Vaisampayana. How did that prince enter his city, overwhelmed as he was with shame and unmanned by grief?"

Vaisampayana said, "Dismissed by Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, Dhritarashtra's son Suyodhana bends his head in shame and, tormented by shame and melancholy, sets out slowly. He rides towards his city, accompanied by his four forces, his heart ruptured by sorrow and his mind filled with the memory of his defeat.

Along the way, in a place lush with grass and plentiful water, the king makes camp, with his elephants, horses, foot-soldiers and chariots.

Duryodhana is seated on a raised bedstead that is as magnificent as a burning fire, looking like the eclipsed moon, when, towards the small hours of the morning, Karna arrives there and says to him, 'Son of Gandhari, it is fortunate indeed that you are alive, and fortunate, too, that we meet again. It is by great fortune that you vanquished the Gandharvas, who can assume any form at will. And, Kurunandana, it is by good fortune alone that I see that your mighty brothers have vanquished their foes and emerged victorious.

As for myself, assailed by the Gandharvas, I fled before your very eyes and could not rally our terrified forces. My body mangled by enemy arrows, I sought safety. Bhaarata, I marvel at seeing all of you emerge safe and sound, with your wives, troops and chariots, out of that superhuman encounter.

No other man in this world could do what you, O king, with your brothers, have achieved in battle today.'

But Duryodhana replies to the king of the Angas in a voice choked with tears."

"Duryodhana says, 'O Radheya, you do not know what happened and so I am not upset by what you say. You think that it is with my prowess that I killed the hostile Gandharvas. Mahabaho, my brothers and I did indeed engage in a long battle with the sky-rangers. Both sides suffered heavy casualties. But when the Gandharvas took to the air with their magical powers and began to fight us from there, our contention became unequal. We were defeated and taken captive.

The Gandharvas took us, snared like animals in a net and in agony; they carried away our troops, our chariots, our wives and our children through the skies. It was then that some of our bold men went in despair to the sons of Pandu, those Kshatriyas that never refuse help to those that ask for it.

They said to the Pandavas, "Duryodhana, the son of Dhritarashtra, with his younger brothers, his friends and wives, has been captured and is being borne away through the sky by Gandharvas. Blessings be upon you! Liberate the king and the women of the royal household. Do not allow the royal ladies to be insulted."

When they said this, Pandu's eldest son, that virtuous soul, pacified his brothers and commanded them to free us. Those four bulls among men overtook the Gandharvas and asked them gently to release us, although they could have easily secured our freedom with their prodigious strength.

Though addressed in conciliatory words, the Gandharvas refused to release us. Then Arjuna, Bhima and the twins shot arrows at the sky-rangers, who abandoned the fight and fled through the sky, gleefully dragging us behind them in our stricken state. Immediately, we saw Dhananjaya spread a net of arrows all around and, at the same time, loose his Devastras at the enemy. Seeing all the horizon covered by Arjuna's arrowy net, Arjuna's friend, the Gandharva king, revealed himself.

Chitrasena and Arjuna embraced each other and enquired after each other's welfare. The other sons of Pandu also embraced the lord of the Gandharvas and were embraced by him in return, and warm and courteous civilities passed between them as well. The Gandharvas threw down their weapons and armour and mingled in friendship with the Pandavas. And Chitrasena and Dhananjaya lovingly worshipped each other.' "

"Duryodhana says, 'Arjuna smilingly said to Chitrasena, "Best of Gandharvas, you must release my brothers. They will not be humiliated as long as the sons of Pandu live."

O Karna, the lord of the Gandharvas then disclosed our reason for having gone there: that we went there to feast our eyes on the plight of the Pandavas and their wife.

When the Gandharva exposed us, I was so ashamed that I wished the earth would open and swallow me. The Gandharvas and the Pandavas went to Yudhishtira and, after telling him why we had gone there, handed us over to him. What greater sorrow could be mine than that I should be offered as a tribute to Yudhishtira in the very sight of the women of our household, bound in chains and miserable, a prisoner of my enemies. They that I have always maligned and tormented, to whom I have always been an enemy, released me and, wretch that I am, I owe them my life. It would have been far better to have died in battle than for my life to have been spared in this way. If the Gandharvas had killed me, my fame would have spread across the Earth and I would have attained eternal bliss in Indraloka.

Listen, O Manavarishabhas, to what I intend to do next. I will remain here, not eating, while you return home. Let all my brothers also go to Hastinapura; let all our friends, including Karna, and all our relatives led now by Dussasana return to the city of the elephant.

My enemies have shamed me, and I will not go to Hastinapura. I, who stripped my adversaries of honour, who always enhanced the esteem of my friends, have now become a source of shame to my own and one of joy to my enemies.

What will I say to the king if I go to Hastinapura? What will Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Drona's son, Vidura, Sanjaya, Bahuka, Somadatta and other revered elders say to me? What will the elders of the other varnas and the prominent men of independent professions say to me, and how will I answer them?

Until now, I have stood over the heads of my enemies and planted my feet on their breasts, but now I have fallen. How can I ever face or speak to them? Insolent men who become prosperous and gain knowledge and affluence are rarely blessed for long, even like me who was puffed up with vanity. Alas, folly led me to a vile path, and because of my foolishness, I have sunk to these depths.

And so, I will starve myself to death for my life has become unbearable. What man wants to drag out his days after he has been saved by his enemy? Proud as I am, my enemy stripped me of my dignity and laughed at me. The Pandavas have seen me plunged in wretchedness.'

Now Duryodhana turns to Dussasana, 'O Dussasana, listen to me. Bhaarata, be king in my place. Rule the earth, protected by Karna and Subala's son. Just as Indra looks after the Maruts, take care of your brothers in such a way that they will rest their faith and confidence in you. Let our friends and relatives depend on you, like the gods depend on him of the hundred yagnas.

Always bestow wealth on Brahmanas, promptly, and always be the refuge of your friends and family. As Vishnu looks after the Devas, you must look after all your relatives. You must always cherish your gurus. Go, rule the earth; gladden your friends and chastise your foes.'

And embracing Dussasana, Duryodhana says, 'Go!'

Dussasana is overwhelmed by sorrow when he hears this; his voice choked and with hands joined prayerfully, he bows his head and says to his elder brother, 'Relent.'

His heart so heavy, he falls on the ground; in searing grief, that tiger among men sheds tears on his brother's feet and says, 'Never! This will never be. The Earth may split, the vault of the Sky may shatter, the Sun may cast off his splendour, the Moon abandon his coolness, the Wind forsake his speed, Himavat may move from his place, the waters of the Ocean may dry up and Fire renounce his heat; but I, O king, will not rule the earth without you.'

Repeatedly saying, 'Relent, Rajan, you alone shall be king of our race for a hundred years', Dussasana weeps at the feet of his elder brother, whom he adores, O Bhaarata.

Seeing Dussasana and Duryodhana sobbing, Karna says to them, 'O Kuru princes, why do you give in to sorrow like children, like ordinary men? Crying can never ease a man's grief; what do you gain by giving way to sorrow? Summon patience; do not give your enemies cause to be joyful.

Suyodhana, the Pandavas only did their duty by freeing you. The subjects of a king must always do what is pleasing to the king. The Pandavas are living happily in your kingdom and under your protection. It is not fitting for you to indulge your anguish, like any common man. Look, how despondent your brothers are to hear that you want to put an end to your life. May you be blessed! Arise! Return to your city and console your brothers.'

"Karna says, 'O king, your conduct is immature. Kshatriya, what is so surprising in the Pandavas saving you when you were defeated by the enemy? Those that live in the dominions of a king, especially those who are warriors, must always do what is good for the king, whether their monarch knows them or not.

Often, Kshatriyas who raze the ranks of an enemy are finally vanquished by them, and are then rescued by their own troops. Warriors living in a king's realm should always unite and do their utmost for their king.

If the Pandavas, who live in your kingdom, freed you, why should you grieve? Indeed, that the Pandavas did not follow you when you went into battle is unforgivable. They live under your authority and have become your slaves. They are honour-bound to help you, who are brave and strong and never turn away from the field of battle.

You now own the Pandavas' wealth. They are still alive; they have not resolved to fast to their deaths!

Rise up, my king. It is not fitting for you to indulge in such despair for long. It is the bounden duty of everyone in the kingdom to do what is in the king's best interest. Where is the cause for distress in what happened?

If you do not do as I say, I will remain here by your side, worshipping your feet. Purusharishabha, I have no wish to live without you. If you decide to kill yourself by fasting, you will only become the laughing-stock of other kings.’

Even after hearing what Karna says, Duryodhana remains unmoved and does not stir from where he sits.”

Vaisampayana said, “Normally incapable of tolerating an insult, Duryodhana sits resolutely determined to fast to death, and seeing this, Subala’s son Sakuni consoles him.

Sakuni says, ‘Scion of the Kurus, you heard what Karna said. He speaks wisely. Why would you so foolishly throw away the enormous wealth I won for you by giving up your life today, Rajan, through this silliness?

It seems to me that you have never paid heed to what wise old men say. He who cannot control sudden occurrences of joy or sorrow is lost even though he may have prospered, even like an unfired earthen vessel filled with water. Subjects seldom respect the king who is destitute of courage, who has no spark of manliness, who is the slave of procrastination, who is indiscreet, or who is addicted to sensual pleasures.

With all the good fortune you enjoy, where does this unreasonable grief of yours spring from? Do not negate this graciousness of Pritha’s sons by indulging your grief. Why do you grieve, and reward the Pandavas, when you should be joyful? Ah, your behaviour is inconsistent. Be cheerful; do not throw your life away; instead, remember with a grateful heart the favour they have done you.

Return their kingdom to Pritha’s sons, and thereby win honour and fame. In that way, you can show your gratitude. Establish brotherly relations with the Pandavas, in friendship, and give them back their father’s kingdom. Then you will be happy!’

Hearing what Sakuni says, and seeing the valiant Dussasana lying prostrate before him, and overcome by fraternal love, the king raises Dussasana up and, clasping him in his mighty arms, sniffs his head in affection. Karna and Saubala's words move Duryodhana to shame, and utter dejection grips his soul.

Sorrowfully, he responds to his friends, 'I have no more need of virtue, wealth, friendship, affluence, sovereignty or pleasure. Do not try to move me; leave me, all of you. I am firmly resolved to fast to my death. Return to Hastina and pay your respects to our elders.'

They reply to that grinder of his foes, 'Whatever course you take, we shall, too, Bhaarata. How can we enter the city without you?'

Whatever his friends and advisors say to him, the king does not waver in his determination. Dhritarashtra's son spreads kusa grass on the ground, purifies himself with water and sits down. He casts away his royal robes, covers himself in rags and grass, and vows to observe Atikatora, the most difficult tapasya. Falling silent, that tiger among kings, his mind focused on Swarga, begins to pray, shutting out the outside world.

Meanwhile, the fierce Daityas and Danavas, whom the Devas defeated long ago, and who live in Patala, the nether realms, find out about Duryodhana's vow and, knowing that if he dies they will be immeasurably weakened, begin a yagna with fire, to fetch Duryodhana into their presence.

Demons, masters of dark mantras, using the methods declared by Brihaspati and Usanas, conduct rites prescribed in the Atharva Veda and the Upanishads. Brahmana Asuras of rigid vows, versed in the Vedas and their many branches, prayerfully pour libations of ghee and milk into the fire whilst chanting mantras. After those rituals have been completed, O king, a macabre and dreadful female spirit, with a yawning maw, rises from the sacrificial fire and asks to be commanded.

The Daityas command her, 'Bring the royal son of Dhritarashtra here from where he keeps a fast to end his life.' She vanishes, saying, So be it.

She goes in an instant to where Suyodhana sits, picks the king up bodily and carries him back to Patala, to the great Danavas. The Danavas see the king, who is brought into their midst in the night, and together they address Duryodhana with flattery, their hearts full of hope and their eyes wide with delight."

"The Danavas say, 'O Suyodhana, great king, perpetuator of the Bhaaratas, you are living in the company of heroic and illustrious men. Why have you sworn this harsh vow of fasting to the death? The man that commits suicide sinks into hell and everyone speaks ill of him. Intelligent men like you never commit such sins, which are contrary to their own interests and that strike at the very root of their purpose. Set aside your resolve: it is against dharma, destroys profit, happiness, fame, prowess and energy, and enhances the joy of your enemies.

Rajan, realise the truth of the divine origin of your soul and your body; summon patience to your aid.

Long ago, Maheswara gave you to us as a reward for our tapasya. Anagha, your upper body is composed entirely of thunder, Vajra, and is invulnerable to any weapon. The lower part of your body, which can captivate a woman's heart by its physical beauty, was made of flowers by Mahadeva's wife, the Devi herself. Best of kings, your body is the creation of Maheswara and his consort. Purushavyaghra, you are not of human origin, but celestial.

Other brave Kshatriyas of mighty energy, headed by Bhagadatta, all of whom have knowledge of Devastras, will kill your enemies. Let this grief of yours end now. You have no need to be afraid. There are countless heroic Danavas who have been born into the world with the sole purpose of helping you.

Other Asuras will insinuate themselves into the atmas of Bhishma, Drona, Karna and the rest. Possessed by them, these heroes will shed their dharma and fight your enemies. When the Danavas enter their hearts and possess them completely they will cast aside their compassion and, becoming savage and cruel, these warriors will strike down everybody who stands against them, not even sparing sons, brothers, fathers, friends, disciples, relatives, nor even children and old men. As destined by Brahma, ignorance and rage will drive these tigers among men. Their hearts steeped in sin, they will, O Kurusattama, depopulate the earth with all kinds of weapons, with manly prowess and strength, all the while boasting to their victims, You will not escape me with your life.

These are the men that the Pandavas, who are just five, will face. Vested with uncanny strength and favoured by Destiny, the Danavas will entirely destroy the sons of Pandu. Rajan, many Daityas and Rakshasas have been born as Kshatriyas, and they, too, will fight your enemies, with arrows, maces, swords, spears and astras as well.

As for the fear that rests in your heart because of Arjuna, we have already decided how to kill him. The atma of the slain Narakasura has assumed the form of Karna. In this form, he will remember his ancient hatred and he will kill both Krishna and Arjuna. This Maharatha and best of all warriors, who is proud of his ability, will vanquish Arjuna and all your enemies in battle.

Knowing all this and wanting to save Arjuna, Indra, the wielder of the Vajra, will disguise himself as a Brahmana and take from him Karna's kavacha and kundala, the golden armour and earrings that make Karna invincible.

Also, to this end we have sent hundreds of thousands of Daityas and Rakshasas into the world. They shall be known as Samsaptakas, and these inexorable warriors will slay the heroic Arjuna.

Therefore, Rajan, grieve not. You will rule the earth without a rival. Do not yield to despondency; it does not suit you. If you die, all our kind will be weakened. Come, Kshatriya, do not even think of anything other that annihilating your enemies. You are our refuge, in the same way that the Pandavas are the refuge of the Devas.'

The Daityas embrace that best of kings, and the Danavarishabhas, bulls among Danavas, cheer that irrepressible hero as if he is a son. Bhaarata, they steady his mind with soft words of deep enchantment and then allow him to leave, saying, 'Go and be victorious!'

The female spirit bears Duryodhana back to the place where he sat. She sets the Kshatriya down and pays him homage. Then she vanishes.

Bhaarata, when she has gone, Duryodhana reflects on all that has happened, as if it were a dream. He says within himself, 'I shall defeat the Pandavas in battle,' and convinced that Karna and the Samsaptaka legions will kill Arjuna, Dhritarashtra's evil son becomes strong with hope.

At this very hour, Karna is possessed by the soul of Narakasura and his heart hardens further in determination to kill Arjuna. The Samsaptakas, their souls taken by the Daityas, and under the control of fell influences, also become intent on slaying Phalguna. Bhishma, Drona and Kripa, they too possessed by the Danavas, lose their fondness for the Pandavas. And Suyodhana does not reveal what he now knows to anyone.

When the night has passed Suryaputra Karna says Duryodhana, with his palms folded in respect, 'A dead man never conquered his enemies. It is only alive that he achieves anything. Of what use is a dead man? O Kaurava, where is his victory? I say to you, this is no time for grief, or fear, or death.'

He embraces his beloved friend, 'Arise, O king! Why do you lie down? Why do you grieve, Parantapa? Having afflicted your adversaries with your strength, why do you wish for death? Does fear grip you at the sight of Arjuna? I promise you this: I will slay Dhananjaya in battle. Lord of men, I swear by my sacred bow that before the thirteen years are over, I will bring the sons of Pritha to their knees before you.'

When he hears what Karna says, he remembers the words of the Daityas, as well as the pleas of his brothers, and Suyodhana rises. The Demons' words have given this Purushavyaghra strength of resolve. He arrays his army, of vast numbers of horses, elephants, chariots and foot-soldiers. With great, royal white parasols, flags and white chamara whisks, with chariots, elephants and foot-soldiers, that army moves like the majestic Ganga, looking as glorious as the sky after the monsoon, when the clouds have dispersed and autumn has signalled its arrival.

Rajadhiraja, king of kings, Brahmanas bless Suyodhana to be victorious and sing his praises. Dhritarashtra's son leads his army, receiving the honour of uncountable hands joined in homage to him, flaming in splendour and flanked by Karna and that gambler Sakuni. All his brothers with Dussasana at their head, and Bhurisrava, and Somadatta, and the dauntless king Bahlika follow that lion among kings as he marches with a multitude of chariots, horses and the strongest, most massive elephants. Best of kings, shortly the Kauravas enter Hastinapura."

Janamejaya said, "What did sons of Dhritarashtra, those best of men, superb archers, do while the Pandavas lived in the forest? And how did Karna, Sakuni, Bhishma, Drona and Kripa occupy themselves during that time? Tell me all this."

Vaisampayana said, "O Maharajan, after the Pandavas have freed him, Suyodhana goes to Hastinapura, where Bhishma says to him in the Kuru sabha, 'Child, I told you when you were determined to go to the forest that I was not happy with your plan. You went anyway and you were taken captive by the Gandharvas and then rescued by the honourable Pandavas. Still, you are not ashamed.

O son of Gandhari, you saw how the Suta's son panicked and fled from the Gandharvas with your army. In your distress, you saw for yourself the prowess of the noble Pandavas, and also that of Karna, the sinful Sutaputra. Karna cannot measure up to a quarter of even one Pandava, be it in the Astra Shastra, in courage, or in dharma. For the weal of this house of Kuru, it is best you make peace with the Pandavas.'

Dhritarashtra's son laughs impudently at Bhishma and abruptly walks out with Sakuni. His brothers, mighty bowmen all, with Karna and Dussasana at their head follow Duryodhana, not knowing where he goes. Pitamaha Bhishma, the grandsire of the Kurus, hangs his head and retires sadly to his apartments.

After Bhishma has left, Dhritarashtra's son returns to the sabha and consults his advisors. He says, 'What is the best course for me to adopt? Is there something else I should do? Let us discuss how we can achieve what is best for us.'

Karna says, 'Duryodhana, take to heart what I am going to say. Bhishma always blames us and praises the Pandavas because he dislikes you. He hates me as well; he always insults me in your presence. I will never forget what Bhishma said to you, when he extolled the Pandavas and berated you, Parantapa. My king, give me command of your men, your armies and your chariots, and I will conquer the Earth with her mountains, woods and forests. It took four powerful Pandavas to subdue Bhumi, but I will do it single-handedly.

Let that dreg of the Kuru race, the evil-minded Bhishma, who reproves the innocent and praises the undeserving, witness my might and feel ashamed of himself. O Rajan, only command me; and victory will surely be yours. This I swear to you by my bow.'

Listening to Karna, Duryodhana is delighted and says to him, 'I am blessed with the wealth of your friendship! You are endowed with unrivalled strength and devoted to me. My life has borne fruit today. Go, O valiant one, and vanquish all my enemies as you intend. May good fortune follow you! Command me; what shall I do for you?'

Karna loses no time in gathering all that he needs for his expedition. Then, on a good day of the lunar calendar, at an opportune moment, and under the influence of a nakshatra presided over by an auspicious deity, he sets out. The Dvijas honour him, the Brahmanas pour auspicious and holy water over him in blessing, and all who are gathered sing his praises as he goes forward, filling the three worlds, its mobile and immovable beings, with the rumble of his chariot wheels."

Vaisampayana continued, "With a teeming army, Karna besieges Drupada's beautiful city. After a hard-fought battle, Karna quells Drupada, makes him surrender his gold, silver and jewels, and also makes him pay a tribute to Duryodhana. Once he has defeated Drupada, he goes on to subdue the vassal kings and extracts tribute from them as well.

He turns northwards and brings those kings under his sway. After defeating the unvanquished Bhagadatta, Radheya Karna climbs to the top of the colossal Himavat, crushing all whom he encounters on the way. He conquers all the kings living on the Himavat Mountain and makes them all pay him rich tributes.

Descending from the mountain and moving to the east, he subdues the Angas, and the Vangas, the Kalingas and the Shundikas, the Magadhas and the Karkakhandas, Avasiras, Yodhyas and the Ahikshatras. Having conquered all the east, Karna goes on to subdue Vatsabhumi, Kevala, Mrittikavati and Mohana; and Pattana, Tripura and Kosala, and forces tribute from them, as well.

He turns his attention to the south, where he vanquishes the Maharathas of those kingdoms. There, the Sutaputra encounters Rukmi.

After a dreadful battle, Rukmi says to Karna, 'Rajendra, foremost of kings, I am impressed by your strength. I will do you no wrong; I have only fulfilled Kshatriya dharma. I will gladly give you as many gold coins as you wish.'

Karna proceeds, then, to the Pandya kingdom and to the Mountain Sri. Defeating king Nila of Kerala, Venudari's son and other mighty kings of the southern kingdoms, he extracts tribute from all of them. The Sutaputra goes on to crush Sisupala's son, and brings all the neighbouring rulers under his dominion.

Bharatarishabha, he subjugates the Avantis and makes peace with them; he defeats the Vrishnis and conquers the west. He goes to the sea kingdoms of Varuna and makes the Yavana and Barbara kings pay him tribute.

Thus, the peerless Karna conquers all the kingdoms of the north, south, east and west. That hero single-handedly subdues all the Mlechcha nations, the mountain kingdoms, the Bhadras, the Rohitakas, the Agreyas and the Malavas. He defeats the mightiest chariot-warriors and the Sasakas and the Yavanas.

Having conquered the whole world, this Maharatha, Purushavyaghra Karna returns to Hastinapura.

Dhritarashtra's son, with his father and his brothers and friends, comes out of his gates and greets Karna; and he pays homage to the warrior crowned with victory. The king proclaims his feats and says, 'You have given me what no one else has, not even Bhishma, Drona, Kripa or Bahlika. May God bless you!

What need is there for lengthy speeches, when in you, Karna, Janeswara, god among men, I have my refuge? Mahabaho, Narapumgava, neither all the Pandavas nor any of the other prosperous kings measures up to a sixteenth of you. Karna, look on Dhritarashtra and the illustrious Gandhari as the Vajradhari does upon Aditi.'

A great uproar rises in the city of Hastinapura; a great clamour and cries of both Oh! and Alas! fill the air. Some of the kings praise Karna, while others censure him, and some say nothing.

In such short time, Karna has conquered the Earth, replete with her mountains, forests and skies, her oceans and islands, her fields, highlands and lowlands, and her cities. Lord of Earth, he has brought kings under his control and garnered endless wealth. Thus does the Suta's son present himself to the king and, entering the palace, the hero stands before Dhritarashtra and Gandhari. Karna, learned in dharma, takes Dhritarashtra's feet in his hands, as a son would; and Dhritarashtra embraces him affectionately before allowing him to leave.

From then on, Rajan, king Duryodhana and Subala’s son Sakuni consider that Pritha’s sons have already been defeated and slain by Karna.”

Vaisampayana said, "Lord of men, the Suta's son, slayer of hostile Kshatriyas, says to Duryodhana, 'Suyodhana, keep the words that I now say to you close to your heart, because, Parantapa, after having heard me, you must do as I say. I have rid the Earth of your enemies. Now rule her as Sakra does Devaloka after destroying his enemies.'

The king replies, 'Nothing is unattainable to him who has you at his side, to whom you are devoted and whose welfare you have at heart. I have a plan which I want you to hear. Listen.

Ever since I saw the Pandavas performing the wonderful Rajasuya yagna, I have wanted to celebrate that very yagna. You must make this wish come true.'

Karna says to the king, 'Now that you have conquered all the rulers of the Earth, you may summon the chief Brahmanas and, procuring whatever you need for the sacrifice, undertake it in glory, O Best of Kurus. Let the Ritwiks celebrate the Rajasuya yagna in accordance with the rules laid down in the Vedas. Begin your great yagna, Bharatarishabha; let it be grand, abounding in meat and drink, and indeed an abundance of all things rare and desirable.'

Duryodhana summons the priest and says to him, 'I want you to celebrate that greatest of sacrifices, the Rajasuya yagna, with abundant gifts.'

The Brahmanottama says to the king, 'Lord of the Kauravas, as long as Yudhishtira lives, this sacrifice cannot be performed in your clan. Furthermore, your father, too, is still living. Rajottama, you cannot undertake this yagna.

There is another great sacrifice that is similar, even equal to the Rajasuya. Perform that yagna, Rajan. Listen to me.

All the rulers of the Earth who have become your vassals will pay you tribute in gold, in various degrees of purity. Use that gold to make the sacrificial plough and, Bhaarata, plough the site for the yagnashala with it. There, with the proper rituals, and undisturbed, begin your sacrifice, Rajadhiraja. Sanctify it with mantras and serve all manner of delicious food in plenty.

This sacrifice, worthy of the most virtuous men, is called the Vaishnava. No one other than the ancient Vishnu himself has ever performed it before. This wondrous sacrifice compares with the Rajasuya. Moreover, it will prove most beneficial to you. You can celebrate it without any obstacles, and your desire will be fulfilled.'

When the Brahmanas say this, Dhritarashtra's son says to Karna, his brothers and Sakuni says, 'I like what the Brahmana says. Tell me if you also approve.'

They all say, 'Tathaastu, so be it'.

Duryodhana appoints his people, one by one, to various tasks; he arranges for artisans to make the sacrificial plough; and all that needs to be done is gradually accomplished."

Vaisampayana said, "All the sculptors, the chief advisors and the wise Vidura approach Dhritarashtra's son and say to him, 'The preparations for the great sacrifice are complete; the time is right, Bhaarata. The precious golden plough is ready.'

Duryodhana commands the commencement of that mahayagna. The Vaishnava yagna begins, sanctified by mantras, and with an abundance of food being served. The son of Gandhari is initiated as the sacrificer; and Vidura, Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Karna and Gandhari are happy indeed. Duryodhana sends swift messengers to invite Kshatriyas and Brahmanas from across Bharatavarsha and they go forth on fleet chariots with the king's invitation.

Then, to one of the messengers about to set out, Dussasana says, 'Go to Dwaita vana and invite the Brahmanas and the black-hearted Pandavas.'

That man comes to the hermitage beside the lake and, bowing to the Pandavas, says, 'Having acquired immense wealth through his prowess, the Kuru prince Duryodhana is performing a yagna. Kings and Brahmanas from all over the holy land will attend his great sacrifice. The noble Duryodhana has sent me to invite you. You must come to his Vaishnava mahayagna.'

Having heard the messenger out, that tiger among kings, Yudhishtira, says, 'It is fortunate that Suyodhana, the enhancer of his ancestors' glory, is performing this best of sacrifices. We would surely have come but we are bound by our vow for thirteen years.'

Bhima adds, 'Yudhishtira Dharmaraja will go there only when he can cast Duryodhana into the sacred fire that is kindled by weapons. Go and tell Suyodhana that when the thirteenth year is complete, that lord of men, the son of Pandu, will pour his anger as a libation over the sons of Dhritarashtra at the yagna of war. I will also come to that sacrifice in blood."

The other Pandavas, Rajan, say nothing unpleasant and, on his return, the messenger reports everything to Dhritarashtra's son.

Many lords of men, kings of countless countries and great and pure Brahmanas come to Dhritarashtra's city. All of them are pleased with the reception they receive in Hastinapura, with due ceremony. Dhritarashtra is surrounded by all the Kauravas and is at the pinnacle of his joy.

He says to Vidura, 'Kshatta, make haste and serve everyone who has come with food and delicacies, to their heart's content.'

The learned, honourable Vidura cheerfully entertains all the different people from various ranks in society with meat, rice and drink, after welcoming them with fragrant garlands and a variety of clothing. Opulent pavilions have already been raised to accommodate them. Duryodhana entertains thousands of his Sadasyas and Brahmanas and gives them all kinds of rich gifts, before he takes his leave of them and enters Hastinapura, surrounded by his brothers, and with Karna and Sakuni."

Vaisampayana said, "Duryodhana enters his city to the sound of eulogies being sung to his endless strength, his might as an archer and his fame as the greatest of kings. The citizens fling fried paddy over him, sprinkle him with sandalwood paste, and say, 'O king, it is by good fortune that you completed your sacrifice without facing any obstacles.'

Some that are bolder, more reckless and caring little for the consequences, say, 'Your sacrifice cannot be compared with Yudhishtira's; indeed, it does not measure up to a sixteenth part of that Rajasuya.'

His friends, however, say, 'Your yagna has surpassed all others. Yayati, Nahusha, Mandhata and Bharata, all performed this very yagna; they were purified and have all found Swarga.'

Hearing his friends' pleasing words, the king happily enters the city and goes to his palace, Bharatarishabha. There he worships the feet of his father and mother, and of others, like Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, and the wise Vidura. In turn, his younger brothers pay their reverences to him, and that giver of joy to his bothers sits on his throne, surrounded by them.

Karna stands and says, 'With good fortune, Bhaaratottama, you have completed your great yagna. I will honour you once again, as I do today, when you have killed Pritha's sons in battle and have performed the Rajasuya yagna.'

Dhritarashtra's mighty son replies, 'Well said, O Purushottama! When I have killed the lowly Pandavas, and when I celebrate the Rajasuya yagna, you shall, indeed, O Hero, honour me again.'

Saying this, the Kaurava embraces Karna and begins to dream about performing the Rajasuya, best of all yagnas. He declares to the assembled Kurus, 'Kauravas, when I have slain all the Pandavas, I shall celebrate that foremost of yagnas, the Rajasuya!'

Now Karna says to him, 'I vow, O most majestic of kings, that until I have killed Arjuna I will allow no one to wash my feet, nor will I eat meat. I will observe the Asura vrata: I swear that I will never refuse anything to anyone who asks.'

When Karna makes his vow to kill Arjuna in battle, those Maharathas and virile bowmen, the sons of Dhritarashtra, set up a loud cheer, almost as if that the Pandavas have already been killed. The magnificent Duryodhana leaves the others and goes to his apartment, like the Lord Kubera entering the garden of Chitraratha. Bhaarata, all the rest also return to their apartments.

Meanwhile, the Pandavas are distressed by what the messenger said. Then, some spies come and tell them of Karna's vow to kill Arjuna, and Yudhishtira is deeply troubled. Thinking of Karna of the impenetrable mail and of his superb prowess, he knows no peace. The Dharmaraja is full of anxiety and makes up his mind to leave Dwaita vana, emerald forest that teems with game and other creatures of the wild.

Meanwhile, Dhritarashtra's royal son rules the world with his brothers, and with Bhishma, Drona and Kripa, all with the support of Karna crowned in martial glory. Duryodhana bends his mind to the welfare of the kings of the earth. He worships Brahmanas by celebrating sacrifices and giving bountiful gifts; and occupies himself with promoting his brothers' welfare, in the firm conviction that the best use of wealth, its true joy, lies in sharing it."

MRIGASWAPNODBHAVA PARVA

Janamejaya said, "After saving Duryodhana's life, what did Pandu's mighty sons do in the forest? Tell me about them."

Vaisampayana said, "Once, as Yudhishtira lies asleep at night in the Dwaita vana, some deer, their voices choked with tears, appear in his dream. Their bodies tremble as they stand before him with their forelegs reverently folded.

Yudhishtira says to them, 'What do you want to say? Who are you? Tell me what you want.'

Those deer, which are the ones that remained after the herd had been slaughtered, reply, 'O Bhaarata, we are the deer left alive after the rest of our herd was killed. Soon, we will all be dead. We want you to move to another part of the forest. Great king, all your brothers are Kshatriyas, and skilled archers. They have thinned the ranks of our herd of forest-dwellers. The few remaining of us are left like seed, mighty one. By your grace and favour we can increase again.'

Seeing these deer, which remain like seed stock after a crop has been harvested, shaking in fear, Yudhishtira is grief-stricken. Always mindful of the welfare of all creatures, the king says to them, 'I will do as you say,' and wakes from his dream.

Moved to pity, he says to his brothers, 'The deer that remain alive after our slaughter of their herd came to me in my dream and told me that the few who remained were like the seed of a new herd. They blessed me and begged me to be compassionate to them. What they say is true. We ought to take pity on the animals of the forest. We have been feeding on them for a year and eight months.

Let us move to the charming Kamyaka vana, that most beautiful forest at the head of the desert near the lake Trinabindu. It has plenty of game and we can live there for the remainder of our exile, until we go into ajnatavasa for its final year.'

The Pandavas gather their spare belongings and, accompanied by the Brahmanas and all the others who live with them, with Indrasena and their other retainers following behind, they move the very next day. They go along roads where excellent corn and clear water are available to travellers, and at length see the sacred asrama of Kamyaka, steeped in the aura of tapasya. Surrounded by their excellent Brahmanas, the sons of Pandu enter the Kamyaka vana, much as pious men enter Swarga."

VRIHIDRAUNIKA PARVA

Vaisampayana continued, “The noble Pandavas live in the forests for eleven years, in poverty, Bharatarishabha. Although they deserve happiness, they pass their days in some misery, brooding on the circumstances that have overtaken them, and living on fruit and roots.

Rajarishi Yudhishtira thinks about the suffering his brothers endure, and remembering that all this is a result of his gambling, he cannot sleep. He feels as if his heart has been pierced with a lance. He remembers the harsh words of the Suta’s son, and repressing the venom of his wrath, he passes his time, outwardly calm, but in anguish all the time.

Arjuna, the twins, Draupadi and that strongest of all men, Bhima, are wracked with heartache when they look at Yudhishtira. Knowing that only a short time remains of their exile, and sustained by rage and hope, those bulls among men submit their bodies to the most rigorous and exacting discipline.

Some time elapses, and one day the great tapasvin, Satyavati’s son Vyasa, comes to the Pandavas. Seeing him approach, Yudhishtira goes to receive the Mahamuni reverentially. He bows down to Vyasa, pleasing him; and after the Rishi is seated, the self-retrained Yudhishtira sits down, waiting for the sage to speak. At the sight of his grandson emaciated and living on the wild produce of the forest, the Maharishi is moved to pity.

His voice choking, he says, ‘Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, those who do not perform rigorous tapasya do not attain happiness. Joy and sorrow come in turns; no man enjoys uninterrupted happiness. A wise man, knowing that life has its ups and downs, neither overly celebrates nor grieves. When happiness comes one should enjoy it and when misfortune comes, one should endure it, in much the same way as the farmer lives by the seasons.

Nothing is superior to tapasya; with tapasya one gains great rewards. Bhaarata, there is nothing that asceticism cannot achieve. Truth, sincerity, freedom from anger, justice, self-control, restraint of the mind, avoidance of malice, innocence, sanctity, and subduing of the senses: these purify a man whose deeds are pure.

Foolish ones addicted to vice and bestial ways merit birth as animals in the next life, and they are never happy. The fruit of what one does in this world is reaped in the next. Even so, one must discipline oneself by performing tapasya and keeping vratas.

Cheerfully and without ulterior motives, a man must give gifts that he can afford, after humbly paying his respects to the recipient. The man who always tells the truth gains a trouble free life; the man who has no anger attains sincerity; and one who is free from malice acquires supreme contentment.

The man who has subdued his senses and controls his mind never knows tribulation, nor does he feel envy or sorrow at another's prosperity. The man who gives everyone his due, and who bestows boons, attains felicity and possesses every object of enjoyment; the man free from envy reaps the reward of perfect health.

He who gives honour to one to whom it is due attains birth in an illustrious house; and he who has subdued his senses never sees misfortune. The man whose mind is inclined to good, after paying his debt to nature, is born again with a righteous mind.'

Yudhishtira says, 'O mighty Sage, which has greater benefits in the next world - giving gifts or performing tapasya? And which is more difficult?

Vyasa says, 'Child, there is nothing harder than giving charity. Men thirst for wealth, which is not easy to earn. Magnanimous one, brave men renounce comfort and go deep into the sea or the forest in order to acquire wealth. Some take to farming and cattle-rearing, and some become the servants of others. It is difficult to part with wealth that is obtained with such difficulty. Since nothing is harder to practise than charity; I think that bestowing a boon is superior to everything.

Especially bear in mind that hard-earned wealth should, in the proper time and place, be given away to pious men; but that the giving away of ill-gotten riches can never liberate the giver from the evil of rebirth.

It has been said, Yudhishtira, that by giving even a small gift in a spirit of pure-mindedness to a deserving person a man gains inexhaustible rewards in the next world. There is a story in this connection, about how Mudgala was rewarded for having given a bucket of vrihi, corn.' "

"Yudhishtira says, 'Why did that Brahmana give away a drona of vrihi? To whom and how did he give it? Tell me all this. I think of the life of a virtuous man as being worthwhile, whose conduct pleases Him of the six attributes who sees and knows everything.'

Vyasa says, 'Rajan, there lived in Kurukshetra a man of dharma named Mudgala. He was truthful, free from malice and had subdued his senses. He lived by the dictates of sila and unchha. Although he lived a life of pigeon-like frugality, that Mahatapasvin entertained his guests, celebrated the sacrifice called Ishtikrita and performed other rituals.

This sage, his wife and son ate during one fortnight and spent the next fortnight collecting a drona of corn, like a pigeon would. This innocent and guileless Rishi celebrated the Darsa and Paurnamasya yagnas and passed his days by taking the food that remained after the Devas and his guests had eaten.

On auspicious lunar days, Trilokapati Indra, accompanied by the celestials, would partake of the food offered at this sage's yagnas. And so, great king, this man lived the life of a Muni and cheerfully entertained his guests on such days. As that pure man happily gave away his food, what remained of the drona of corn increased with the arrival of each new guest!

By dint of the purity of soul with which Mudgala gave food, it increased so much that he fed hundreds of learned Brahmanas with it.

O king, it came to pass that Durvasa Muni heard of the virtuous, vrata-observing Mudgala. The half-naked sage, looking like a madman in his sparse, ragged clothing, his head hairless, came to Mudgala's kutila, Pandava, muttering all kinds of insults.

The Muni said rudely to the Brahmana, "Best of Brahmanas, I have come here in search of food!"

Mudgala said to the sage, "Welcome!" and offered the hunger-crazed ascetic water to wash his mouth and feet and, accustomed as he was to feeding his guests, placed excellent food before Durvasa.

The hungry Rishi frantically ate the food. Mudgala then gave him more and, having again eaten it all, Durvasa smeared his body with the unclean scraps and went away as abruptly as he had come.

He came again, in the same way, during the next season, and again ate all the food that Mudgala gave him. After Durvasa left, Mudgala, without having eaten anything himself, gathered corn, as prescribed by the unchcha vrata. Hunger did not shake his equanimity, nor did anger or guile; nor did a sense of degradation or agitation enter into the heart of that Brahmanottama who, with his son and wife, led the unchha way of life.

Durvasa appeared six times at Mudgala's asrama. Never was he able to detect even the slightest distress in Mudgala's heart; instead, he saw only joy.

Extremely pleased, the Muni said to Mudgala "There is not another being on earth as pure-hearted and charitable as you. Pangs of hunger drive away dharma and rob men of patience. The tongue, which loves delicacies, lures men towards them. Life is sustained by food and the mind is fickle and hard to control.

Dhyana consists of concentrating the mind and the senses. To renounce in a pure spirit something painfully earned is difficult indeed. Yet, pious one, you have achieved this.

In your company we feel grateful and happy. You possess self-restraint, fortitude, justice, control of body and mind, mercy and virtue. By what you have done, you have conquered all the worlds and gained admission into realms of beatitude. Even the Swargavasis proclaim the greatness of your daana. Most holy one, you will go to heaven in your own body."

Whilst the Muni Durvasa was speaking, a Devaduta appeared before Mudgala on a vimana yoked with swans and cranes, hung with a network of bells, scented with an unearthly fragrance and colourfully painted; and it had the power of going anywhere at will.

The divine messenger said to the Brahmana, “O Rishi, climb onto this chariot; you have earned the right by your deeds. You have attained the reward of your tapasya.”

The sage said, “Devaduta, please describe to me the attributes of those who live in Swarga. What are their austerities, and to what end do they practice them? What constitutes happiness in heaven? What sorrows are there? High-born men have declared that one has friendship with the pious by merely walking seven paces with them. Lord, I ask you these things in the spirit of that friendship. Tell me the truth, without hesitation. And tell me what is good for me. After I hear what you say, I will decide what to do,” ’ says Vyasa.”

"Vyasa continues, 'The messenger of the gods said, "Maha Muni, you are a simple man. Having been offered heavenly bliss, which brings great honour, you still deliberate like a person of little wisdom. The realms known as Swarga exist above. They tower high and have excellent paths that the chariots of the Devas traverse. Atheists, dishonest people, those that have not practised tapasya and those that have not performed great yagnas cannot go there. Only men of pure souls and subdued minds, who have their bodies and senses under control, who are free from malice, who are intent on the practice of charity, heroes and men with battle scars who have, with subdued minds and senses, performed the most worthy rites, attain these realms, O Brahmana, which are gained only by dharmic deeds, and where only the pious live.

Mudgala, in Swarga are myriads of exotic, resplendent worlds that bestow everything one can want, what the celestial beings—the Devas, the Sadhyas, the Viswas, the Maharishis, Yama, the Dharmas, the Gandharvas and the Apsaras—have. There is that monarch of mountains, golden Meru, extending over thirty-three thousand yojanas.

Mudgala, there are the sacred gardens of the Devas, Nandana the best of them, where the deserving enjoy themselves.

There is no hunger, no thirst, no weariness, no fear, or anything unpleasant or inauspicious in Swargaloka. Delightful perfumes pervade, delicious breezes waft and captivating sounds are everywhere, enchanting the heart. There is no grief, no old age, no effort and no regret. One attains this world as a reward for one's actions. People go there by virtue of their good deeds.

Everyone who lives there shines in splendour, and this, too, is because of their own karma, not because of anything their fathers or mothers have done. Here, there is neither sweat, nor any excrement nor urine, O Muni. There is no dust to soil one's garments; garlands, redolent with divine fragrance, never fade; and all their vimanas are like this one that I have brought.

Mighty sage, devoid of envy, grief, fatigue, ignorance and malice, men who have reached heaven live there in perfect happiness.

O bull among Munis, above this realm are others with superior celestial qualities. Of these, the beautiful and glorious realms of Brahma are the best. Brahmana, that is where Rishis go, who have been sanctified by the most meritorious deeds.

Beings named Ribhus live there; they are the gods of the gods. Their realms are supremely blessed and adored even by the Devas. These beings shine with their own lustre and bestow every object of desire. They do not suffer from the pangs that women might cause; they do not possess material wealth; and they are free from guile. Unlike the Devas, the Ribhus do not live on havis or amrita, yet their forms are so divine that they cannot be perceived by the senses.

These eternal gods of the Devas have no desire for happiness for happiness' sake, nor do they change at the completion of a revolution of a Kalpa. Indeed, they suffer no changes of age or decay. They feel neither happiness nor sorrow. Then how could they be affected by anger or hatred? Mudgala, the gods covet their state of supreme, blissful freedom, Moksha, that beings who have desires can never achieve.

There are thirty-three Ribhus. To their realms wise men go, after having observed the most excellent vratas or given charity according to the laws of dharma. You have succeeded in acquiring this state by your acts of charity; enjoy the glory of your merit.

Such, O Brahmana, is the bliss of Swarga, with all its worlds. I have described the blessings of heaven. Now let me tell you some of its drawbacks. While living in Swarga and enjoying the fruits of his good deeds, a man cannot perform more actions with a view to increasing his punya. He must first enjoy all the benefits that he has already accrued, until they are exhausted. The great shortcoming of Devaloka is that once a man's punya has run out, he will fall from there.

The fall of a person whose mind is soaked in bliss has to be counted as the greatest defect of Swarga. The discontent and sadness that result from a life less blissful than one has lived in the bright and blessed kingdom will be hard to bear. Those who are about to descend from Swarga have stunned minds and agitated emotions. As the garlands they wear are about to fade, fear begins to invade their hearts. These are terrible experiences, Mudgala, and extend even to Brahmaloka.

In Swarga, men who have earned their places there are godlike; their virtues cannot be counted. O Muni, yet when their punya karma is exhausted, they are born again as human beings. And in that form, they can acquire much fortune and happiness. However, if they are unable to acquire knowledge here, they devolve to bestial states.

The consequences of karma done in this world are felt in the next. This world has been ordained to be one of deeds; the other is one of fruit. Mudgala, I have described everything to you. Now, if it pleases you, we must go quickly." '

Vyasa continues, 'Mudgala began to think about everything the Devaduta had said. After some thought that best of Munis said to the divine messenger, "O Devaduta, I bow to you. Venerable one, depart in peace. I do not want to have anything to do with Swarga, which has great bliss from which one must inevitably fall. Those that enjoy heaven are doomed to suffer the deprivation of its joys.

I do not desire Swarga. I will strive for that enduring realm where you do not have to lament, or be troubled or agitated ever again, when you are there. You have told me of the great defect of Swarga. Now describe to me a realm that has none."

To that the divine messenger said, "Above the abode of Brahma, there is the supreme seat of Vishnu, pure, eternal and luminous, known as Parabrahman. It is not possible for those attached to material things to go there; nor can those who are arrogant, greedy and ignorant, or those who feel anger or envy. This place is only for those that are free from attachment, pride and conflicting emotions; those that have restrained their senses; and for those given to dhyana and yoga."

Hearing this, the Muni bade farewell to the Devaduta, and that sage continued living by the unchha code and, in time became perfectly content.

Praise and disapproval became equal to him; a brick, a stone and gold were equal in his eyes. With pure Gyana yoga, the Brahmana began to meditate, setting his soul on the path to Brahman. He gained the power of knowledge and understanding and did attain that supreme state of emancipation, Moksha, which is eternal.

Therefore, son of Kunti, you must not grieve. By your stern tapasya you will regain your flourishing kingdom. Sorrow and joy revolve around a man, like the points on a wheel turning on its axle. When the thirteenth year of your exile has ended, you will get back the kingdom that was yours, and your father's and grandfather's before that. So, cool the fever of your heart.'

Saying this to Yudhishtira, the Muni Vyasa returns to his asrama and to his relentless tapasya."

DRAUPADI HARANA PARVA

Janamejaya said, "While the Pandavas live in the forest, enjoying the company of the Munis, sharing the ambrosial food they got from the Sun's platter and various kinds of venison with the Brahmanas and others who came to them for food all day until it was time for Krishnaa's meal, what did Duryodhana and his sinful brothers, advised by Dussasana, Karna and Sakuni, have to do with them? Worshipful one, tell me about this."

Vaisampayana said, "Great king, when Duryodhana hears that the Pandavas are living as happily in the vana as in a city, he, Karna, Dussasana and the others long to do them harm. While those malignant men hatch evil schemes, the celebrated Durvasa arrives in Hastinapura with ten thousand sishyas. Duryodhana and his brothers welcome the choleric sage with great humility, self-abasement and gentleness, and Duryodhana personally waits upon the Rishi, as a servant would. The illustrious Muni stays there for a few days and, fearing his curses, Duryodhana attends on him day and night.

At times, Durvasa says, 'I am hungry, O king; give me food at once.' At others, he goes for a bath, returns late, says, 'I do not want to eat anything today; I am not hungry,' and vanishes. Sometimes he appears suddenly and asks for food. At others, he wakes at midnight and demands fresh food to be prepared at that hour; then he complains about it and does not touch it. In this way, he tries the prince and, finding that Duryodhana does not get angry or annoyed, he turns kindly towards him.

Then, Bhaarata, the intractable Durvasa says to Duryodhana, ‘I have the power to grant you boons. Ask me for whatever is closest to your heart. May you be blessed! I am pleased with you, and I will give you anything I can, as long as I don’t break dharma.’

Hearing the great ascetic, Suyodhana’s spirit fills with new vigour. Karna, Dussasana and he have already decided what boon he should ask for if the Muni is sufficiently pleased to grant him one.

The evil prince says to Durvasa, ‘Yudhishtira is the eldest and the best of our clan. That dharmatma now lives in the forest with his brothers. You must go there with your disciples, as a guest, as you came here to us. The favour I ask is that you arrive when their lovely wife, the famed Panchali, lies down to rest after having served the Brahmanas and her husbands, and after she has eaten her own meal.’

The Rishi replies, ‘I will do as you wish,’ and goes away in much the same way as he came.

Suyodhana thinks that he has achieved what he wanted; and happily he clasps Karna’s hand.

Karna, too, is pleased and says to the king, who is with his brothers, ‘By singular good fortune, you have got all that you wanted. It is fortunate, too, that your enemies, struggling to stay afloat on a sea of danger, have to face the fire of Durvasa’s anger. They have fallen into a dark abyss.’

Rajan, Duryodhana and others return to their respective homes, full of vile delight.”

Vaisampayana said, "One day, having made sure that the Pandavas are all lounging relaxed and that Krishnaa is resting after her meal, the Maharishi Durvasa, with ten thousand sishyas, arrives in that forest and the Pandavas' asrama. The noble Yudhishtira sees that a guest has come and goes with his brothers to receive him. Joining his hands together in worship and offering the sage a comfortable seat, he welcomes him respectfully.

The king says to the sage, 'Venerable one, perform your nitya karma and come back soon, while we prepare a meal for you.'

With his disciples, the Muni goes to bathe in the nearby river, wondering how the king will be able to provide food for them all. Meanwhile, Rajan, the lovely Draupadi, ever devoted to her husbands, is stricken by fear; she has eaten and does not know how she will feed the Munis. She knows that there is no earthly way in which she can provide Durvasa and his sishyas with a feast, and she prays in her mind to Krishna, the slayer of Kamsa. The princess says, 'Krishna, Krishna, Mahabaho, Devakinandana, whose power is inexhaustible; Vasudeva, Lord of the Universe, who wipes away the tribulations of those that worship you; you are the soul, the creator and the destroyer of the Universe. O Lord, you are eternal; you are the saviour of the afflicted.

You are the preserver of the Universe and of all created beings; you are the guardian of cows. You are the highest of the high, and the wellspring of the mind's activities—akuti and chitti. O supreme and infinite One, giver of all good, you are the refuge of the helpless. Primordial Being, you cannot be perceived by the soul, the mind, or in any other way. You are the ruler of all and the Lord of all. I seek your protection.

Mahaprabhu, you are always compassionate to those that take refuge in you. Be kind to me, take care of me. You, of the complexion as dark as the leaves of the blue lotus, and of eyes as red as the corolla of the lily; Pitambara, clad in yellow, adorned with the bright jewel Kaustubha—you are the beginning and the end of creation, and the sanctuary of all.

You are the supreme light and essence of the Universe. Your face is turned in all directions at once. You are called the supreme seed and the storehouse of all treasures. With your grace, O Devadeva, all evils lose their terror. You protected me before from Dussasana; save me now from this terror.'

Thus adored by Panchali, Krishna of the mysterious ways, who is always kind to his bhaktas, leaves Rukmini's side, and instantly appears before the Pandavas' queen. Draupadi gasps, bows down to him in great joy and tells him about the arrival of Durvasa.

Krishna says to her, 'I am very hungry. Give me some food, and then carry on with your chores.'

Draupadi replies, 'The vessel that Surya Deva gave me remains full until I finish my meal. But I have already eaten, and it is empty now.'

The lotus-eyed Avatara says to her, 'Krishnaa, I am starving. Bring the Sun's vessel and show it to me.'

Krishnaa doubtfully brings the vessel to him, and he sees in it a shred of rice and vegetable, stuck to the rim. He swallows that morsel and says to her, 'May the Lord Hari, the soul of the Universe, that God that shares in every sacrifice, be satiated with this!'

Krishna, remover of misery, turns to Bhimasena, 'Hurry, call the sages to dinner.'

Rajan, Bhimasena sets out for the cool, transparent river where Durvasa and the others have gone to perform their ablutions. These ascetics have entered the river and, as they scrub their bodies, they suddenly find that their stomachs feel full to bursting. Coming out of the lucid water, they look at one another. They turn to Durvasa and say, 'We have come here for our baths, having told the king to prepare a meal for us. But, O Dvijottama, we cannot eat a thing now because our bellies are full. The feast that has been prepared will go waste. What shall we do?'

Durvasa says, 'By arriving unannounced and making him prepare food that will be not be eaten, we have done a great wrong to Rajarishi Yudhishtira. The Pandavas might well burn us with the fire from their eyes. I know that Yudhishtira has immense tapasyashakti. Brahmanas, I am afraid of men that are devoted to Hari. The noble Pandavas all devout men, learned, warlike, diligent in tapasya and every religious observance, all of them devoted to Vasudeva. They follow dharma punctiliously. If provoked, they can consume us with their anger, as fire would a bale of cotton. My sishyas, you must all flee from here without returning to their asrama.'

The disciples waste no time but run in all directions, and Durvasa with them.

Not finding the sages in the river, Bhima searches for them everywhere, at all the landings. He discovers from other ascetics in the forest that they have fled, and he goes back and informs Yudhishtira. The Pandavas, of the subdued senses, continue to wait for a while, expecting the sages to return.

Then, Yudhishtira says, 'The Rishis will trick us by coming in the middle of the night. What is our way out of this plight fate has landed us in?'

While they are absorbed in such dismal thoughts and sighing frequently with long, deep breaths, Krishna suddenly appears before them and says with a smile, 'Sons of Pritha, Draupadi knew of the danger you were in from the possible wrath of the Rishi and called me in her mind. So, here I am, speedily arrived.

Now you have no need to fear Rishi Durvasa. Afraid of your ascetic powers, he made himself scarce some time ago. Good men never suffer. I beg your leave to let me return home. May you always prosper!'

His words reassure Pritha's sons and Draupadi, and their fever of anxiety leaves them. They say to him, 'Just as people who are drowning in the ocean reach the safety of the shore in a ship, we have, Lord Govinda, escaped from our danger through you. Go in peace, and may prosperity be yours.'

Krishna goes back to Dwaraka, and the Pandavas, wandering from forest to forest, pass their days happily with Draupadi. Rajan, this is the story you asked me to tell you, and this is how the evil plot of Dhritarashtra's son fails."

Vaisampayana said, "Those great Kuru warriors wander about and hunt, like Devas, in the deer-rich forest of Kamyaka, gratified by the sights of deep and vast wilderness and broad swathes of woodland resonant with flowers in bloom. The sons of Pandu, each like an Indra, and each the terror of his enemies, remain in that vana for some time.

One day, when they go out in search of game, they leave Draupadi alone in the asrama, with the permission of Maharishi Trinabindu, resplendent with tapasyashakti, and of their spiritual mentor Dhaumya.

At this very time, the king of Sindhu, the son of Vriddhakshatra is on his way to the kingdom of Salva, to be married. He wears his best princely attire and is accompanied by many princes. He stops in the Kamyaka vana, and in that secluded hermitage, comes upon the beautiful Draupadi, standing at the threshold of the Pandavas' asrama.

She is splendid in her beauty and seems to light up the woodland with lustre, as lightning illuminates dark clouds. Those who see her ask themselves, 'Is this an Apsara, or a daughter of the Devas, or some other divine spirit?' and gaze at her perfect and faultless beauty, their hands joined in stunned reverence.

Jayadratha, the king of Sindhu, is struck through by her beauty, and lust ingites in his mind. Inflamed with desire, he says to the prince Kotika, 'Whose is this perfect woman? Is she human? I have no need of my marriage if I can have this lovely creature. I will take her back home with me. O, find out who she is and where she comes from, and also why this exquisite, most delicate one is in this forest.

Will this ornament of womankind, this beauty with the slender waist, who has lovely teeth and big eyes, take me for her lord? I will think of my life as being complete in every way if I win the hand of this devi. Go, Kotika, and ask who her husband is.'

Kotika, wearing one kundala, jumps down from his chariot and goes up to Panchali, just as a jackal approaches a tigress, and speaks to her."

"Kotika says, 'Most beautiful one, who are you, standing alone in this hermitage, leaning against a kadamba tree and holding onto one of its branches, and blazing like a night fire fanned by the wind? O incomparable one, how is it that you are not afraid to be in the forest?

Surely, you are a Devi, a Yakshi, a Danavi, an Apsara or the wife of a Daitya, a daughter of the Naga king or a Rakshasi, the wife of Varuna or Yama or Soma or Kubera. You must have taken human form to wander in these forests. Or, have you come from the heavenly palace of Dhatri, Vidhatri, Savitri, Vibhu or Sakra?

You do not ask us who we are, nor do we know who protects you here. Respectfully we ask you, devi, who is your father, and tell us the names of your husband, your clan and your family. Tell us also what you are doing here.

I am king Suratha's son and my name is Kotika. That man, with eyes as large as lotus petals, sitting on the golden chariot, and looking like sacrificial fire on an altar, is the warrior Kshemankara, king of Trigarta. The man who stands behind him and gazes at you is the famous son of the king of Kulinda. He is armed with a mighty bow, has large eyes and is adorned with flower garlands. He always lives in the mountains. The dark and handsome young man, the scourge of his enemies, standing at the edge of that tank, is the son of Subala of the Ikshvaku dynasty.

And if, devi, you have ever heard the name of Jayadratha, king of Sauviras, he is here, leading six thousand chariots, horses, elephants and footsoldiers, and followed by twelve Sauvira princes as his standard-bearers, whose names are Angaraka, Kunjara, Guptaka, Satrunjaya, Sanjaya, Supravriddha, Bhayankara, Bhramara, Ravi, Sura, Pratapa and Kuhana. They are all mounted on chariots drawn by chestnut steeds, and all of them blaze in splendour, like sacrificial fires.

The brothers of the king, the mighty Balahaka, Anika, Vidarana and others, are among his followers. These noble youths are the flowers of the Sauvira chivalry. The king travels among his friends, like Indra surrounded by the Maruts.

O you of the beautiful hair, who was unknowing of this, tell us whose wife and daughter you are.' "

Vaisampayana said, “Thus addressed by that ornament of Sibi’s race, the princess Panchali looked at him gently and, letting go of the kadamba branch and arranging her apparel, says, ‘I am aware, O prince, that it is not proper for one like me to speak to you, but there is no other man or woman here just now to convey my words. I will speak, respected one, but understand that I am aware that, being alone, I do remember the proper way for a woman to conduct herself and that I should not talk to you.

Prince of the Sibis, I know now that you are Suratha’s son Kotika. So, I will tell you of my lineage and my kin. I am the daughter of king Drupada, and my name is Krishnaa. I have five men for my husbands, of whom you might have heard while they were living at Khandavaprastha. Those Manavottamas are Yudhishtira, Bhimasena, Arjuna and the two sons of Madri.

They have left me here and gone hunting, each in a different direction. The king has gone to the east, Bhimasena south, Arjuna to the west and Nakula and Sahadeva towards the north.

Dismiss your carriages; wait here until they come back so that they can welcome you properly. Yudhishtira Dharmaputra likes having guests and will be happy to see you.’

And Draupadi, of the face as radiant as the moon, goes into her kutila, thinking fondly of her husband’s hospitable nature.”

Vaisampayana said, "O Bhaarata, Kotika tells the other waiting princes of his conversation with Krishnaa.

Jayadratha hears this and says to the Sibi hero, 'I have only heard what she said and already my heart is full of love for this jewel among women. Why have you returned without carrying out your mission? Mahabaho, now that I have seen her, other women seem like monkeys. She has captured my heart. Tell me, Saibya, is this woman a human being?'

Kotika replies, 'She is the famed princess Krishnaa, the daughter of Drupada, and the celebrated wife of the five sons of Pandu. She is the greatly respected, beloved and chaste wife of Kunti's sons. Take her away with you to Sauvira.'

The evil Jayadratha, king of Sindhu, Sauvira and other lands, needs no further encouragement, and saying, 'I must see Draupadi,' enters the asrama with six of his men, like a wolf going into a lion's den.

He says to Krishnaa, 'Greetings, devi. Are your husbands well, whose well-being you always wish for?'

Draupadi replies, 'Kaunteya Yudhishtira of the Kurus, his brothers, I, and all those you ask about, are well. Is all well with your kingdom, your treasury and your army? Do you, as king, rule justly over Saibya, Sibi, Sindhu and your other dominions? O Kshatriya, accept this water to wash your feet, and this seat. Accept these fifty animals for your entourage's breakfast. In addition, Kuntiputra Yudhishtira will give you tusked deer, nanku deer, doe and antelope, sarabhas and rabbits, rurus, bear, sambara and gayal. He will give you wild boar, buffalo and other four-legged animals as well.'

Jayadratha says, 'All is well with me. Your offer of food is as good as having eaten it already. Come! Ride in my chariot and be perfectly happy. It is not fitting that you should still bear any love for the miserable sons of Pritha. They live in the jungle; they are powerless and impotent; they have lost their kingdom; and they are at the lowest ebb of their lives.

A sensible woman does not attach herself to an impoverished, destitute husband. She should follow her lord when he is prosperous but leave him in adversity. The sons of Pandu have lost their prosperity for ever. There is no need for you to share their hardships.

O you of the flaring hips, leave Pandu's sons; be my wife and share the kingdoms of Sindhu and Sauvira with me.'

Hearing the king of Sindhu, Krishnaa turns away, her eyes troubled. Contemptuously ignoring his lustful offer, she of the slender waist rebukes the king of Sindhu. 'Do not dare to speak to me like that again. Are you not ashamed? Be careful.'

And Krishnaa of the blemishless character, anxiously awaiting her husbands' return, begins to speak at length in order to keep Jayadratha at bay."

Vaisampayana continued, "Drupadi's lovely face is flushed in anger. Her eyes are inflamed and her brows contract in fury as she speaks to the lord of Sauvira.

She says, 'Are you not ashamed, fool, to speak so insultingly of those Kshatriyas, each of whom is like Indra himself, who are all true to their dharma, and who never waver in battle even if it be against hosts of Yakshas and Rakshasas? O Sauvira, good men never speak ill of the learned, who are devoted to austerities and blessed with wisdom, regardless of whether they live in forest huts or in great palaces, but only sinful wretches like you.

I do not think there is anyone among the Kshatriyas here who can save you from falling into the pit you dig for yourself under your very feet. You have as much hope of vanquishing Yudhishtira Dharmaraja as of separating from his herd a mammoth leader of elephants in the Himalayas, the juice of musth trickling from his temples, with a stick in your hand. Childish folly prods you to awaken a mighty sleeping lion to pluck the whiskers from his face.

You will run when you see Bhimasena in a rage. Courting a fight with the furious Jishnu will be like kicking a powerful, ferocious lion asleep in a mountain cave and waking him. Contention with the two superb youths, the youngest Pandavas, is the act of the fool who knowingly stamps on the tails of two venomous black, fork-tongued cobras. The bamboo, the reed and the plantain bear fruit once and die. The crab, too, conceives young ones whose birth destroys her. So do you dare try to lay your hands on me, whom these great Kshatriyas protect.'

Jayadratha says, 'I know all this, Krishnaa, and I am aware of the prowess of those princes, but you cannot frighten me with your threats. We, too, are born into the seventeen noble clans and are endowed with the six royal qualities. In fact, we look down on the Pandavas as our inferiors! So, Draupadi, do not waste time, but ride this elephant or this chariot; mere words cannot stop us from taking you. Talk less boastfully and throw yourself at the mercy of the king of the Sauviras.'

Draupadi says, 'Why does the king of the Sauviras not take my power seriously? I do will not demean myself before you, out of fear. Even Indra himself cannot abduct her who is protected by Krishna and Arjuna, who would follow her together in the same chariot. What more can I say of a mere man's chances!

When Arjuna Kiriti cleaves your legions in his chariot, he will strike terror into every heart and consume everything around him like fire burning a stack of dry grass in summer. The warlike Andhaka and Vrishni princes, with Janardana at their head, and the mighty Kaikeya bowmen will follow me tirelessly. Dhananjaya's fearsome arrows, shot from the Gandiva and propelled by his powerful arms, will fly at you, roaring like thunder.

When you face Arjuna shooting dense locust-swarms of arrows from his Gandiva, you will repent this folly of yours. Imagine how you will feel when, armed with the Gandiva and blowing his conch, his gloved hands making his bowstring thrum, he pierces your breast again and again with his arrows. When Bhima rushes at you with his mace, and the two sons of Madri range in all directions, spewing the venom of their wrath, you will feel pangs of untold regret for daring to accost me like this.

I vow by my faithfulness to my husbands that I will have the pleasure of seeing Pritha's sons crush you in battle and drag you along the ground. Cruel as you are, you cannot frighten me by forcefully seizing me, because those Kuru warriors will bring me back to the Kamyaka vana as soon as they see me.'

Then the devi of the large eyes, realising that they are about to seize her, cries, 'Do not sully me with your touch!' In panic, she calls out to Dhaumya.

Darting forward, Jayadratha seizes her upper garment, but she pushes him away violently, so that sinner falls to the ground, like a tree severed from its roots. But he takes hold of her once again, while she pants in fear. Even as she clings to Dhaumya's feet, Jayadratha drags Krishnaa on to his chariot.

Dhaumya says, 'Jayadratha, take heed of the ancient dharma of the Kshatriya. You cannot carry her off without first defeating her husbands in battle. You will reap the painful fruit of your despicable deed when you meet the sons of Pandu with Yudhishtira Dharmaraja at their head.'

Dhaumya says this and, entering into the massed ranks of Jayadratha's footsoldiers, follows the princess as she is borne away by her abductor."

Vaisampayana said, "Meanwhile, having gone in separate directions, and each having killed many deer, bear and buffalo, the Pandavas meet in that same mighty forest, crowded with deer, which suddenly echoes with the ominous calls of birds and the cries of other wild creatures, as if some great danger threatens.

Yudhishtira says to his brothers, 'These birds that fly into the sunlight shriek harshly and the other wild beasts seem agitated. I feel certain that there are hostile intruders in the jungle. We must not waste a moment but find them. We have enough game.

My heart clenches in fear and my soul wants to fly out of my body. The Kamyaka vana seems strangely bereft, almost like the lake which Garuda rid of the snake that lived in it, like a pot that thirsty men have drained of water, like a kingdom that has lost its king and prosperity.'

Those Kshatriyas ride towards their asrama in their chariots drawn by hurricane-swift Saindharva horses. As they fly back they see a jackal howling hideously to their left.

Yudhishtira looks intently at it and says to Bhima and Dhananjaya, 'This jackal belongs to a lowly species. It is an evil omen that it is on our left, and howling. Ah, the Kaurava sinners are surely here and bent on doing us some great harm.'

The sons of Pandu enter the grove where their asrama is situated. Here they find their beloved's maid Dhatreyika sobbing piteously.

Indrasena leaps down from the chariot and anxiously questions her, 'Why are you lying on the groung and crying? Why is your face so sad and pale? I pray that no evil has befallen princess Draupadi, who is the very soul of the Pandavas? Dharmaputra is so distraught that if the princess has entered the bowels of the earth or flown into heaven, or dived to the bottom of the ocean, he and his brothers will follow her there.

What fool would dare abduct that priceless jewel of these Parantapas, to whom her life is as dear as their own? Who would think of carrying away this princess who has such awesome protectors, and who is like an embodiment of the Pandavas' hearts? The breast of the man that has done this will be pierced by dreadful arrows today.

Do not weep for her, timid girl; Krishnaa will return this very day, and the sons of Pritha will again be united with Yagnaseni after killing their enemies!'

Dhatreyika wipes her face and says to the sarathy Indrasena, 'With no regard for the five Indra-like sons of Pandu, Jayadratha has carried Krishnaa away. The traces of his tracks have not yet been covered over, because the tree branches he broke on his wild way have not yet dried. Turn your chariots around and follow her; the princess cannot have gone far.

O Kshatriyas mighty as Indra, arm yourselves with your glorious bows, take up your quivers and hurry after her, before, overpowered by threats or violence and losing heart and courage, she gives herself up to an undeserving sinner as wastefully as sanctified libations poured onto a pile of ashes.

O, see that the ghee is not poured into paddy husks that will not catch; see that the vanamala is not cast away in a cemetery. O, take care that the Soma rasa of a yagna is not licked up by a dog through the carelessness of the officiating priests; let not the lily be recklessly torn up by a jackal searching for its prey in the thick forest. O, let no man, like a dog licking the ghee in the sacrificial pot, touch with his lips the perfect face of your wife, who is as lovely as moonbeams. Oh, go swiftly after her and do not let time steal a march on you!'

Yudhishtira says, 'Go away, woman; control your tongue. Do not speak thus before us. King or prince, whoever he is, drunk with power, will come to grief.'

And they go forth, following the trail pointed out to them, frequently giving vent to deep sighs that sound like the hissing of snakes, and twanging the strings of their great bows. In time, they see a cloud of dust that the horses of Jayadratha's army raise; and they see Dhaumya in the midst of the abductor's footsoldiers, crying out to Bhima to ride more swiftly.

The exhilarated Pandavas tell Dhaumya to take heart and return to the asrama. They charge the enemy in fury, like hawks swooping down on their prey. And they, who are like Indra himself, are filled with rage at the insult to Draupadi, and the sight of Jayadratha sitting smugly in his chariot with their beloved queen fans the flames of their fury.

And those mighty bowmen—Bhima, Dhananjaya, the twins and the king—roar at Jayadratha to stop; the enemy legions are panic-stricken."

Vaisampayana said, "Enraged at the sight of Bhimasena and Arjuna, the enemy Kshatriyas roar aloud in the forest. The evil Jayadratha sees the flags of those bulls of the Kurus and says to Yagnaseni, 'Krishnaa, I believe these five great warriors that come towards us are your husbands. You know the sons of Pandu well, so, O you of the lovely tresses, describe them one by one and point out which one rides each chariot.

Draupadi replies, 'Having done me such violence that is sure to shorten your life, of what use is it to you now to know who is who? Foolish man, my husbands have come, and none of you will be left alive. But since you are about to die, I will tell you about them. I see Yudhishtira Dharmaraja and his younger brothers and I am not afraid any longer.

That warrior, on whose flagstaff are two beautiful and melodious mridangams called Nanda and Upananda, that sound constantly, is one who knows his svadharma well. God and successful men always walk in his footsteps. With golden skin, a prominent nose and large eyes, that slim man is my husband Yudhishtira, the son of Dharma. He is the best of the Kurus, and grants life to the enemy who surrenders. So, foolish one, throw down your weapons, fold your hands to him and surrender yourself into his protection.

That other man you see, long-armed and as tall as a full-grown sala tree, who sits on his chariot, biting his lips and frowning, is my husband Vrikodara. Steeds of the noblest pedigree, powerfully built and well-trained, draw his chariot. His feats are superhuman, and he is known as Bhima. Anyone who offends him does not live. He never forgets an enemy and, on some pretext, he will exact bloody vengeance, and remain dissatisfied even after.

That greatest of bowmen you see there, of great intelligence and fame, who has his senses under complete control, who worships his elder brother Yudhishtira, and is his disciple, is my husband Arjuna. He never forsakes dharma, not from lust, not from fear or anger. He is never cruel. His energy is like fire, and he can withstand every enemy. That parantapa is also Kunti's son.

The youth you see, who is versed in every aspect of dharma and artha, who dispels the fear of the frightened, who is wise, and who is the most handsome of all men on earth, is utterly devoted to his brothers. Dearer to them than their own lives, the other sons of Pandu protect him. He is my husband Nakula. This intelligent and wise man, whose twin is Sahadeva, is dexterous with his sword, and you, foolish one, will see his skills in battle. He will be among you like Indra among the Daityas.

And that fifth Kshatriya, a master of the Astra Shastra, also brilliant and wise, always intent on pleasing Yudhishtira Dharmaputra in all that he does, the youngest of the Pandavas and their favourite, is my husband Sahadeva. Heroic, brilliant, sagacious and quick-tempered, there is not another man as intelligent or as eloquent as he is. He is dearer to Kunti than her own soul; he is always conscious of Kshatriya dharma; and he would sooner jump into a fire or sacrifice his own life than say or do anything that is dishonourable or sinful.

When the sons of Pandu have killed your warriors in battle, you will see your army in the same plight as a ship laden with a cargo of jewels wrecked at sea by a whale. You have acted rashly with little regard for the prowess of the Pandavas. If you escape from them alive, you will indeed have been blessed.'

The five sons of Pritha, each like Indra, are filled with rage. Sparing the panic-stricken infantry who beg them for mercy, they charge the charioteers, attacking them from all sides and darkening the air with barrages of arrows."

Vaisampayana continued, "The king of Sindhu issues commands to the princes who are with him, crying Halt! Strike! and so on. When they see Bhima, Arjuna and the twins with Yudhishtira, the soldiers send up a loud clamour on the field of battle, and the Sibi, Sauvira and Sindhu warriors quail at the sight of these Kshatriyas who look like ferocious tigers.

Armed with a mace made entirely of Saikya iron and embossed with gold, Bhimasena rushes towards the doomed Sindhu king. But Kotikasya deftly surrounds Vrikodara with a formation of Maharathas, effectively separating him from his quarry. Bhima is assailed with countless spears, clubs and arrows but he does not waver for a moment. Instead, with his mace, he kills an elephant, its mahout and fourteen foot-soldiers in front of Jayadratha's chariot.

Arjuna, too, eager to capture the Sauvira king, slays five hundred bold Maharathas from the mountains, the vanguard of the army, fighting in the front. Yudhishtira kills a hundred of the best Sauvira fighters, in the twinkling of an eye. Nakula, sword in hand, leaps down from his chariot and, like a tiller sowing seeds, scatters heads of the soldiers in the rear. From his chariot, Sahadeva brings down so many elephant-mounted warriors with his iron shafts, and they drop from their lofty seats like birds from the trees.

Bow in hand, the king of the Trigartas leaps down from his great chariot and kills Yudhishtira's four horses with his mace. But seeing the enemy closing in and fighting on foot, the Dharmaraja pierces his chest with a crescent-tipped arrow, so that he vomits blood and falls at his feet, like an uprooted tree. Yudhishtira, his horses slain, takes this opportunity to leave his chariot and climb with Indrasena into Sahadeva's.

Kshemankara and Mahamukha attack Nakula from both sides, like two great clouds, with telling showers of the sharpest arrows, but the son of Madri swiftly kills both. Suratha, king of the Trigartas, an expert in fighting from an elephant's back, lumbers upto Nakula's chariot and makes his elephant seize it with is trunk and drag it about here and there. A little daunted by this, Suratha jumps off his ratha, and then, sword and shield in his hands, stands immovable as a mountain.

Suratha wants to kill Nakula immediately, and he prods his mammoth, excited elephant towards him. When the great beast is near enough, Nakula severs its head, trunk and tusks from its body, and the mail-clad elephant gives a dreadful wail and falls, crushing its riders to crimson pulp. Madri's son quickly climbs into Bhima's chariot and has some respite.

Bhima sees Kotikasya rush into the fray and cuts off his sarathy's head with a horseshoe-shaped arrow, so swiftly that the prince does not even realise his charioteer has been killed, and his driverless horses careen chaotically across the field. Seeing the driverless prince retreating, Bhima storms up to him and kills him with a feathered arrow.

Dhananjaya uses razor-sharp, crescent-tipped arrows and cuts off the heads of all the twelve Sauvira heroes; Maharatha Arjuna kills the Ikshvaku leaders and great numbers of Sibis, Trigartas and Saindhavas. He fells banner-bearing elephants and flag-adorned chariots. Heads and headless bodies lie on the field, covering it entirely. Dogs, herons, ravens, crows, falcons, vultures and jackals feast on the flesh and blood of the dead.

When Jayadratha, king of the Sindhus, sees his soldiers all slain, he is terrified, and eager to be rid of Krishnaa and flee. In the general bedlam, the wretched man quickly leaves Draupadi and runs for his life, following the same forest path by which he came.

Yudhishtira sees Draupadi walking with Dhaumya before her, and lifts her onto the chariot of Madri's valiant son Sahadeva.

A great slaughter follows Jayadratha's unseemly flight. As they run away, Bhima mows down all Jayadratha's men with iron shafts, calling out their names as he strikes them down, one by one.

Arjuna sees that Jayadratha has fled and asks his wild brother to refrain from killing the rest of the Saindhava army. He says, 'Jayadratha is to blame for all this, and he does not seem to be here anymore. It is him you must seek out and I will pray for your success. What is the point of slaughtering his soldiers? Why are you bent on this useless bloodshed?'

Admonished by the wise Arjuna, Bhima turns to Yudhishtira and says, 'We have killed a great many enemy warriors, and the rest run. My brother, take Draupadi, the twins and Dhaumya with you, and comfort the princess when you return to the asrama. I will hunt down the witless Jayadratha, even if he hides in Patala, or is protected by Indra himself.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Mahabaho, even if the king of Sindhu is evil, for the sake of our sister Dussala, his wife, and the pious Gandhari you must not kill him.'

Draupadi becomes very agitated when she hears this, and bashfully, but in anger, says to her two husbands, Bhima and Arjuna, 'If you want to do what pleases me, you must kill that despicable man. The enemy who abducts a wife or takes a kingdom should never be forgiven in battle, even if they beg for mercy.'

Bhima and Arjuna, admonished, fly in search of the Saindhava king, and Yudhishtira takes Krishnaa and Dhaumya back to the asrama. On entering the hermitage, he finds it covered with darbhasanas for sadhus, and crowded with their disciples. Markandeya and other Brahmanas grace the asrama, and the Brahmanas are lamenting what has befallen Draupadi when the ineffably wise Yudhishtira and his brothers arrive.

Great is the joy of all who are there for the Saindhavas and the Sauviras have been vanquished, and Panchali rescued. The king sits among the sages, while Krishnaa goes into their kutila with the twin brothers.

Meanwhile, Bhima and Arjuna see Jayadratha fleeing some two krosas ahead of them and urge their horses to greater speed. Effortlessly, Arjuna shoots down Jayadratha's horses from that distance with astras which weave their way through intervening trees and surely find their target.

Bhima and Arjuna rush on towards the terrified king of Sindhu, who finds himself alone and bewildered, and also gripped by sorrow to see his horses killed before his eyes. Seeing Arjuna's unearthly archery, Jayadratha decides to run, and takes the same track that brought him through the forest. Phalguna overtakes the petrified Saindhava king and says, 'What a petty man you are! How did you dare abduct a queen? Turn around, Kshatriya; it is not right that you flee. How can you run like this, leaving your men to face the enemy?’

The king of Sindhu does not look back at all. Bhima impatiently overtakes him, but the compassionate Arjuna begs him not to kill the black-hearted fellow.”

JAYADRATHA VIMOKSHANA PARVA

Vaisampayana said, "Jayadratha still runs headlong from the terrible brothers who come at him with weapons raised and ready to strike. The furious Bhimasena jumps down from his chariot and runs after him. He seizes him by his hair and, hefting him aloft, slams him down on the ground. He holds the prince's head and rains blows on him, until Jayadratha faints.

When the Saindhava recovers consciousness, he groans aloud and attempts to get up, but Bhima Mahabaho kicks his head, felling him. He kneels squarely on Jayadratha's chest and rains dreaful blows on his face, and that prince faints again.

Arjuna now intervenes and persuades the enraged Bhimasena to stop punishing Jayadratha anymore; he reminds his brother of what Yudhishtira has said about their sister Dussala.

Bhima says, 'This wretch has done great injury to the blameless Krishnaa. He deserves to die! Ah, but I am helpless because our brother overflows with mercy and you, too, from a misplaced sense of dharma, constantly stop me from having a Kshatriya's just revenge.'

With his crescented arrow, Vrikodara shaves Jayadratha's head, leaving five symbolic tufts of hair. Silently Jayadratha submits to this and Bhima says to him, 'If you want to live, listen to me, fool, and I will tell you how you can save your worthless life. In public meetings and in open sabhas you must declare for all to hear, I am the slave of the Pandavas! On this condition, I spare your life. This is the dharma of victory in battle.'

Jayadratha, in a swoon, trembling, and covered in dust, says meekly to that ferocious one, 'So be it.'

Arjuna and Vrikodara bind him with rope and bundle him into their chariot. Bhima mounts the chariot and, with Arjuna, rides to the asrama. He comes to Yudhishtira and shoves Jayadratha down to the ground before his elder brother.

The Dharmaraja smilingly tells him to set the Sindhu prince free, and Bhima says to the king, 'Tell Draupadi that this dog is now the slave of the Pandavas.'

His brother says affectionately, 'If you have any regard for me, you will set this man free.'

And now Draupadi, too, urges Bhima to do so. She says, 'Let him go. He has become the king's slave and you have disfigured him by shaving his head and leaving five tufts of hair on it.'

Now at liberty, Jayadratha approaches Yudhishtira and bows low to him. He bows to all the Munis. Seeing the abject Jayadratha, so weak that Arjuna has to support him, the compassionate Yudhishtira says, 'I release you; you are a free man now. Go, and be careful never to commit such folly again. It is shameful that you meant to take a woman by force; no man less vile would think of such a thing.'

Yudhishtira looks with some pity at the Sindhu king and says, 'May your heart grow in dharma, so that such a base thought never enters it again. Go in peace now with your charioteers, cavalry and footsoldiers.'

O Bhaarata, when Yudhishtira says this, Jayadratha is overcome with shame and, bending his head, he silently and sadly makes his way to Gangadvaram, the place from where the Ganga comes down to the plains. He implores Trilochana, Uma's consort, for protection and does severe penance. Siva, the three-eyed One, is so pleased with Jayadratha's tapasya that he comes down to the Earth to accept his offering of penance and tells him to ask for a boon.

Listen, Rajan, to the boon that Jayadratha asks Mahadeva for. The Saindhava says, 'Grant that I am able to defeat all the five sons of Pandu, mounted on their chariots, in battle!'

Lord Siva tells him this is not possible. 'None can slay or conquer them in battle. However, except for Arjuna, I grant that you will be able to contain them, but only once, on the battlefield. Arjuna is Nara, and Vishnu's own Avatara. He performed an impossibly austere tapasya in the Badari vana, and Lord Narayana supports him, so that even the Devas cannot defeat him. I myself have given him the divine astra called Pasupata. The Lokapalas have given him the Vajra and other Devastras.

Vishnu Devadeva, Hyanantatma the Infinite Spirit, Suraguru Prabhu the Lord Preceptor of all the Devas, Pradhana Purusha the Supreme Being without attributes, Viswatma the Soul of the Universe, Viswamurtiman is embodied in all creation. At the end of a great cycle of time, he assumed the form of the all-consuming Fire and devoured the Universe, with its mountains and seas, islands, hills, woods and forests. After he destroyed the subterranean Naga world as well, huge, many-hued clouds, clashing and flashing with thunder and lightning, spread over the sky and poured water in torrents as thick as chariot axles, filling space and dousing the raging apocalypse.

This happened at the end of four thousand yugas, when the Earth was flooded with water and had become one vast sea, the ekarnava. All was hushed: mobile creatures were dead; the Sun, the Moon and the winds were all gone; and the Akhanda was without stars and planets. It was then that the Paramatman Narayana, unperceivable by the senses, Sahastraksha Sahastrapata—thousand-headed and thousand-limbed—wanted to rest. The serpent Sesha, awesome with his thousand hoods and shining with the splendour of ten thousand suns; white as the Kunda flower, or the Moon, or pearls, or the white lotus, or milk or the fibres of a lotus stalk, served as his couch. That adorable and omnipotent God slept on lap of the fathomless Ocean, enveloping all space with the blackness of night.

When, finally, the urge to create stirred in him he awoke and found the Universe empty. There is, in this connection, a sloka that describes and explains the word Narayana: Nara created water and it formed his body, therefore, it is called Nara. It was his Ayana, or resting place, and, therefore he is known as Narayana. As soon as that Eternal Being began to meditate in order to create the Universe again, a lotus sprang spontaneously from his navel, and the four-faced Brahma emerged from that lotus. Brahma Lokapitamaha, the ancestor of all creatures, sat on that flower and, finding that all the Universe was a void, created in his own likeness, and from his mind, the nine great Rishis—Marichi and others.

These nine also became creators and brought Yakshas, Rakshasas, Pisachas, reptiles, men and all mobile and immobile creatures into being.

Brahman, the Supreme Spirit, exists in three states: in the form of Brahma he is the Creator; as Vishnu he is the Preserver; and as Siva he is the Destroyer of the Universe.

O king of Sindhu, have you not heard of the wondrous achievements of Vishnu, which the Munis and the Brahmanas who know the Vedas describe?

When the world was reduced to one vast Sea with only the heavens above, the Lord, like a firefly on a monsoon night, searching hither and thither for a patch of stable ground from where he could begin the act of creation, decided to raise the submerged Earth out of the water for his purpose. He wondered what shape he should take to rescue Bhumi Devi from the flood and, after some contemplation, he chose the form of a wild boar, sporting in the water. He assumed the shape of a sacrificial boar, radiant and aglow with intuitive knowledge of the Vedas. The Varaha was ten yojanas long; it had sharp tusks and was cloud dark. Its body was as massive as a mountain and, roaring like tumultuous rain-clouds clashing, it dove deep and lifted up the Earth with one of its tusks and set Bhumi back in her proper place.

At another time, the Mahatman assumed the marvellous form of a half-man, half-lion—Narasimha, the Manticore. Joining his hands together in supplication, he went to the court of the king of the Daityas. That progenitor of the Daityas, the son of Diti, was the enemy of the Devas, and flared up in rage when he saw this peculiar beast. Eyes inflamed, adorned with garlands and looking like a mass of black thunderheads, this warlike son of Diti, Hiranyakasipu took up his trident and, roaring like thunderclouds, rushed at the Manticore. The Narasimha leapt into the air and tore the Daitya apart with his claws.

Having slain the Daitya king for the sake of the well-being of all creatures, the radiant, lotus-eyed Lord of great effulgence, was born again from the womb of Aditi as the son of Kasyapa.

At the end of a thousand years she delivered him, a Being of superhuman conception, short, dark-skinned, and bright eyed. He held a Rishi's staff and kamandalu in his hands, and the mystic birthmark of Srivatsa, shaped like a curl of hair, on his chest. He had tangeld locks of jata and wore the sacrificial thread across his chest; he was strongly built and handsome, and shone with lustre.

Arriving at the yagnasala of Bali, king of the Danavas, Vamana the dwarf entered the assembly with the help of Brihaspati.

Bali was pleased to see him and said, “I am happy to see you, O Brahmana. What can I do for you?”

The dwarf replied with a smile, “Lord of Danavas, give me land to cover three paces of my legs,” and Bali consented happily to give the Brahmana what he wanted.

As he was measuring the three paces, Hari the dwarf assumed his Viswarupa, and with just three steps, covered the Earth; and then immortal Vishnu gifted it to Indra.

What I have just told you is the famous story of the Vamana Avatara, the incarnation of the dwarf. From him all the gods were created, and from this incarnation onwards, the world is said to be Vaishnava, or pervaded by Vishnu. Vishnu has now been born into the world again, in the race of the Yadavas, to destroy evil and preserve dharma. In this Avatara he is called Krishna.

Saindhava, these are the achievements of the Brahman, whom all the worlds worship and whom the learned describe as without beginning or end, as un-born and divine. They call him Yamahurajitam – the unconquerable; Sankachakragadhadharam—who holds the conch-shell, discus and mace in his hands; Srivatsadharinam Devam – the Lord who is marked with the mystic Srivatsa; Pitakausheyavasasam – attired in yellow silk, and who is the best of all who are skilled in the Astra Shastra.

It is this same Krishna who protects Arjuna. That glorious and lotus-eyed One of infinite power, that slayer of hostile heroes, rides in Partha’s chariot and defends him. Thus, Arjuna is invincible. The gods cannot resist him, to say nothing of a mere mortal being able to vanquish Partha in battle.

Therefore, O king, Arjuna you must leave well alone. You shall, however, be able to quell, for a single day only, the rest of Yudhishtira’s forces, as well as your enemies, the other four sons of Pandu!’

Having spoken thus to Jayadratha, the Divine Hara, Sarvapaapa Haro Hara—the destroyer of all sins, Umapati—the consort of Uma, Pasupati—the Lord of wild beasts, Yagnaha—the despoiler of Daksha’s sacrifice, Tripurardana—He who destroyed the Tripura, He that plucked out the eyes of Bhaga, He who is surrounded by his dwarfish, hunchbacked and dreadful entourage of ganas that have frightful eyes and ears and uplifted arms – Siva vanishes from that place, O Narashardula, with his beloved Uma.

Jayadratha returns home and the sons of Pandu continue to live in the Kamyaka vana."

CANTO 271

RAMOPAKHYANA PARVA

Janamejaya asked, "What did those Naravyaghras, the Pandavas, do after the trial of Draupadi's abduction?"

Vaisampayana said, "After he has defeated Jayadratha and rescued Krishnaa, Dharmaraja Yudhishtira sits down with that Brahmanottama Markandeya. Hearing the words of sympathy that all the Rishis express, Yudhishtira says to Markandeya, 'Worshipful one, you are known amongst the gods and the ascetics to have the fullest knowledge of the past and the future. I have a doubt that I would like you to clear.

This devi is the daughter of Drupada; she was born from the sacrificial fire and not from a woman's womb; she is highly blessed and is the daughter-in-law of the illustrious Pandu. I know that all creatures are subject to the influences of kaala and kalpa—time and destiny—that were established by Brahman, and to the karma of one's actions. If this is true, how could such misfortune afflict this wife of ours who is so faithful and pure, even like an honest man being falsely accused of theft?

Draupadi has never committed any sin. Indeed, she has never done anything that is not praiseworthy; she has treated Brahmanas with the utmost dharma. Yet, Jayadratha carried her away by force; and as a consequence, he and his allies were defeated in battle, and he had his head shaved.

No doubt, we slaughtered the Sindhu troops and rescued her, but we are tainted by the disgrace of our wife being abducted because of our carelessness. This life in the wilderness is full of sorrow. We live by hunting and we are forced to kill the animals with whom we share the vana as a home. This exile that we suffer is because of deceitful kinsmen. Is there anyone who is more unfortunate than I am? Have you ever seen or heard of such a man?' "

"Markandeya says, 'Bharatarishabha, even Rama suffered unequalled torment because of the evil Rakshasa king Ravana, who used maya and, overpowering the vulture Jatayu, forcibly carried away Rama's wife Sita from their asrama in the forest. With Sugriva's help, Rama brought her back by building a bridge across the sea and burning down Lanka with his fiery arrows.'

Yudhishtira says, 'In what dynasty was Rama born, and how great was he? Whose son was Ravana, and what quarrel did he have with Rama? O Illustrious, tell me all this in detail, for I long to hear the story of Rama of the great deeds.'

Markandeya says, 'Listen, prince of the Bhaaratas, to this ancient Itihasa, exactly as it happened. I will tell you about the suffering that Rama and his wife endured.

There was a great king named Aja in the Ikshvaku dynasty. He had a son named Dasaratha, who was devoted to the study of the Vedas and was pure of heart and mind. Dasaratha had four sons, who were knowledgeable about dharma and artha; they were Rama, Lakshmana, Satrughna, and the mighty Bharata. Rama's mother was Kausalya, Bharata's was Kaikeyi, and those twin scourges of their enemies, Lakshmana and Satrughna, were the sons of Sumitra.

Janaka was the king of Videha, and Sita was his daughter. Tvashta himself created Sita with the intention of making her the beloved wife of Rama. This was the lineage of Rama and Sita; and now listen to how Ravana was born.

That Lord of all creatures and the Creator of the Universe—Sarvalokanam Prabhu Swayambhu Prajapati, that Rishi-like Deva, was the grandfather of Ravana. He had a beloved son named Pulastya who, in turn, had a mighty son called Vaisravana, who was born of a cow. But Vaisravana left his father and went to live with his grandfather. Rajan, his furious father created another exactly like himself to take revenge on his son Vaisravana, and he called this one Visrava.

Pleased with his grandson Vaisravana, the Pitamaha Brahma gave him these gifts: immortality, the ownership of all the wealth in the Universe, the guardianship of one of the cardinal points, the friendship of Isana Siva, and a son named Nalakubara. He gave him Lanka for his capital, which was guarded by legion Rakshasas; a chariot called Pushpaka that could go everywhere, at the will of he who sat in it; and kingship over the Yakshas, and sovereignty over other kings.' "

"Markandeya continues, 'The Muni named Visrava, replicated in a moment of rage from the soul of Pulastya, began to look at Vaisravana with great anger. But Kubera Vaisravana, king of the Rakshasas, knew that his father was angry with him and always tried to please him.

Bhaaratottama, that Rajarajan who lived in Lanka sent three Rakshasa women, borne on men's shoulders, to wait on his father. Their names were Pushpotkata, Raka and Malini; they were accomplished singers and dancers, and attentive to that Mahataman Rishi. Those slender Rakshasis vied with one another in making the Rishi happy, and that worshipful being was pleased with them. He granted them boons, and to every one of them he gave princely sons according to their wishes.

Pushpotkata had two sons, both most magnificent Rakshasas and unequalled in prowess. They were Kumbhakarna and Dasagriva Ravana. Malini had a son named Vibhishana, and Raka had twin children named Khara and Surpanakha. Vibhishana was the most handsome of them all. He was pious and conscientiously performed every religious rite.

The first of Rakshasas, Dasagriva the ten-headed, the eldest, was devout, vivacious and strong beyond belief. Kumbhakarna was the most powerful in battle, for he was a fierce and terrible warrior and a master of maya. Khara was a skilled archer; he hated Brahmanas and lived on human flesh. And the fierce Surpanakha was a constant bane to tapasvins in the vana.

And learned in the Vedas and diligent in ceremonial rites, all these lived with their father on the Gandhamadana mountain. There they saw Vaisravana, owner of great wealth, always borne on men's shoulders, with their father. Gripped by envy, they decided to perform the most severe tapasya to please Brahma.

Dasagriva, subsisting on air alone and surrounded by the five sacred fires, meditated while standing on one leg for a thousand years. Kumbhakarna performed his tapasya with bowed head and hardly ate at all. The wise and magnanimous Vibhishana, undertaking fasts and subsisting only on dry leaves, also sat in dhyana and practised severe tapasya for a long time. Khara and Surpanakha cheerfully protected and attended on them while these others were at their penance.

At the end of a thousand years, the invincible Dasagriva cut off nine of his heads and offered them to Agni. Brahma, Lord of the Universe, was pleased and, appearing to the Rakshasa tapasvins, told them to stop their tapasya and promised to grant boons to each of them.

Brahma said, "I am pleased with you, my children. Stop your tapasya and ask me for boons. I will give you anything you ask for, except immortality. Ravana, your heads, which you offered to me in the great fire, will adorn your body as before, in whatever way you like. Your body will not be disfigured; you will be able to assume any form at will, and conquer your enemies in battle. This is my promise."

Ravana said, "May I never be defeated by a Gandharva, a Deva, a Kinnara, an Asura, a Yaksha, a Rakshasa, a Naga or any other creature!"

Brahma said, "You will never have cause to fear any of those you have named, except man. May good fortune attend you! This is my command."

Ten-headed Ravana was jubilant, for, being an eater of men, he dismissed humans as being of no consequence. The Pitamaha spoke to Kumbhakarna in the same way, and being dull-witted, Kumbhakarna asked for the boon of long sleep, which Brahma granted. Then Brahma addressed Vibhishana and told him to ask for any boon he wanted, as he was pleased with him.

Vibhishana replied, "Lord, grant that even when I am in grave danger, I never swerve from the path of dharma and, that being ignorant, I may be enlightened by the light of divine knowledge!"

Brahma replied, "Parantapa, although you are born a Rakshasa, your soul does not lean towards adharma. And so, I grant you immortality."

Markandeya continues, ‘Having obtained his boon, the ten-headed Rakshasa defeated his half-brother Kubera Vaisravana in battle and wrested the kingdom of Lanka from him. The noble Kubera left Lanka and, followed by his Gandharvas, Yakshas, Rakshasas and Kinnaras, went to live on the Gandhamadana mountain.

Ravana forcibly took the Pushpaka vimana from him, and for this, Kubera cursed him, saying, “This chariot shall never carry you; it will bear the man who will kill you in battle. And because you have insulted me, your elder brother, you will soon die!”

Rajan, the devout and splendid Vibhishana, who always walked the path of dharma, followed Kubera. That divine Lord of wealth was pleased with his younger brother and gave him command of the Yaksha and Rakshasa armies.

In the meantime, the mighty and man-eating Rakshasas and Pisachas came together and made Dasagriva their king. He could take any form at will and his powers were terrifying. Able to fly through the air, he attacked the Devas and the Daityas and took their most valuable possessions from them. Because he terrified all creatures, he was called Ravana; and with the power to muster as much strength as he wanted, without limit, he struck terror into the hearts of the Devas,’ says Markandeya.”

"Markandeya says, 'When terror gripped the worlds, the Brahmarishis, the Siddhas and the Devarishis, with Havyavaha as their spokesman, asked Brahma for protection.

Agni said, "Dasagriva, the powerful son of Visrava, cannot be killed because of your boon. Endowed with limitless strength, he oppresses the earth's creatures. Protect us, Bhagavan. We have no other refuge but you."

Brahma said, "Vibhavasu, neither the Devas nor the Asuras can conquer him in battle. I have already ordained the means of his death, and that is imminent. At my command, the four-headed Deva has already incarnated for this. Vishnu Mahatman will accomplish what you want."

The Pitamaha said to Sakra, "You and all the Devas must be born on Earth in amsa as sons born of monkeys and bears: heroic, powerful beings who can take any form at will, who will be Vishnu's allies."

At his word, the Devas, the Gandharvas and the Danavas quickly assembled to decide how they should each be born on Earth. Brahma commanded a Gandharvi named Dundubhi to go to the Earth and accomplish his task. Dundubhi was born in the world of men as the hunchbacked Manthara. All the chief Devas, including Sakra and others, sired children on the wives of the best of vanaras and reekshas. And these sons equalled their fathers in strength and glory.

They could split mountain peaks, and their weapons were rocks and sala and tala trees. They were wonderfully strong and their bodies were hard as diamonds; they were accomplished in battle and could call on unlimited energy whenever they wished. They were each equal to a thousand elephants in might, and they were as swift as the wind. Some of them lived anywhere, while others lived in forests.

Having contrived all this, Brahma Prajapati instructed Manthara about what she must do. Manthara of the mind quick as lightning understood immediately and, from then on, went here and there, busying herself with creating and fanning quarrels,' says Markandeya."

"Yudhishtira says, 'O luminous one, you have told me about the birth of Rama and the others in detail. I want to know the reason for Rama's exile. Brahmana, tell me why the sons of Dasaratha, the brothers Rama and Lakshmana, went to the forest with the renowned Maithili, princess of Mithila.'

Markandeya says, 'The pious king Dasaratha, who was always attentive to the needs of his elders, and devout in performing religious kriyas, was joyful when his sons were born. They grew up, strong and learned in the Vedas and their mysteries, and in the Astra Shastra. After they had completed their Brahmacharya vows, the princes were married; and Dasaratha's cup of joy overflowed.

The intelligent Rama, the eldest son, became his father's favourite, and delighted the people with his charming nature. Then, Bhaarata, the wise king thought that he was getting old, and consulted his ministers and his kulaguru Vasishta about installing Rama as Yuvaraja of the kingdom. All those devoted men agreed that the time was ripe for this. Dasaratha looked at his splendid son Rama, the enhancer of Kausalya's joy, of the red eyes and sinewy arms, of the gait like an elephant's, of the long arms and curly black hair, who was courageous and glowed in splendour, and equal to Indra himself in battle, who was versed in the Shastras, as wise as Brihaspati, and a master of all the arts and sciences. Everybody loved him.

Rama's senses were under complete control, and even his enemies felt happy to see him. He was the terror of the unrighteous and protector of the good. With a sparkling mind, he was irresistible; he was ever-victorious and undefeated. O Kurunandana, Dasaratha looked at his son who flooded Kausalya with joy, and was gratified.

Thinking about Rama's qualities, the mighty king said to the Purohita, "Blessed Brahmana, tonight the Pushya nakshatra will rise in a most auspicious conjunction. Have preparations made for the coronation and call Rama. This auspicious time lasts until tomorrow. My ministers and I will invest Rama as Yuvaraja of all my subjects."

Manthara, Queen Kaikeyi's maid, heard the king, went to her mistress and slyly said to her, "Kaikeyi, today the king has made a proclamation that does not augur well for you. Unlucky one, it is better that you are bitten by an angry and fiercely venomous snake. But Kausalya is fortunate, for it is her son who is to become Yuvaraja. Where is good fortune when your own son does not inherit the kingdom?"

The slender-waisted Kaikeyi put on all her ornaments and sought out her husband in private. Lovingly and with alluring smiles she said to him, "Rajan, you are always true to your word. You swore, once, to give me something I desired. I ask you to keep that oath now and save yourself from the sin of breaking your sacred word."

The king said, "I will give you what you ask for. Ask for anything you like. What man, undeserving though he may be of death, shall I kill today? What man that deserves to die shall I set free? Who shall I give wealth, whose wealth shall I confiscate? Whatever wealth there is in this world, except that which belongs to Brahmanas, is mine. I am the king of kings and the protector of the four varnas. Tell me quickly, blessed devi, what does your heart desire?"

Kaikeyi heard the king and knew that she had bound him to his pledge, and that her power over him was strong. She said, "I want Bharata be made Yuvaraja, and Rama to be sent into exile for fourteen years in the Dandaka aranya, wearing matted jata on his head and clad in rags and deerskin."

Bhaaratottama, the king heard her words like daggers and was speechless with grief. But learning of his father's pledge and Kaikeyi's demand, the noble Rama went into the jungle so that his father's dharma was preserved. His wife Sita, the princess of Videha and daughter of Janaka, and Lakshmana, that best of archers, followed Rama into the forest.

After Rama left, king Dasaratha died, as was destined. Queen Kaikeyi called her own son Bharata to her and said, “Dasaratha has departed for Swarga, and both Rama and Lakshmana are in the forest. Take this vast kingdom that has no rivals to disturb its peace.”

But noble Bharata cried, “You have done an evil thing by killing your husband and having Rama sent into exile. From lust for wealth and power, mother, O accursed woman, you have piled sin on my head.”

And the prince wept bitterly. He proved his innocence before all the subjects of the kingdom and set out after Rama, to bring him back. With Kausalya, Sumitra and Kaikeyi in chariots going before his retinue, and with a heavy heart, he set out with his brother Satrughna.

Accompanying him were the Rishis Vasishtha, Vamadeva and thousands of other Brahmanas, and the people of the cities and the provinces, all wanting to bring Rama back.

On the Chitrakuta mountain, Bharata saw Rama and Lakshmana, dressed like sadhus, with bows in hand. Rama, however, was determined to keep his father’s word and dismissed Bharata. Bharata returned and ruled from Nandigrama, keeping his brother’s wooden sandals in front of him always. Rama was afraid that the people of Ayodhya would come again to Chitrakuta, and made his way through the dense vana to the asrama of Rishi Sarabhanga.

There he paid homage to Sarabhanga and, entering the forest of Dandaka, set up his dwelling on the banks of the Godavari. While he lived there, through the wiles of Surpanakha, Rama was forced to fight Khara, who lived in nearby Janasthana. That righteous son of the Raghuvamsa killed fourteen thousand Rakshasas in order to protect the Rishis at their tapasya, whom the demons preyed on and ate.

By killing mighty Rakshasas like Khara and Dushana, the wise Rama restored the peace of that sacred forest.

After these Rakshasas had been slain, Surpanakha, her nose and lips mutilated by Laksmana, flew to Lanka, to her brother Ravana. When the Rakshasa woman, demented with grief, and dried blood staining her face, saw Ravana she fell at his feet. He was overpowered by anger at seeing how horribly she had been disfigured and, grinding his teeth, sprang up from his throne.

He dismissed his ministers, and when they were alone he asked his sister, “Who has done this to you, forgetting that you are my sister? Who is he that calls my vengeance and his death so ardently to him? Who is he that sleeps happily with a fire lit so near his head? Who is he that steps on a vicious serpent? Who is he that stands with his hand thrust into the mouth of a lion?"

Flames of fury burst from his body, as a night fire spews out of the hollows in a dry tree.

His sister told him about Rama's prowess and about the defeat of the Rakshasas with Khara and Dushana at their head. Impelled by destiny and the slaughter of his kinsmen, Ravana thought of using Maricha to kill Rama. He resolved on the course he would follow and arranged for Lanka to be ruled by his ministers while he was away.

After consoling Surpanakha as best as he could, he set out on a journey across the sky. He crossed the Trikuta and the Kala mountains and saw the vast ocean of unplumbed waters—the home of makaras.

Crossing the ocean, ten-headed Ravana reached Gokarna, the favoured place of the illustrious Deva armed with the Trisula. And there Ravana met his old friend Maricha who, out of fear of Rama, had become a sannyasin.'

Vaisampayana continued, "Markandeya says, 'Maricha received Ravana with a respectful welcome and offered him fruit and roots.

When Ravana was seated and at ease, the eloquent Maricha sat beside him and said to Ravana, "Your skin looks unnaturally pale. Is all well in your kingdom, O king of Rakshasas? What brings you here? Are your subjects as loyal to you as ever? Whatever it is that has brought you here, consider it already done, even if it be difficult to accomplish."

Ravana, his heart in turmoil from anger and humiliation, told him about what Rama had done and that he, Ravana, wanted the prince dead.

An alarmed Maricha said, "You must not provoke Rama; I know his prowess. No one can withstand his arrows. That great one is the reason for my taking sannyasa. What evil creature has instigated you to follow a course that will surely bring ruin upon you?"

Ravana replied simply, "If you do not do as I say, you will die."

Maricha thought within himself, "Since death is inevitable, I will do as he says, because it is better to die at the hands of Rama, who is superior." And he says to Ravana, "I will do whatever I can to help you."

Dasagriva Ravana said to him, "Take the shape of a deer with golden skin and antlers of gold, and go and enchant Sita. When she sees you she will send Rama to hunt you, and then she will be mine to carry away. Losing his wife, the villainous Rama will die of grief. This is what you must do to help me."

Maricha performed his own funeral rites in anticipation of his death and unhappily followed Ravana. They reached Rama's asrama and both did as planned. Ravana took the guise of a sadhu, with a shaven head and carrying a kamandalu and a three-pronged staff.

Maricha took the form of a golden deer. He appeared before Sita and, spurred by her own destiny, she sent Rama after the deer.

Eager to please her, Rama took up his bow, left Lakshmana to protect Sita, and set off in pursuit of the deer. Armed with bow and arrows and his sword, his fingers cased in lizard-skin gloves, Rama went after that deer, even as Rudra followed the astral deer as told in the Purana.

Ravana lured Rama a great distance away by appearing and disappearing from sight, and leading him on. Finally, when Rama realised that the deer was a Rakshasa, the illustrious scion of Raghu shot the golden creature with an unerring arrow. Struck with Rama's arrow, the Rakshasa Maricha cried out in agony, pefectly mimicking Rama's voice and calling out to Sita and Lakshmana. Vaidehi heard the cry and told Lakshmana to hurry to the spot from where the cry came.

Lakshmana said, "Gentle princess, have no fear. Who can harm Rama? O Sita of the sweet smiles, you will see your husband Rama return any moment now."

When Lakshmana said this, the chaste, naturally timid Sita was suspicious of the innocent Lakshmana's motives and began to cry.

She, who was devoted and faithful to her husband, scolded Lakshmana, "Foolish one, what you secretly yearn for can never be yours. I would rather kill myself with a weapon or throw myself from the top of a hill or walk into a blazing fire than forsake my Rama and live with a sorry wretch like you, like a tigress with a jackal."

The good-natured Lakshmana, who was devoted to his brother, covered his ears in anguish and set off on the path that Rama had taken, without a single look at that devi with lips as soft and red as the bimba fruit.

Now Ravana, wearing a gentle guise that hid the great evil that he was, like ashes covering a smouldering fire, came to the asrama. He came in the form of a hermit to carry away that princess of the blemishless character. Sita saw him and welcomed him with fruit and roots, and offered him a seat. Ignoring these that tiger among Rakshasas showed his own form.

He said, "O Sita, I am Ravana, king of all Rakshasas. My peerless city, Lanka, lies across the great ocean. There, among lovely women, you will live with me and be radiantly happy. O you with the beautiful lips, leave your ascetic Rama and be my wife!"

Janaka's daughter shut her ears and cried, "O do not speak like this. The vault of heaven with all its stars may fall down, the earth may shatter into fragments, fire may change its nature and become cold, but I could never leave Raghunandana. How can a she-elephant who has lived with the mighty leader of a herd, with rent temples, forsake him and live with a pig? Having once tasted the sweet wine prepared from honey or flowers, how can a woman relish coarse arrack made from rice?"

Saying this, she went inside her hut, her lips quivering and her arms trembling with rage. Ravana followed her inside and he seized her by her hair, took her in his arms and flew into the air with her.

A great and noble vulture, Jatayu, who lived on a mountain peak, saw that helpless devi in the Demon's grasp and heard her wailing out to Rama in anguish as she was carried away by Ravana.' "

"Markandeya says, 'Jatayu, heroic king of the vultures, whose brother was Sampati and whose father was Arjuna, was a friend of Dasaratha's. Seeing his friend's daughter-in-law on Ravana's lap, that sky-ranger attacked the Rakshasa in fury.

He cried, "Leave the princess of Mithila! Rakshasa, how can you ravish her when I am alive? If you do not release my daughter, you shall not escape from me with your life."

And Jatayu began to tear at the king of the Rakshasas with his talons. He lacerated Ravana with a hundred wounds by striking him with his wings and beak. Blood flowed from Ravana's body, as freely as water from a mountain spring. Attacked by this vulture who fought for Rama's sake, Ravana drew his sword and hacked away Jatayu's two wings and, as the immense avian fell to the earth below, the Rakshasa soared into the air, shooting out above the clouds with Sita in his grasp.

As they flew, whenever Vaidehi saw an asrama of Rishis, a lake, a river, or a tank, she threw down one of her ornaments. She saw five great monkeys on a mountain-top, and that intelligent princess threw down a piece of shimmering cloth torn from her garment. That strip of yellow cloth fell, fluttering through the air and flashing like lightning from the clouds, amongst those five foremost of vanaras.

With dazzling speed, the Rakshasa flew a long way through the sky like a great swift bird, and soon he saw his enchanting city of the many gates, which was enclosed on all sides by lofty walls, and built by Viswakrit himself. And the king of the Rakshasas entered Lanka, with Sita.

Whilst Sita was being abducted, Rama was walking back to the asrama after killing the deer, when he met his brother Lakshmana. Rama scolded him, “How could you leave Vaidehi alone in this Rakshasa-infested forest?”

He realised that he had been purposefully lured away a great distance by the deer, which was a Rakshasa in disguise, and his heart misgave him sharply when he saw his brother and knew that Sita was alone.

Rama breathed, “Ah Lakshmana, is the princess of Videha still alive? I fear I shall never see her again.”

Lakshmana told him everything that Sita had said, especially the harsh words with which she had rebuked him. His heart on fire, Rama and Lakshmana ran back towards the asrama. On the way they saw the vulture, big as a hill, lying on the ground in the throes of death. Suspecting that he was a Rakshasa, Rama and Lakshmana rushed at him, drawing their bows into circles.

The mighty vulture, however, addressed them, “Be blessed! I am Jatayu, king of vultures, and a friend of Dasaratha.”

Rama and his brother lowered their great bows and wondered who it was that spoke their father’s name in the wilderness. They saw that the speaker was the vulture, who had lost his wings and how blood spouted from his wounds. That hulking bird told them how Ravana had seized Sita and how the Rakshasa had cut off his wings.

Rama asked Jatayu which way Ravana had taken, and the vulture indicated the direction with his grandly crested head, and then Jatayu was dead.

Rama understood that Ravana had gone south. Rama paid his respects to his father’s friend and performed his funeral rites. Then those Parantapas, Rama and Lakshmana, filled with grief, took a southern course through the Dandaka aranya.

On their way they saw many uninhabited asramas, with kusa grass cushions scattered about, and leaf umbrellas and broken water-pots, and overrun by jackals. In the depths of that forest Rama and Saumitra saw herds of deer roaming at will. They heard the terrible voices of many predators and other fell beings, and they sounded like a roaring fire devouring the forest.

Shortly, they saw a hideous, headless Rakshasa, dark as rain-clouds and big as a mountain, his shoulders broad as a sala tree, and his arms long and massive. On the creature's chest was a pair of staring eyes, and his mouth was on his bloated belly.

In a trice the headless Rakshasa seized Lakshmana in a giant hand, holding him helpless and, O Bhaarata, the son of Sumitra was confounded. His eyes on Rama, the headless Rakshasa began to slowly draw Lakshmana towards the yawning maw on his belly.

Lakshmana said to Rama in dismay, "Look at my fate! I cannot bear it: your losing your kingdom, the death of our father, then the abduction of Sita and now this. O, I am sure I will not see you return with Vaidehi to Kosala and sitting on our ancestral throne as sovereign of the Earth. Only the very fortunate will see your face, radiant as the moon emerging from behind clouds, after your ritual coronation bath and sanctification with kusa grass, fried paddy and black peas."

The sensitive Lakshmana gave vent to his anguish and lamented in this way for a time.

However, Rama, always unperturbed in the face of danger, said, "Narapumgava, do not give way to grief. What is this creature, when I am here? You cut off his right arm and I will his left."

Even as he spoke, Rama hewed off the Rakshasa's left arm with his sword, as if it was a stalk of corn. The mighty Saumitra did the same to the Rakshasa's right arm, and then struck him time and again in his belly, blows like thunder, and the headless monster fell dead, making the ground shake.

Then, as if in a dream, the brothers saw a divine being rising from the dead Rakshasa's body and hovering in the air, shimmering like the Sun in the sky.

The eloquent Rama asked him, "Who are you? Tell me, what miracle is this? How can such a thing happen? I am struck with wonder!"

That being said, "O Kshatriya, I am a Gandharva and my name is Viswavasu. A Brahmana cursed me and I became a Rakshasa both in appearance and nature. Rama, Sita has been taken by king Ravana of Lanka. Go to Sugriva; he will be your friend. His lives on the mountain peak of Rishyamuka, by lake Pampa of the sacred water, where cranes flock. Sugriva, the brother of the Vanara king Vali, adorned with a golden garland, lives there with four of his counsellors. Go to him and tell him the reason for your grief; he is in a similar plight and will help you. That is all I can say. You will surely see Janaki, because the king of the Vanaras knows Ravana and the others."

With these words, the radiant, divine being vanished, leaving Rama and Lakshmana marvelling at what had happened.' "

"Markandeya says, 'In a torment of grief at Sita's abduction, Rama hurried to Pampa, which was only a short distance away. The lake was lush with lotuses of different kinds, and cool, fragrant breezes fanned the woodland air. Rama remembered his wife, O king, and was suddenly overwhelmed by utter sadness, and he wept.

Lakshmana said to him, "You, who are always respectful to those that deserve it, you should not have to suffer such anguish. Suffering should stay away from you, like illness does from the man who leads a disciplined life. You have found out about Ravana and Vaidehi. Rescue her now, using your intelligence and might.

Let us approach Vanarottama Sugriva, who is on the mountain peak. Be strong and cheerful; I, your disciple, slave and friend, am here."

Rama regained his composure at what his brother said, and turned his mind to what he needed to do. The brothers Rama and Lakshmana bathed in the waters of Lake Pampa and offered oblations to their ancestors; then they set out for Rishyamuka. On arriving there, they saw on the summit of the mountain, whose slopes were adorned with bounties of trees, fruits and roots, five monkeys.

Seeing them approach, Sugriva sent his advisor, the wise Hanuman, large like Himavat, to receive them. The brothers exchanged greetings with Hanuman, who then took them to Sugriva. Rajan, Rama immediately struck up a friendship with the good Vanara. When Rama told Sugriva about Sita, Sugriva showed him the piece of cloth that she had dropped while Ravana was carrying her away.

Rama received this token of faith from Sugriva and installed him as king of all the monkeys on Earth. Rama also vowed to kill Vali. With this compact, and with utmost confidence in each other, they made their way to Kishkindha, to do battle with Vali. Sugriva announced his arrival in Kishkindha with a roar as thunderous as the sound of a towering waterfall.

Vali could not abide this challenge, and was about to rush out, when his wife Tara stood in his way. Wise Tara pleaded, "From the sound of Sugriva's confident roars, I feel sure that he has found a great ally. Do not go out, my lord."

The Vanara king, the eloquent Vali, wearing a golden garland, said to Tara of the face as bright as the moon, "You recognise the voice and language of every creature from afar. Listen carefully and tell me who helps this brother of mine, brother in name only."

Tara said, "Listen, O Kapiswara, and I will tell you. Dasaratha's son Rama, greatest of arhcers, mightiest of Kshatriyas, whose wife has been abducted, has made a pact of friendship with Sugriva. Rama's brother, the intelligent Lakshmana, also mighty-armed, the unvanquished son of Sumitra, stands beside him to ensure Sugriva's success. Mainda, Dwivida, Hanuman the son of Pavana, and Jambavan the king of bears are Sugriva's ministers; they, too, stand by his side. All these illustrious ones are blessed with vast strength and intellect, and they all want you dead. So do not venture out, my lord."

But the king of the monkeys ignored her advice. He suspected that she had lost her heart to Sugriva, and was filled with raging envy. He upbraided her harshly and came out of his palatial cave to face Sugriva, who stood on the slope of the Malyavat mountain.

Vali said to Sugriva, "Often have I defeated you and, because life is so precious to you and because we are brothers, I have spared you each time. What makes you wish for death again?"

Sugriva answered Vali in such a way as to inform Rama of all that had transpired between him and his brother. He said gravely, "You have robbed me of my wife and my kingdom. What need have I of life? I have come to you in search of death."

The Vanara brothers spat venom with vicious words, then flew at each other in wrath. Fighting with sala and tala trees, and stones, they struck each other down; they leapt high into the air; they struck with their fists; they raked each other with nails and bit with long sharp fangs. Covered in blood, the two heroes shone like a pair of red-blossomed kinsuka trees.

As they fought, they looked identical and no one could tell them apart. Now Hanuman draped an elephant-flower mala around Sugriva's neck, and that Vanara shone with it, like the Malaya mountain with its circlet of clouds.

Rama could now identify Sugriva by the gajapushpi garland. He raised his best of bows, and aimed his arrow at Vali. The twang of Rama's bow was deafening as his arrow pierced Vali's breast. Vali trembled in fear and, his heart pierced, began to vomit blood. He saw Rama standing before him, Lakshmana at his side. He chastised that prince, for having taken his life without just cause, and fell dead to the ground. And Tara saw him lying on the bare earth, her lord who was as radiant as the Sun.

After Vali was killed, Sugriva regained possession of Kishkindha, and along with it, also of the widowed Tara, of the face as lovely as the moon. Rama of the sparkling intellect lived on the lush Malyavat hill for four months, with Sugriva in worshipful attendance.

Meanwhile, the lust-driven Ravana reached Lanka and ensconced Sita in an asrama-like arbour, in a wood of asoka trees as lovely as the Nandana vana. Sita put on valkala and passed her days in distress, living on fruit and roots, practising tapasya and keeping vratas, and wasting away day by day, pining for her Rama.

The king of the Rakshasas appointed some Rakshasa women armed with bearded spears and swords, lances and battle-axes, maces and flaming brands, to guard her. Some of these had two eyes and some three; some had eyes on their foreheads; some had long tongues lolling down to their throats, and some had none. Some had three breasts and some only one leg; some had three matted braids on their heads; some had only one eye. There were those who had blazing eyes and hair as stiff as the camel's; and they all stood watchfully, surrounding Sita night and day.

And those fearsome Pisacha women with dreadful voices always spoke savagely to her. "Let us eat her, a dainty morsel she will make; let us mangle her and tear her into little pieces. This woman has no regard for our master."

Filled with grief at being separated from Rama, Sita sighed and said to the Rakshasa women, "Devour me at once, good women. I have no desire to live without my husband who has eyes like lotus leaves and wavy blue-black hair. Else, I will go without food and become emaciated, like a she-snake hibernating in a tala tree; I have no will to live. Know for certain: I will never live with any man other than Raghava, the descendant of Raghu. And knowing this, do what you like with me."

Hearing her, those raucous-voiced Rakshasis went to the king of the Rakshasas and reported what she had said. When the Rakshasis were speaking to Ravana, one of them, Trijata, kind-hearted and pleasantly-spoken, consoled the princess of Videha.

She said, "Listen, O Sita, to what I tell you, for I believe completely in what I am about to say. O you of the lovely hips, cast away your fear and listen. There is an intelligent and old chieftain of the Rakshasas known as Avindhya. He always wishes Rama well and he said this to me.

'Reassure and console Sita. Tell her that her husband the mighty Rama is well and that Lakshmana serves him faithfully. Raghunandana has struck up a friendship with Sugriva, the king of monkeys, and is ready to come to your rescue. Timid one, have no fear of Ravana, whom the world despises. O Daughter, Nalakubara's curse will keep you safe from him. Brahma cursed Ravana once for having ravished his daughter-in-law Rambha, and the Rakshasa's ten heads will blow apart in shreds if he ever forced himself on another woman.

Sita, your husband will come soon, with Sugriva and Lakshmana, and he will take you away from here.

Devi, I have had a terrible dream of evil omen, in which I saw the death of this wretch of Pulastya's race. Vicious and brutal is this night-ranger. His evil nature and ways inspire terror in one and all. Fate has taken good sense away from him, and makes him defy the gods and dharma. In my dream I saw omens that portend his end.

I saw Dasagriva, the ten-headed, with his head shaved, his body smeared with oil and covered in filth, dancing on a chariot drawn by donkeys. I saw Kumbhakarna and other Rakshasas, stark naked and also with shaven heads, and smeared all over with blood and excrement, running southwards.

Vibhishana was alone, with a royal white parasol unfurled over his head, and wearing a turban; his body was adorned in white garlands and his skin anointed with the finest unguents; and I saw him climb to the summit of the Mountain Sweta. I also saw four of Vibhishana's ministers, similarly adorned, ascending the summit of that hill along with him.

These signs mean that only these five will survive the impending holocaust. Bhumi with her oceans and seas will be enveloped by Rama's arrows. Princess, your husband's fame will fill the earth. In my dream I saw Lakshmana's arrows devouring everything, in all directions; I saw him climbing onto a pile of bones and drinking rice and honey boiled in milk. And I saw you running northwards, weeping and covered in blood, and protected by a tiger. O Vaidehi, very soon you will be united with your lord Raghava and his brother."

The princess with eyes of the gazelle heard what Trijata said and hope woke again in her heart of seeing Rama again. And when the Pisacha women came back, they saw her sitting with Trijata, just as they had left her.' "

"Markandeya says, 'The chaste Sita languished in Lanka, sunk in melancholy and filled with grief for her husband, wearing ragged clothes, with only a single jewel on the marital thread on her wrist, weeping constantly as she sat on a rock, and waited upon by Rakshasis. While she was in this state, Ravana, tormented by desire, came to her.

Inflamed by lust, clad in divine attire, decked with jewelled earrings, and wearing a beautiful garland and crown, that virile conqueror of the Devas, Danavas, Gandharvas, Yakshas and Kimpurushas, arrived in the asoka vana, like an embodiment of spring. Ravana had dressed with care and looked like the kalpa-vriksha in Indra's garden. But though he adorned himself with every embellishment, she saw him only as an evil spectre, like a glorious banyan tree in a cemetery.

The night-ranger came near the slender-waisted Devi, like Saturn approaching Rohini. Pierced by the arrows of the god of the flower emblem he accosted that woman of the perfect hips, startling her like some helpless doe.

He said to her, "O Sita, you have shown your devotion to your husband for long enough. Delicate-limbed one, take pity on me. Let these maidservants of mine bathe and adorn you now, and take me for your lord. Put on rich clothes and ornaments, and be the first among all my women. Many daughters of Devas and Gandharvas are mine. I am lord of countless lovely Danava and Daitya women.

One hundred and forty million Pisachas, twice as many man-eating Rakshasas of terrible deeds, and three times as many Yakshas are at my command. Only some of these are ruled by my brother Kubera, who is the lord of all treasures. In my drinking hall, lovely one of the beautiful thighs, Gandharvas and Apsaras wait on me and my brother.

I am the son of that Brahmanottama, Rishi Visravasa, of the immense tapasya. I am celebrated as the fifth Lokapala. Beautiful one, I enjoy the finest food and drink in all the worlds; why, I have as much wealth as the Devadeva himself. Let me put an end to your life of misery in the forest. O you of the fair hips, be my queen, equal to Mandodari."

The exquisite Vaidehi turned away, dismissively, as if he was as insignificant as a piece of straw, and replied to that night wanderer. The princess of Videha, who considered her husband her god, her deep, firm breasts drenched by her unending tears, said to that degenerate Demon, "It is my misfortune, O king of Rakshasas, that I am forced to listen to such noxious words. Blessings be yours, Rakshasa, lover of sensual pleasures. But turn your mind away from me; I am the wife of another and am faithful to my husband. You can never possess me. In this helpless state, I am not a fit wife for you. What joy will you find by forcing yourself on an unwilling woman?

Your father is a wise Brahmana, born of Brahma and equal to Prajapati. Being a Lokapala, why do you not live by dharma? How can you feel no shame for having disgraced your brother, the worshipful Lord of the Yakshas and the nine treasures, Kubera who is the friend of Maheswara himself?"

And Sita began to weep, her breasts trembling in agitation, and she covered her neck and face with her garment. Her long, black, glossy braid tumbled from her head, like a black snake.

Having heard Sita's sharp admonition, Ravana said sadly, "Devi, let the Deva who has a makara for his emblem burn me if I come near you, when you are unwilling. What can I do to you, who still adore Rama, a mere man?"

Saying this to that princess of blemishless character, the Rakshasa king made himself invisible and went away to a favoured spot, alone, to console himself. And Sita, surrounded by the Rakshasa women, and treated with gentleness by Trijata, continued to live there in sorrow.' "

"Markandeya continues, 'Meanwhile, Rama and Lakshmana continued to live under the clear blue sky, on the hillside of the Malyavat mountain. One night, while gazing from the mountain-top at the bright moon surrounded by planets and stars in the cloudless sky, cool breezes, redolent with the scent of lilies, lotuses and other lily-like flowers blew, and Rama was reminded sharply of Sita.

Dejected at the thought of Sita in the home of the Rakshasa, Rama spoke to the heroic Lakshmana in the morning. "Go, Lakshmana, to Kishkindha and find that ungrateful king of the Vanaras, that selfish and licentious wretch, whom I set upon the throne of Kishkinda to rule over all apes, monkeys and bears. Mahabaho, look for that ingrate, for whose sake I killed Vali. Lakshmana, that worst of Vanaras has forgotten me in my time of anguish.

I think he will not fulfil his pledge, and out of foolishness, he disregards the one who has done him these favours. If you find him apathetic and indulging himself in pleasure, you must send him on the same path that we did Vali. It will be for the good of all creatures.

If, on the other hand, you find that he happily espouses our cause, bring him here at once. Hurry now and return quickly."

At once, the ever obedient Lakshmana, always mindful of his elders, set off, taking his beautiful bow and arrows with him. He entered the gates of the city of Kishkindha unchallenged. The Vanara king Sugriva came out to meet him, realising that he had come in anger. He and his wife received Lakshmana in honour and with genuine humility. The heroic Saumitra then repeated Rama's words to him.

Great king, after hearing everything, Sugriva reverently folded his hands and, joined by his wife and servants, said joyfully to that most valiant Kshatriya, "Lakshmana, I am neither wicked, nor ungrateful, nor destitute of dharma. Let me tell you what efforts I have made to discover where Sita is being held captive. I have despatched intelligent monkeys in all directions and instructed them to return within a month. They will search the entire Earth—her forests, hills and seas, and her villages, towns, cities and deep mines. In five days, that month will end, and Rama and you will hear happy news."

Noble Lakshmana was pacified and he, in turn, paid his respects to the king of the Vanaras. They both went back to Malyavat, where Rama waited, and Lakshmana told him that the mission to rescue Sita had already begun. Soon, having meticulously sought Sita, thousands of monkey lords began to return from the three quarters of the earth—the north, the east and the west; only the ones that had gone south were yet to return.

Those that came back reported that although they had searched everywhere—on earth as well as across the seas, they had not found any trace of Vaidehi or Ravana. By now in an anguish of despair, Rama pinned his hopes on the monkeys that had gone south, and somehow eked out the days.

Two months went by, when several monkeys hurried to Sugriva and, in urgent voices said to him, "O king, Pavana's son and Vali's son Angada, along with the other great Vanaras that you sent to the south, have returned and are wrecking your madhuvanam, the vineyard that first Vali and then you nurtured so lovingly."

Sugriva, hearing this, knew that they had succeeded in their mission, for success often leads to such exuberance. Vanarottama Sugriva shared his thought with Rama. Rama, too, felt that Sita had been found. Then, rested and refreshed, Hanuman and the other monkeys came to their king, who was with Rama and Lakshmana. Bhaarata, Rama saw Hanuman's bearing and the colour of his face, and he was sure that this Vanara had actually seen Sita. Those successful monkeys, with Hanuman at their head, bowed low to Rama, Lakshmana and Sugriva.

Rama took up his bow and quiver of arrows and said to the monkeys who stood before him, “Have you accomplished your mission? Are you going to breathe life into me again? Are you going to enable me to reign in Ayodhya after killing my enemy in battle and rescuing Janaki? As long as Vaidehi is a captive, and as long as Ravana remains alive, I do not care to live, robbed of both my wife and my honour.”

The son of Vayu said to Rama, “I bring you good news, O Rama: I have seen Janaka’s daughter! After searching all the lands of the south for a long time, its hills, forests and mines, we became weary. At last, we saw a great tunnel, many yojanas in length, and went into it. It was dark and deep, overgrown with tree-roots and infested with worms.

We went deep into the tunnel and suddenly emerged into sunshine, and we saw a beautiful palace. Raghava, it was the home of the Daitya Mayaa. There we saw a female Muni named Prabhavati at tapasya. She gave us food and drink and, refreshed, we continued our journey along the way she pointed to us.

At long last, we came out of the interminable tunnel and heard ocean waves; and we saw the Sahya, the Malaya and the great Dardura mountains.

We climbed the mountains of Malaya and saw the vast ocean below us. In pain and tormented by hunger, despairing of ever returning alive, we lost heart at the sight of it. Scanning the great ocean that extended over many hundreds of yojanas, that abounded in whales, crocodiles and other marine creatures, we grew dejected and grieved at our failure. We sat together and decided to starve ourselves to death.

In the course of conversation, we happened to speak of the vulture Jatayu, and just then we saw a bird, as big as a hill, so frightful so as to strike terror into every heart, and like a second son of Garuda Vinata.

Swooping down to devour us, the enormous avian said, ‘Who are you that speak of my brother Jatayu? I am his elder brother Sampati, and I am the king of birds. Once, long ago, we both flew in a race towards the sun. My wings were burnt, but not Jatayu’s. That was the last time I saw my beloved brother, the king of vultures! With my wings burnt, I fell onto this great mountain, and here I still am.’

We told him briefly of the heroic death of his brother and told him, also, of the calamity that struck you. Rajan, the mighty Sampati grieved and said, ‘Who is this Rama, and why was Sita carried away, and how was Jatayu slain? O best of monkeys, I want to hear everything in detail.’

We told him everything, about what had befallen you and the reason for our vow of starvation. The king of birds then persuaded us to abandon our vow. He said, ‘I know Ravana. The city of Lanka is his home. I saw it on the other side of the sea in a valley of the Trikuta hills. Vaidehi must be there, I am sure of it.’

Parantapa, we arose and excitedly began to discuss how we could cross the ocean. None dared to cross it, but I invoked the power of my father Vayu and crossed the ocean, which is a hundred yojanas wide. I slew some Rakshasis on the way, and finally I saw the chaste Sita in Ravana’s asoka vana. She was at tapasya, and yearning for her lord; her hair was matted; her thin body was covered with dirt; and she sat there broken-hearted and hopeless.

I recognised her as Sita by these unusual signs and, after waiting for a moment when she was alone, I approached that worshipful Devi and said, ‘O Sita, I am Rama’s messenger; I am a Vanara and Pavana’s son. I have flown through the sky to find you, and here I am. The Kshatriya brothers Rama and Lakshmana live in safety, protected and cared for by Sugriva, the king of monkeys. Rama and Saumitra are anxious about you, as is their good friend Sugriva. Your husband will soon be here with an army of Vanaras. Trust me, precious Devi; I am a monkey and not a Rakshasa.’

Sita seemed to meditate for a moment and then replied, ‘From what Avindhya told me, I know that you are Hanuman. Mahabaho, Avindhya is an old and respected Rakshasa. He told me that Sugriva is surrounded by faithful advisors like you. You may leave now.’

And she gave me this jewel as a token of proof that I had met her; indeed, this jewel helped the blemishless Sita muster the strength to live.

As further proof, Janaki told me that you once used mantras and turned a blade of grass into a deadly astra, with which you shot a crow, which was no crow but Indra’s son, while you lived on Chitrakuta. She said this would confirm that I had really met her and that she truly was Vaidehi herself.

I then allowed myself to be seized by Ravana’s soldiers, and I set fire to the city of Lanka,” said Hanuman,’ says Markandeya.”

"Markandeya says, 'At Sugriva's command, all the best of monkeys and the Vanara chieftains assembled on the mountainside where Rama sat.

Vali's father-in-law, the illustrious Sushena, accompanied by a thousand crores of powerful jungle-folk, came there; those two foremost of monkeys, Gavaya and Gaja, each accompanied by a hundred crores of monkeys, came there. Rajan, the fearsome Gavakshya, with the tail of a bull, came with sixty thousand crores of monkeys; the renowned Gandhamadana, who lived on the mountain of the same name, came, bringing a hundred thousand crores of monkeys; the intelligent and mighty Panasa mustered fifty-two crores of monkeys, and came to Rishyamuka; that best and most illustrious of monkeys, Dadhimukha of the unquenchable energy gathered a large army of powerful monkeys, and came; Jambavan came, with a hundred thousand crores of ferocious black bears with tilaka marks on their foreheads.

All these and countless other great monkey chieftains came there, O king, to help Rama in his mission. With bodies like mountains, roaring like lions and leaping about everywhere in excitement, these monkeys set up a deafening commotion. Some of the Vanaras looked like mountain peaks; some looked like buffaloes; some were as dark as autumnal clouds; and some had faces as bright red as vermillion. Monkeys swarmed in from all directions, some leaping about, some falling down, and some scattering the dust as they came. And that monkey army, vast as the sea at full tide, camped there at Sugriva's command.

Once the force of monkeys had gathered, Rama and Sugriva chose a good day, when the stars were in auspicious conjunctions, and led forth that massive host, eager for battle, their minds set on destroying the very world.

Hanuman, the son of Vayu, went in front, while the rear was guarded by the fearless son of Sumitra. Surrounded by the monkey lords, the two princes of Raghukula, with their fingers in lizard-skin gloves, shone as they rode out; and they were like the Sun and the Moon in the midst of the planets.

The monkey host, armed with rocks, and sala and tala trees, was like a vast cornfield under the morning sun. And that mighty army, protected by Nala and Nila, by Angada and Kratha, and by Mainda and Dwivida, marched to accomplish Raghava's purpose. The army made many peaceful overnight camps on their way, in wide, lush fields and valleys rich with fruit, roots and honey, where there was plentiful water and meat. Finally, the Vanara legions reached the shores of the ocean, and looking a sea itself, the jungle army brilliant with countless colours, camped there.

The noble son of Dasaratha called Sugriva to him alone and said, "This army is vast, and the ocean is, as well. How shall we cross the endless waves?"

At this, many vain monkeys said confidently that they could easily cross the ocean. But this was not of much use as they could not all cross on their own. Some of the monkeys proposed that they cross in ships, some in boats and some on rafts of various kinds.

However, appeasing them all, Rama said, "The sea here is a full hundred yojanas wide. O heroes, all the Vanaras will not be able to cross it. Besides, we do not have enough boats to carry across all the troops. It is not dharma for us to interfere with trade by commandeering merchant ships, or fishing boats or rafts.

Our army is immense, and the enemy will use any little weakness to wreak havoc on us. I do not recommend crossing the sea in ships, boats and rafts. I will pray to the Lord of the waters to show us the way. I will fast and lie on this shore. He will certainly show himself to me. If he does not, I will punish him with astras that blaze brighter than fire and are unquenchable."

Both Rama and Lakshmana touched the water in ritual purification and lay down on a bed of kusa grass, spread upon on the sand. The divine Sagara, the lord of all rivers, surrounded by his aquatic creatures, appeared to Rama in a vision.

The Ocean, surrounded by innumerable gem-filled mines, spoke sweet words to Rama. He said, "O Son of Kausalya, Manavarishabha, tell me how I can help you. I, too, am from the Ikshvaku dynasty, and your kinsman."

Rama said, "O Lord of male and female rivers, I want you to create a pathway for my troops, using which, I can reach Lanka and kill Dasagriva Ravana, that dreg of the Pulastyas. If you do not make me the way I ask of you, I will dry you up with my divine astras."

Hearing what Rama said, the Ocean joined his hands in respect and said in distress, "I do not want to put any obstacles in your way. I am no enemy. Listen, Rama, to what I say and then do what is fitting. If I give your army passage at your command, others will threaten me with their weapons and order me to do the same.

In your army there is a monkey named Nala, who has boundless strength and skills. He is the son of Tashtri, the architect of the Devas. Whatever he throws into my waters, be it wood, grass or stone, I will hold it up on the surface, and you will have a bridge to cross on." Saying this, Sagara disappeared.

Rama arose, called Nala to him and said, "Build a bridge across the sea. You are the only one who can."

It was thus that Rama, scion of the Kakutsthas, had a bridge built, which was ten yojanas wide and a hundred yojanas long. And to this day that bridge remains famed and is known as Nalasetu, Nala's bridge. Only when the bridge was completed did Nala, of the mountainous body, come out of the water, at Rama's command.

While Rama was still on this side of the ocean, the virtuous Vibhishana, brother of the king of Rakshasas, accompanied by four of his ministers, came to him. The noble Rama welcomed him with affection. Sugriva, however, feared that he might be a spy, but Rama was convinced of his good intentions because of his transparent sincerity and demeanour, and he honoured the good Rakshasa. He installed Vibhishana as the sovereign of all the Rakshasas and made him his own counsellor and a friend of Lakshmana's. It was under Vibhishana's guidance, Rajan, that Rama and his troops crossed the great ocean by means of that bridge; and it took them a month.

As soon as they arrived in Lanka, Rama ordered the monkey army to wreck the numerous and expansive gardens. While Rama's troops were thus engaged, Vibhishana captured two of Ravana's ministers and spies, Suka and Sarana, who had disguised themselves as monkeys and come among the Vanaras. When those night-rangers assumed their real forms, Rama showed them around his troops and dismissed them quietly. Then, after creating camps for his legions in the gardens of that verdant island, he sent the wise Angada as his envoy to Ravana.' "

"Markandeya says, 'He settled his army in Lanka's groves, abundant in food and water, fruit and roots; and Rama, descendant of the Kakutsthas, took loving care of them.

Ravana's city was magnificent and fortified, with many contrivances built to prevent the entry of enemies. Impregnable with formidable ramparts and gateways, it was circled by seven deep moats that were full of fish, sharks and crocodiles; into these moats pointed stakes of khadira wood had been driven.

The ramparts, heaped with stones for the great catapults that were used to protect them, were unassailable. The warriors who guarded the walls were armed with earthen pots filled with venomous snakes and toxic powders of many kinds; they also had fire-brands, arrows, lances, swords and battle-axes; and satagnis and sturdy maces covered in wax so they could be set alight.

At all the lofty gates of the city were both mobile and fixed encampments manned by large numbers of infantry, supported by countless elephants and horses.

Angada reached one of the gates of the city and announced himself to the Rakshasas. He entered the town without suspicion or fear and, surrounded by Rakshasas, that handsome Vanara prince looked like the Sun amidst dark clouds. He approached that scion of Pulastya's race, who sat in the midst of his counsellors, and saluting Ravana, the eloquent Angada delivered Rama's message.

He said, "O king, Rama, the descendant of Raghu, who rules in Kosala, and whose fame has spread throughout the world, says these words to you:

Kingdoms are corrupted by sinful kings who cannot control their souls and are ruined by their sins. You have attacked me by abducting Sita, and you will cause the death of many innocent people. Inflated with power and pride, you have killed numberless Rishis living in the jungle and you have insulted the Devas. You have killed great kings and sorrowing women. Retribution for those vicious sins is about to overtake you, for I will kill you and all your advisors.

Fight! Show me your valour. O wanderer of the night, although I am a mere mortal, behold the power of my bow. Release Janaka's daughter Sita. If you do not set her free, I will rid the Earth of all her Rakshasas with my arrows."

The defiant message was intolerable to Ravana, and he became incoherent with rage. Four Rakshasas, adept at reading every nuance of their master's body and face, seized Angada, like four eagles taking a tiger. Held fast in the grip of those four, Angada sprang up and landed on the terrace of the palace with such velocity that the Rakshasas lost their hold on him and fell down to the flagstones below, bruised and their ribs broken. From the golden terrace on which he had alighted Angada leapt down, and out over the walls of Lanka, and flew to his comrades.

He went to Rama and, after relating all that had happened, and with Rama's permission, Angada of the magnificent tejas retired to rest before battle.

Then Rama used all those monkeys, who were as swift as the wind, in a single action, and stormed the walls of the city, bringing them crashing down. With Vibhishana and Jambavan, king of bears, marching ahead of him, Lakshmana blasted down the southern gate of the city that was once impregnable. Rama attacked Lanka with a hundred thousand crores of monkeys, skilled warriors all, and ruddy-skinned like young camels. Crores of grey bears with long limbs and huge paws also rushed forward to support the Vanara forces. The monkeys leapt up and down everywhere, and raised such a pall of dust that the bright orb of the Sun was invisible.

The people of Lanka saw their city-walls turn a tawny colour, covered as it was by monkeys, some as golden as stalks of ripe paddy, some grey as shirisha flowers, some red as the rising Sun, and some pale like bleached flax or hemp. The Rakshasas, with their wives and elders, marvelled at that wondrous sight.

The monkey warriors pulled down pillars made of precious stones, and wrecked the terraces and roofs of palatial mansions. They shattered the catapults and their missiles into fragments and scattered them everywhere. They flung the sataghnis, the discs, clubs and stones down into the city, with great violence and explosions. The Rakshasas that had been stationed on the walls as guards took to their heels and fled, in their thousands.

Hundreds of thousands of dreadful Rakshasas, who could assume any form at will, came to battle at the command of the king. With a barrage of arrows they drove the forest-dwellers away and the demons stood on the ramparts in a display of strength. Those massive Rakshasas forced the monkeys off the walls and, struck by enemy lances, many monkey chieftains fell from the ramparts. Crushed by falling columns and gateposts, many Rakshasas, too, fell to their deaths.

The monkeys and the dreadful Rakshasas, who began to eat them, locked in a bloody struggle. They seized one another by the hair and tore each other apart with their claws and fangs. The roars of Vanaras and Rakshasas filled the air, and so many on both sides fell to rise no more. Neither side was willing to yield.

All this time, Rama poured a thick stream of arrows on Lanka, like clouds do rain, and his arrows inundated the city, killing innumerable Rakshasas. The mighty Saumitra, Lakshmana, untiring in battle, picked particularly strong Rakshasas on the ramparts and killed them one by one with narachas, iron arrows ablaze. And when the monkey army had pulled down the fortifications of the city of Lanka, making easy targets of everything within, Rama called a halt and commanded his simian forces to desist.' "

"Markandeya said, 'While the withdrawn troops were resting, many small Rakshasas and Pisachas, loyal to Ravana, insinuated themselves invisibly amongst them. Among these infiltrators were Parvana, Patana, Jambha, Khara, Krodhavasa, Hari, Praruja, Aruja and Praghasa. But Vibhishana knew them and undid the maya which made them invisible; the Vanaras leapt on them and killed them all. Ravana could not bear this, and he marched out at the head of his troops.

Ravana, who was as expert in the art of warfare as Usana, marched out, surrounded by his fearsome army of Rakshasas and Pisachas in a vyuha known as Usana, and fell on the monkeys. Seeing Ravana come, with his army arrayed in that formation, Rama deployed his jungle legions in the apposite counter formation recommended by Brihaspati. And the battle between Rama and Ravana began.

Lakshmana faced Indrajit; Sugriva fought Virupakshya; Nikharvata fought Tara; Nala fought against Tunda, and Patusa engaged Panasa. Each warrior on the battlefield fought against one that he considered a match for him. That encounter, so frightful to the timid, became unbearably fierce, like that between the Devas and the Asuras in the days of old.

Ravana covered Rama with a storm of arrows, lances and swords; and Rama tormented Ravana with stone-whetted iron arrows. Lakshmana struck Indrajit with arrows that would penetrate the body's most vital organs; and Indrajit responded with an arrowy deluge. Vibhishana showered arrows on Prahasta, who countered with a like shower, both fighting recklessly with winged arrows sharpened to deadly points.

And then, between those mighty warriors there followed a duel with awesome Devastras, and the three worlds with their mobile and immobile creatures were terror-stricken.' "

"Markandeya says, 'Prahasta suddenly rushed against Vibhishana and, with a roar, fetched him a staggering blow with his mace. Despite being struck with such force, the mighty-armed and wise Vibhishana held his ground and stood firm, like the Himavat mountain. He took up a javelin adorned with a hundred bells and, investing it with the power of mantras, hurled it at Prahasta's head. Like a thunderbolt, that weapon sloughed off Prahasta's head, and he looked like a mighty tree felled by the wind.

When he saw Prahasta killed, Dhumraksha charged the Vanara host in fury. And when the monkey leaders saw Dhumraksha's soldiers flying towards them like swift, dark storm-clouds, they broke ranks and fled. And when that tiger among Vanaras, Pavana's son Hanuman, saw those best of monkey warriors lose heart, he came forward to take up the fight. And, Rajan, when the retreating jungle warriors saw how fearlessly Pavana's son stood on the battlefield they turned back at once to support him.

Fearful was the din that arose from Rama and Ravana's forces clashing; the field was soon a quagmire of blood.

Leading the demon onrush, Dhumraksha attacked the monkey host with volleys of winged shafts; then Hanuman confronted him. Fierce was the contention between the Vanara and the Rakshasa heroes, like the one of long ago between Indra and Prahlada.

The Rakshasa struck the Vanara with maces and spiked clubs, and the monkey struck the demon with uprooted trees. Finally, the enraged Hanuman slew the Rakshasa along with his charioteer and horses, and smashed his chariot into little pieces.

Seeing Dhumraksha killed inspired the monkeys with courage, and abandoning all fear, they charged the Rakshasa army, with whoops and roars. They slaughtered countless Rakshasas, and the remaining fled back into Lanka. The remnants of the Rakshasa host came to their kng and told Ravana of everything that had happened. When he heard how Prahasta and Dhumraksha had been killed and their armies destroyed, Ravana sighed deeply and rose from his throne.

"The time has come for Kumbhakarna to come to battle," he said, and awoke his brother from his long, deep slumber with noisy instruments being blown into that monster's jug-like ears. In an anguish of anxiety, Ravana said to Kumbhakarna, now awake and sitting relaxed on his bed, "How fortunate, my brother, that you can enjoy profound and undisturbed sleep, unknowing of the calamity that has overtaken us. Rama and his monkey army have crossed the ocean by a bridge and, with scant regard for our might, wage a terrible battle against us.

I stole his wife Sita from him, and he has come to rescue her. He has already killed our kinsmen Prahasta and some others. Parantapa, there is no one alive, other than you, who can vanquish Rama. O bravest of all, put on your armour and go at once to dispatch Rama and his followers. Dushana's two younger brothers, Vajravega and Pramathina, will join you with their forces."

After Kumbhakarna, the Rakshasa king gave Vajravega and Pramathina their orders; and the warrior brothers marched out of the city behind Kumbhakarna.' "

"Markandeya says, 'Kumbhakarna set out from the city with his legion, and soon saw before him the victorious monkey troops. He scrutinized the monkey army, looking for Rama, and saw Sumitra's son Lakshmana standing at his post, bow in hand.

Seeing the titanic Kumbhakarna, the Vanara warriors rushed at him and, surrounding him, cast great trees at him. Fearlessly, many began to tear at his body with their nails, while other monkeys fought in more conventional ways. They mantled that lord of the Rakshasas with a shower of myriad weapons, but Kumbhakarna only laughed and began to devour them. He ate those best of the monkey-folk—Chala, Chandabala and Vajrabahu.

The other monkeys saw this and they howled long and loud with fear. Hearing the screams of the monkey chieftans, Sugriva, the noble king of the Vanaras, charged Kumbhakarna and struck the Rakshasa a stunning blow on his head with the trunk of a sala tree. The agile Sugriva broke the tree on Kumbhakarna's head, but it made no impression on the gigantic demon. Indeed, as if roused from his torpor by that blow, Kumbhakarna stretched his arms and seized Sugriva, and dragged him away towards the city.

Seeing Sugriva being hauled away, Lakshmana, the heroic son of Sumitra, the giver of joy to his friends, and the slayer of hostile heroes ran at Kumbhakarna and shot an astra embellished with golden wings at him. The arrow pierced the Rakshasa's coat of mail and passed cleanly through his body, and embedded itself in the earth, stained with his blood.

Kumbhakarna, his chest bored through, released Sugriva and, picking up a great boulder, charged at Lakshamana.

As the Rakshasa rushed towards him, Lakshmana cut off his upraised arms with two shafts whose tips were like razors. As soon as the Rakshasa's two arms were severed, twice that number of arms appeared on his body. The hands on every arm scooped up huge rocks, but Lakshmana, masterly bowman, cut them off, as well.

That Rakshasa assumed a stupendous form with many heads, arms and legs; but Saumitra sent forth a Brahmastra and blew the mountainous body apart.

Struck by that divine weapon, the Rakshasa fell on the field of battle, like a huge tree with spreading branches struck by a thunderbolt from heaven. The Rakshasa warriors saw the mountainous Kumbhakarna of the dazzling tejas, who was like Asura Vritra, lying lifeless on the field and ran in terror.

Seeing the Rakshasa warriors flee, the younger brothers of Dushana, rallied them and rushed at Saumitra in fury. However, with a roar, Lakshmana easily deflected the winged arrows with which the enraged Vajravega and Pramathina attacked him.

O Prithaputra, fercious was the battle that ensued between Dushana's brothers and the sparkling Lakshmana, and it made the hairs of the onlookers stand on end. Lakshmana shrouded the two Rakshasas with arrows, and the two enraged Rakshasa heroes covered Lakshmana with a storm of stinging shafts.

That encounter between Vajravega and Pramathina and Mahabaho Lakshmana lasted only a short while, when Pavanaputra Hanuman, an entire mountain peak in his hand, ran at Vajravega and flattened him with it; and the mighty Nala crushed Dushana's younger brother Pramathina, also with a massive crag.

Still, the deadly struggle between Rama and Ravana's soldiers raged unabated. The Vanaras killed hundreds of Rakshasas, and just as many of them were slain, as well. However, the Rakshasa lives that were lost far outnumbered the number of simian dead.' "

"Markandeya says, 'Ravana learned of the deaths of Kumbhakarna and his followers; he heard that the great Prahasta and Dhumraksha had been killed, and he said to his son, the heroic Indrajit, "O Parantapa, you must go to battle against Rama, Lakshmana and Sugriva, and kill them all. My son, I had fame because you vanquished the wielder of the Vajra, the thousand-eyed husband of Sachi. My son, use maya to become invisible, use the divine astras you received as a boon from the Devas and annilhilate my enemies, O best of warriors.

Not Rama, Lakshmana or Sugriva will withstand even a mere touch of your weapons, let alone their followers. Let the victory that eluded Prahasta and Kumbhakarna be yours, Mahabaho. Raze, burn my enemies and their jungle legions and enhance my joy, my son, just as you did once by humiliating Indra."

Indrajit put on his armour, mounted his chariot and drove to the battlefield, O king. That Rakshasa loudly announced himself and challenged Lakshmana, the bearer of auspicious marks, to single combat. Lakshmana rose and rushed at that Rakshasa with his bow and arrows, striking fear into his opponent by twanging his bow-string against the leathern glove of his left hand. Awesome and dreadful was the duel between those warriors, both masters of the Devastras, each defying the other to match his prowess, and both desperate to win.

When Ravana’s son found that his arrows did not harm Lakshmana, Indrajit summoned his vast energy and hurled countless spears at him with blinding force. The son of Sumitra effortlessly clove the lances with his arrows, and the shredded weapons fell impotent to the ground.

Then the handsome Angada, the son of Vali, pulled up a huge tree and charged Indrajit, and struck him on his head with the bole. Undaunted, Indrajit cast a lance of sorcery at Angada but Lakshmana shattered that weapon.

Undeterred, Indrajit struck Angada, who stood close to him, on his left side with a mace. Warding off the blow, the enraged and vigorous son of Vali flung a massive sala tree at Indrajit. O son of Pritha, pitched with vicious force, the tree smashed Indrajit’s chariot and slew his horses and charioteer.

Ravana’s son leapt down from his ruined chariot and, using maya, vanished. When Rama saw the Rakshasa, that illusionist, vanish so suddenly, he ran forward to protect his troops. The invisible Indrajit, using Devastras, now freely pierced Rama and Lakshmana all over their bodies; but the brothers were never gravely injured; they fought on against Ravana’s son cloaked in maya.

The raging Indrajit besieged those Narapumgavas with thousands of razor-tipped shafts; the Vanara troops, armed with rocks, swarmed around, seeeking the invisible warrior who scorched them with an endless firestorm of arrows, even as he continued to attack the Kosala brothers. Pierced all over with fell arrows, Rama and Lakshmana suddenly fell, like the Sun and the Moon fallen from the sky.’ ”

"Markandeya says, 'Seeing Rama and Lakshmana lying unmoving on the ground, Ravana's son created a mesh of subtle astras and encased them inside it. Snared in Indrajit's arrowy net, those Naravyaghras looked like caged hawks. Sugriva and his Vanaras surrounded the brothers, who lay wounded and captive on the ground. The king of the jungle stood there, stunned, with Sushena and Mainda, Dwivida, Kumuda and Angada, Hanuman, Nila, Tara and Nala.

Meanwhile, Vibhishana, who had secured victory in another part of the field, arrived there and, using an astra called prajna, awakened the brothers from their swoon. Carefully, Sugriva drew Indrajit's arrows from their bodies and applied the miraculous herb Visalya to their wounds, while chanting divine mantras. The Kshatriya brothers arose, their pain gone, and full of vitality again.

Prithaputra, seeing that Rama of the Ikshvakus was quite restored, Vibhishana joined his palms together and said, "O Parantapa, Kubera, king of the Guhyakas, has sent one of his people to you from the Sweta mountains; and with him he has sent a gift of water from his enchanted gardens. Rajan, if you, or anyone you choose to give it to, wash your eyes with the water, you will be able to see anyone who has become invisible."

Saying Tathaastu, Rama took that sacred water and washed his own eyes with it; and the noble Lakshmana did the same. Then Sugriva and Jambavan, Hanuman and Angada, Mainda, Dwivida and Nila, and many other important Vanaras cleared their eyes with that water.

Exactly as Vibhishana had said, O Yudhishtira, now they could all see much that they could not before: worlds and beings hidden to ordinary sight.

Meanwhile, flushed with his success, Indrajit went to his father and, after telling Ravana of his feats, quickly returned to the field of battle and placed himself at the van of his army. Then, urged by Vibhishana, Lakshmana ran towards Ravana's choleric son, who had returned lusting for battle.

Incensed by what had transpired earlier, Lakshmana came to kill the arrogant Indrajit who had not completed his nityakarma, and struck the conqueror of Indra with a torrent of arrows.

The duel between those two, both intent on killing the other, was like the long ago battle between Indra and Prahlada; it defied the imagination. Indrajit struck Sumitra's son with shafts that pierecd deep into his body, and Sumitra's son retaliated with his own fiery arrows. Wounded by Lakshmana, Ravana's son was beside himself and shot Lakshmana with vicious, venom-tipped barbs.

Now listen, Yudhishtira, to how the heroic Saumitra took his adversary's life with three final arrows, burning with energy. With the first one, he severed from Indrajit's body the arm with which the demon prince grasped his bow. With the second arrow he hewed away the other arm, which held arrows, and it fell to the ground. With the third, the last one, a bright and crescent-tipped shaft, he cut off Indrajit's haughty, handsome head with its fine nose and glittering earrings.

Shorn of arms and head, Indrajit's torso was frightful to look at. Thus, Lakshmana killed his greatest adversary and then, that mightiest of mighty men easily dispatched Indrajit's sarathy. The dead prince's horses galloped back to Lanka, dragging an empty chariot behind them.

Ravana saw the chariot without his son on it, and when he heard that his son had been killed his heart was gripped by a pang of intolerable grief. In his anguish, the lord of all Rakshasas wanted to kill the princess of Mithila. Seizing up a sword, Ravana ran to asoka vana, where Sita pined for her husband.

Avindhya saw what Ravana intended to do and tried to pacify him.

Listen, Yudhishtira, to the ways in which Avindhya tried to stop Ravana from the murder he was bent on. The wise Rakshasa said, "You sit on the glorious throne of an empire, and it is not fitting for you to kill a woman. Besides, being your prisoner, this woman is as good as dead. Destroying her body will not kill her spirit; kill her husband and she, too, will die broken. Not even Indra of the hundred sacrifices is your equal. In battle you have often chased away the gods with Indra at their head, as if they were a pack of jackals."

Seaking eloquently, and at some length, Avindhya succeeded in pacifying the seething Ravana, who grew calmer and abandoned his mad resolve. The Rakshasa king sheathed his sword and ordered his chariot to be readied for battle against Rama and his army of the wilds.' "

"Markandeya says, 'Smouldering with rage and grief at the death of Indrajit, the ten-headed Ravana climbed into his chariot, inlaid with gold and priceless gemstones. The most terrible Rakshasas, bearing all kinds of weapons, followed him, as the Rakshasa king steamed towards Rama, at whose side the monkey generals fought.

Seeing Ravana flying in high dudgeon towards Rama and the Vanara army, Mainda, Nila, Nala, Angada, Hanuman and Jambavan surrounded him with all their troops. Those foremost of monkeys and bears pounded Ravana's soldiers with tree-trunks, mashing them before their king's eyes. And seeing the enemy slaughtering his troops, Ravana, unparalleled master of sorcery, began to use dark spells against the forest warriors.

He extruded hundreds and thousands of Rakshasas from his body, all armed with spears and double-edged swords. Rama killed all those demons in a flash with Devastras, at which, O Bhaarata, the king of the Rakshasas resorted to more fell wizardry.

Now thousands of dire warriors, all replicas of Rama and Lakshamana, all armed with bows and arrows, sprang forth from his body, and rushed at the brothers from Ayodhya. Lakshmana cried out to Rama to raze that sinister legion. And Rama killed them all.

Now Indra's sarathy Matali came to Rama on the battlefield in a chariot that dazzled like the Sun, and was yoked with tawny horses. He said, "Son of the Kakutsthas, this victorious ratha drawn by this team of chestnuts belongs to the Lord of the Devas. Purushavyaghra, it is from this chariot that Indra killed hundreds of Daityas and Danavas. Rama, climb into my chariot, and kill Ravana."

But Rama did not believe Matali; he suspected that this was also Ravana's sorcery. Vibhishana said to him, "Narapumgava, this is no maya of Ravana. Climb into the chariot, for it is indeed Indra's."

Rama did so and flew at Ravana, who also flashed forward to meet him. All the Earth's creatures howled loudly, and in Devaloka the gods roared to the beating of drums. And the battle between the ten-headed Rakshasa and the prince of Ayodhya began.

So fierce was it that the like had never been seen before. The Rakshasa hurled a sizzling javelin at Rama, which resembled Indra's thunderbolt, and was powerful as the potent curse of a Brahmana. In a blink, Rama cut that javelin into shards with his arrows. Seeing this, fear lanced briefly through Ravana.

The ten-headed one began to storm Rama with tens of thousands of weapons of all kinds—spears, maces, battle-axes, darts, sataghnis and stone-whetted arrows. With maya, the Rakshasa created monstrous illusions, and the monkeys fled in terror.

Then, from his quiver, Rama took a wonderful arrow, flighted with wings and golden feathers, and with a bright and beautiful head. He fitted it to his bowstring and invoked the Brahmastra. Seeing Rama chant mantras to transform the arrow into the Brahmastra, the Devas, the Gandharvas and the Kinnaras, with Indra at their head, rejoiced, knowing that the Rakshasa was as good as dead.

Rama invoked Ravana's death and loosed that weapon of unrivalled ferocity. Bhaarata, the instant the arrow left the bow, drawn almost into a circle, and found its mark, the Rakshasa, his ratha, his sarathy and horses erupted in fire and were consumed in a flash. The Devas, the Gandharvas, the Charanas and all the other celestial ones were celebrant.

The five vital elements of life left Ravana; the Brahmastra deprived him of earthly dominion and incinerated him. His body was reduced to nothingness, not even his ashes could be seen.' "

"Markandeya says, 'Having killed sinister Ravana, king of the Rakshasas and enemy of the Devas, Rama, Lakshmana and their jungle army rejoiced. The Devas with the Rishis at their head paid homage to Rama Mahabaho. They blessed him fervently and shouted Jaya! The Devas, the Gandharvas and the Swargavasis delighted the lotus-leaf-eyed Rama with hymns in his praise and showered him with unearthly flowers. After worshipping him so, those ones of light returned to Devaloka, while the sky looked as if a great and joyous festival was being celebrated in its vaults.

Having killed Ravana, Rama of universal fame, conqueror of hostile cities, bestowed Lanka on Vibhishana. Then Ravana's wise old minister Avindhya, walking behind Vibhishana and with Sita before him, came out of the magnificent city.

Humbly, Avindhya said to Rama, "O illustrious one, take this Devi, Janaka's daughter of the unblemished character, to yourself."

Rama of the Ikshvakus alighted from the shining chariot and saw the tear-drenched Sita. Seeing that faultless one crushed by grief, her hair matted, her body covered in dirt, and wearing unwashed clothes, Rama seemed to quiver in fear: that her virtue had been lost.

He said harshly to her, "Vaidehi, you may go wherever you wish, for you are a free woman now. I have done my duty: I killed the Rakshasa because you are my wife, and he kept you forcibly in his home. But knowing dharma as I do, how, for even a moment, can I take back a woman who has been enjoyed by another? Maithili, whether you are chaste or impure, I dare not touch you; you are like sacrificial butter that has been licked by a dog."

Hearing these heartless words, the princess swooned in grief, like an uprooted plantain tree. The colour that had suffused her face in joy disappeared, as quickly as breath that mists a mirror. The monkeys and Lakshmana, too, grew very still, as if in death, when they heard Rama.

Then, all at once, the Deva who is the embodiment of purity, Brahma of the four faces, Prajapati who sprang from a lotus, flew down on his heavenly Swan before Rama. Sakra, Agni and Vayu; Yama and Varuna; Kubera, Lord of the Yakshas, the holy Rishis and king Dasaratha, radiant in their divine forms, appeared as well, in a chariot drawn by swans. The sky was luminous, crowded with Devas and Gandharvas, as if the brightest in it had drawn near the Earth.

Sita arose from where she had fallen and, in the midst of all those who were there, said to the broad-chested Rama, "O Kshatriya, I do not blame you; you know dharma well, and how to conduct yourself with both men and women. But listen now to what I have to say.

Ever-moving Prana lives in the hearts of all creatures. If I have sinned, let my life-breath leave my body. O, if I have sinned, let the other four mahabhutas—fire, water, earth and ether—also forsake my body. All this while in Lanka, I have thought of none other than you, even in my dreams. Therefore, be my lord as God has ordained."

When Sita spoke, a sacred voice, resounding throughout the Earth, was heard speaking from the skies, bringing untold joy to the Vanaras. Vayu Deva said, "Sita speaks the truth, Rama. I am the Wind God, the witness of all things. The princess of Mithila is sinless. Therefore, O king, be united with your wife."

Now Agni Deva said, "Raghava, I dwell within the bodies of all creatures. Maithili is not guilty of the smallest transgression."

Varuna Deva said, "Rama, every creature's breath originates in me, and I tell you to take Maithili back."

Then, Brahma himself said, "Scion of Kakutstha, my son, I do not find this conduct of yours strange, knowing as I do how honest and pure you are, and how well you know the dharma of a Rajarishi. Yet, listen to what I have to say. You killed the invincible Rakshasa, enemy of the Devas, the Gandharvas, the Nagas, the Yakshas, the Danavas and the great Rishis. It was because of my boon to him that, until now, none could kill him; and because, though he was evil, he was also so very great, I let him live a long life. But his abducting Sita was the sign that his end was near.

As for Sita, I protected her through the curse of Nalakubara, who said that if ever Ravana ravished an unwilling woman, his head would shatter in a hundred pieces. Rama, you have no need to be suspicious. Glorious one, take your wife back to yourself. You have achieved a mighty feat that benefits the Devas, radiant one."

Finally, Dasaratha said, "I am pleased with you, my child; bless you. I am your father Dasaratha. I command you to take back your wife and rule your kingdom, O Maryadapurusha."

Rama replied, "If you really are my father, I salute you with reverence, Rajarajan! At your command, I will return to wonderful Ayodhya."

Bhaaratarishabha, pleased with Rama, the corner of whose eyes were red, his father said, "Return to Ayodhya and rule your kingdom. My splendid son, your fourteen years of exile have ended."

Rama bowed to the gods, and with his friends' felicitations, was united again with his wife. And they looked like Mahendra, the Lord of the Devas, and Puloma's daughter. That chastiser of his enemies gave a boon to Avindhya; and he bestowed riches and honours on the Rakshasi Trijata.

Brahma, with all the Devas led by Indra, said to Rama, "Son of Kausalya, what boons does your heart desire that we can grant you?"

Rama prayed to him to grant him devotion to dharma, victory over his enemies, and the restoration to life of all the Vanaras that the Rakshasas had killed. Brahma did as he asked, and all the jungle-folk killed in battle came to life again and stood up on the battlefield, as if they awoke from a dream.

Sita granted Hanuman a boon, saying, "May you live for as long as the fame of Rama's achievements does, O Hanuman of the golden eyes; by my grace, may you always enjoy divine food and drink."

Then, even as the warriors of the immaculate deeds looked on, the Devas with Indra at their head disappeared. Seeing Rama united with Janaki, Sakra's sarathy Matali was delighted and addressed Rama as he stood in the midst of his friends.

Matali said, "Invincible Rama, you have dispelled the sorrow of the Devas, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas, the Asuras, the Nagas and Manavas.

As long as the Earth remains, so long will all creatures—Devas, Asuras, Gandharvas, Yakshas, Rakshasas and Punnagas—sing your praises."

Matali worshipped Raghava, the scion of Raghu; then, with his leave, climbed onto that chariot of Sun-like brilliance and flashed away.

With Saumitra and Vibhishana, accompanied by all the monkeys of Sugriva, Rama set Sita before all the rest and, after making arrangements for Lanka's security, crossed the ocean, home of the crocodiles, over the same bridge they had built. Rama rode in the flying vimana, Pushpaka, which could go anywhere at the will of he who rode in it. Rama, of the controlled senses, surrounded by his counsellors, in their order of importance, arrived at the same part of the seashore where he had earlier lain down in prayopavesa; and there, with the Vanaras in attendance, the virtuous king halted.

Raghunandana brought the monkeys before him, one by one, and venerated them all, giving them gifts of jewels and magical gemstones, and then sent them home. When the monkey lords, the bears and the bull-tailed apes had left, Rama went back to Kishkindha with Sugriva and Vibhishana, riding in the Pushpaka, and showing Vaidehi the sights of the forests in which they had been, as they flew over them.

When they arrived at Kishkindha, Rama, that best of warriors, installed the victorious Angada as Yuvaraja of the kingdom. Then, accompanied by the same friends, Sita and Lakshmana, taking them along the same path by which he had come, Rama flew back towards the city of his fathers.

On reaching Ayodhya, he despatched Hanuman as an envoy to Bharata. After careful observation, Hanuman made certain of Bharata's loyalty to Rama and then gave him the good news of his brother's return.

Rama went to Nandigrama, where he saw Bharata covered in dirt and clad in rags, seated with his brother's sandals before, him, talking to them even as if to Rama. O Bull of the Bhaaratas, indescribable was Rama and Lakshmana's joy at being united with Bharata and Satrughna; and great, too, was Bharata and Satrughna's rapture at being united with their brothers and at seeing Sita again.

Bharata worshipped his brother and gladly returned the kingdom that he had held as a sacred trust into Rama's hands. At the auspicious eighth hour of the day, under the Sravana nakshatra, Vasishtha and Vamadeva together crowned Rama as king of Ayodhya.

After his investiture, Rama gave leave to Sugriva, the Vanara king, and all his followers, as well as to Vibhishana of the Pulastyas, to return to their own kingdoms. Having paid homage to them with gifts and due rituals, it was with tears in his eyes and a heavy heart that Rama bid them farewell. He worshipped the Pushpaka Vimana, and sent it home to Vaisravana.

Later, assisted by Devarishi Vasishtha, Rama performed on the banks of the Gomati ten Aswamedha yagnas, with no hindrances of any kind, and with three times as many gifts to Brahmanas as before.' "

"Markandeya says, 'Mahabaho, that was how Rama of the ineffable tejas suffered during his exile in the forest. O Tiger among men, do not grieve; you are a Kshatriya, a slayer of your enemies. You walk the same path of dharma, dependent on the strength of your arms, which is sure to lead to success. You are sinless.

Even the Devas, with Indra at their head, and the Asuras will follow you in dharma. It was after similar tribulations that Indra, with the help of the Maruts, slew Asura Vritra, the invincible Namuchi and Dirghajihva, the Rakshasi with the long tongue. The man who has support fulfils all his goals.

What obstacle is there that cannot be overcome in battle by him who has Dhananjaya for his brother? Bhima of the awesome prowess is the strongest of the strong, and the young sons of Madri are mighty bowmen. With brothers like these, why do you despair, Parantapa? They can vanquish the combined armies of the Vajradhari and the Maruts.

Having such brothers, Bharatarishabha, you are sure to conquer all your enemies.

Look how these Kshatriyas performed incredible feats of valour to bring back Drupada's daughter Krishnaa, whom the sinful, arrogant Saindhava abducted. They overpowered Jayadratha, who then lay helpless and pitiful at your feet. Rama had only an army of Vanaras and Reekshas, when he rescued Vaidehi by killing Ravana in battle.

Rajan, bear all this in mind, and do not grieve. Noble souls like you never give in to sorrow, Parantapa.'

So Markandeya comforts the king, and that Kshatriya Mahatman shrugs off his melancholy and speaks once more to Markandeya."

PATIVRATA MAHATMYA PARVA

"Yudhishtira says, 'Mighty sage, I do not so much grieve for myself, for my brothers or for the loss of my kingdom as I do for Draupadi. When our evil cousins tormented us at the game of dice, it was Krishnaa who saved us; and it is she that Jayadratha carried off from our forest asrama. Have you seen or do you know of any woman as faithful and devoted as this beloved daughter of Drupada?'

Markandeya says, 'Listen, Yudhishtira, to the story of the princess Savitri and how she attained the highest faithfulness. There was once a pious and virtuous king of Madra, who was devoted in his care of Brahmanas, who was pure-souled and true to his word, who was devout in performing yagnas, and who had his senses under firm control. He was the most generous of men and everyone loved him, in towns and villages alike. This lord of the Earth, ever committed to universal welfare, was called Aswapati.

This king, of the honest, self-controlled and forgiving nature, had no children. When he grew old, he was sorrowed over this. With the object of having children, he observed rigid vows and began to live frugally and with his senses subdued, like a brahmachari. Every day, this best of kings offered ten thousand oblations to the fire, recited mantras in honour of the Devi Savitri, and ate a small meal at the sixth hour of the day. He lived in this way for eighteen years.

After eighteen years of his life of austerity, the Devi Savitri was pleased with him and appeared in her physical form before him, from the fire.

The Goddess said to him, “I am pleased, O king, with your brahmacharya, your purity and self-restraint, your observance of vratas, and with all your penance and worship. Mighty king Aswapati, ask for the boon that you desire, bearing dharma in mind.”

Aswapati said, “It is to attain dharma that I have striven all these years. O Devi, grant that I will have many sons worthy of my race. If you are pleased with me, grant me this boon. The Dvijas have told me that having children brings great punya.”

Savitri replied, “O king, I knew what you wanted and I have spoken to the Pitamaha about your wanting sons. By the grace of Brahma, you will soon have a daughter of vibrant tejas. Brahma told me to give you this glad news, to which you need make no reply.” ’

Markandeya continues, ‘The king accepted Savitri’s boon, and when he had worshipped her and said, “May this happen soon,” she vanished.

The king went back to his city, and ruled his subjects justly. Some time elapsed, and the eldest queen of Aswapati became pregnant with his child. Bhaaratarishabha, the embryo in the womb of that princess of Malava grew like the Moon in the night sky during the waxing fortnight; and when the time came, she gave birth to a lotus-eyed daughter.

Aswapati joyfully performed the life-passage rituals for her, and because Devi Savitri had rewarded his offerings by blessing him with this child, he and the Brahmanas of his court named her Savitri.

The princess grew in the likeness of Devi Sri herself in an earthly, human form and, in the course of time, attained puberty. Seeing that graceful maiden, of the slender waist and flaring hips, who looked like a living golden statue, the people thought she was a goddess. Intimidated by her blazing energy, none could marry this lotus-leaf-eyed girl who pulsated with splendour.

One day, on the occasion of a parva, Savitri, having fasted and washed her hair, came before the family deity and had the Brahmanas offer the havis and other oblations to Agni. She took the flowers that had been offered to the sacred fire and, looking as beautiful as Lakshmi, went to her noble father.

She paid reverence at her father’s feet and offered him the flowers she had brought, and that lovely maiden joined her hands together and stood beside the king. The king was sad to see that although his divinely beautiful daughter had attained puberty, she had no suitors.

He said, “My child, the time has come to give you in marriage, yet none asks for your hand. Therefore, you must select a husband whose qualities match your own and inform me of your choice. Choose anyone you wish for your husband, and I will, after deliberation, give you to him.

O blest one, listen to what I have heard Brahmanas quote from the Shastras. The father that does not give his daughter in marriage faces disgrace. The husband that does not enjoy his wife in her fertile season faces disgrace. The son that does not look after his widowed mother faces disgrace.

Take heed of what I say and find a husband. Ensure by your actions that the Devas have no cause to chastise us.”

Having spoken thus to his daughter in the presence of his faithful ministers, the king instructed his attendants to make preparations to accompany her wherever she chose to go. Bashfully bowing down to touch her father’s feet, the gentle girl set out without hesitation, to do her father’s will.

In her golden chariot, and accompanied by her father’s aged counsellors, she visited the delightful asramas of Rishis and the splendid palaces of Rajarishis. Everywhere, my son, she worshipped the feet of the venerable sages, and she travelled through all the forests one by one, distributing wealth in all the sacred tirthas where Dvijottamas lived.’ ”

"Markandeya continues, 'Bhaarata, one day the king of the Madras was seated in the midst of his courtiers, conversing with Narada, when, accompanied by his ministers, Savitri returned after visiting various tirthas and asramas. Seeing her father with Narada, she worshipped both of them by bowing her head down to their feet.

Narada said, "Where has your daughter been, Rajan, and from where has she come now? Why do you not give her in marriage, now that she has attained puberty?"

Aswapati answered, "It was on this very quest that I sent her, and from which she returns now. Devarishi, let us hear whom she has chosen as her husband."

Savitri took her father's command to be a divine request, and the blessed girl related in detail all that had happened, and at last she said, "There was, amongst the Salvas, a virtuous Kshatriya king named Dyumatsena, who was blind. This wise king had only one infant son, and an old enemy took advantage of the king's disability and seized his kingdom. With his wife and their infant held to her breast, he went to live in the forest, where he observed rigid vratas and practised austere tapasya. His son, though born in the city, grew up in an asrama. That youth Satyavan is the right husband for me, and I have given my heart to him."

Narada said, "Ah, Rajan, Savitri has erred gravely, she has made an ignorant choice. Satyavan, to whom she has give her heart, does have excellent qualities. It is because his parents are both so truthful that the Brahmanas gave him his name. When he was a child he loved horses and used to sculpt steeds out of clay and paint pictures of horses. For this, he is sometimes called Chitraswa."

Raja Aswapati then asked, "Is prince Satyavan, who is devoted to his father, endowed with tejas, wisdom, a forgiving nature and courage?"

Narada replied, "In energy Satyavan is like the Sun; in wisdom he is like Brihaspati; in courage he is like the Lord of the Devas; and in forgiveness he is like Bhumi Devi, the Earth herself."

Aswapati then said, "And is prince Satyavan devoted and generous to Brahmanas? Is he handsome and charitable, and pleasant?"

Narada said, "In generosity within his means the mighty son of Dyumatsena is like Sankriti's son Rantideva; in truthfulness of speech and devotion to Brahmanas he is like Sibi, the son of Usinara; in magnanimity he is like Yayati; in beauty of face he is like the Moon; and in beauty of form he is like the twin Aswins. He has his senses under control; he is gentle, brave and honest. He is self-restrained, faithful to his friends, free from malice, modest and patient. In short, the exalted sages of tapasyashakti say that his conduct is impeccable in its dharma, and he wears honour like a crown."

Hearing this, Aswapati said, "Lord, you have described him as one who has every noble virtue. Tell me now of his defects, if he has any."

Narada said, "He has only one, and it overwhelms all his virtues. He, who cannot be conquered by any means, has only one defect, and no other. Within a year from today, Satyavan, granted with a short life, will cast off his mortal body."

Hearing these words of the Muni, the king said, "Come, Savitri, choose another for your lord, my lovely child. The single great blemish that this young man has eclipses all his virtues. The illustrious Narada, whom even the Devas honour, says that Satyavan will leave this earthly life in exactly a year from today."

Savitri said, "A die can be cast but once; a daughter can be given away but once in marriage; and only once can a person say, I give. These three things can happen only once. Whether he lives long or dies young, whether he is virtuous or bereft of virtue, I have chosen and will not choose a second time. A decision is first made in the mind, then it is declared and, finally, executed in action. Let my decision be proof of this."

Narada said, “Aswapati, your daughter is firm in her resolve and will not swerve from the path of dharma. No one else has Satyavan’s goodness. I give my approval to this union.”

The king said, “Your words must be obeyed, illustrious one, for you speak the truth. You are my Guru, and I shall do as you say.”

Narada said, “May peace reign over the bestowal of your daughter Savitri. I leave you now with my blessings.”

Saying this, Narada rose into the sky and went to Devaloka, and on Earth, king Aswapati began to make preparations for his daughter’s wedding.’ ”

"Markandeya continues, "With Narada's words echoing in his mind, the king began to make preparations for the wedding. He summoned all the old Brahmanas, the Ritvijas and the other priests, and set out with his daughter on an auspicious day. On arriving at Dyumatsena's asrama in the sacred forest, he approached the Rajarishi on foot, accompanied by his Brahmanas.

He saw the blind monarch of great wisdom seated on a cushion of kusa grass under a sala tree. After paying his homage in proper fashion, king Aswapati humbly introduced himself, and in response the blind king welcomed him with arghya, a darbhasana to sit on and the gift of a cow.

Then he asked his royal guest the reason for his visit. The king told him why he had come.

Aswapati said, "Rajarishi, this beautiful girl is my daughter Savitri. I ask that you, who are learned in dharma, accept her as your daughter-in-law in accordance with Kshatriya custom."

Dyumatsena said, "Deprived of my kingdom, and living in the forest, we live the disciplined life of tapasvins. Your daughter is not used to this life of hardship, nor does she deserve it. How will she cope?"

Aswapati replied, "My daughter knows, as well as I do, that joy and sorrow are both fleeting; so, do not speak to me of these things. I have come here with my mind made up. I have greeted you in friendship, and you should not crush my hope. It is love that has brought me here and you ought not to refuse me. We are equals in lineage and an alliance between us is fitting. Accept my daughter as your daughter-in-law and the wife of prince Satyavan."

Dyumatsena said, "For many years, I wanted such an alliance with you, but I hesitated to ask after I lost my kingdom. Let my long-cherished wish be fulfilled today. You are very welcome, indeed."

The two kings summoned all the Dvijas who lived in the asramas of that forest, and he solemnised the marriage with the traditional rites. Having bestowed his daughter, with rich clothes and ornaments, Aswapati went back in great joy.

Having gained a wife graced with every noble quality and accomplishment, Satyavan was happy indeed, and Savitri, too, rejoiced at having got the husband of her heart's desire.

When her father left, she took off all her ornaments and put on valkala and clothes dyed red. By her service and virtue, her affection and selflessness, and by the care she gave so willingly to all, she was a source of delight to all.

She pleased her mother-in-law by attending to her comforts and by adorning her in fine clothes and ornaments. She gratified her father-in-law by worshipping him as a god and controlling her speech before him. She made her husband happy by speaking sweetly to him, by her skill in all kinds of work, by her sweet nature and by demonstrations of her love in private.

They continued to live in the forest asrama, practising tapasya, but Narada's words were never far from the mind of the inwardly sorrowful Savitri.' "

"Markandeya says, 'O king, a year flitted by and the time of Satyavan's death arrived. Ever conscious of what Narada had said, Savitri had been counting the days as they passed. On a day when she knew that only four days remained for her husband to live, she fasted day and night in observance of the Triratra vrata. Hearing of the vow she kept, the king was grieved and went to console Savitri.

He said, "Princess, this vrata that you have taken, to fast three nights in a row, is harsh and trying."

Savitri said, "Father, do not be sorry; I can keep the vow. I have undertaken it with firm resolve, and determination brings success."

Dyumatsena said, "I should not ask you to break your vrata. On the contrary, I ought to encourage you to fulfil it." And he said no more to dissuade her.

Savitri continued to fast and began to look wan and thin, like a wooden doll. And, Bharatarishabha, convinced that her husband would die the next morning, the griefstricken Savitri spent the night in anguish while she fasted. When the Sun had risen about two hands into the sky, Savitri, thinking that Satyavan's end was at hand, finished her morning rites and offered oblations to the fire.

She bowed down to the elderly Brahmanas and to her father- and mother-in-law, and she stood humbly before them with joined hands. All the Munis living in that asrama blessed her that she would never suffer widowhood. Savitri, immersed in dhyana, accepted the words of the tapasvins in her mind, silently saying, Tathaastu, so be it.

The princess reflected on Narada's words and sat still, in expectation of the hour and the dreaded moment.

Then, Bhaaratottama, her father- and mother-in-law said to the princess, "You have completed the vrata successfully, and it is time for you to break your fast. You must do what is proper."

Savitri said, "Now that I have completed the vow, I will eat when the Sun goes down. This is my resolve and the vow of my heart." '

Markandeya continues, 'When Savitri spoke thus of her first meal, Satyavan hefted his axe onto his shoulders and was about to go into the forest for wood and fruit, when Savitri said to her husband, "It is not proper for you to go alone. Let me come with you; I cannot bear to be apart from you."

Satyavan said, "You have never gone into the forest before. My love, the paths are rough and you are weak from your fast. How will you be able to walk?"

Savitri said, "I feel neither weak nor tired from fasting. I have decided to go, and you must not stop me."

Satyavan said, "If you wish to come with me, I will not prevent you, but take my parents' leave so that I will not be held responsible."

Savitri bowed to her father- and mother-in-law and said to them, "My husband is going into the forest to gather fruit. With your permission, revered father and mother, I will go with him, for I cannot bear to be separated from him today.

Your son is going to the forest for wood to feed the sacrificial fire and fruit to feed his elders, and you must not stop him. Indeed, he might have been persuaded not to go had it been on some other errand. Do not stop me either; I will go into the forest with him. It is almost a year since I have been outside the asrama. I am so looking forward to seeing the forest in bloom."

Dyumatsena said, "From the time that her father gave Savitri to me as my daughter-in-law, I do not remember her asking for anything. Let her have her wish. My daughter, do not in anyway distract Satyavan from his work."

Having received the permission of her husband's parents, the illustrious Savitri went with her husband, smiling on the outside in seeming happiness, but her heart torn in grief. As that princess of large eyes went along, she passed through picturesque and charmed glades inhabited by swarms of peacocks, but did not notice them.

Satyavan said sweetly to Savitri, “Look at these rivers of sacred waters and these lovely flower-decked trees.”

Looking only at him, the blemishless Savitri continued to watch her lord in all his moods, and remembering Devarishi Narada’s words, thought of her husband as already dead. Her heart breaking, she followed him, responding softly to all he said, dreading the final hour.’ ”

"Markandeya says, 'With Savitri helping him, the mighty Satyavan plucked fruits and filled his bag with them. Then he began to cut branches from trees, and as he did so, he began to sweat profusely and his head ached from the exertion.

Exhausted, he came to Savitri and said to her, "The work has made my head ache; my body trembles strangely and my limbs and my heart also hurt. Mithibhashini, you of restrained speech, I feel unwell; oh, my head feels as if it has been pierced by a hundred arrows. I want to sleep, Savitri, for I am too weak to stand."

Savitri quickly went to him, sat on the forest floor, and took his head on her lap. Narada's words still clear in her mind, she began to calculate the arrival of the moment of his death, by the day, the hour and the minute. The next instant, she saw a great being, clad in red, with a crown on his head. He was huge and shone like the Sun. He was dark-skinned, had red eyes, and held a noose in his hand. And he was altogether dreadful to behold.

He stood beside Satyavan, gazing steadily at him. Savitri gently placed her husband's head on the ground. She got up and, her heart trembling, said in an anguished voice, "From your appearance, you must be a Deva. If it pleases you, tell me, great one, who you are and what you intend."

Yama Deva, the Lord of Death, replied, "Savitri, you are devoted to your husband and blessed with tapasyashakti. That is why you see me and why I am talking to you. Blessed one, I am Yama. Prince Satyavan's time to live has ended, and I must bind him in my noose and take him away. This is why I have come."

Savitri said, "I have heard that your emissaries come to take away mortals, O worshipful one. Why then, have you come in person?"

The great lord of Pitrs found himself captivated by her purity, and wanting to oblige her with a reply. Yama said, "This prince is endowed with dharma and physical beauty. He is a sea of accomplishments and he does not deserve to be taken away by mere dutas. That is why I have come."

Saying this, Yama drew a thumb-sized Satyavan out of his body and bound him firmly in his noose. His linga sarira removed, Satyavan's body, deprived of life-breath, shorn of lustre and motionless, was unsightly. And binding Satyavan's pranatma, Yama went away in a southerly direction.

Overwhelmed by grief, the chaste Savitri, ever devoted to her lord and crowned with the success of her vratas, followed Yama.

Yama said, "Stop, Savitri. Go back and perform your husband's funeral rites. You are freed from all your wifely duties. You have come as far as you may."

Savitri said, "Wherever my husband is taken, or wherever he goes of his own will, I will follow him. This is the eternal dharma. By my tapasyashakti, out of my respect for my elders, from my love for my husband, by the strength of my vratas, and with your favour, my course is clear. Wise men learned in truth have declared that by walking just seven paces with another, one makes a compact of friendship with that person. As your friend now, I will say something to you, to which you must listen.

They that have their souls under control do not acquire punya by merely following the four varnasramas—brahmacharya, grihasta, vanaprastha and sannyasa. Spiritual merit is said to consist of true knowledge. And all the greatest sages have said that it is punya and not the passage of the four stages of life that is important.

By discharging the duties of just one of these four, Grihastasrama, we attain true punya and do not need the two that come after. It is for this that the wise have declared the punya gained in domesticity to be the highest of all."

Yama said, "What you say is true, Savitri, and I am pleased with you. Ask for any boon except the life of your husband, perfect one, and I will give you whatever you ask."

Savitri said, “Deprived of his kingdom and bereft of sight, my father-in-law leads a hermit’s life in our asrama. Give that king back his vision and let him be as powerful as Agni or Surya.”

Yama said, “Faultless one, I grant you this boon. It will be as you have said. You seem to be tired by your journey. Stop following me and turn back. Do not exhaust yourself any more.”

Savitri said, “What weariness can I feel when I am with my husband? My husband’s lot is mine too. Wherever you carry my husband, there I will also go. Best of Devas, hear what I have to say. Even a single conversation with one like you is a great blessing; friendship with such a one is greater still, and always fruitful. Therefore, one should live in the company of the righteous.”

Yama said, “Your words, so full of import, delight the heart and enhance the wisdom of even the learned. Savitri, ask for a second boon, anything other than the life of Satyavan.”

Savitri said, “My wise and intelligent father-in-law was deprived of his kingdom. May he regain it, and may he always adhere to his svadharma.”

Yama said, “The king will regain his kingdom, and never will he abandon his dharma. Princess, I have fulfilled your second wish. Now you must return. Do not trouble yourself anymore.”

Savitri said, “You control all creatures by your laws, and it is by your laws that you take them away, not according to your whims. That is why, Lord, you are called Yama, or the one who upholds the law. I beg you, listen to me.

The eternal duty of the righteous towards all creatures is never to injure them in thought, word or deed, but to show them love and give them their due. For me now everything in this world is like my husband – lifeless. Good men show mercy even to their enemies when these seek their protection.”

Yama said, “Your words are like water to a thirsty soul. Beautiful one, ask for one more boon, anything but the life of Satyavan.”

Savitri replied, “My father Aswapati has no sons. Grant that he may have a hundred natural sons, so that his line is perpetuated. This is the third boon I ask of you.”

Yama said, “Your father will have a hundred illustrious sons, who will perpetuate and increase their father’s line. Now, princess, you have your wish. Turn back now, you have come far enough.”

Savitri said, “Because I walk close to my husband, I am not conscious of how far I have come. Indeed, my mind travels a greater distance. Please listen, as we walk, to what I have to say.

You are the powerful son of Vivaswata, and the wise call you Vaivaswata. Lord, you dispense justice impartially to all beings, and so you are Dharma, the Lord of justice. People do not have as much faith in themselves as they do in those that are righteous. That is why all men aspire for close contact with men of dharma. It is purity of heart alone that inspires the confidence of all beings, and that is why they rely on those that live by dharma.”

Yama said, “I have never heard anyone speak as you do, devi. I am so pleased with what you say. Other than the life of Satyavan, ask for a fourth boon, and then go your way.”

Savitri said, “I wish for a hundred strong and powerful sons born to me of Satyavan, who will perpetuate our line. This is the fourth boon that I ask of you.”

Yama replied, “Devi, you shall have a hundred sons, strong and powerful, and the cause of your delight. Princess, do not tire yourself any more. Stop now. You have already come too far.”

Savitri said, “They that are righteous always practise eternal dharma. The communion of the pious with the pious is always fruitful. There is never any danger to the righteous from those that are righteous. It is the righteous who by their truth make the Sun move in sky, it is the righteous that support the Earth with their austerities, and, O Lord, it is the righteous upon whom both the past and the future depend. Therefore, they that are righteous are always happy in the company of the righteous. Knowing this to be the sanatana dharma, they that are righteous do good to others without expecting any benefit in return.

A good deed is never wasted on the virtuous, and such actions never injure honour or welfare. Since good conduct attaches to the righteous, they often become the protectors of all.”

Yama said, “The more you speak to me with words of deep meaning, in language so sweet to hear, the more I am taken with you. O you who are so devoted to your lord, ask me for some incomparable boon.”

Savitri said, “Bestower of honour, the boon you have already given me cannot be fulfilled without with my husband being alive. So, I ask that you restore Satyavan to life. Without my husband, I am as good as dead; without my husband, I have no desire for happiness; without my husband, I do not wish for Swarga itself; without my husband, I do not want prosperity; without my Satyavan, I have no wish to live. You yourself granted me the boon of a hundred sons fathered by him, yet you are taking my husband away from me.

I ask for this boon: let Satyavan be restored to life, because only by that can your boon prove true."

Defeated, saying So be it, Vivaswata's son Yama, the dispenser of justice, untied his noose and said to Savitri, "Auspicious and chaste devi, I set your husband free. You may take him back whole and healthy. He will achieve great success and he will live with you for four hundred years. He will perform great yagnas and achieve unmatched fame in this world.

Satyavan will give you one hundred sons. And these Kshatriyas with their sons and grandsons will all be kings, and will always bring honour to your name.

Your father, too, will have a hundred sons with your mother Malavi. Known as Malavas, your godlike Kshatriya brothers will be renowned, as will be their sons and daughters."

Having bestowed these boons on Savitri, Yama left for his abode. After the Lord of death had gone, Savitri went back to the place where her husband's grey corpse lay. She went to him, sat down on the ground and took his head onto her lap. Satyavan awoke and gazed long and lovingly at her, like one who has come home after a long journey through an alien land.

He said to her, "I have slept long. Why did you not wake me? And where is that dark being who was dragging me away?"

Savitri said, "Manavarishabha, you have been asleep on my lap for a very long time. That ruler of the destiny of all beings, Yama Deva, has gone away. You are refreshed now and awake, O Prince. If you feel able, rise. Look, night is upon us."

Having awoken, Satyavan got up as if he had enjoyed a refreshing sleep and, seeing that they were in a thick forest, said, "My slender-waisted one, I came here with you to collect fruit. While I was cutting wood I felt a pain in my head and could not stand anymore. So I lay on your lap and slept. I remember all this, Savitri. Then, in your embrace, as sleep stole my senses, I saw that it was dark all around. In the darkness I saw a being of incandescent radiance.

If you know what happened, tell me whether what I saw was only a dream or if it was real."

Savitri said to him, "The night deepens. I will tell you everything tomorrow. Rise now, and may God bless you always. You of the excellent vows, come and see your parents! The Sun set a while ago and night advances. Creatures with fell voices are out. I hear the sounds of predators, rustling through the woods; and the awful howls of jackals that come from the south and east make me tremble in fear."

Satyavan said, "In this absolute darkness the forest is dreadful to see. You will not be able to see the path, and we cannot go now."

Savitri said, "A fire burned in the forest earlier today, and there is a withered tree that still burns. I see its flames every time the wind fans them. Let me fetch some twigs from there and light a fire here. Do not be anxious; I can do this even if you are too tired. You are still weak and will not be able to find your way through the blackness that cloaks the forest. Tomorrow, when we can see our way clearly, we will leave this place. Anagha, tonight let us stay here."

Satyavan said, "The pain in my head has gone and my limbs feel stronger. I want to see my father and mother. I have never returned late to the asrama; my mother keeps me within its enclosure before dusk. Even when I go out during the day my parents become anxious about me, and my father and other asramavasis come in search of me. Often, in their anxiety, my parents have rebuked me for going home late. How they must worry now because of me; they will surely be distraught.

One night, the old couple, who love me dearly, wept from deep sorrow and said to me, 'Without you, son, we cannot live for even a moment. We will live only as long as you do. You are our staff; without you we are blind. The continuance of our race, our funeral oblations, our fame and our descendants, all depend on you.'

My mother and father are old, and I am their crutch. If they do not see me return at night, what will their plight be? I blame myself for having slept, and causing my parents agony. I cannot bear to live without my father and mother. I am certain that by now my blind father, his mind crazed with grief, is asking everyone who lives in the hermitage about me. I am not worried for myself, but for my father and for my feeble mother who depends on him. Ah, they must surely be demented with anxiety about me. I will live as long they live, and live for them. I know that I must take care of them and do only what pleases them."

The virtuous Satyavan, who loved and revered his parents, began to weep with his arms raised in a paroxysm of grief. Savitri wiped the tears from his eyes and said, "By the virtue of my tapasya, because of whatever I have done that is charitable and my sacrifices, may this night be a benign and peaceful one for my father-in-law, mother-in-law and husband. I do not remember ever having told a single lie, even in jest. Let my father-in-law and mother-in-law remain alive tonight by my truthfulness."

Satyavan said, "I long for the sight of my father and mother. Savitri, let us go immediately. Beautiful one, I swear on my own self that if I find any evil to have befallen my father and mother, I will not live. If you care about dharma, if you want me to live, if it is your dharma to do what pleases me, then go with me now to the asrama."

The lovely Savitri got up, knotted her hair and helped her husband up. Satyavan stood and rubbed his arms and legs briskly with his hands. As he looked about he noticed his bag, and Savitri said to him, "You can gather fruit tomorrow, and I will help you now by carrying your axe."

She hung the bag on the branch of a tree and, picking up the axe, went to her husband. The princess of the shapely thighs placed her husband's left arm on her left shoulder, and holding him with her right, she set out, with the swaying gait of an elephant.

Satyavan said, "Timid one, I know the forest paths well, for I use them regularly. I can also see them by the moonlight that shines from between the trees. We have reached the same path that we took this morning. Blessed girl, go by the way we came, rather than by some uncertain way. Near that glade of palasa trees the path forks. Take the path that goes north. I feel well and strong again, and eager to see my parents."

Saying this, Satyavan hurried towards the asrama.' "

"Markandeya says, 'Meanwhile, the mighty Dyumatsena had regained his vision and could see everything around him. Bharatarishabha, he took his wife Saibya with him and went to all the neighbouring asramas in search of their son, becoming increasingly distressed by the moment.

The old couple searched in asramas, by rivers and lakes, and in the woods. Whenever they heard any sound, they stood with their heads raised, anxiously anticipating the return of their son, and saying, O here come Satyavan and Savitri. Soon, they rushed from place to place in a frenzy, their feet torn and bleeding, and pierced with thorns and sharp kusa blades.

All the Brahmanas living in their hermitage came to them and, surrounding them, comforted them and brought them back to their own asrama. There the old sadhus diverted Dyumatsena and his wife with stories of kings of the olden days. Although that aged couple yearned for their son, they were consoled, but grew disconsolate again when they began to think of his childhood.

They began to cry heartrendingly, "Ah, Satyavan my son, O chaste Savitri, where are you?"

A pious Brahmana named Suvarcha said to them, "Considering the austerities, self-restraint and purity of Savitri, there can be no doubt that Satyavan is alive."

Another mighty Brahmana, Gautama, said, “I have studied all the Vedas and their many angas, and I have acquired great punya. I have led a celibate life as a brahmachari, and I have pleased Agni and my superiors. With disciplined soul I have observed all the vows, living at times on air alone. By the strength of my tapasya, I know what everyone is doing. I tell you that I am certain Satyavan lives.”

His sishya said, “The words that my Guru has spoken can never be false. Satyavan is definitely alive.”

And the Rishi said, “His wife Savitri has auspicious marks on her body that show she will never be widowed. There is no doubt that Satyavan lives.”

Bharadwaja said, “Savitri’s conduct, self-restraint and tapasyashakti convince me that Satyavan is alive.”

Dalbhya said, “Because you have regained your sight, and because Savitri completed her vow of fasting before she left, I am certain that Satyavan lives.”

Apastamba said, “We hear birds and wild animals all around us in the stillness; miraculously you have got your vision back, and can involve yourself again in worldly matters. These are indications that Satyavan lives.”

Dhaumya said, “Your son is graced with every noble quality and is loved by one and all; he has the marks that indicate a long life. I, too, am in no doubt that Satyavan lives.”

At what those knowing sages said, Dyumatsena’s heartache eased a little. A short while later that night, Savitri and Satyavan reached the hermitage and entered it joyfully.

The Brahmanas said, “Lord of the Earth, greetings to you on being united with your son and on regaining your vision. Being able now to see your son and your daughter-in-law make your blessing manifold. What we have said must come to pass; there can be no doubt of this. From now on, your good fortune will grow rapidly.”

Partha, the Dvijas lit a fire and sat down before Dyumatsena, after which, Saibya, Satyavan and Savitri, who stood apart, sat with their permission, their hearts light. Then all the forest-dwellers who sat with the king, prompted by curiosity, asked Satyavan, “Illustrious prince, why did you not return sooner with your wife? Why have you come so late in the night? What kept you? We want to know why you alarmed us and your parents so. Tell us what happened."

Satyavan said, "Savitri and I went into the forest with my father's permission. There, as I was chopping wood, I felt a sharp pain in my head, which made me fall into a deep sleep. This is all I remember. I have never slept so long before, and I have come home so late at night so that you will not worry about me anymore. There is no other reason."

Gautama said with a smile, "Then you do not know about your father's vision having returned? I think Savitri should tell us about that. I want to hear about it from you, for you know all the subtleties of dharma.

Savitri, you are like the Goddess Savitri herself in splendour. You must know how this happened. So, tell us truly; if it is no secret, tell us everything."

Savitri said, "I have no secret to keep, so listen to the truth of what transpired. Devarishi Narada predicted the early death of my husband, and today was the appointed day and I could not bear to be separated from him. After he had fallen asleep, Yama came and, tying my husband in his noose, began to take him away towards the abode of the Pitrs.

I followed that Deva and began to eulogise him, and he granted me five boons, of which I will tell you.

For my father-in-law I obtained two boons: the restoration of his sight and his kingdom. For my father I asked for a hundred sons. For myself I asked for a hundred sons and a life of four hundred years for my husband Satyavan. It was for my husband's life that I kept that vrata.

I have told you in detail how my enormous misfortune turned into great joy."

The Rishis said, "Chaste and gentle devi of the stern vows, graced with every noble quality and born of a noble line, you have rescued this best of dynasties, which was overwhelmed by adversity and sinking into an ocean of darkness."

The Rishis applauded her and paid their respects to that holy woman, and taking leave of the king and his son, they left for their homes, with peace and good cheer in their hearts.' "

"Markandeya says, 'When the night passed and the Sun rose in the sky, the tapasvins performed their morning rites and congregated at Dyumatsena's asrama. However much those mighty sages talked with Dyumatsena of Savitri's greatness and good fortune, they were never satisfied.

And it happened, O king, that there came to that hermitage a large group of people from Salva. They brought news that Dyumatsena's enemy had been killed by his own minister: how the minister had slain the usurper and all his friends and allies; how all the enemy's people had fled and how all the subjects were unanimous that their legitimate king be restored to the throne.

The emissaries from Salva said, "We have been sent to you with that message. This chariot and this army consisting of four kinds of forces have arrived for you. May God bless you, O king. Come! Your accession has been proclaimed in the city. Occupy forever the throne that belonged to your father and grandfather."

Seeing the king with his vision restored and looking strong, they bowed their heads and their eyes were round with wonder. After worshipping the elderly and the Brahmanas living in the hermitage, and being honoured by them in return, the king set out for his capital. With a force of soldiers protecting them, Saibya rode with Savitri in a golden palanquin, spread with splendid sheets and borne on the shoulders of men.

Arriving in the city, the priests joyfully installed Dyumatsena on the throne, also crowning Satyavan as Yuvaraja. In time, Savitri gave birth to a hundred sons, all warlike and steadfast in battle, who enhanced the fame of the Salvas. She also had one hundred powerful brothers, born to Malavi by Aswapati, the lord of the Madras.

This is the story, Yudhishtira, of how Savitri emerged from a desperate plight and took herself, her father and mother, her father-in-law and mother-in-law, as well as the dynasty of her husband to lofty heights. Like the gentle Savitri, the auspicious Draupadi, graced with a noble character, will save you all,' says Markandeya."

Vaisampayana said, "Encouraged by what the Mahatman Rishi says, the son of Pandu continues to live, now without anxiety, in the Kamyaka vana. The man who listens reverently to the blessed story of Savitri attains happiness, success in all his endeavours, and is never touched by misery."

KUNDALA HARANA PARVA

Janamejaya said, "O Brahmana, why was Yudhishtira so afraid of Karna that Rishi Lomasa conveyed a message to the son of Pandu from Indra, who promised to remove that fear after Dhananjaya had left? And, Sreshta, why was it that the noble Yudhishtira never spoke of his fear to anyone?"

Vaisampayana said, "Rajashardulam, tiger among kings, listen and I will tell you.

After twelve years of their exile have passed and the thirteenth year has begun, Sakra, who is always a friend of the Pandavas, decides to ask Karna to give him his earrings. Vibhavasu, the Sun God, whose wealth is his light, finds out what Indra intends, great king, and goes to see Karna. Best of kings, one night, when that hero, devoted to Brahmanas and truthful in speech, is sleeping peacefully on his luxurious bed, covered by a silken sheet, the radiant Deva, moved by compassion and a father's love, comes to him in a dream.

He assumes the form of a handsome Brahmana, learned in the Vedas. Surya says sweetly to Karna, 'O best of truthful men, Mahabaho, listen to what I say now for I speak from affection and for your good. Karna, with the welfare of Pandu's sons in mind, Sakra wants to have your kundalas. He will come to you disguised as a Brahmana. He knows, as all the world does, of your vow that you will always give away anything the pious ask you for but never demand a thing in return. My son, you give Brahmanas wealth or whatever they ask; indeed, you never refuse anyone. Indra is well aware of your oath and will come to beg you for your kavacha and kundala, as alms.

When he asks for the kundalas, you must not give them away, but instead appease him as best you can, for your own good. When he begs for them you must deflect him with many excuses, cite various precedents and refuse him the earrings; instead, offer Purandara other kinds of wealth, gems, women and cattle.

Karna, if you give away your golden earrings, which you were born with, your life will be shortened and you will soon meet your death. Wearing your kavacha and kundala, you are invincible to your enemies in battle. Take what I say to heart. Both your armour and earrings were made from the Amrita of immortality, and you must guard and keep them, if you value your life.'

Karna says, 'Who are you that tells me this and shows me such kindness? Please tell me, O lustrous one, who you truly are, in the guise of a Brahmana.'

The Brahmana says, 'Son, I am the Deva of the thousand rays. I say what I do out of love. Do as I say because it is to save your life that I have come to you.'

Karna replies, 'I am fortunate that the god of splendour is considerate of my welfare, and speaks to me. But listen to what I say; for I, too, speak from love. If you love me, you should not dissuade me from keeping my vow. O Vibhavasu, you are rich with the wealth of effulgence. The whole world knows that I have solemnly sworn to give anything, even my life, to a chaste Brahmana who comes to me for alms.

If Sakra comes disguised as a Brahmana, to beg so he can benefit the sons of Pandu, I will give him my kavacha and kundala, so that my fame, which has spread across the three worlds, does not diminish. It is not honourable for me to save my life by breaking my sworn oath; rather, it is my dharma to die earning the praises of the world. And so, I will give Indra my earrings and armour.

Besides, if the slayer of Bala and Vritra comes to ask for the kundala to help the Pandavas, it will enhance my fame and, also, put Indra to shame. Glorious Surya Deva, I wish for fame and honour in this world, even if it is to be bought with my life, because those who have fame enjoy Swarga, while those who have none are lost.

Renown keeps men alive in this world even as a mother does, while dishonour kills them even though they be physically healthy. Lord of the worlds, greatness is the very life of man, as is told in an ancient sloka that Prajapati Brahma himself sang: In the next world his fame supports a man, and in this world it lengthens life.

So, by giving away my earrings and mail, both of which I was born with, to a Brahmana, according to the laws that govern the giving of gifts; by offering up my body as a gift to the gods in the sacrifice of war; by doing what is hard to do and conquering my enemies in battle, I will acquire nothing but renown. By sparing frightened warriors who beg for their lives, and by dispelling the fears of old men, young boys and Brahmanas, I will win the highest fame and attain the loftiest heaven. I will guard my honour even with my life. This I swear.

By giving away such a valuable gift to Indra Maghavat, I will become a legend in this world.' ”

"Surya says, 'Karna, never do anything that is harmful to yourself, your friends, your sons, your wives, your father or your mother. O best of this Earth's creatures, men wish for renown in this world and for lasting fame in heaven, but without having to sacrifice themselves. But you want undying fame at the expense of your very life, and fame will snatch your life from you.

Purusharishabha, in this world the father, the mother, the son and other kin are useful only to the man who is alive. A king's power is useful to him only as long as he lives. Don't you understand this?

O splendid warrior, fame benefits only those that are alive to enjoy it. Of what use is fame to the dead, whose bodies have been burnt to ashes? A dead man cannot enjoy his renown, but only while he lives. The fame of a dead man is like a garland of flowers draped around the neck of a corpse.

Because you worship me daily, I tell you this for your good, for I always protect those that worship me. Mahabaho, your worship is profound and inspires my love for you. Do not doubt me, but do as I say. Besides, there is a deep mystery attached to all this, ordained by fate, which is also why I say this to you. You must trust me. O bull among men, you cannot be told this secret, which even the gods do not know. I cannot reveal it to you now, but you will understand it in time.

I repeat what I have already said, Radheya. Take my words to your heart. When the wielder of the Vajra asks for them, do not give him your kundala. Ah, with your shimmering earrings you look so radiant, like the Moon himself in the clear sky, amidst the stars of the Visakha nakshatra.

You know that fame helps only he that is living. When the king of the Devas asks for the earrings you should refuse him, my son. Repeat, over and over, different explanations for your refusing him and, in that way, Anagha, you will be rid of Indra's eagerness to have the kundala. Using pleasant and subtle arguments, Karna, remove his desire with reasoning of grave import.

O tiger among men, you always taunt and challenge the ambidextrous Savyasachi, and you will undoubtedly meet him in battle. As long as you wear your kundala Arjuna can never vanquish you, even if Indra himself comes to help him. Karna, if you want to kill Arjuna, you must never give these exquisite earrings of yours to Sakra.' "

"Karna says, 'Lord of splendour, knowing me as one who worships you, you also know that there is nothing I would not give away as daana in charity. Not my wives, not my friends, not my sons or my own self are as dear to me as you, because of the adoration I have for you. You know, maker of light, that exalted beings love their worshippers dearly. Thinking, Karna is my faithful devotee and is dear to me; and he knows no other God in heaven, you have told me what you think is good for me. Effulgent one, again I beseech you with bended head, once more I place myself in your hands, and I repeat the response I have already given you. I beg you, forgive me for refusing to do what you ask.

Death itself is not fraught with such terror for me as to break my vow. Especially when it comes to Brahmanas, I do not hesitate to give even my life for them. O Deva, I understand what you have said to me about Phalguna. Shed your anxiety about him; I will conquer Arjuna in battle. Jamadagni and Drona have both given me weapons of great power.

Permit me now, Devottama, to adhere to my vrata, so that to him of the Vajra coming to beg of me, I may give even my life.'

Surya says, 'If, my son of the mighty strength, you give your kundala to the Vajradhari, to ensure victory you must tell him of the hundred sacrifices that you will give him the earrings on a condition. Remember that with these earrings you are invincible to one and all. It is to see you killed in battle by Arjuna that the enemy of the Danavas wishes to take your earrings away from you.

Adulate Indra with truthful words, praise Purandara who has irresistible weapons, and plead with him, saying, "Give me an infallible astra which can slay any enemy and I will, O thousand-eyed Lord, give you my kavacha and kundala."

Only on this condition should you give the earrings to Sakra. With that astra, Karna, you will slay your enemies in battle. Mahabaho, that singular weapon of the Lord of Devas does not return to the hand that casts it without killing enemies by the hundreds and thousands.'

The Lord of the thousand rays vanishes. The next day, after his prayers, Karna relates his dream to Surya Deva and tells him all that passed between them in the night. After hearing everything, that enemy of Svarbhanu, the resplendent and divine Surya, says to Karna, with a smile, 'That is so.'

And Radha's son, the slayer of hostile heroes, knowing his dream to be true, and wanting to have Indra's astra, waits for Vasava."

Janamejaya said, “What was the secret that the lord of the fiery rays would not tell Karna? What were the kavacha and kundala like? From where did the armour and those earrings come? I want to hear all this, O you of the mighty austerities, tell me everything.”

Vaisampayana said, “Rajan, I will tell you the secret which the lord of the wealth of radiance does not reveal. I will also describe to you that coat of mail and those earrings.

A long time ago, there appeared before Kuntibhoja a Brahmana of fierce tejas. He was tall, with a beard and matted locks, and he carried a staff in his hand. He was handsome; his form was perfect and blazed in splendour. He had honey-coloured, yellowish-blue skin and his voice was melodious. He shone with tapasyashakti and Vedagyana.

This person said to Kuntibhoja, ‘O you who are free of pride, I would live as a guest in your house, eating food that you give me as alms. Neither you nor your people must ever displease or anger me. If, Anagha, this suits you, I will live in your house in this way. I will come and go as I wish, and no one should disturb me when I am eating or sleeping.’

Kuntibhoja cheerfully agreed and said, “Tathaastu; so be it, and even more. Wise one, I have an illustrious daughter named Pritha. She has an excellent character, she observes vows, is chaste, and of subdued senses. She will attend on you and take care of you with all reverence. You will be pleased with her disposition.’

Having said this to that Brahmana and paid him homage, the king went to his daughter Pritha of the large eyes and said to her, 'My daughter, this eminent Brahmana wishes to live in our house. I have agreed, my child, and I count on your skills in caring for Brahmanas. You must look after him with honour and reverence, to keep my word. Be prompt in giving this venerable one, who is engaged in the deep study of the Vedas, whatever he may want. Cheerfully give him everything he asks for.

A Brahmana is the embodiment of the highest tejas and also of the highest punya. It is because of the tapasya of Brahmanas that the Sun shines in the heavens. It is because of their cruelty and disrespect to Brahmanas that the Asuras Vatapi and Talajangha were killed by the curses of the holy ones.

And now, my child, I am entrusting the care of a most virtuous Brahmana to you. You must always attend on him with the utmost care. Daughter, I know that since your childhood you have always been attentive to Brahmanas, elders, relatives, servants and friends, and to your mother and me. I know how exemplary your conduct is, how you give due respect to all the deserving. My faultless one, because of your gentleness, there is not one person in the antahpuram of my palace, or even one among the servants, who is displeased with you. That is why I saw fit to have you wait upon the short-tempered Brahmana.

Pritha, you are still a girl; and you are my adopted daughter. You were born in the House of the Vrishnis, and you were Sura's favourite daughter. Your father himself gladly gave you to me because I had no child of my own. You are the natural sister of Vasudeva, and by adoption, the first of my daughters.

Your father promised me his firstborn child, and gave you to me when you were just a baby; and now you are my daughter. Born into a noble line and raised in one, you have come from one royal house to another, like a lotus taken from one lake to another.

My beautiful child, despite being disciplined with difficulty, low-born women develop perverted characters because their hearts are immature. But you are born in a royal race and you are extraordinarily lovely. You are graced with every accomplishment. Renounce pride, hauteur and self-importance, and worshipfully wait upon the boon-giving Brahmana; and you will be blessed, Pritha, and surely attain the realms of bliss. If, however, you provoke the anger of the Dvijottama, he will destroy my entire race.' "

"Kunti said, 'Father, I will keep your promise and serve the Brahmana with devotion. Foremost of kings, these are not empty words. It is my nature to worship Brahmanas, and because in this case my doing so will please you, it will surely lead me to good fortune. Whether that worshipful one comes in the morning, evening, or at night, even at midnight, I will not give him cause for anger.

I both benefit and derive joy from serving the twice-born ones, and obeying all your commands. Dispel your anxiety; you can rely on me. Truly, that best of Brahmanas shall never have cause for dissatisfaction while living in your house. I will pay particular attention to what pleases the Brahmana, and also to what will bring punya and his blessings upon you.

Anagha, I know full well that, when pleased, such eminent Brahmanas bestow even moskha, but when offended they can destroy the one who offends them. I will take great care to please this best among Brahmanas.

You will not come to grief from him through any fault of mine. The hubris of kings resulted in Brahmanas bringing about their downfall. This is what happened with Chyavana as a result of what Sukanya did. Father, as you wish, I will diligently serve the Brahmanottama.'

After she had spoken at length to reassure the king, he embraced her, and gave her detailed instructions about her duties towards the Brahmana. And the king said, 'You will conduct yourself in this way, gentle one, without fear, for my good as well as your own, and for the good of our dynasty, my perfect-limbed child.'

Saying this, the noble Kuntibhoja, who was devoted to Brahmanas, brought Pritha to that Brahmana and said, 'This is my daughter, O Dvija. She is very young and accustomed to luxury. Make allowances for her if she makes any mistakes. Great Brahmanas are never angry with old men, children and ascetics, even if these frequently err. Even a serious wrongdoing deserves forgiveness from a Brahmana. Brahmanottama, you must aceept the best worship and service that my child is able to offer you."

The Brahmana said, 'So be it,' and the happy king showed him to his apartments, that were bright and white, like swan down, or moonbeams. In the yagnasala the king placed a grand throne that had been especially made for the Brahmana. The food and everything else that he provided were equally excellent. And casting aside idleness and self-importance, the princess devoted herself with all goodwill to serving the Brahmana.

And the chaste Kunti, of the pure character, moved to these apartments to wait upon the sage. Serving him faithfully, as if he was a Deva, she made him happy indeed."

Vaisampayana continued, "That young princess of the rigid vows succeeded in pleasing the Brahmana by serving him devotedly. Foremost of kings, sometimes, saying he would be back in the morning, he would return in the evening or at night. Regardless, the girl worshipped him at all hours with offerings of delicious food and drink, and a comfortably made bed.

Days passed, and her attention to his needs only grew instead of diminishing. Even when the Brahmana reproved her, finding fault with any of her arrangements, at times speaking harshly, Pritha never showed any displeasure or did anything that was disagreeable to him.

On many occasions, the Brahmana came after the appointed hour had long passed; and on others, in the dead of night, when it was difficult to serve him food, he would demand a meal. At all those times, Pritha would give him whatever he asked for. Like a sishya, daughter or young sister, that blemishless jewel of a girl devotedly served that Brahmana, who was pleased with her conduct and her caring attention, and he valued her service highly.

Bhaarata, every morning her father asked her if the Brahmana was happy with her ministrations, and every day the girl replied that he was. And at that, the noble Kuntibhoja was delighted.

A whole year went by without that Muni being able to find any fault with Pritha. One day, he said to her, 'Gentle maiden, I am pleased with you.

O lovely girl, blessed one, ask me for boons that are difficult for people of this world to obtain, which will make you more famous than all the women on Earth.’

Kunti said, ‘I have everything I want because I have made you, who are learned in the Vedas, happy; and my father is pleased with me. I consider every boon I could wish for as having already been given to me, O Brahmana.’

The Brahmana said, ‘Susheela of the sweet smiles, if you do not want any boon from me, let me give you this mantra to invoke the Devas. Any of the gods whom you call by chanting this mantra will appear before you and do as you tell them. Willing or not, by virtue of this mantra, the particular deity will become your meek and obedient slave, under your control.’

That faultless princess could not, for fear of incurring a curse, refuse the Brahmana a second time. O king, the Brahmana taught the girl of the tender limbs the invocations that are recited in the beginning of the Atharva Veda.

Then he said to Kuntibhoja, ‘Rajan, I have lived happily in your house, always worshipped and lovingly cared for by your daughter. I am going now.’

And saying this, he vanished from where he stood, leaving the king amazed. Kuntibhoja praised his daughter Pritha and looked on her with even more affection.”

Vaisampayana said, "One day, after that great Brahmana had gone, the young Kunti began to think about the efficacy of mantras she had learnt, and she said to herself, 'I wonder what the mantras that the Mahatman taught me can achieve. Let me chant them now and discover for myself.'

Even as she thought this, she noticed the signs in her body that signalled the onset of puberty; she saw that she was menstruating. She was in her room sitting on her luxurious bed, and she saw the Sun rising in the eastern sky. Her eyes and her mind were riveted on Surya pulsing with light, and the slender girl gazed at him in fascination and could not tear her eyes away from the beauty of the Sun at dawn. Hardly aware of what she did, she mumrmured the mantra the Brahmana had taught her.

Suddenly, a celestial vision appeared within her and she saw, with her inner eye, the Sun embodied in a divine form, wearing blazing kavacha and kundala.

At the sight of Surya Deva, her curiosity to test the mantra was aroused, and she decided to try it on him. First she went through her pranayama and then invoked the Maker of Day. Instantly, he presented himself before her. His skin was golden like honey; his arms were powerful; his neck was marked with lines as on a conch-shell; he wore glittering bracelets on his arms and a crown on his head.

And he came to her, smiling and lighting up the chamber with his brilliance. With his yogic power he divided himself, setting to one side his burning half, and the other part of him standing before her.

He addressed Kunti in sweet words. The Deva said, 'Gentle one, I am bound by your mantra, and I have come to you in obedience. I am yours, to do whatever you command, princess. Tell me what you would have me do.'

Kunti said nervously, 'Worshipful one, you may go back to where you came from. It is only from curiosity that I invoked you. Forgive me, Lord.'

Surya said, 'O slender-waisted, I will return to where I have come from, as you command. However, you may not invoke a Deva in vain. Graceful one, your heart's intention was to have a son from Surya, a splendid son, born with kavacha and kundala, and with incomparable prowess. Give yourself to me, maiden with the swaying gait of a she-elephant. You shall have a son, just as you wished for.

Gentle girl of the sweet smiles, I will go back only after enjoying you. If you do not gratify me today, I will curse you in anger and your father and that Brahmana, as well. I will consume them all, and you will be to blame. I will exact retribution from your foolish father, who knows nothing of your wrongdoing, and from that Brahmana, who bestowed mantras on you without knowing your true character.

Purandara and all the Devas are watching me, and they laugh at me for having been deceived by you. Look, you can see them with your celestial vision, which I gave you so that you would be able to see me.'

The virgin princess saw the Devas standing in the heavens, each in his proper place, and in front of her was the resplendent Suryadeva of the blinding rays. The girl was frightened when she saw them all, and she blushed in mortification.

She said to Surya, 'O Lord of Light, please return to your own place. I am horrified at the outrage you propose, for I am still a maiden. Only a father, a mother and other elders can give their daughter's body away. I will not sacrifice my virtue; chastity is a woman's highest dharma. O splendid one, I called you because I was childishly eager to test the mantras. Consider that this is the act of a girl of tender years; you must forgive me, Lord.'

Surya said, 'Kunti, it is only because you are a young girl that I am speaking so gently to you. I would not make such concession to any one else. Surrender, Kunti; you will be happy. Because you have summoned me with mantras, perfect-limbed one, I cannot leave without achieving my purpose, for if I do, I will be the laughing-stock of the world and ridiculed by the Devas. Give in to me; you will have a son in my image, and you will be praised by the whole world.' "

Vaisampayana said, "Try as she might, speaking sweetly, the princess could not dissuade the Deva of the thousand rays. Afraid of a curse, she began to reflect on what she ought to do.

She thought, 'How can my innocent father and that Brahmana be saved from the angry Vibhavasu's curse, for which I am to blame. Although tejas and tapasya can destroy sins, even honest people should avoid them, particularly if they are young. Because of my youthful folly, I am in a terrible predicament. I have put myself in the hands of this Deva. Yet, how can I do what is wrong by giving in to him?'

Wracked by the fear of his curse, and by her own anxiety, a languid torpor crept over her. She was so confused that she did not know what to do. Afraid, on the one hand, Rajan, of the reproach of her loved ones if she yielded to the deity and, on the other, of his curse if she did not, at last the girl said to the Deva, in a voice trembling and shy, 'O Lord, as my father and mother and my friends are still living, I cannot violate my dharma. If I commit this sin with you, I will sacrifice the honour of this family. If, O first among heat-givers, you consider this union to be worthy, I will give myself to you, even though my family has not bestowed me. By the truth that every being's virtue, reputation, fame and life are established in you, may I remain chaste after having surrendered my body to you.'

Surya replied, 'Neither your father nor your mother, nor any of your elders has the right to give you away. Blessings be upon you, beautiful girl.

Listen to me:

The word kanya is derived from the root kama, which means desire, and it is used to denote a virgin because she desires everyone. Therefore, lovely-hipped one of the finest complexion, a virgin is free to do as she pleases. You will not, in any way, be committing a sin by giving what I ask. Would I, who am devoted to the well-being of all creatures, ever do anything that violates dharma?

Nature's law dictates that men and women should not be bound by any restraints. Anything to the contrary is a perversion of nature.

You shall remain a virgin even after having gratified me, and your son shall be illustrious.'

Kunti said, 'If, O destroyer of darkness, I have a son from you, grant that he is born with kavacha and kundala, and that he is mighty-armed and great.'

Surya answered, 'Gentle princess, your son shall indeed be mighty-armed, and decked with divine kavacha and kundala. His armour will be invulnerable and his earrings made of Amrita.'

Kunti said, 'If the armour and earrings of the son you will have with me are truly made of Amrita, then fulfil your desire, O Deva! May my son be powerful, strong, vigorous and beautiful, like you, and may he be blessed with virtue.'

Surya said, 'Noble girl, these kundala were a gift to me from Aditi. Timid one, I will bestow them and this wonderful armour on your son.'

Kunti then acquiesced, 'O Lord of light, if I have such a son, I will do as you say and satisfy your desire.'

Surya Deva said, 'Tathaastu,' and that sky ranger, the enemy of Svarbhanu, with his soul absorbed in yoga, entered into Kunti and touched her on her navel. Immediately, she lost consciousness and fell onto her bed.

Surya said to her, 'I leave you now, you of the graceful hips. You shall give birth to a son who will become the best of all warriors; and you shall remain a virgin.'

Then, Rajarajan, as the blazing Deva was about to leave, the girl bashfully whispered to him in her swoon, 'So be it.'

It was thus that the daughter of king Kuntibhoja, having invoked Surya and then asked for a son, fell down in a stupor on her bed, like a broken creeper. And it was thus that, after stupefying her, the god of fierce rays entered into her through the power of his yoga and impregnated her without breaking her virginal seal and dishonouring her.

When Surya had gone, the young girl regained consciousness.”

Vaisampayana said, “Lord of the Earth, Pritha’s son was conceived on the first day of the bright fortnight, in the tenth month of the year. Carrying a child as radiant as the lord of the stars, the maiden of the shapely hips hid her pregnancy from fear of disapproval, and no one knew of her condition. Living as she did in a virgin princess’ apartments, and using all her guile to carefully conceal her condition, only her nursemaid knew the truth.

In due time and by the grace of Surya Deva, the young Kunti gave birth to a godlike son. The baby was clad, like his father, in a coat of mail and adorned with glittering earrings. His eyes were tawny, like a lion’s; and his shoulders were broad, like a bull’s.

As soon as he was born, with the help of her nurse, Kunti placed the infant in a spacious and smooth wicker basket cushioned with silk sheets and a soft pillow. They coated it with wax, so it would not sink, and wrapped it in a rich cover. Then, with tears in her eyes, Kunti carried her baby to the river Aswa and set the basket upon the current.

She knew that an unwed girl should not have a child, yet she wept piteously, as her son was about to be borne away by the river. Listen to what she said, as she surrendered the precious basket to the Aswa.

‘My child, may all who live on this Earth—on land, in water, in the sky and in the heavens—do good to you. May all your paths be blessed. May you face no obstacles. My son, may all whom you meet be your friends and bear you no enmity.

May that Lord of all waters, Varuna, protect you in the water. May the Deva that wanders the skies protect you in the sky. May Surya Deva, first of heat-givers, your father who gave you to me through destiny, protect you everywhere. May the Adityas and the Vasus, the Rudras and the Sadhyas, the Viswas, the Devas and the Maruts, the Cardinal Points with the great Indra and their guardians presiding over them, and all the heavenly ones protect you!

Wherever you may be, I will recognise you by your kavacha and kundala. Your father, the glorious Surya Deva, is fortunate indeed, for, with his celestial vision, he will watch over you as you float down the river. Blessed also is that woman who will, O Devaputra, take you for her son, and who will give you her breast when you are hungry. What a dream she has dreamed, that woman who adopts you who are as splendid as the Sun, who wear divine armour and earrings, with your lotus eyes and skin as lustrous as burnished copper, your lofty, powerful brow and hair ending in silken curls. Lucky is the woman who will see you crawl on the ground, covered in mud and uttering the sweetest inarticulate words of infancy. Blessed is she who will see you reach manhood like a maned Himalayan lion.'

Rajan, Pritha cried over the basket for a long time before she set it afloat down the Aswa, in the dead of night, with only her nursemaid beside her. Though she longed to keep standing there forever, she was afraid that her father might discover what had happened, and she returned to the palace. Meanwhile, the basket floated down the Aswa to the river Charmanwati, and from the Charmanwati into the Yamuna, and then on to the Ganga. Borne by the Ganga, the basket came at dawn to the city of Champa, which was ruled by a Suta, a charioteer.

The wonderful coat of mail and earrings, made of Amrita, and destiny, kept the child safe and alive."

Vaisampayana said, “It happened that at this time a Suta named Adhiratha, who was a friend of Dhritarashtra, came to the river Ganga along with his wife Radha of great beauty. Parantapa, that otherwise blessed woman had done all she could to have a child, but without success.

Coming that day to the Ganga, she saw a large wicker basket drifting on Jahnavi’s current. It veered towards the bank where she stood, as if moved by some unseen hand, and the woman bent to arrest it. She called her husband Adhiratha the Suta, and he lifted the basket out of the water and prised it open.

Inside, he saw a boy, dazzling like the morning Sun. The infant wore golden armour, as if it was his very skin, and his stunningly beautiful face was adorned with earrings. The Suta and his wife were wonder-struck.

Taking the baby onto his lap, Adhiratha said to his wife, ‘I have never in my life seen anything so wonderful. This child must be of divine birth. Surely, seeing us childless, the gods have taken pity on us and sent him to me.’

Saying this, O Bhumipala, he gave the infant into Radha’s eager arms. And in accordance with divine law, Radha adopted the child of unearthly origin and form, who shimmered like lotus-stamens and was handsome past describing. She lavished him with all her love and care and, naturally endowed with more than human strength, the child grew apace.

After adopting Karna, Adhiratha had other natural children, and seeing the child adorned with shining mail and golden earrings, the Brahmanas named him Vasusena. That is how this resplendent Suryaputra of immeasurable prowess became the son of a sarathy, and came to be known as Vasusena and Vrisha.

Pritha discovered through some spies that her child was growing up amongst the Angas as the eldest son of the sarathy Adhiratha.

When the boy grew into a youth, Adhiratha sent him to Hastinapura. There, Karna lived with Drona, to learn the Astra Shastra, and the powerful youth befriended Duryodhana. He acquired all the four kinds of astras from Drona, Kripa and Parasurama, and achieved renown throughout the world as a mighty bowman. His friendship with Duryodhana ignited in him a hatred of the sons of Pritha, his brothers, though he did not know they were that, and he became obsessed with fighting the noble Phalguna.

O king, from the first time they met, Karna and Arjuna always challenged each other.

That Karna, born to Kunti of Surya Deva, was being brought up as a Sutaputra was Surya Deva's secret. Seeing Karna with his kavacha and kundala, Yudhishtira was troubled by the thought that he would be invincible. When, after bathing, Karna worshipped the irradiant Deva at high noon, Brahmanas came to beg alms of him, and, at that time of his fervent prayers, there was nothing that he would not give away to them.

And so, one day at that hour, assuming the guise of a Brahmana, Indra appears before Karna, and says, 'Give me alms,' to which Radha's son replies, 'You are welcome.' " Vaisampayana said, "Karna first sees Indra as just another Brahmana and welcomes him. Adhiratha's son says to the Brahmana, 'What shall I give you—a necklace of gold, beautiful damsels, cattle-rich villages?'

The Brahmana replies, 'I do not want you to give me either a golden necklace or pretty girls, or any other such thing. Give those to men that ask for them. If you are true to your vow, cut the golden kavacha and kundala you were born with from your body, and give them to me. Parantapa, I want you to do this at once; for me this one gift is better than all others.'

Karna says, 'O Brahmana, I will give you land for a house, beautiful virgins, cattle and fields; but I cannot give you my kavacha and kundala.'

Despite Karna trying to deflect him in so many ways, that Brahmana does not want anything else. Although Karna tries his best to placate him and though he pays him much homage, that Brahmanottama refuses to compromise on what he wants.

When that Dvijottama refuses to accept anything else, Radha's son says, 'Dvijottama, I was born with this kavacha as part of my body, and my kundala were created from Amrita. They make me invincible in this world, and I cannot part with them. Brahmanarishabha, let me give you the entire kingdom of the Earth, with no enemies, and full of prosperity, but not my kavacha and kundala. Without them, I can be killed by my enemies.'

When the illustrious Brahmana refuses to take any other gift, Karna says, now with a smile, 'Devadeva, I have recognised you already. O Lord Sakra, it is not right that I give you a gift which will bring ignominy upon you.

You are the king of the Devas, and it is you who should be bestowing boons on me. If I give you my kavacha and kundala, I will surely meet my end, and you will as surely be ridiculed. Therefore, O Sakra, take my mail and my earrings but give me something in return, so that you are not demeaned. Otherwise, I will not give the kavacha and kundala to you.'

Sakra replies, 'Even before I came, Surya Deva knew what I intended and told you about it. Karna, let it be as you wish. Except for the Vajra, tell me what it is you wish to have.'

Indra's words fill Karna with delight; his purpose is about to be accomplished. Intent upon procuring an inexorable astra, he says to Indra, 'O Vasava, in exchange for my kavacha and kundala earrings, give me a weapon that cannot be defied, one which will devour enemy armies in battle array.'

Concentrating his mind to summon that weapon, Indra says to Karna, 'Give me your kavacha that is your skin, and your kundala, and take this shakti, but on one condition. When I meet Daityas in battle and loose this invincible astra, it annihilates the mightiest enemies in their thousands and flies back to my hand after it has achieved its task. In your hand, however, Sutaputra, this shakti will slay only one enemy of yours, and having done so, it will return to me, roaring and ablaze.'

Karna says, 'There is only one enemy that I wish to slay in battle; he burns bright and fierce, like a fire, and I am afraid of him.'

Indra says, 'You shall indeed slay such an enemy in battle, but the one you wish to kill is protected by an exalted One. Those that are learned in the Vedas call this One "Invincible Varaha" and "Incomprehensible Narayana". Krishna himself protects your sworn enemy.'

Karna says, 'Even if this is so, O Illustrious, give me the weapon that will destroy only one powerful enemy, and I will cut the kavacha and kundala from my body and give them to you. However, grant that my body, thus wounded, will not be scarred or ugly to behold.'

Indra says, 'Karna, because you are devoted to the truth, your body will not be disfigured, and it will not have any scars. O Karna, finest among the eloquent, you shall be graced with the brilliance and prowess of your father.

Here is my Vasavi shakti; and remember that if you loose this astra in a fit of anger, while there are still other weapons available to you and your life is not in immediate danger, it will turn on you.'

Karna says, 'O Sakra, I will use this Vasavi astra only when I my life is in imminent peril. This I swear.'

Rajan, Karna accepts the smouldering weapon, and he begins to peel away the natural kavacha that coats his body. And the entire host of Devas and Danavas roar aloud to see him paring his own skin. Karna's face does not betray his pain, instead he still smiles. Celestial kettle-drums begin to beat, and heavenly flowers rain down on him.

Karna cuts his golden kavacha from his body and gives it, still dripping blood, to Indra. From his ears, he cuts his beautiful kundala and gives them, too, to the Deva king. And for this deed of his, he is called Karna.

Thus tricking Karna, but so giving him immortal fame, Indra is pleased that he has accomplished the Pandavas' goal, and he ascends into Devaloka. Hearing that Karna had been deceived, Dhritarashtra's sons are dismayed. On the other hand, learning of what has happened to the Sutaputra, Pritha's princes are filled with joy."

Janamejaya said, "Where were those Kshatriyas, the sons of Pandu, at that time? Who gave them this welcome news? And what did they do when the twelfth year of their exile was over? O Illustrious one, tell me all this."

Vaisampayana said, "By this time, the heroic Pandavas have defeated the Saindhava king and rescued Krishnaa. They have lived out the entire term of their painful exile in the jungle; they have heard ancient legends about Devas and Rishis from Markandeya.

Now those heroes return from their asrama in Kamyaka vana to the sacred Dwaita vana. With them are all their chariots, their sarathys, their followers, citizens of their kingdom and their cattle."

ARANEYA PARVA

Janamejaya said, “What did the Pandavas do after they had endured such anguish on the kidnapping of Krishnaa, and after rescuing her?

Vaisampayana said, “After their difficult time, when Krishnaa was abducted, the ever-glorious Yudhishtira and his brothers leave the Kamyaka vana and return to the lush Dwaita vana. The sons of Pandu live there with their wife, frugally, eating fruit, and engaged in their vratas. During their stay in Dwaita vana, Yudhishtira, Bhimasena, Arjuna and Madri’s sons undergo a great trial for the sake of a Brahmana. However, their troubles turn out to be the very means to their future weal. I will tell you of the strange difficulty that those foremost of Kurus face while living in those woods, which in the end brings them good fortune. Listen.

Once, as a deer is frolicking about, it happens that two arani sticks, which a devout Brahmana used to light his daily fire, and his churning-staff become entangled in its antlers. In alarm, the stag runs out of the asrama, swiftly and with long leaps, with the sticks and staff still caught on his head.

Kurusthama, the Brahmana sees his most precious possessions, which he uses to light his sacred fire, being carried away and, utterly distraught, comes running to the Pandavas.

He goes to Ajatasatru, who is sitting in the forest with his brothers, and cries, ‘A deer was playing near my asrama, O king, and my fire-sticks and churning-staff, which I had tied to a tree, got caught in its antlers. That swift creature fled with great leaps, taking my sticks and staff. Pandavas, you must follow its tracks and retrieve them for me, so that my agnihotra does not pause.’

Yudhishtira is concerned. He takes up his bow, and the son of Kunti sets out at once. His brothers pick up their bows and follow him in search of the deer, all of them eager to help the Brahmana. The Maharathas spot the deer quite close by and shoot it with arrows, but, however they try, they cannot wound the animal at all, and it runs from them.

As they go after it, a long way, the fine stag suddenly vanishes. Dispirited at having lost their quarry, tired, thirsty and hungry, the Pandavas sit down in the shade of a banyan tree deep in the forest.

Here, Nakula, who is both disheartened and impatient, says to Yudhishtira, ‘In our clan, Rajan, we never abandon our dharma, nor do we ever lose our wealth from idleness. We never refuse or fail anyone who asks for our help, least of all a Brahmana. Why then have we met this fate today?’ ”

"Yudhishtira says, 'There is no limit to troubles, nor is it possible to determine their final outcome. The Lord Dharma is solely responsible for giving out the fruits of both punya and paapa.'

Bhima growls, 'This is the bitter fruit of my not having killed the Pratikamin on the spot, when he dragged Krishnaa into the Kuru sabha like a slave.'

Arjuna says softly, 'We have met with this failure today because I did nothing to answer the vicious words of the Sutaputra, words that pierced me to my bones.'

Sahadeva says, 'Surely, Bhaarata, this calamity has befallen us because I did not kill Sakuni when he cheated you at dice.'

Yudhishtira says to Nakula, 'Climb this tree and look around at the ten points of the horizon. Can you see water or water-plants anywhere near us? Child, your brothers are tired and thirsty.'

Nakula quickly climbs the tree and, after looking all around, says, 'Rajan, I see many trees that grow beside some large body of water, and I hear the cries of cranes. There must surely be water somewhere near.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Handsome one, go and fetch water in these quivers.'

At his elder brother's command, Nakula hurries towards the trees he saw, and soon sees a lake of crystallline water, on whose banks cranes live, and he wants to drink from it. Just then he hears a voice from the sky, which says, 'O child, do not drink, for this lake belongs to me. Son of Madri, you must first answer my questions, and then you may drink to your heart's content and also take as much water as you need with you.'

Nakula, however, is parched with thirst and, ignoring the asariri from the sky, he kneels and drinks the cool water. Immediately he keels over, dead.

Parantapa, seeing that Nakula is late, Yudhishtira says to Sahadeva, 'Our brother has been gone a long time. Go and bring your twin back, and fetch the water, too.'

Sahadeva sets out in the same direction, and soon he comes to the lake where his brother lies dead on its bank. In shock, and in an agony of thirst, he goes towards the water, when he hears a voice saying, 'O child, do not drink, this lake belongs to me. First answer my questions and then you may drink and take away as much water as you want.'

But Sahadeva is also parched and, disregarding the disembodied voice, drinks the water; and immediately he also falls dead.

When Sahadeva does not return, Yudhishtira says to Arjuna, 'It is a long time since your brothers went, Bibhatsu. Go and bring them back, as well as water. You are the one we always turn to when we are in trouble.'

Accordingly, Arjuna takes his bow and arrows, as well as his unsheathed sword, and goes towards the lake. Arriving, Svetavahana sees his two younger brothers who had come to fetch water, lying dead. Seeing them, that lion among men is heartbroken. He raises his bow and looks around but sees no one in the thick forest that surrounds the lake. He, too, is tired and goes towards the water.

As he nears it, he hears a voice speaking from the sky, 'Why are you going to the water? I am a Yaksha and this lake is mine. I forbid you to drink from it. O Kaunteya, if you can answer the riddles I will ask you, only then may you drink and take away as much water as you want.'

Arjuna says, 'Show yourself and then try to stop me. When my arrows pierce you, you will never speak again.' And he sprays his mantra-invoked arrows all around, displaying his expertise at shabdavedi: shooting an invisible target, tracking it only by sound. Annoyed by thirst and fatigue, he looses a towering fountain of countless arrows into the sky.

Then, the invisible Yaksha says, 'Why do you go through all this trouble, Partha? You need only answer my questions to drink from the lake. However, if you drink without doing so, you will also die.'

Arjuna ignores the asariri and helps himself to the water. Immediately, he drops dead.

On not seeing Arjuna return, Yudhishtira says to Bhimasena, 'Parantapa, it is such a long time since Nakula, Sahadeva and Bibhatsu went to fetch water, and they have not yet come back. Bhaarata, bless you, go and bring them back, and the water, too.'

Bhima sets out at once for the lake where those tigers among men, his brothers, lie dead. And seeing them, Bhima, afflicted though he is with thirst, is horrified. The mighty-armed hero thinks that this must be the work of some Yaksha or Rakshasa. Vrikodara thinks, 'I will surely have to fight today. So let me first quench my thirst.' And he goes quickly towards the lake to drink the water.

The unseen Yaksha says, 'O child, do not drink; this lake belongs to me. First answer my questions, then drink and take away as much water as you like.'

Bhima does not bother to reply, but bends and drinks from the lake; and as soon as he does so, he also falls dead.

Yudhishtira waits a little longer, saying to himself, 'Why are the two sons of Madri so late? Why does the wielder of the Gandiva delay? And what keeps mighty Bhima away so long? Ah, I will go and search for them.'

Tiredly, Yudhishtira gets up, his body burning with thirst and his mind with some dismay.

Yudhishtira thinks, 'Is this forest enchanted by some evil spell, or is it infested by deadly predators? Have they all vanished because they have disregarded some mighty being? Perhaps they did not find water where they went and are scouring the forest in search of some? Why have those bulls among men not returned?' Thinking these thoughts, the illustrious Yudhishtira, foremost of monarchs, enters the thick forest where no human sound is heard, where deer, bears and birds live, where bright green trees grow like ornaments, where black bees hum and birds warble sweetly.

He comes upon the lovely lake, which looks as if it has been created by Brahma himself. It is adorned with golden-hued flowers, lotuses and sindhuvaras, and encircled by dense woods of ketaka, karavira and pipala trees. The exhausted Yudhishtira sees the lake and is speechless with wonder."

Vaisampayana said, "Yudhishtira sees his brothers, all as glorious as Indra, lying dead, as if they are the Lokpalas fallen from their places at the end of a yuga. He sees Arjuna's body, his bows and arrows strewn on the ground; he sees Bhimasena and the twins lying still; and the king sighs deeply and tears of sorrow bathe his face.

Dharmaputra, his heart torn in grief, mourns his dead brothers, sobbing, 'Noble Vrikodara, you swore to smash Duryodhana's thighs with your mace in battle. O Mahabaho, you who enhance the glory of the Kurus, your death has made everything meaningless. The promises that men make may be futile, but why has the word of God been rendered impotent?

Arjuna, when you were born, while our mother was still in labour, the gods said to her that you would be the equal of the Deva of the thousand eyes. And all the beings in the northern Pariyatra mountains sang your praises, saying that you would be the one who restored their prosperity, which had been stolen by their enemies. They said that you are invincible in battle. Why then has the mighty Jishnu succumbed to death? O, why does Dhananjaya, on whom we pinned our hopes and thus endured all our misery, lie lifeless on the ground, shattering my faith?

Why have the heroic and mighty sons of Kunti—Bhimasena and Dhananjaya—who always killed their adversaries and who are irresistible in battle been overpowered by an enemy?

This vile heart of mine must be made of stone that it does not burst when I see these twins lying on the forest floor. You bulls among men, who are versed in the Shastras and learned in the proprieties of time and place, who are rich in the wealth of tapasya, who are devout in the performance of all sacred rites, why do you lie so still and not speak to me as you ought? Ah, undefeated one, how do you lie insensible on the earth although your bodies are whole and show no injury or wound?'

Looking at his brothers, seeming as if there are in their usual blissful sleep on the hillside, that king is heartbroken. Sunk in a bottomless well of grief, he begins to think about what caused their deaths. Although the virtuous and mighty-armed king, who is learned in the laws that govern time and place, thinks long and hard, he can come to no conclusion about what he should do.

After lamenting a long time, Yudhishtira restrains his sorrow and thinks about who might be responsible for the deaths of his brothers.

He says, 'There are no marks of weapons on them, nor are there any footprints on the ground. Whoever has killed my brothers must be powerful indeed. I will think about this seriously, but first let me drink some water before I try to discover what happened.

Perhaps the evil Duryodhana arranged for this lake to be created here by the king of the Gandharvas. No sensible man would trust that vile and vicious man who sees no distinction between good and evil. Or perhaps, his own agents have done this awful thing.'

The king reflects in this manner, his mind flying in different directions. Yudhishtira does not believe that the water is poisoned because he sees that the bodies have no grey pallor and that the faces are still bright, as if with life, though they do not breathe.

The king continues his reflections, 'Each of these Manavottamas is as potent as a great waterfall. Who but Yama himself, who destroys all things when their time comes, could have laid my brothers low?'

Coming to this conclusion, he begins to perform his ritual ablutions in the lake.

As he steps into the water, he hears a voice in the sky, saying, 'I am a crane, living on tiny fish. It is I who have brought your brothers under the reign of the Lord of departed spirits. O Kshatriya, if you do not answer the questions I ask, you will become the fifth corpse. Do not do anything rash.

This lake belongs to me. Answer my questions first, Kuntiputra, then drink and take away as much water as you like.'

Hearing this, Yudhishtira says, 'Are you the Lord of the Rudras, or of the Vasus, or of the Maruts? Which Deva are you? This could not have been done by a bird! Who are you that have conquered the four mighty mountains—Himavat, Pariyatra, Vindhya and Malaya? Great is your feat, O strongest of the strong. You have killed my brothers whom the Devas, Gandharvas, Asuras and Rakshasas feared. What you have done is hard to believe.

I do not know what your intentions are, and I am curious but also frightened that you have possessed me. My mind is roiled and my head aches. I ask you, therefore, worshipful one, who are you that live here?'

The voice says, 'I am a Yaksha, not a krauncha. It is I who killed all your brothers.'

Hearing these wretched words spoken in a harsh voice, Yudhishtira approaches the Yaksha and stands before him. That Bharatarishabha sees the Yaksha—he has strange eyes and a huge body with a tail as big as a palmyra tree; he blazes like the Sun, like Fire; he is as indomitable as an immense mountain. He stands on a tree and growls as loudly and deeply as black clouds.

The Yaksha says, 'O king, your brothers ignored my warning and drank from my lake. That is why I killed them. He who wants to live should not drink this water. Prithaputra, be warned again. This lake belongs to me. First answer my questions and then take as much water as you want.'

Yudhishtira says, 'O Yaksha, I do not want what you own. Virtuous persons do not approve of a man who praises himself. Therefore, humbly, and to the best of my knowledge, I will answer your questions. Ask me.'

The Yaksha says, 'What makes the Sun rise? Who stays by him? Who makes him set? And in who is he established?'

Yudhishtira says, 'Brahma makes the Sun rise; the Devas keep him company; Dharma makes him set; and he is established in Truth.'

The Yaksha says, 'How does one become learned? How does one attain greatness? How can one have a second self? And, O king, how can one acquire wisdom?'

Yudhishtira says, 'It is by the study of the Srutis that a person becomes learned; it is by tapasya that one acquires greatness; it is by intelligence that a person can have a second self; and it is by serving the old that one becomes wise.'

The Yaksha says, 'What is the divine attribute of Brahmanas? What practices of theirs are pious? What is the human attribute of the Brahmanas? And what practices of theirs are sinful?'

Yudhishtira says, 'The study of the Vedas is their divine attribute; their tapasya is their pious behaviour; their vulnerability to death is their human attribute; and slander is their inherent tendency to sin.'

The Yaksha says, 'What is the divine quality of Kshatriyas? What conduct of theirs is pious? What is their human attribute? What practices of theirs are sinful?'

Yudhishtira says, 'Arrows and weapons form their divine aspect; celebration of yagnas is their piety; fear is their human attribute; and a refusal to give protection is their sin.'

The Yaksha says, 'What does sacrificial Sama consist of? What makes the sacrificial Yaju? What is the last resort and essential element of a yagna?'

Yudhishtira says, 'Life is the Sama of the yagna; the mind is the Yaju; the Rik is the essential element, which the sacrifice cannot do without.'

The Yaksha says, 'What is of most value to one that cultivates crops? What is of most value to the one who sows? What is of most value to one who desires prosperity in this world? And what is of most value to those that give birth?'

Yudhishtira says, 'Rain is of most value to those that cultivate; seeds are of most value to those that sow; the cow is of most value to those that desire prosperity; and a child is of most value to those that give birth.'

The Yaksha says, 'Is there a person, who is intelligent, who has the respect and affection of the world, who enjoys sensual pleasures, and who though he breathes, is not alive?

Yudhishtira says, 'The man who makes no offerings to Devas, guests, servants, Pitrs and to himself, does not live, although he breathes.'

The Yaksha says, 'What is heavier than Bhumi herself? What is higher than the Swarga? What is swifter than Vayu? And what is more numerous than grass?'

Yudhishtira says, 'The mother is weightier than the Earth; the father is higher than heaven; the mind is swifter than the wind; and our thoughts are more numerous than grass.'

The Yaksha says, ‘What does not close its eyes when asleep? What does not move after being born? What has no heart? And what swells with its own power?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘A fish does not close its eyes when it sleeps; an egg does not move after being laid; a stone has no heart; and a river swells with its own power.’

The Yaksha says, ‘Who is the friend of the exiled? Who is the friend of the householder? Who is the friend of the ailing? And who is the friend of one about to die?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘The friend of the exile in a distant land is his companion; the friend of the householder is his wife; the friend of one who is ill is the physician; and the friend of one who is about to die is his charity.’

The Yaksha says, ‘Who is the guest of all creatures? What is the eternal dharma? What, O king of kings, is Amrita? And what is this entire Universe?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘Agni is the guest of all creatures; cow’s milk is Amrita; oblation of Amrita is the eternal dharma; and this Universe is just space.’

The Yaksha says, ‘What is that which journeys alone? What is that which renews its birth? What is the antidote for cold? And what is the largest field?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘The Sun journeys alone; the Moon takes birth anew; Fire is the remedy against cold; and the Earth is the largest field.’

The Yaksha says, ‘What is the highest sanctuary of dharma? What of fame? What of Swarga? What of happiness?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘Liberality is the highest sanctuary of virtue; a gift, of fame; truth is the sanctuary of heaven; and a good character that of happiness.’

The Yaksha says, ‘What is the soul of a man? Who is the friend bestowed on him by the Devas? What is a man’s chief support? And what is his chief refuge?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘The son is a man’s soul; the wife is the friend bestowed on man by the gods; the clouds are his chief support; and charity is his chief refuge.’

The Yaksha says, ‘What is the best of all that is praiseworthy? What is the most valuable of all possessions? What is the best of all gains? And what is the best of all the kinds of happiness?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘The best of all praiseworthy things is skill; the best of all possessions is knowledge; the best of all gains is health; and contentment is the best of all the kinds of happiness.’

The Yaksha says, ‘What is the greatest dharma in the world? What virtue always bears fruit? What is that which, if controlled, does not lead to regret? And who are they with whom a friendship cannot break?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘The greatest dharma is non-violence; the rituals ordained in the three Vedas always bear fruit; the mind, if controlled, does not lead to regret; and friendship with the good never breaks.’

The Yaksha says, ‘What, if renounced, makes one likeable? What, if renounced, causes no regret? What, if renounced, makes one wealthy? And what, if renounced, makes one happy?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘Pride, if renounced, makes one likeable; anger, if renounced, causes no regret; desire, if renounced, makes one wealthy; and avarice, if renounced, makes one happy.’

The Yaksha says, ‘Why does one give to Brahmanas? Why to players and dancers? Why to servants? And why to a king?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘It is for punya that one gives to Brahmanas; it is for fame that one gives to players and dancers; it is to support them that one gives to servants; and it is for relief from fear that one gives to kings.’

The Yaksha says, ‘What is the world wrapped in? What prevents a thing from showing itself? Why are friends forsaken? And why does one fail to attain heaven?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘The world is enveloped in darkness; darkness does not permit a thing to show itself; it is from avarice that friends are forsaken; and it is attachment to the world that prevents one from finding Swarga.’

The Yaksha says, ‘When is a person considered dead? When is a kingdom considered dead? When is a sraddha considered dead? And when is a sacrifice considered dead?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘A man without wealth may be regarded as dead; a kingdom without a king may be regarded as dead; a sraddha performed without a learned priest may be regarded as dead; and a sacrifice without gifts to Brahmanas may be regarded as dead.’

The Yaksha says, ‘What is the way? What is water? What is food? And what is poison? Tell me also what the proper time is for a sraddha; and then you may drink and take away as much water as you like.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘The virtuous are the way; the sky is water; the cow is food; and a request is poison. The availability of a Brahmana is regarded as the proper time for a sraddha. What do you think of all this, O Yaksha?’

The Yaksha says, ‘What is the sign of asceticism? What is true restraint? What is forgiveness? And what is shame?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘Faithfulness to one’s dharma is asceticism; the restraint of the mind is true restraint; forgiveness is the ability to endure an enemy; and shame is refraining from evil actions.’

The Yaksha says, ‘O king, what is knowledge? What is tranquillity? What is mercy? And what is simplicity?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘True knowledge is knowledge of divinity; true tranquillity is that of the heart; true mercy is the desire for universal happiness; and true simplicity is equanimity.’

The Yaksha says, ‘What enemy is invincible? What is an incurable disease for man? What sort of man is honest; and what man is dishonest?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘Anger is the invincible enemy; covetousness is the incurable disease; the honest man is the one who wants the well-being of all creatures; and the dishonest man is one who has no compassion.’

The Yaksha says, ‘O king, what is ignorance? What is pride? What is idleness? And what is grief?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘Ignorance is not knowing one’s svadharma; pride is having a high opinion of oneself; idleness is not doing one’s duty; and grief is ignorance.’

The Yaksha says, ‘What do the Rishis refer to as steadfastness? What do they consider patience to be? What do they think of as a proper ablution? And what do they say is charity?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘Rishis say that steadfastness is adherence to one’s own religion; patience is subduing the senses; washing the mind clean of impurities is the proper bath; and protecting all creatures is charity.’

The Yaksha says, ‘Who is a learned man? Who is an atheist? Who is an ignorant man? What is desire and where does it spring from? And what is envy?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘He that knows his dharma is learned; he that is ignorant is an atheist, and the atheist is ignorant, too; desire springs from possessions; and envy is nothing but grief.’

The Yaksha says, ‘What is pride? What is hypocrisy? What is the grace of the gods, and what is wickedness?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘Stolid ignorance is pride. Hypocrisy is to wave the banner of religion; the grace of the gods is the fruit of one’s charity; and wickedness is speaking ill of others.’

The Yaksha says, ‘Dharma, artha and kama are opposed to one another. How can these exist together?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘When a man’s wife and his dharma do not oppose each other, then all the three you mention can exist together.’

The Yaksha says, ‘O Bharatarishabha, what man is condemned to everlasting naraka? Tell me this quickly.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘He who calls a poor Brahmana with the promise of a gift and then tells him there is none lives in hell forever. He who gives false meaning to the words of the Vedas, of the Dharma Shastras, of Brahmana’s and of Devas, and of rituals that honour the Pitrs also goes to hell everlasting. He that is wealthy but never gives any charity, nor enjoys his possessions because of miserliness and greed, saying he has none, also lives in eternal hell.’

The Yaksha says, ‘O king, how does a person become a Brahmana—by birth, by conduct, by learning or by study? Tell me this with certainty.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘Listen, O Yaksha, it is neither birth, nor study, nor learning that makes a Brahmana. Without doubt, it is good character that makes one a Brahmana. Good conduct should always be maintained, especially by a Brahmana. One who is constant in good conduct is always strong. Masters and disciples, and all who study the scriptures, are considered illiterate if they have bad habits. The truly learned man is one who performs his duties faithfully. Even the man who has studied the four Vedas is regarded as vile and wretched, scarcely distinguishable from a Sudra, if his behaviour is unbecoming. Only he who performs the agnihotra and has his senses under control is a Brahmana.’

The Yaksha says, ‘What does the man who speaks pleasantly gain? What does the man who acts judiciously gain? What does the man who has many friends gain? And what does he who is devoted to dharma gain?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘He who speaks pleasantly is liked by all; he who acts judiciously gets whatever he wants; he who has many friends lives happily; and he who is devoted to dharma gains bliss in the next world.’

The Yaksha says, ‘Who is truly happy? What is most wonderful? What is the path? And what are the perennial tidings? Answer these four questions of mine and your dead brothers will return to life.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘O amphibious one, a man who cooks in his own house during the fifth or the sixth part of the day, with few vegetables, who is not in debt and who does not leave home, is truly happy. Day after day, countless creatures go to Yamaloka, yet those that remain behind believe they are immortal. What can be more wonderful than this? Argument never to any certain conclusion; the Srutis are all different; there is no Rishi whose opinion everybody accepts; the truth about dharma is hidden in caves; therefore, that is the path that the great have taken. This world, full of ignorance, is like a pot; the Sun is fire, the days and nights are fuel; the months and the seasons make up the wooden ladle; time is the cook that stirs all creatures in that pot. These are unchanging tidings.’

The Yaksha says, ‘Parantapa, you have answered all my questions, and correctly. Tell me now, who is truly a man; and what man truly possesses every kind of wealth?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘Reports of one’s good deeds reach Swarga and spread across Bhumi. As long as these reports are alive, so long does a man, to whom persons pleasant or otherwise, happiness and sorrow, past and future are the same, possess every kind of wealth.’

The Yaksha says, ‘O king, since you have correctly told me who is a man and what man has every kind of wealth, one of your brothers may live again.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘Let this dark-skinned one, whose eyes are red, who is tall like a large Sala tree, whose chest is broad and arms long, let Nakula, O Yaksha, rise and live.’

The Yaksha says, ‘Bhimasena is very dear to you, and Arjuna is the one on whom you all depend. Why, then, do you wish to give life to a half-brother? How can you forsake Bhima, who is as strong as ten thousand elephants, for Nakula? Everyone says that you love Bhima dearly. Then why do you ask for Nakula’s life? Why do you sacrifice Arjuna, of the mighty arms, whom all the Pandavas idolise, for Nakula’s sake?

Yudhishtira says, ‘If dharma is sacrificed, he that sacrifices it is lost; virtue cherishes the man who cherishes it. So I am careful that dharma, by being sacrificed, does not sacrifice us. I never abandon dharma. Abstention from doing injury is the highest dharma, even higher than the most valuable object. I try to practise that virtue. Therefore, revive Nakula, O Yaksha. Let men know that the king is always virtuous. I will never deviate from dharma. Let Nakula, therefore, live.

My father had two wives, Kunti and Madri. Let both of them have living children. This is what I wish. Madri is as much a mother to me as Kunti; I make no difference between them. I wish to act equally towards my mothers. Therefore, let Nakula live.’

The Yaksha says, ‘Since you consider non-violence to be more important than artha and kama, I will restore the lives of all your brothers, O bull among the Bhaaratas.’ ”

Vaisampayana said, "At the Yaksha's words, the Pandavas awake and get up, as if from a deep slumber. They are no longer hungry or thirsty.

Yudhishtira says, 'What Deva are you, invincible one, who stands on one leg in a lake? I cannot believe that you are a Yaksha. Are you a chief of the Vasus or of the Rudras, or the Lord of the Maruts? Or are you the Lord of the Devas, the wielder of the Vajra? Each of my brothers is capable of fighting like a hundred thousand warriors, and I do not see a warrior who could kill them all. They have woken up refreshed, as if from a pleasant sleep. Are you a friend of ours, or our father himself?'

The Yaksha says, 'Child, I am your father Dharma Deva. Bharatarishabha, I came here from a desire to see you. Fame, truth, self-restraint, purity, candour, modesty, steadfastness, charity, tapasya and brahmacharya are my physical body. Non-violence, impartiality, peace, penance, sanctity and freedom from malice are the doors through which I can be reached. You are always dear to me. Fortunately, you are devoted to the practice of the five virtues—equanimity of mind, self-control, abstinence from sensual indulgence, forgiveness and yoga. Fortunately, too, you have conquered the afflictions of hunger, thirst, sorrow, delusion, decrepitude and death. Of the six, the first two manifest themselves in the first part of life, the second two in the middle and the last two at the end in order to send men to the next world.

I bless you, my son! I am Dharma, the Lord of Justice. I came here to test you, and I am pleased to see your spirit of compassion. Anagha, I will grant you boons. Rajarajan, ask what you wish for and I will grant it. Those that are devoted to me never suffer.'

Yudhishtira says, 'A deer carried away a Brahmana's fire-sticks; so the first boon I ask is that the Brahmana's worship of Agni is not interrupted.'

The Yaksha says, 'Kuntiputra, it was I in the form of a deer who carried away the Brahmana's fire-sticks, to test you.' That Deva says, 'I grant you the boon you ask, and I bless you again. Godlike, ask for another boon.'

Yudhishtira says, 'We have spent the past twelve years in jungles and are now in the thirteenth year of our exile. Grant that no one will recognise us, wherever we choose to spend this year.'

The Deva says, 'I grant this boon,' and reassuring Kunti's son whose strength is truth, he says, 'Bhaarata, I grant that even if you range all the Earth in your own forms none in the three worlds shall recognise you. You perpetuators of the Kuru line, by my grace, you will spend this thirteenth year disguised and unrecognised in Virata's kingdom. You will all be able, at will, to assume any form you like. Now give the Brahmana his fire-sticks. It was only to test you that I carried them away as a deer.

Noble Yudhishtira, ask for another boon of your choice, and I will give it to you. I have not had my fill of giving you boons. Take a third boon that is great and incomparable. Rajan, you are my son, and Vidura is an amsa of me.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Eternal Devadeva, it is enough that I have seen you in your physical form. Father, I will gladly accept whatever boon you give me. May I always conquer greed, folly and anger, and may my mind be always devoted to daana, satya and tapasya.'

Dharmadeva says, 'Pandava, you are naturally endowed with these qualities, because you are dharma embodied. However, since you ask, I give you what you ask for.'

With these words, Dharma, on whom all the worlds meditate, vanishes. The noble Pandavas are united with each other after their plumbless sleep. No longer tired, the Kshatriyas return to the asrama and restore his fire-sticks to the Brahmana.

The man who listens to this great and fame-enhancing story of how the Pandavas are revived, and of the meeting of father and son, earns perfect tranquillity of mind, and he gets sons and grandsons, as well as a long life of more than a hundred years. The mind of the man who takes this story to heart never delights in adharma, in discord among friends, in theft, in taking other men’s wives, or in evil thoughts.”

Vaisampayana said, “In obedience to Dharma’s bidding to spend their thirteenth year, the one of ajnatavasa, in disguise, the Pandavas, observant of vows and with truth as their strength, sit with the learned Munis who, out of love, share their exile in the forest. With their hands joined in reverence, they speak to the tapasvins to have their blessings to spend the thirteenth year in this way.

They say, ‘You all know that the sons of Dhritarashtra deceitfully deprived us of our kingdom and wronged us in many other ways. We have passed twelve years of privation in the forest. The thirteenth year, which we have to spend undiscovered, still remains. We ask your permission to spend this year in hiding. If they discover us, Suyodhana, Karna and Subala’s vile son will make our friends and our people pay dearly. So, we must part ways here, O adored Djivas, for when our ajnatavasa ends, must we not establish ourselves in our own kingdom again?’

That pure-hearted son of Dharma is overwhelmed with grief at the thought of parting from the loyal Brahmanas and, breaking into loud sobs, he faints. The Brahmanas and his brothers revive him and try to cheer him.

Then, Dhaumya says with some gravity, ‘Rajan, you are learned, capable of withstanding great privation, firm in promise, and of subdued senses. Men like you do not crumble in the face of misfortune. The very Devas have wandered the worlds in disguise so they might prevail over their enemies.

Indra lived disguised in the Giriprastha's asrama in the Nishada kingdom and achieved his goal. Before he was born from Aditi, Vishnu spent a long time disguised as Hayagriva, the horse-headed, in order to vanquish the Daityas. You know that He disguised himself as a dwarf and deprived Mahabali of his kingdom. And you have heard how Hutasana went into the water and remained hidden in order to achieve a purpose of the gods.

O Dharmatma, you have heard that, wishing to vanquish his enemies, Vishnu entered Sakra's Vajra and lay hidden there. You have heard of the task that the Rishi Aurva once performed for the gods, by staying concealed in his mother's womb. Living hidden in every part of the Earth, Vivaswata used his energy and consumed his enemies with fire. And living disguised in the home of Dasaratha, Vishnu of the dreadful deeds slew Ravana Dasagriva in battle.

Many exalted ones have conquered their enemies by going for some time disguised, and so you will you.'

Encouraged by Dhaumya's words, Yudhishtira, relying on his own wisdom and knowledge gleaned from the scriptures, recovers his composure.

Now Mahabaho Bhimasena, that strongest of the strong, boosts the king's spirits.

He says, 'The wielder of the Gandiva looks to you for permission to have our revenge and, duty-bound, he has not done anything impulsive. Although Nakula and Sahadeva of the fearful prowess can raze our enemies, I have restrained them from doing so. We shall never swerve from our obedience to your will. Tell us what we should do. We shall conquer our enemies very soon.'

When Bhimasena says this, the Brahmanas bless the Bhaaratas, take leave of them and return to their homes. All those foremost of Yatis and Munis, versed in the Vedas, go back, but in excited expectation of seeing the Pandavas return to the home of their sires. The five Pandavas, equipped with their bows, and accompanied by Dhaumya, set out with Krishnaa.

Each of them is accomplished in a different shastra; all of them are proficient in mantras and know when to make peace and when to wage war. Those Purushavyaghras, who are about to start living in disguise the next day, go a krosa from their asrama and sit down to seek one another's counsel," said Vaisampayana.

The End of Vana Parva

Virata Parva

CANTO 1

PANDAVA PRAVESHA PARVA

AUM! Having bowed down to Narayana and Nara, foremost of Purushas, and to the Devi Saraswati, I invoke the spirit of Jaya!

Janamejaya said, "Brahmana, how did my great-grandfathers live undiscovered in the city of Virata, fearful as they were of Duryodhana? How did their devoted wife, the most blessed Draupadi, unswerving in her faith in God, and in the grip of misery, spend her days without being recognised?"

Vaisampayana said, "Hear, O lord of men, how your great-grandfathers pass the period of their exile in King Virata's city without being discovered. Having obtained boons from Dharma Deva, Yudhishtira returns to the asrama and tells the Brahmanas all that has befallen them. Then, to the Brahmana who followed him, he restores the fire sticks and the churning staff that he had lost.

After that, O Bhaarata, Yudhishtira Dharmaputra calls together all his younger brothers and says, 'We have passed twelve years in exile from our kingdom. This, our thirteenth and most difficult year has come. Arjuna, you choose a suitable place where we can spend our days undetected by our enemies.'

Arjuna says, 'Lord of men, Dharma Deva's boon will enable us to go where we please and yet escape discovery. Still, I will suggest some pleasant and secluded places where we can live and you can choose one of them.

Surrounding the kingdom of the Kurus are many beautiful and bountiful lands such as Panchala, Chedi, Matsya, Surasena, Pattachchara, Dasarna, Navarashtra, Malla, Salva, Yugandhara, Saurashtra, Avanti, and the expansive Kuntirashtra. Which of these would you choose, Rajan? Where shall we spend this year?'

Yudhishtira says to his brothers, 'Mahabahos, whatever the Lord of all creatures has decreed must come to pass. Even so, after consulting together we must choose an agreeable and auspicious place where we can live free from fear. The aged Virata, king of the Matsyas, is virtuous, powerful and charitable. All men like him, and he is fond of us Pandavas. In his city then, let us spend this year and enter his service. Tell me, sons of Kuru, in what guises will you each present yourselves before king Virata of the Matsyas?'

Arjuna says, 'God among men, what service will you perform in Virata's kingdom? In what role will you live in the city of Virata? You are mild and kind-hearted, modest and virtuous, and a man of honour. Rajan, in your present adversity, what will you do? A king has to face troubles just like everyone else. How will you rise above yours?'

Yudhishtira says, 'Purusharishabhas, hear what I will do when I appear before king Virata. I will present myself as Kanka, a Brahmana skilled in the game of dice who enjoys playing, and become a courtier in Virata's sabha. I will entertain the king, his courtiers and his friends by astute moves of ivory chessmen—blue and yellow, red and white—on chessboards, and by clever throws of the black and red dice. Nobody will succeed in discovering me. And should the monarch be curious about me, I will say that I used to be a close friend of Yudhishtira's. This is how I intend to pass my days.

What work will you do, Vrikodara, in the city of Virata?' "

"Bhima says, 'I will present myself before lord Virata as Ballava, a cook. I am skilled in the culinary arts; I will prepare food for the king that is better than anything his best cooks have ever set before him and thus charm him. I will carry mighty loads of wood and, seeing that amazing feat, the king will be pleased. O Bhaarata, the servants of the royal household will honour me when they see my superhuman abilility, and I will gain control of the royal storerooms.

I will be commanded to subdue powerful elephants and mighty bulls, which I will do. I will entertain the king by defeating anyone who challenges me in combat. However, I shall not take a life; I will only bring the man down without killing him. And if I am asked about my past, I will say that I was a wrestler and cook in Yudhishtira's court. Rajan, that is how I will spend our thirteenth year.'

Yudhishtira says, 'And, Bhima, what occupation will Dhananjaya have, this mighty scion of the Kurus, son of Kunti, best of men, long-armed, invincible in battle; to whom, while he was with Krishna, the divine Agni himself, wanting to consume the Khandava vana in flames, appeared humbly in the guise of a Brahmana? What can Arjuna undertake, this mightiest of Kshatriyas who pleased Agni by killing huge Nagas and Rakshasas from a single chariot, and who married the sister of the Naga king Vasuki?

Even as the Sun is the lord of all heat-givers, the Brahmana the best among all humans, the cobra the foremost of all serpents, Fire the first of all things of energy, the Vajra the most powerful of all weapons, the humped bull the greatest among bovines, the Ocean of all water-bodies, as rain-clouds are the best of all clouds, as Ananta is the chief of all Nagas, Airavata the mightiest of all elephants, as a son is the most beloved of loved ones and the wife the best of all friends, so is young Gudakesa the supreme bowman.

Bhaarata, what calling will he pursue, Bibhatsu the wielder of the Gandiva; whose chariot is drawn by white horses; who is equal to Indra and Krishna? What career will he have, who lived five years in the abode of the thousand-eyed Indra? He shines in celestial splendour and has mastered the Devastras. In my eyes he is the tenth Rudra, the thirteenth Aditya, the ninth Vasu and the tenth Graha.

The skin on his long, ambidextrous arms has become callused and scarred, as on the humps of bulls, by constant wielding of the bow. He is the greatest of Kshatriyas: he is as Himavat among mountains, as Varuna among water-bodies, as Sakra among the Devas, as Agni among the Vasus, as the tiger among beasts, as Garuda among birds!'

Arjuna says, 'Lord of the Earth, I will declare myself a eunuch. It is surely difficult to hide the marks of the bowstring on my arms, but I will cover both my scarred arms with bangles. I will adorn my ears with earrings and my wrists with bracelets of conch-shells. I will wear my hair in a long braid and pose as one of the third sex.

Brihannala will be my name, and passing for a hermaphrodite, I will entertain the king and the women of the harem by telling them stories. I will instruct the ladies of Virata's palace in singing and dancing and teach them to play musical instruments. I will also tell of great men's feats of valour, and so hide in disguise.

Should the king enquire, I will say that I worked in Yudhishtira's palace as Draupadi's sairandhri, her main waiting-maid. Best of kings, concealing myself like this, as fire is covered by ashes, I will pass my days quite happily in Virata's palace.' "

Vaisampayana said, "Arjuna falls silent and Yudhishtira addresses another of his brothers.

Yudhishtira says, 'Gentle Kshatriya Nakula, your tender nature deserves a life of ease. What career will you follow whilst living in the dominions of king Virata? Tell me what you plan.'

Nakula says, 'I will take the name Granthika and become the keeper of the king's horses. I have a deep knowledge of horses; I am skilful in caring for them and enjoy the work. I am good at training them and very fond of them, even as you are, O my brother. In my hands even high-spirited colts and fillies become docile and carry their riders and draw their chariots gently.

And if anyone in Virata's city should ask about me, I will say that I was once employed by Yudhishtira and given charge of his stables. In this disguise, Rajan, I will spend my days happily in the city of Virata. No one will discover my true identity, for I will please the king with my work.'

Yudhishtira says, 'How will you, Sahadeva, present yourself before the king? And what will you do, child, in order to go undiscovered?'

Sahadeva replies, 'Rajan, I will become a keeper of Virata's cattle. I am skilled at milking cows and know all about their pedigrees, and I am also good at taming bulls. I will call myself Tantripala and perform my duties ably. Let your anxiety be stilled, Bhumipala; I used to look after your herds and have deep knowledge of the work.

I know a great deal about cattle, their markings, and also much else about them. I can recognise bulls with certain auspicious marks, the scent of whose urine can make a barren woman fertile. I have always enjoyed this work, so that is how I will live. I will please the king and certainly no one will recognise me.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Draupadi is our beloved wife, dearer to us than our lives. She deserves to be cherished by us like a mother and respected as an elder sister. Unacquainted as she is with any womanly chores, what service will Krishnaa perform? Delicate and young, she is a princess whose virtue and devotion to her lords is well known. How will she live, who from the time of her birth has enjoyed nothing but fragrant flower garlands and perfume, ornaments and fine clothes?'

Draupadi says, 'There is a class of women known as sairandhris, who serve as important waiting-maids. Usually, women from respectable families do not become sairandhris, but some do. I will pose as one of these few. I shall be a sairandhri skilled in dressing hair, and if questioned I will say that I served in Yudhishtira's household as Draupadi's main waiting-woman. And in this way I will pass my days in disguise, serving the famous Sudeshna, king Virata's queen. Surely, she will be pleased with my services. Do not grieve so, Rajan.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Krishnaa, your words are sweet but, beautiful one, you are born into royalty. Chaste and always true to your vows, you have always lived a virtuous life and do not know what sin is; therefore conduct yourself in such a way that sinful men may not cast their eyes on you for their pleasure.' "

"Yudhishtira says, 'You have all decided how to occupy yourselves sensibly, and I have, too. Our priest, the charioteers and cooks must go to Drupada's palace and keep our sacrificial fires burning. Indrasena and the others will take the chariots and leave at once for Dwaravati. Draupadi's maids can go to the Panchalas with the sarathys and our cooks. All of them must say that they do not know where the Pandavas went after leaving them at the lake in Dwaita vana.'

Now the Pandavas ask Dhaumya for his counsel. Dhaumya says, 'Sons of Pandu, the arrangements you have made for the Brahmanas, your friends, the chariots, weapons and the sacred fires are excellent. But, Yudhishtira and Arjuna, you must be particularly watchful of Draupadi's safety. You know what men are like.

However knowledgeable you are, as your friend I take the liberty of telling you what you already know, which is in the eternal interest of dharma, kama and artha. Listen to me carefully and remember my words.

To live in the court of a king is difficult, but I will tell you how you can be ideal members of a royal household. O Kurunandanas, you must somehow spend this year in the palace without being discovered; only thus will you be able to peacefully live out the final year of your exile.

Pandavas, the king, under whose protection everyone comes, is God in human form; he is like a fire sanctified by mantras.

First of all, only present yourselves before the king after obtaining permission at the gate. None of you should have any contact with royal spies; nor should any of you try to have a court position that someone else aspires to. If you find the king's favour, you must never use the king's personal chariot, sit on his throne or ride on his elephant. Also, avoid important positions whose occupation alarms envious and malevolent men. Only conducting yourselves thus, will you deserve to live in the king's household.

Offer the king advice only when he asks for it. Praise and pay homage to him at the appropriate time; at other times sit silently and respectfully beside him. Kings get annoyed with babblers and courtiers who speak ill of others.

Be wise; don't initiate friendship with the queen or ladies of the antahpura, or with anyone that the king dislikes. Whatever you do must be with the king's knowledge, and you must be willing to perform even the most trivial task for him. If you behave in this way you will not come to any harm.

Even if one of you attains the highest office, you should always uphold the king's dignity by your silence: consider yourself born blind, unless you are commanded by him. Parantapas, if their pride is wounded, the rulers of men do not forgive even their sons, grandsons and brothers. Kings should be served with the same attentiveness with which you serve Agni and the other Devas. If you are disloyal to your sovereign, he will destroy you.

Renounce anger, pride and indiscretion, and always be obedient to the king. After a careful study of various matters at hand, present to the king only those that are both beneficial and gratifying. If there happens to be something that is definitely beneficial, you must tell the king of it, even if it is unpleasant. You must always put the interests of the king first and never speak offensively or unnecessarily.

Be alert and never become complacent in the king's affection. Always focus on his happiness and prosperity, remain steadfast and do not swerve from your allegiance to him. Do not befriend the king's enemies. Never wrong the king. This is the way to succeed in a royal household.

A wise man sits beside the king, on his right or left; he should not sit behind him, for that is the place for his armed guards; and to sit in front of him is forbidden. None of you should ingratiate yourselves with the king by intervening while he is dealing with his subjects' grievances. Even if the supplicant is poor and needy, such behaviour is inexcusable.

Never reveal a falsehood that the king may have spoken, because the king will hate those who expose his lies. Remember that kings distrust men who show themselves as being clever. You should not be vain about your bravery or intelligence. You will earn the monarch's respect and enjoy a prosperous life by being humble and subservient to the king's wishes. And Bhaaratas, even when you acquire wealth—which is not easy—and lead a comfortable life, you should continue to work towards the king's advantage and pleasure. Which man who is held in high regard would even think of displeasing the one whose anger results in the worst failure and whose favour brings great rewards?

You should always sit still in the king's presence. Speak mildly and use your spittoon softly when you are with the king. Do not laugh loudly or uproariously, nor be unnaturally grave when you see something amusing. Show your interest by smiling discreetly. If you are always conscious of the king's welfare, if you do not allow rewards to elate you or sorrows to deject you, then you will thrive in the king's court.

If you are wise and make the king and his princes happy by speaking pleasantly, you will become the king's favourite. And if, as the favourite courtier, you should then lose royal favour for a good reason, yet still do not speak ill of the king, you will regain it in time. If you are astute, you will speak only in praise of the king, both in his presence and out of it.

If you manipulate the king in order to achieve your own objective, you will jeopardise your position in court and risk death. Never initiate communications with the king's enemies with a view to furthering yourself. You should never try to best the king at any skill or talent. Be cheerful and mild-mannered, honest, strong and courageous; but live in the king's shadow. These qualities will make you worthy of living in the royal household.

When you are given a responsibility, accept it readily. This will make you deserving of living in the king's palace. If you are entrusted with a task, either within or outside the king's dominion, undertake it boldly for then you will deserve to live in the royal household. Although you are far away from home, do not show your grief at the absence of loved ones; show that you are willing to endure deprivation in expectation of future happiness. This is how you will succeed in living in the king's household.

You should not dress as grandly as the king; you should not laugh loudly in his presence; you should never divulge royal secrets. This is how you will win the king's favour. You should never be tempted by bribes to complete work that is assigned to you. This could lead to imprisonment, even death. You should always use the clothes, jewels and chariots that, in his magnanimity, the king gives you. This will please him.

My children, Pandavas, discipline yourselves during this year. Once you regain your kingdom, you can live as you please.'

Yudhishtira says to Dhaumya, 'You have tutored us well, O Dhaumya. May you be blest. No one could have advised us as you have, other than our mother Kunti and the wise Vidura. Now, you must perform the needful ceremonies for our departure, to help us come safely through our difficulties, and finally to vanquish our enemies.'

Dhaumya, the best of Brahmanas, performs the proper rites of leave-taking. He lights the fires and offers oblations accompanied by mantras. He prays for the prosperity and success of the Pandavas and for their re-conquest of the world. The Pandavas walk in pradakshina around sacred Agni and the holy Brahmanas, and set out with Yagnaseni at the head of their little procession of six.

When the noble Kshatriyas have left, Dhaumya takes their sacred fires and sets out for the Panchala kingdom. Indrasena and the others go to the Yadavas and live there in contentment, looking after the Pandavas' horses and chariots."

Vaisampayana said, "The princes strap their swords around their waists, put on their lizard-skin finger guards and arm themselves with their other weapons. Closing the chapter of their life in dense forests and inaccessible mountain ranges, impatient to end their exile and recover their kingdom, the mighty warriors stride towards the southern bank of the river Kalindi.

Those Kshatriyas, who have been living like forest-dwelling deer hunters, pass through Yakriloma and Surasena. They pass the Panchala kingdom on their right and the Dasarna kingdom on their left. Now pale and bearded from their years in the forest, they finally emerge from it and enter the Matsya kingdom, still in the guise of hunters.

Here Krishnaa says to Yudhishtira, 'O look at these footpaths and fields. It seems the city is still some distance away. I am tired; let us break our journey and spend the night here.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Arjuna, carry Panchali in your arms. We have just this forest to cross and we shall arrive at the city.'

Like the bull-elephant of the herd, Arjuna picks Draupadi up in his arms and sets her down only when they near the city.

On reaching the city, Yudhishtira says to Arjuna, 'Where shall we leave our weapons before we enter? If, my brother, we go in armed, we will cause alarm. Also, everyone will recognise the Gandiva and it will not take them long to know who we are. Remember that if even one of us is discovered, by our oath we must pass another twelve years in the forest.'

Arjuna says, 'Close to that smasana you see over there, near that steep hill, is a huge sami tree, difficult to climb because of its wildly spreading branches. Nobody will see us hiding our weapons there, or discover them when they are hidden, Pandava. The tree stands in the heart of a remote forest full of predators and crawling with snakes; and the gloomy cemetery is right beside it. Let us store our weapons in the sami tree and then, without anxiety, go to Virata's city.'

Saying this to Yudhishtira, Arjuna prepares to conceal the weapons in the tree. He loosens the string of the great and dreadful Gandiva, the bow whose twang fills the air like thunder, which razes enemies, with which Arjuna has single-handedly conquered Devas, Manavas, Nagas and entire kingdoms.

Then Yudhishtira unties the wondrous, undecaying string of his bow, with which he defended Kurukshetra. And the illustrious, pure-hearted Bhimasena unstrings his bow, with which he defeated the Panchalas and the lord of Sindhu, with which he singly opposed countless enemies who only had to hear the deafening mountain-splitting sound of his weapon to make them flee in panic from the battlefield.

Nakula, the copper-skinned, soft-spoken son of Pandu, named for his exceptional handsomeness, unfastens the string of his bow, with which he conquered all the western lands. The heroic but mild-mannered Sahadeva undoes the string of his bow with which he subjugated the southern countries.

With the bows, they place their flashing swords and quivers of razor-sharp arrows. Nakula climbs the tree and fastens this armoury in it, tying the weapons securely on high sturdy branches sheltered from the rain.

The Pandavas take a corpse from the neaby cemetery and hang it from the sami tree, knowing that anyone who even whiffs the stench of rotting flesh will avoid that place.

Just at that time, some cowherds happen to pass by and ask about the corpse. The Pandavas say to them, 'This is our mother, who was a hundred and eighty years old. We have hung her body from the tree, according to our ancient custom.'

At last, those slayers of their foes approach the city. Yudhishtira gives himself and his brothers other names to be part of their disguise: Jaya, Jayanta, Vijaya, Jayatsena, and Jayatbala. They go towards the great city to pass the thirteenth year of their exile undiscovered, as they vowed they would to Duryodhana.”

Vaisampayana said, “As he nears Virata’s city, Yudhishtira meditates on the divine Devi Durga and salutes her in praise. She is the supreme Goddess of the universe, born from the womb of Yasoda, font of the boons bestowed on her by Narayana, sprung from the race of the cowherd Nanda, giver of prosperity, enhancer of the glory of his bhaktas, nemesis of Kamsa, destroyer of Asuras. She, who flew into the deepest skies when Kamsa dashed her against a rock, is Krishna’s sister; she is adorned in celestial garlands and attired in heavenly raiment; she is armed with sword and shield.

This eternal bestower of blessings always rescues the devotee who, when stuck and drowning like a cow in a quagmire, calls out to her in distress to free him. It is She that Yudhishtira invokes, in his yearning to see her, by chanting her various names in praise and devotion.

Yudhishtira says, ‘Salutations, O giver of boons. You are one with Krishna. Devi Brahmacharini, you have observed the vow of brahmacharya. Your being blazes like the Sun at dawn. Your face is as radiant as the full moon.

I salute you! Four-handed, four-faced, round-hipped and deep-breasted, you wear bangles made of emeralds and sapphires, and exquisite bracelets adorn your upper arms. You shine, O Goddess, as Padma, the consort of Narayana. You that roam the akasa, your form and chastity are immaculate. Your face, as dark as black clouds, is beautiful like Sankarshana. Your two great arms you hold upright in praise of Indra; in your six other arms you hold a vessel, a lotus, a bell, a noose, a bow, a discus and myriad weapons.

I salute you! You are the only truly pure female being in the universe. Your shapely ears are adorned with rings. O Devi, the radiance of your face challenges the Moon in lustre. Wearing a wondrous crown, with braided hair, in snake-skin robes and glittering waistlet you shine like snake-girdled mount Mandara. Iridescent peacock feathers decorate your head. You have sanctified Devaloka with your vow of celibacy. O Slayer of Mahishasura, you are praised and worshipped by the Devas themselves for the protection of the three worlds, Swarga, Bhumi and Patala.

I salute you! First of all Deities, give me your grace, show me your mercy, and bless me. You are Jaya and Vijaya; it is you who gives victory in battle. Grant me victory and boons, O Devi, in this my hour of distress.

I salute you! You are resplendent in your eternal abode on Vindhya parvatam, best of mountains. O Kali, Kali, Mahakali, wine, meat and animal sacrifice please you. You who can go anywhere at will, you who can bestow boons on your devotees, Brahma and the other gods are always with you on these journeys. There is nothing that cannot be had, children or wealth, by supplicants who call upon you for relief from their burdens and by those who bow to you at daybreak on Earth.

You are called Durga because you rescue those who are in distress, whether they are in a wilderness or sinking in an ocean. You are the sole refuge of men when they are attacked by robbers, when they flounder in rivers and seas, when they are oppressed in the wilderness and evil forests. Mahadevi, Great Goddess, men who meditate on you are never struck down.

I salute you! You are Keerti—fame, Sri—prosperity, Dhriti—constancy, Siddhi—success, Neera—modesty, Vidya—learning. You are man's wife and his offspring. You are knowledge and the intellect. You are Sandhya—the two twilights, Ratri—the dark night, Prabha—light, Nidra—sleep, and Jyotsna Kanti—the light of the Sun and the Moon. You are Kshama—forgiveness, Daya—mercy, and every virtue besides.

From those who worship you, you remove their fetters of ignorance, childlessness, poverty, disease, death and fear. I, who have been deprived of my kingdom, beg for your protection. I worship you with bowed head, Sureshwari, Goddess of the gods of light. O Devi Padmapatrakshi—lotus-leaf-eyed one, watch over me.

O Durga, to us who uphold dharma by our actions, be Truth incarnate and the granter of wishes. In your compassion for all who seek refuge in you, in your love for your devotees, give me your protection.'

Hearing these stutis, the Goddess appears before Yudhishtira and says, 'O Rajan, Mahabaho, hearken to me! My grace will help you vanquish the Kaurava army and will give you victory in battle. You will again be lord of the Earth and rid her of evil. And through my grace, you and your brothers will enjoy great felicity; every joy and prosperity will be yours.

All who chant praises of my attributes and victories shall be freed from their sins and made happy. I will bless them with lands, long life, physical beauty and children. They who invoke me as you have done, be they in exile or in their homes, in the midst of battle or in unseen danger from their enemies, in forests or in deserts, in seas or on mountains, will want for nothing in this world. Pandava, those who devotedly recite this powerful hymn of yours, or even listen to it, will enjoy success in all that they do.

My grace will ensure that neither the Kaurava spies nor the people of the Matsya kingdom will recognise you all as long as you live in Virata's city!'

Having spoken to Yudhishtira Parantapa, and having granted her protection to the Pandavas, the Goddess Durga disappears."

Vaisampayana said, "Yudhishtira wraps in brocade his dice of gold set with blue sapphires, tucks it under his arm and walks towards Virata's court. This illustrious lord of men, noble scion of Kuru, honoured by kings, mighty, irrepressible, as deserving of wariness as a venomous snake, a bull among men, powerful and beautiful, blessed with greatness and godlike in form is now like the Sun shrouded by thick clouds, like fire covered by ashes, when he appears before the famed king Virata in his court.

Virata and his courtiers see Yudhishtira, looking like the full moon veiled by clouds, his face as radiant as Soma Deva's.

The king says to his ministers, the Brahmanas, the Maharathas and the Vaisyas in his court, 'Who is this kingly man who enters my sabha? He cannot be a Brahmana. He looks like a lord among men, a lord of the Earth. He has no slaves, chariots or elephants with him, yet he has the majesty of Indra. I think the marks on his body indicate that he has been crowned at a sacred rite. He approaches me boldly much like an elephant walking towards a bed of lotuses!'

Yudhishtira comes before Virata and says, 'Maharajan, I am a Brahmana. I have lost all my possessions and come to beg you for the means to sustain myself. O Anagha, I will live here and serve you faithfully, my lord.'

The king is pleased and replies, ‘You are welcome here. Consider yourself appointed to whatever position you seek.’ Happily he gives Yudhishtira the appointment he asks for and says, ‘I ask you in affection, what kingdom do you come from? What is your name? Which family do you belong to? What skills and knowledge do you have?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘My name is Kanka, and I am a Brahmana belonging to the Vaiyaghra family. I am good at throwing dice, and I was once a friend of Dharmaputra Yudhishtira’s.’

Virata says, ‘I will grant you whatever you wish. You can even rule the Matsyas and I will be your subject. I like gamblers, even cunning ones. You, on the other hand, are like a Deva and deserve not a mere position in my court, but an entire kingdom.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘My first request, lord of Earth, is that my play should not be disputed by any low-born man. Further, I will keep my winnings at dice, whosoever I play against. Honour me by granting me these wishes.’

Virata says, ‘I will kill anyone who crosses you; if he be a Brahmana, I will banish him from my kingdom. Let all that are assembled here mark my words: from this day, Kanka is as much lord of this realm as I am! Kanka, you will be my companion and ride with me in my chariot. You will not lack for clothes; you shall have abundant food and drink. You will supervise my transactions, both at home and abroad; and for you my doors will be always open. When the destitute or job-seekers approach you, you will inform me immediately, whatever the hour, and I will help them. As long as you live with me, you need have no fear.’

Having received these assurances from Virata, Yudhishtira settles down to a happy life and quickly earns the respect of all. And during that time, no one suspects who he is.”

Vaisampayana said, "In a short while, another of blazing beauty and strength comes before Virata. Holding a cook's ladle, a spoon and a gleaming, unsheathed sable-hued sword in his hands, he walks toward the king like a lion. Even in the guise of a cook, he lights up the court like the Sun shining on the world at daybreak. This man, strong as Himavat king of mountains, dressed in black, comes forward and stands at a small remove from the king of the Matsyas.

Virata looks at this regal one and says to his courtiers, 'Who is this extraordinarily handsome young man with the shoulders of a lion, this Manavarishabha? The stranger is like the resplendent Sun. Try as I might, I do not recognise him and cannot guess why he is here. His appearance suggests that he is either the king of the Gandharvas or Purandara himself. Find out who he is, and let his wishes be granted at once.'

Virata's messengers go quickly up to Bhimasena, and give him the king's message.

The noble Pandava approaches Virata and says in a cook's humble way, 'O best of kings, I am a cook. My name is Ballava and my skill lies in cooking the most exotic dishes. I beg you, employ me in your kitchen!'

Virata says, 'I cannot believe, Ballava, that cooking is your true calling. You resemble Indra the thousand-eyed; your strength, beauty and grace make you seem like a king.'

Bhima replies, ‘King of kings, first and foremost I am your cook and servant, but in truth it is not only cooking that I am expert at, although I used to prepare food for Yudhishtira himself at one time. Lord of the Earth, I am also a wrestler. There is no one as strong as me: I can fight lions and elephants, O Anagha, and entertain you otherwise.’

Virata says, ‘I will grant your wish; you may have the job you ask for, since you say you are skilled at it. Yet, I do not think that this is work worthy of you. You deserve the Earth with her girdle of seas, but it shall be as you wish. You will oversee my kitchens and have authority over everyone there.’

Once he is established in the kitchen, Bhima soon becomes the favourite of king Virata; he continues to live there unrecognised by the servants and others of the court.”

Vaisampayana said, "Her incomparable hair—fine, soft, long and black, ending in curls—is plaited. Dark-eyed, dark-skinned Draupadi of the sweet smiles throws her braid over her right shoulder and conceals it under the end of her upper cloth. As befitting her guise of a sairandhri, she is dressed in just a single piece of grand, but old, black cloth. She wanders here and there inside the palace grounds in apparent distress.

Seeing her drifting aimlessly, men and women hurry to her side and ask, 'Who are you? And what are you looking for?'

And she says, 'I am a royal sairandhri. I am looking for someone whom I can serve, who will take care of me.'

So lovely is she, so rich her clothes, so sweet her speech, that people cannot believe she is a maidservant in search of a job. While looking out from her terrace, Virata's beloved queen, the king of Kekaya's daughter, happens to notice Draupadi.

Seeing her forlorn appearance and shabby attire, Queen Sudeshna calls out to her, 'O Sundari, beautiful one, who are you, and what do you want?'

Draupadi answers, 'Foremost of queens, I am a sairandhri, willing to serve anyone who will take care of me.'

Sudeshna says, 'What you say does not match the beauty I see. You might well be the mistress of servants rather than a servant yourself.

Your heels are slim, your thighs rounded, and your navel is deep; you seem intelligent and your words are solemn. Your body is both young and exquisite: your toes, breasts and hips, your back and sides, your toe-nails, your palms. The palms of your hands, the soles of your feet are the colour of the deep-red wild rose; your voice is sweet like a swan's; your hair is lovely; your breasts are shapely and graceful.

Like a Kashmiri mare you bear the marks of lofty lineage. You have curled eyelashes, pink lips, a slender waist, a neck with conch-like lines, delicate veins, and a face like the full moon. Your eyes are like lotus leaves; your body is fragrant like the lotus blossom. Indeed, you look like Lakshmi, whose best-loved seat is that autumnal flower.

Tell me who you are, incomparable one; you cannot be a sairandhri. Are you a Yakshi, a Devi, a Gandharvi or an Apsara? Are you the daughter of a Deva, or are you a Nagina? Perhaps you are the guardian goddess of some city? A Vidyadhari or a Kinnari? Are you Rohini herself? Or are you Alambusha, or Misrakesi, Pundarika, or Malini, or Indra Deva's queen, or Varuna's? Or are you the wife of Visvakarma, or the consort of Lord Vishnu himself? Of these goddesses who are celebrated in Devaloka, which one are you, most graceful one?'

Draupadi says, 'Revered queen, I am neither a goddess nor a Gandharvi, neither a Yakshi nor a Rakshasi. I am, truly, a maidservant of the sairandhri class. I know how to dress a royal lady's hair; I can make fragrant lotions and colourful malas of jasmines, lotuses, blue lilies and champakas.

At one time, I served Krishna's beloved queen Satyabhama; and I was once maid to Draupadi, most beautiful of Kurus and wife of the Pandavas. I wander about alone now, living as long as I can in any place where I can earn a good meal and fine clothes in exchange for my services. Draupadi used to call me Malini, maker of garlands.'

Sudeshna says, 'I would so love to take you into my care and pamper you if it were not for the anxiety that the king may lose his heart to you. Even the women and maids of the antahpura are drawn by your beauty and cannot take their eyes off you. What man could resist you? Surely, exquisite one of rounded hips, my husband Virata will see your supernatural loveliness and forsake me for you.

You of the perfect limbs, whose large eyes cast darting sidelong glances, any man you look at with desire will be struck by love. You of the sweet smiles and the perfect body, he whose eyes linger on you will be seared by desire. Like the man who risks his life by climbing a lofty tree, even as the crab conceives her young ones who will kill her by their birth, I may destroy myself by giving you a home.'

Draupadi says, 'Lovely devi, neither Virata nor any other man will have me, for my five Gandharva husbands, sons of a powerful Gandharva king, protect me. No one can injure or dishonour me. My husbands have forbidden me to work for anyone who makes me wash their feet, and I am not allowed to eat food from another's plate. Any man who attempts to have me like a common woman will die that very night. My beloved and mighty Gandharvas protect me silently and at all times.'

Sudeshna says, 'You who gladden hearts, if that is the way of it, I will take you into my household, and you shall not be required to touch food that has been served to another person, nor wash another's feet.'

Janamejaya, with these words of queen Sudeshna, Krishnaa, devoted to her husbands, begins her life in the city of Virata, and no one knows who she really is!"

Vaisampayana said, "Sahadeva, dressed like a cowherd and speaking in Yadava dialect, makes his way to king Virata's cowsheds. Amazed to see this splendid bull among men, Virata instructs his men to summon the disguised Pandava to his presence.

When Sahadeva appears before him, the king says, 'Whose service are you in and where do you come from? What work are you looking for? I have never seen you before, Purusharishabha. Tell me about yourself.'

That distresser of his foes, Sahadeva, stands before the king, and in a voice as deep as thunder says, 'I am a Vaisya, and my name is Arishtanemi. I served those bulls of the Kuru race, the Pandavas, as a cowherd, but I want to live in your service now, Purushottama, because I no longer know where those lions among kings are, the sons of Pritha. I need a livelihood and I do not want to work for anyone but you.'

Virata says to him, 'You must either be a Brahmana or a Kshatriya. You look as if you are lord of all Bhumi and her seas. Be honest with me, you who mow down your foes. The work of a Vaisya is not fit for you. Whose kingdom do you come from? What knowledge and skills do you have? In what capacity would you like to stay here with us? And what payment would you accept?'

Sahadeva says, 'Yudhishtira, the eldest of Pandu's five sons, has many herds of cattle. One numbers ten thousand and eight hundred heads; one numbers ten thousand, another is twenty thousand strong; and I helped tend all those cows and bulls. People call me Tantripala. I know the pedigrees of all cows living within ten yojanas. Raja Yudhishtira was familiar with my gunas, and he was very pleased with me.

I also know how to increase the fertility of cows and how to prevent diseases. I can distinguish bulls that have the auspicious marks that make them worthy of worship by men, and by the scent of whose urine barren women can conceive.'

Virata says, 'I have a hundred thousand cattle divided into separate herds. I give you charge of them all; and their keepers too will be under your authority. Henceforth my livestock will be in your care.'

From this day Sahadeva lives contentedly in the Matsya kingdom, working for Virata, his true identity unknown to the king or anyone else, except his brothers."

Vaisampayana continued, "The next to appear at the gates of the palace ramparts is a great and exquisitely beautiful man decked in women's ornaments. He wears large earrings and the finest conch-shell bracelets set in gold. He has powerful arms and his long, lush hair tumbles about his neck. He walks with the graceful gait of an elephant, and he makes the earth tremble as he comes into the sabha and stands before Virata.

Seeing the lustrous son of Indra, Arjuna Parantapa, disguised as a eunuch, enter the sabha with his magnificent gait and walk towards him, the king says to his courtiers, 'Where does this person come from? I do not recognise him.'

And when the courtiers say they do not know who the stranger is, the king says to Arjuna in wonderment, 'You look amazingly strong, like a Deva, and your youth and dark skin make you look like a bull-elephant, the leader of a herd. Wearing your seashell-and-gold bangles and earrings, decked with flower garlands, and with your soft hair, you shimmer like a fully-armed Kshatriya in his chariot.

I am old and want to give up my burden of kingship. Be like a son to me and share my burden, or even rule the kingdom of the Matsyas by yourself, as I do now. You are surely some great man and not a eunuch.'

Arjuna says, 'I sing, dance and play musical instruments, and I do all these very well. Lord of men, send me to princess Uttaraa to be her dance teacher. As to how I became a eunuch, is there any point in telling the story when the memory of it only brings me pain? Suffice it to say, O king, that I am Brihannala, son or daughter without father or mother.'

Virata says, 'Brihannala, I will give you the position you ask for. Teach my daughter and the other princesses to dance. To me, however, this occupation seems too lowly for you. You deserve the Earth and her girdle of seas.'

The king of the Matsyas verifies Brihannala's gifts in dancing, music and other fine arts by watching him perform. He consults his ministers and immediately sends Brihannala to be examined by women, who confirm that he is indeed a eunuch and quite impotent. Virata sends him to princess Uttaraa's apartments. And there, Arjuna begins giving lessons in singing and instrumental music to the daughter of Virata, to her sakhis and sairandhris, and he captures their hearts.

In this way, Arjuna lives confidently in disguise, enjoying the pleasure of the princess' company, unrecognised both by those inside the palace and outside it."

Vaisampayana said, "After a few days, citizens of the Matsya kingdom see Nakula purposefully making his way towards king Virata's palace. Looking like the Sun pushing its way through the clouds as he comes, he keenly inspects the horses he sees in the royal stables.

Noticing this, the king of the Matsyas says to his entourage, 'I wonder where this man, who glows like a Deva, comes from. He looks so intently at my horses; he must be very knowledgeable about them. Bring him to me at once. He seems to be a Kshatriya; truly, he looks like a god!'

Splendid Nakula Parantapa goes up to the king and says, 'Victory to you, O Rajan! May you be blest. I am a horse-trainer who has earned the respect of kings. I will look after your horses with great care.'

Virata says, 'I will give you chariots, wealth and spacious living quarters, and you shall have charge of my stables. But first tell me, where do you come from? Who are you? And what brings you to my kingdom? What other skills do you have?'

Nakula replies, 'Bane of your enemies, I used to work for the eldest of the Pandavas, Yudhishtira. I was in charge of his stables. I am sensitive to a horse's every mood and have mastered the art of breaking them in. I can calm wild or violent horses and know how to treat their diseases. No animal in my care becomes weak or ill. With my training, stallions and mares become docile. Everyone, including Yudhishtira, knows me as Granthika.'

Virata says, ‘From today I put all the horses in my stables in your care. From now, all those who work in the stables and my charioteers, as well, shall be answerable to you. What remuneration will you accept for this?

But you are kingly, almost godlike, and the occupation of an equerry is not worthy of you. You look like a king and I am filled with respect for you. Your presence makes me as happy as if Yudhishtira himself was here. Ah, I wonder how he who is so scrupulously principled passes his time in the forest without anyone to serve him?’

From then on, Nakula, looking like a Gandharva lord, is shown great respect by the delighted Virata and, by his conduct, he makes himself well-liked by everyone in the palace, and no one recognises him while he lives under Virata’s protection.

In this way, the Pandavas, the very sight of whom is a blessing, live in the realm of the Matsyas. With great forbearance in their time of distress, these lords of the earth and seas remain true to their pledge and pass their days unknown.”

SAMAYAPALANA PARVA

Janamejaya said, "While living disguised in the Matsya kingdom, what did the mighty Kuru princes do, Dvijottama?"

Vaisampayana replied, "Listen, O king, and I will tell you what those sons of Kuru do while they live disguised in the city of the Matsyas and serve that king.

By the grace of Rishi Trinabindu and of the sublime Dharma Deva, the Pandavas continue to live in Virata's city, undiscovered and in peace. Virata and the other nobles find in their new courtier, Kanka, a most congenial companion. An expert in the intricacies of the game of dice, this son of Pandu orchestrates dice games according to his will and makes players sit in the gaming hall like a row of birds on a wire.

Unknown to the king, Yudhishtira divides his winnings amongst his brothers. Bhima sends Yudhishtira meat and other food that he gets from the king. Arjuna distributes the used clothes that he is given in the antahpura of the palace. The Gopa, Sahadeva, gives them milk, curds and ghee. And Nakula shares the wealth that the king rewards him with for managing his stables. Carefully staying away from the gaze of men, forlorn Panchali keeps a watchful, loving eye on her husbands.

Whilst taking care of each other, those mighty Kshatriyas live in Virata's capital, hidden from view as if they are once more in their mother's womb. Ever vigilant of danger from Duryodhana, the Pandavas continue to live in hiding and watch over their wife.

Three months pass, and the grand festival of Lord Brahma is celebrated with pomp in the country of the Matsyas. Athletes from all parts of Bharatavarsha arrive in their thousands, like hosts of Devas flocking to the abode of Brahma or of Siva. They have mighty bodies and great strength, like the Kalakhanja Asuras. Virata honours them and they are proud indeed of their strength and achievements. Their necks, shoulders and waists are leonine. They are pure of body and heart and have already won many royal tournaments.

Amongst them there is one, Jimuta, who towers above the rest, and he challenges them all to a wrestling match. None dares approach him as he proudly stalks the arena. Seeing the dispirited wrestlers, the king of the Matsyas orders his head cook to meet the challenge.

Bhima reluctantly agrees, since he cannot openly disregard the royal request. Ballava the cook bows to the king and enters the capacious stadium, striding in with tigerish fearlessness. Then to the delight of the spectators, the son of Kunti roars a challenge to the towering Jimuta, whose strength and skill are as famed as the Asura Vritra's.

The awesome combatants are like two maddened bull-elephants in their prime. Those tigers among men begin their wrestling match, each one determined to crush the other. The very first clash between them sounds like a thunderbolt striking a stony mountain.

Delighted that they are evenly matched, each will take advantage of his opponent's slightest lapse. The excited adversaries are like elephants in musth. With clenched fists, they crash staggering blows into each other; they hurl each other away; each slams the other on to the ground; each holds the other down on the stadium floor. They get up again and squeeze each other's bodies in bone-crushing grips, in iron arms.

With stunning punches, they throw each other off balance; each grasps the other's legs and whirls him round before ramming him onto the ground. Their open palms strike like thunderclaps. They jab the nails of taut fingers into each other's bodies like spearheads. They kick; they dash head against head like the crash of granite against granite.

To the endless delight of the spectators, the furious hand to hand combat of the two titans rages on, kept up by the strength of their arms and the energy of their minds and bodies. Rajan, all are absorbed by the contention between the two, who battle like Indra Deva and Vritrasura, and they cheer them on with shouts of praise and applause.

The two long-armed, mighty-chested wrestlers heave, thrust, hurl, strike with their knees, all the while yelling taunts at each other. Their bare, glistening arms are truly like spiked iron maces. Then, finally, Bhima roars like some unimaginable lion and seizes his unyielding adversary, as a lion does an elephant. He picks him up, holds him aloft and, as the spectators—athletes and citizens of Matsya—watch in astonishment, he whirls him round and round over his head a hundred times until Jimuta is unconscious. And Mahabaho Vrikodara smashes him to death on the arena floor.

Virata and his friends rejoice at Jimuta's defeat and, in the exuberance of his elation, the king rewards Ballava with the legendary generosity of Kubera.

Bhima goes on to defeat and kill many other wrestlers, pleasing the king enormously. And when there is no one left who dares face him, Virata makes him fight with tigers, lions and elephants, not only in the public arena, but also in the antahpura for the entertainment of the women of the harem.

Arjuna sings and dances and, in his own way, entertains the king and those women of the inner apartments. Nakula keeps the king's stables full of well-trained, swift horses for the king and his men. Virata is pleased and gives Nakula rich rewards. Seeing the goshala filled with healthy bullocks and cows, Purusharishabha Virata makes gifts of all kinds of treasures to Sahadeva. And, O Rajan, poor Draupadi sighs in constant distress at seeing her Kshatriya husbands suffer.

It is in this way that the illustrious exiles render services to king Virata and live in disguise in the Matsya kingdom."

CANTO 14

KICHAKA-VADHA PARVA

Vaisampayana said, "Living in their disguises, those mighty Kshatriyas spend ten months in the Matsya city.

Rajan, accustomed herself to being waited on, Draupadi serves Sudeshna in her apartments and lives in some anguish, even though Virata's queen and the other ladies are delighted with their sairandhri.

One day, towards the end of that year of exile, Sudeshna's brother Kichaka, fearsome commander of Virata's forces, happens to catch sight of Draupadi. Seeing that woman of ethereal beauty, so like the daughter of a Deva, like a goddess who has stepped out of Devaloka to walk on Earth, he is struck by a shaft of Kama and he yearns for her.

The flame of lust burns high in him, and Senapati Kichaka comes to Sudeshna and says to her, 'I have not seen this woman in the palace before, and the sight of her intoxicates me like the fragrance of fresh wine. Tell me, who is this bewitching Apsara, as beautiful as a goddess? Whose is she and where has she come from? She maddens my heart and has enslaved me, and only she can heal me.

Ah, your sairandhri is as beautiful as a Devi. Surely, she is not fit to be your servant. Let her rule over me and whatever is mine. Let her grace my jewelled palace; let her enjoy the abundance of rich food and drink served in fine dishes and goblets. I have a surfeit of everything she could want, besides my countless elephants, horses and chariots.'

Having spoken to Sudeshna, Kichaka goes to Draupadi, like a jackal to a lioness, and says to Krishnaa in a disarming voice, 'Who are you, exquisite one; and whose are you? Sundari, from where have you come to this city of Virata's? Tell me, dark and exquisite one. Your beauty and grace are incomparable, and your face is peerless and radiant as the luminous Moon. O you of the high-arched brows, your eyes are like lotus petals; your voice is sweet like the koyal's song, you of the slender arms. O beautiful-hipped, faultless one, I have never seen any woman as perfect as you.

Are you the Goddess Lakshmi who lives in the midst of lotuses? Or are you Bhuti, O slender-waist? Perhaps you are Hri, Sri, Kirti or Kanti? Or maybe you are Rati, the beloved of Manmatha.

The celestial lustre of your face is like moonlight. What man could resist you once he has seen your face? Your beauty is supreme, your grace divine; your face is lovely as the full Moon, your smile like his soft light, and your eyelashes like the delicate rays of his beams. Your soft, rounded, deep breasts, set close together, should be adorned with garlands of gold. The sight of your lotus-bud breasts stings me with desire and lashes me like Kama Deva's whip.

O sweet-smiling and slender-waisted, when I see your belly, marked with four lines and measuring but a span of my hand, bent forward by the weight of your breasts, when I see your hips flare from your body like the banks of a river, a fever of longing torments me. Ah, its flames ravage me, fierce as a forest-fire, fanned by the hope of possessing you. Sublime one, cool the fever kindled by Manmatha. My desire is the rain-cloud and your surrender its cooling shower.

Sharpened by my need for you, Kama's arrows recklessly stab my heart. Black-eyes, they pierce deep and torture me past endurance. You must release me from this. Embrace me and give yourself to me. Adorn yourself in the finest robes, garlands and jewellery, my sweet one, and enjoy with me all the pleasures you could desire.

You who walk with the swaying gait of an elephant in rut, in this place you are deprived of the happiness that you deserve. You should not have to live in hardship; let me give you joy. Drink nectar-like wines, enjoy myriad entertainments and be joyful, O blessed devi. Your loveliness, youth and purity are being wasted, while you are like a spring vanamala cast aside and unworn.

I will forsake all my wives; let them be your servants. And I too will stay by your side, your obedient slave, exquisite creature.'

Hearing his passionate declarations, Draupadi says, 'Sutaputra, I am a lowborn sairandhri, a mere hair dresser. I am not worthy of your desire. Besides, I am already married. These overtures do not become a man of your stature. I beg you to remember dharma: men should only delight in their wives. Do not let temptation lead you to adultery. Refraining from adharma is the way of good men. Ignorant, sinful men who give in to lust are doomed to shame or some worse disaster.'

Hearing the sairandhri, the lecherous Kichaka loses control of himself and, though aware of the danger of sinning, he is overcome by his lust.

He says to Draupadi, 'It is not right for you to disregard me, for it is you, graceful and bewitching temptress, who have lured me into Manmatha's spell. If you reject one who is enchanted by you and who speaks so adoringly to you, you will regret it later, timid, black-eyed one.

You of the flowing brows and waist like a lotus stalk, know that I am the real master of this kingdom. The people of this land depend on me for their lives. In ardour and vigour I have no rivals on this earth; and there isn't another man on earth as handsome, as virile, wealthy or rich in treasures as I am. Fortunate devi, why do you choose to be a servant when you can bask in luxury and have everything your heart desires? Accept me and I will make you mistress of this kingdom; anything you want will be yours for the asking.'

Draupadi answers Kichaka's wretched proposition, 'Sutaputra, do not be so rash and throw your life away. I am protected by my five husbands. You cannot have me; my husbands are Gandharvas and will kill you if you try. Do not bring death upon yourself. You have embarked on a path that no wise man should take. Fool, you are like an ignorant child on the seashore who wants to cross the waves. Even if you dive to the core of the earth, or fly deep into the sky or cross the ocean to the other shore, you cannot escape my divine Gandharvas who slaughter their enemies.

Kichaka, why do you pursue me so persistently, almost like a sick man who is impatient for death? Why do you yearn for me, like a baby lying on its mother's lap reaching for the moon? For you who crave their beloved wife there is no haven from my Gandharva husbands either on earth or in the heavens. Kichaka, for your own good, be wise and save your life.' "

Vaisampayana said, "Rejected by Draupadi, the lust-crazed Kichaka abandons good sense and says to Sudeshna, 'Daughter of Kekaya, O my sister, do whatever you must to make your sairandhri mine. Somehow see that this woman with the swaying gait of a she-elephant accepts me, for I am dying from wanting her, Sudeshna.'

Kichaka's ardent distress moves Virata's gentle queen to pity. She thinks deeply about what her brother wants and about Krishnaa's fears.

She says to her brother, the Sutaputra, 'On a festival day arrange for some special food and wine. I will send my sairandhri to you on the pretext of bringing me wine. When she comes to your home, make sure you are alone with her and undisturbed; then woo her in whatever way you think best. If her mind is soothed, she may be persuaded to give herself to you.'

Kichaka leaves his sister's apartments and in a few days begins his preparations. He procures wines fit for a king's table; he has expert cooks prepare every kind of delicacy, including superb meat dishes. When all is ready, Sudeshna sends Krishnaa to Kichaka's palace.

She says, 'My lovely Malini, go to my brother Kichaka's house and fetch me some wine for I am terribly thirsty.'

Krishnaa replies, 'My queen, I cannot go to Kichaka's home. You know how bold he is. Beautiful devi of the perfect arms, while I work for you in this palace I will not sin by being unfaithful to my husbands. O gentle queen, remember the conditions I made before entering your service. You of the tresses ending in soft curls, foolish Kichaka is under Kama's spell and will dishonour me. You have so many maids; send any of them, for if I go, Kichaka will surely ravish me.'

Sudeshna says, 'You are going at my behest and from my house; he will surely not hurt you,' and hands her sairandhri a golden flask.

Her eyes full of tears, the helpless Draupadi prays for protection as she sets out for Kichaka's apartments. She prays, 'I have not been with any man other than my husbands; by virtue of my chastity grant that Kichaka be unable to overpower me even while I am in his presence.'

And she invokes Surya Deva. The Sun God hears her and commands a Rakshasa to protect her. The unseen Rakshasa follows the chaste Draupadi.

Seeing Krishnaa enter his presence like a frightened doe, the Suta rises from his chair, jubilant as a man who, desperate to cross a river, manages to acquire a boat."

"Kichaka says, 'O welcome, you of the shimmering tresses that end in curls of such beauty! Dawn has brought me an auspicious day for you are here today to be mistress of my house. Make me happy. I will have golden necklaces, conch-shells, bright gold earrings, precious jewels from distant lands, rubies and other gems, as well as silks and the softest deer-skins to be brought for you. I have a luxurious bed prepared. Come; sit on it and share this honey wine with me.'

Draupadi says, 'The queen sent me here to fetch wine. I beg you, give it to me quickly, for she is thirsty.'

Kichaka says, 'Gentle one, someone else will take the princess what she wants,' and seizes Draupadi's arm.

She cries, 'I have never been unfaithful to my husbands, even in my mind. Vile man, you have laid hands on me and I swear I shall see you dragged down to the ground and lying powerless.'

Provoked by the reproof of that large-eyed beauty, Kichaka suddenly takes hold of the end of her upper garment, even as she tries to escape. His brutishness is unbearable; Krishnaa's breath quickens, and her body trembles in rage as she thrusts him away from her, making the evil one fall like a tree whose roots are cut. Having flung Kichaka down, Draupadi, shaking, runs for refuge to the sabha where Yudhishtira sits. Kichaka jumps up and pursues her, catches her by her long hair in the very sabha, throws her down before the king himself, and kicks her savagely.

Then, O Bhaarata, the invisible Rakshasa, whom Surya Deva sent to protect her, attacks Kichaka forcefully as a gale-wind; and Kichaka reels and falls like an uprooted tree.

Yudhishtira and Bhimasena are both in that royal court, and they watch Kichaka's outrage of Krishnaa in fury. Bhima wants to kill Virata's senapati; he gnashes his teeth and beads of sweat break out on his heavy brow. His eyes darken as if with smoke, his eyelashes stand on end, and that slayer of enemies buries his head in his hands.

He is about to fly at Kichaka when, in fear of being discovered, Yudhishtira presses down hard on Bhima's thumbs, restraining him. And looking like an infuriated elephant eyeing a large tree, Bhima stays where he is, prohibited by his elder brother.

Yudhishtira says, 'Are you looking for trees for fuel, O cook? If you need kindling, go to the forest.'

Through her tears Draupadi of the graceful hips sees her enraged husbands, and she remembers their pledge and her duty to maintain her disguise. Her eyes flash fire as she says to the king of the Matsyas, 'Today this son of a Suta has insulted the proud and beloved wife of powerful beings; he will find no sanctuary, even if he puts four kingdoms between himself and them. O, this son of a Suta kicked the wife of great beings of truth who are devoted to Brahmanas and whose charity is unconditional. This son of a Suta has kicked the chaste wife of beings whose drums and bowstrings are never silent. This son of a Suta has dishonoured the dearly-loved wife of heroes who are mighty and vigorous, who are generous and proud. O, this son of a Suta has kicked the wife of beings who could destroy the whole world if they were not bound by ties of dharma.

Ah, where are those warriors now who, though living unknown, always grant protection to those who ask for it? Why do these fiery conquerors allow their wife to be abused by a Suta's son, as if they are eunuchs? Where is that rage of theirs, their power, their ardour? How can they stand by and watch a base wretch humiliate their wife? What can I do when dishonourable Virata calmly watches an evil man abuse an innocent woman?

You do not deal with this Kichaka as a king should. Your behaviour is that of a common criminal; it does no credit to this royal sabha. It is not dharma that I have been vilely abused in your presence and you do nothing to redress the wrong.

Let all who are present here see this outrage. Kichaka has ignored dharma; and Virata has done the same. You courtiers who wait upon such a king are equally lacking in honour,' rages Krishnaa, her eyes streaming.

Virata says, 'I did not see what quarrel led to this. Without knowing the truth how can I rule in one person's favour?'

When the courtiers hear what took place they support Krishnaa with applause saying, Well done, and condemn Kichaka.

They say, 'The husband who possesses this lovely-eyed and graceful woman of inestimable worth is a most fortunate man. Rare indeed is a woman of such extraordinary and flawless beauty. Why, she seems to be a goddess.'

Meanwhile, as the courtiers praise Krishnaa, Yudhishtira's brow perspires in anger, and that bull of the Kurus says to his wife, 'Do not stay here, sairandhri; return to Sudeshna's apartments. Wives must endure torment for the sake of their husbands; they attain swarga by suffering great hardships while serving their lords. Your Gandharva husbands, radiant as suns, do not consider this an apt occasion for unleashing their anger, which is why they do not rush to your side.

You weep theatrically in distress because you do not know the deeper significance of all things. Besides, you interrupt the play of dice in the king's court. Leave, sairandhri; the Gandharvas will do what you want. They know of your troubles and will kill the man who has wronged you.'

Krishnaa says, 'My husbands are loving, but they are controlled by one among them and cannot act freely, for that eldest of them is addicted to dice.'

And Krishnaa goes back to Sudeshna's apartments, her hair dishevelled, her eyes blazing and her face flushed and swollen from weeping; she returns like the moon breaking out from behind clouds.

Seeing her like that, Sudeshna asks, 'Ah lovely one, who has hurt you? Why do you cry? Who has upset you, gentle one? Why this grief?'

Draupadi says, 'When I went to fetch wine for you, Kichaka attacked me in the very presence of the king, in his sabha, as if in an unpeopled forest.'

Sudeshna says, 'Lust-maddened Kichaka abused you because he cannot have his way with you. I will have him killed if that is what you wish.'

Draupadi says to her, 'There are others, whom he has wronged, who will kill him. He will go to Yamaloka this very day.' "

Vaisampayana said, "Incensed by what the Suta's son did to her, Krishnaa, fervently praying for the death of Virata's senapati, goes to her room. Drupada's dark-eyed daughter bathes herself. She cries as she washes her body and she wonders how she can wash away her grief.

She says to herself, 'What am I to do? Where can I go?' Then she remembers Bhima and says, 'There is no one except Bhima who can do what my heart is set on.'

That night, griefstricken and wrathful Krishnaa, protected by her powerful, unseen Rakshasa guardian, leaves her bed and hurries to Bhimasena's apartment.

She glides into her second husband's chambers and says, 'How can you sleep while Kichaka, Virata's wretched senapati, my enemy, still lives after the vile thing he did to me today?'

The room where Bhima sleeps, his breath loud like a lion's, is lit by Draupadi's beauty and his own magnificence. Krishnaa goes to him in his cook's apartments, eagerly as a young untamed cow in her first heat to a bull, like a heron by the water-side to her mate in season. The princess of Panchala embraces the second son of Pandu as a frail creeper hugs the great sala tree on the banks of the Gomati. Krishnaa takes him in her arms and rouses him, as a lioness does a sleeping lion in the forest.

Embracing Bhimasena as a she-elephant does her mighty mate, Panchali says in a voice as alluring as a celestial veena playing a Gandharva raga,

‘Wake up, Bhimasena! Why do you lie so still, as if you are dead? Surely, one who is alive would not allow the wretch who disgraced his wife to live.’

Bhima Mahabaho wakes up; he sits up on his couch and says to his precious wife, ‘What brings you here in such anxiety? You look pale and worn. What has happened? Tell me everything. I must know the truth, happy or painful, pleasant or unpleasant, and I will find a solution to your distress. Krishnaa, of all your husbands I am most worthy of your trust; for it is I who always save you from danger. Tell me what you want and why; then return to your bed before others awake.’ ”

"Draupadi says, 'How can a woman who has Yudhishtira for a husband be free from sorrow; and knowing all that I have sufferd how can you ask me this question? That Pratikami dragged me to the Kuru court and called me a slave before all the sabha. That agony, Bhaarata, still consumes me. Which other princess could suffer such misery and still live?

Who else but I could have borne what the evil lord of Sindhu did to me while we lived in the forests? Which other queen could live after being kicked by Kichaka in full view of the honourless king of the Matsyas? What is the point of my living, Bhima, when despite all this, you ask me why I am miserable?

The evil Kichaka is Virata's brother-in-law and commands his armies; he accosts me daily and propositions me, and asks me to be his wife. Like an over-ripe fruit, my heart is bursting from that wretch, who deserves to die, constantly importuning me.

Chastise your elder brother who is addicted to dice; my unhappiness is his doing. Only a reckless gambler stakes his kingdom and everything he owns, including his wife, on one throw, against a life in the forests. If he had gambled day and night for years and wagered thousands of nishkas and other precious possessions, his wealth: silver and gold, costly robes, cattle, sheep, goats and innumerable horses, would still be past reckoning. But now, stripped of everything by a single throw of the ivory dice, he sits mute and ponders his foolishness.

It is pitiful that he, who travelled with ten thousand elephants adorned with golden garlands in his retinue, now supports himself by throwing dice. Kings idolised Yudhishtira and hundreds of thousands of people worshipped him in Indraprastha. In his halls legions of serving-maids attended on countless guests day and night. That most generous of men, who gave thousands of nishkas in charity every day, is now fallen because of his gambling, that root of all evils, and has sunk to earning his livelihood by daily casting dice.

Throngs of poets and rich admirers decked in jewelled earrings once sang melodious praises and paid homage to him all day long. Sadly, the great Yudhishtira, whom a thousand holy sages, all Vedic scholars, served, and whose every wish he granted; Yudhishtira, who maintained eighty-eight thousand Snatakas with thirty servants each; Yudhishtira, who looked after ten thousand Yatis who had forsaken worldly life—this Yudhishtira now lives ajnatavasa, in pathetic disguise.

Yudhishtira is kind, without malice, and gives every man his due; he who has such admirable qualities now lives behind a mask. He of unquestionable power and steadfastness, who is fair-minded; compassionate Yudhishtira, who tends to the blind, the old, the helpless, the orphaned and the distressed—he is now a servant who calls himself Kanka, a thrower of dice in the Matsya king's court and dependent on him.

He, to whom kings of the Earth used to pay tribute in Indraprastha, now begs for subsistence. He, under whose dominion all the lords of the Earth came, has lost his sovereignty and is the subject of another.

Yudhishtira, who blazed over the world like the Sun, is now a liege of Virata. Pandava, look how your brother, whom kings and sages revered, now waits upon another, lesser king.

How can anyone who sees Yudhishtira fawning on Virata and making adulatory speeches as his courtier, not be heartbroken? How can anyone who sees the wise and noble Yudhishtira waiting on another for sustenance not be griefstricken, undeserving though my lord may be of that sorrow.

O Kshatriya, that Bhaarata whom the entire world worshipped is the one you now see adulating another man. When you can see all this, Bhimasena, why are you not able to see me in my misery, drowning in a sea of sorrow?'

"Draupadi continues, 'O Bhaarata, I am going to tell you of another great sadness of mine. Do not be upset with me, for I say this out of grief.

Who would not be sad to see you, O Bhima, Bharatarishabha, doing the work of a cook, so entirely beneath you, and pretending to belong to the Ballava caste? What can be sadder than people knowing you only as one who is plunged in servitude as Virata's cook, and called Ballava? When your work in the kitchen is over, you wait on Virata, and despondency grips my heart. When that king makes you fight elephants for his amusement, and the women of the inner apartments titter in enjoyment, oh, I am sorely distressed.

When you wrestle with lions, tigers and bulls for the entertainment of princess Kaikeyi in the antahpura, I almost faint away. Kaikeyi and her maids come to help me and finding that it is only a swoon the princess says to her serving women, "It is the intimacy she has with this man and her love for him that agitates this sweet-smiling sairandhri when she sees the powerful cook wrestling with beasts. She is lovely and Ballava is handsome. It is difficult to know what is in her heart, but they seem to suit each other well. Very likely, she sheds tears for him because they are lovers. They did both enter into our service at the same time."

She scolds me and, when she sees that I am upset, suspects that we are lovers. When she speaks like that, my anguish is terrible. Even though I am already sunk in grief because of Yudhishtira, in truth, it is when I see you, my awesome Bhima, enduring such torment that I want to end my life.

And he, who on his chariot single-handedly defeated all the Devas and Manavas, is now the dancing-master of Virata's daughter Uttaraa. This son of Pritha, the fathomless soul who pleased Agni in Khandava vana, now lives in the antahpura of the palace like fire hidden in a well. That bull among men, ah, the very same Dhananjaya who was the terror of his adversaries, now pretends to be that which all men abhor: a eunuch!

He, whose mace-like arms have been marked by the strokes of his bowstring, covers his wrists with conch-shell bracelets and lives in grief. Arjuna, the thunderous twang of whose bowstring on his gloves made enemies tremble, now entertains pampered women with his songs. Dhananjaya, who wore a crown of brilliant splendour, now wears braids ending in tawdry curls.

Oh Bhima, when I see that matchless archer wearing braids and living in the midst of women, I am weighed down by despair. That noble Kshatriya, master of all the Devastras and storehouse of all the shastras, now wears women's earrings. The man whom the greatest kings could not contain in battle, just as the waters of the oceans cannot cover the continents, is now dancing-master to Virata's daughter and waits on her in disguise.

My heart clenches in grief for Arjuna, the rumble of whose chariot-wheels made the Earth with all that rests on her tremble, whose birth banished Kunti's sorrows, that most honoured Kshatriya who is your younger brother, when I see him coming towards me with golden earrings and conch-shell bracelets, Bhimasena.

Dhananjaya, whom no bowman in this world can match, spends his time singing and surrounded by women. When I see Partha, peerless in virtue, truth and honour, the most admired man in the world, dressed as a woman, sorrow overwhelms me. The sight of the godlike Arjuna in the midst of women in the hall of music, like a bull-elephant surrounded by she-elephants, waiting on king Virata of the Matsyas, makes my mind reel.

My mother-in-law Kunti does not know that Dhananjaya is in such distress, nor does she know that the son of Kurus, Ajatasatru, thanks to his disastrous addiction to dice, is plunged in misery.

Bhima, when I see the youngest of you all, Sahadeva, disguised as a gopa and tending cattle, I grow pale. Sahadeva's plight is always on my mind and robs me of sleep; what can I say about the rest of you? Mighty-armed, I do not know what sin Sahadeva, Kshatriya of perfect purity, committed that he suffers like this.

Bhaaratottama, when I see your beloved brother serving the king of the Matsyas as his cowherd, sadness floods my heart. When I see that proud Kshatriya, wearing clothes dyed red, giving his all to please Virata, a fever consumes me.

My mother-in-law Kunti always praised the nobility and unassailable integrity of Sahadeva. She, who is passionately fond of her sons, wept as she embraced him when we were about to set out for the forest, and she consigned him to my care. "Sahadeva is shy, soft spoken and virtuous. He is also my favourite child. Yagnaseni, watch over him day and night. He is delicate and brave, devoted to his elder brother the king and worships him. Panchali, tend to him yourself," she said.

Pandava, how can I bear to live whilst looking at this best of Kshatriyas tending cows and sleeping on a bed of calf-skins?

And then, he who wears like a crown the three qualities—beauty, strength and intelligence—is now the steward of Virata's stables. How destiny has changed Nakula! At the sight of him hosts of enemy forces would flee from the battlefield; now he trains swift horses for the Matsya king; and sad am I to see that handsome young man wait upon the gorgeously bedecked Virata and parade his horses before him.

O my Bhima, beset as I am with untold misery on account of Yudhishtira, how do you, slayer of foes, even dream that I could be happy? Listen to me, Kaunteya, while I tell you all my other heartaches, which are worse than these and which cause me to grow emaciated with anxiety, although you are alive.' "

"Draupadi says to Bhima, 'Alas, because of that reckless gambler, I am now under Sudeshna's command and live in the palace as a sairandhri. Parantapa, it is a pitiable condition that I, a princess and a queen, am now forced to endure. I wait in torment for the end of our exile while I cling to the belief that success, victory and defeat are not permanent; and I live in hope that my husbands will rise up again. Prosperity and adversity rotate like a wheel; and so I live in expectation of my husbands' return to prosperity. The same fate that brings victory also fetches defeat. This hope keeps me alive.

Perhaps, Bhimasena, you should think of me as being dead? I have heard that those who give great charity, may, in time, have to beg; those who kill may themselves be killed; and those who vanquish others may themselves be overthrown by their enemies. Destiny will prevail and is inexorable. And so, like a once dry tank filling again, I await the return of good fortune. All the same, when a trade that has flourished by dint of hard work fails, a truly wise person should never try to make it prosper again.

Whether or not you want to hear it, I will explain why I say these things, for my sorrow is great. Who else but I, Drupada's daughter and queen of Pandu's sons, would want to live after sinking to such depths? My desolation is a shame upon the entire Kuru race, as well as the Panchalas and the Pandavas. There is no other woman who has so much to be joyful about, having a father, brothers, a father-in-law and sons, who finds herself in a state such as mine is today.

I must have done something to anger Dhatri when I was young to deserve this. Yes, see how pale and worn I am; even a life of hardship in the forests did not have this effect. Bhima, you know how sublimely happy I used to be, but now I am reduced to servitude and I have no peace.

The awesome archer Dhananjaya now lives like a fire that has been extinguished; I attribute this to destiny. It is impossible for men to know the karma of living beings, O Prithaputra. Your fall could not have been averted.

She who has you and your brothers to care for her, men who are like Indra himself; she who is chaste and noble by birth and nature, has now to attend to the comforts of her inferiors. Pandava, look at my plight; I do not deserve this. You can see how kaala has inverted the just order of things.

Ah, she who had the whole Earth to the edge of the sea under her sway is now the sairandhri of Sudeshna and lives in fear of her. She who had protectors to walk before and behind her now walks before or behind Sudeshna. This wrteched servitude is something else that I cannot bear, Kaunteya. Listen to me; she who had never, not even for her own use, ground ointments, except for Kunti, now makes sandalwood paste for others. Look at my hands; oh, they were never like this.'

She shows him her callused hands and continues, 'She who had no fear, not of Kunti or of you and your brothers, now lives as a slave in fear of Virata; she worries about what that king might say to her about the preparation of the salves, for he does not like sandalwood ground by others.'

And Krishnaa begins to sob, her streaming eyes on Bhima's face. With tear-choked sighs, she stirs his heart powerfully, saying, 'Bhima, I must have offended the gods so terribly that, in my misery, I am still alive when I would rather be dead.'

Then that slayer of Kshatriya foes, Vrikodara, puts his face in his wife's delicate, scarred hands and begins to weep bitterly. He holds her hands in his and speaks to her through his tears," said Vaisampayana.

"Bhimasena says, 'Fie on the might of my arms and fie on the Gandiva of Phalguna, for as your hands, once soft and smooth, are now covered with calluses. I would have brought carnage to Virata's court if Yudhishtira had not forbidden me. Like an elephant a melon, I would have crushed Kichaka's head, drunk with his own power as he is.

Krishnaa, when I saw Kichaka kick you, in my mind I slaughtered the Matsyas. Yudhishtira forbade me with a look and pressing down on my thumbs; I understood and stayed my hand.

Our kingdom has been taken from us and I have not yet killed the Kurus; I have still to collect the heads of Suyodhana, Karna, Subala's son Sakuni and the bestial Dussasana. And this eats away at my very entrails and turns constantly in my heart like a dagger's point.

Noble one of the graceful hips, do not sacrifice your virtue at the altar of wrath; suppress your anger instead. If Yudhishtira hears your rebuke, he will take his own life. If Dhananjaya and the twins hear you say what you have to me, they will do the same. And if they kill themselves, I could not bear to live.

In olden days Sarjati's daughter, the beautiful Sukanya, followed Chyavana of Bhrigu's race into the forest; that sage's mind was under such control that ants built a hill over him while he was lost in dhyana.

You may have heard of how Indrasena, beautiful as Narayani, followed her thousand-year-old husband.

You have surely heard about Janaka’s daughter Sita, the princess of Videha, who followed her lord when he went to live in the forest; and how that lovely one, Rama’s beloved wife, was beset by calamities and persecuted by Ravana, but was finally reunited with him.

Then, there was the young and captivating Lopamudra, who renounced all pleasures of the material world and followed Agastya Muni.

Lofty-minded and flawless Savitri followed Dyumatsena’s brave son Satyavan into Yamaloka.

You have all the virtues that these chaste women possessed, my adored Krishnaa. Be patient for just a little longer; in a fortnight the thirteenth year will be over, and you will be Queen again.’

Draupadi says, ‘I cannot bear my sorrows, and grief alone makes me weep; mighty Bhima, I do not condemn Yudhishtira for there is no point brooding over the past; instead one should live for today. I am pained by the efforts that the jealous Sudeshna makes to keep the king far from me. Knowing her anxiety, vile Kichaka constantly propositions me.

Subduing my anger and disgust, I said to the lustful wretch, “Kichaka, be warned. I am the beloved wife of five Gandharvas, and they will kill you, brazen one.”

The arrogant son of a Suta replied, “I am not in the least bit afraid of Gandharvas, O sairandhri of the sweet smiles. I can mow down a hundred thousand of them in battle. So, timid one, give yourself to me.”

I said to the lust-maddened Suta, “You are nothing before my illustrious Gandharvas. I am virtuous and born of noble blood so I never wish death on anyone. Kichaka, that is the only reason you are still alive!”

The fiend just laughed loudly. Constantly entreated by her brother and moved by her love for him, Sudeshna sent me to him saying, “O sairandhri, bring me wine from Kichaka’s palace.”

When he saw me, the Suta’s son first tried to woo me with cunning flattery and, when that failed, he grew furious and was about to ravish me. I pushed him down and ran to the king, but Kichaka followed me into the royal court; ah, he flung me to the ground and kicked me in Virata’s very presence and in full view of Kanka and many others, including charioteers, royal courtiers, elephant-riders and merchants. I rebuked the king and Kanka repeatedly, but Virata did nothing to stop Kichaka, nor did he punish him.

Kichaka's influence over Virata is powerful indeed. He is cruel and bereft of dharma. The queen and king are very fond of him although he is fearless, proud, sinful, adulterous and obsessed with pleasure; he has amassed vast wealth from the king and he forcibly takes anything he likes from other men, even if they cry in distress.

He does not walk the path of dharma, nor does he do anything virtuous. He is black-hearted, vicious, haughty, debased and licentious. Although I have rejected him repeatedly, if he sees me again he will violate me; and if that happens, I will take my life. Bhima, all your dharma and restraint will become meaningless if I die. You might keep your pledge to Yudhishtira, but you will lose your wife.

By protecting a wife, the children are protected, and by protecting the children, one's soul is preserved. In a wife one's own self is born, and that is why wise men call her Jaya. A wife must also protect her husband, thinking, "How else will he be born from me?"

I have heard Brahmanas declare the duties of the different varnas, and they say that a Kshatriya has no other duty than to put down his enemies. Kichaka kicked me in the presence of Yudhishtira and you.

Mighty Bhima, it was you who saved me from terrible Jatasura; with your brother's help, you defeated Jayadratha. Now kill this evil Kichaka who has humiliated me. Confident of being the king's favourite, Kichaka swells my sorrows. Break this lust-driven creature's body like a pot of clay against a stone.

Be warned, O Bhaarata, if another day dawns on this man who is the source of my grief, I will drink poison and put an end to my life. Before I am forced by Kichaka, I think it would be better that I die here in your presence.'

Krishnaa hides her face in Bhima's chest and weeps. And he holds her close and tries to console her as best he can. Soothing the slender daughter of Drupada with words of good sense and reason, he wipes her streaming face with his hands. Thinking of Kichaka, Bhima is dry-mouthed with rage; he moistens his lips and speaks to the distraught Draupadi."

"Bhima says, 'I will do as you wish, my gentle one; I will kill Kichaka and all his men. Yagnaseni, tomorrow evening, put aside your sorrow and arrange to meet Kichaka in the dance-hall. The king of the Matsyas had it built for the princess and her companions to use during the day; the girls return to their homes at night, and there is a finely wrought wooden couch there. From that couch I will send Kichaka to his ancestors.

My slender Panchali, you must bring him there and be careful that no one sees you.'

Having spoken thus to each other and having shed tears, they wait impatiently for the night to end. The next morning Kichaka rises and goes to the palace, where he accosts Draupadi again.

He says, 'I threw you down in the court and kicked you in the presence of the king, and no one did anything because none dare face my wrath. This should show you that Virata is king of the Matsyas only in name. As senapati of the forces of the realm, I am the real lord of the Matsyas. Gentle one, yield willingly to me and I will be your slave. You of the graceful hips, I will give you a hundred nishkas even now; I will employ a hundred eunuchs and a hundred women to attend on you; I will give you chariots drawn by mares of the finest pedigree. Let us be together, timid one.'

Draupadi replies, 'O Kichaka, I have one condition. Neither your friends nor your brothers should know of your relations with me. I am mortally afraid of being found out by my great Gandharvas. Promise me this, and I will give myself to you gladly.'

Kichaka cries, 'Let it be as you wish! I am lost in love of you of the shapely legs that taper like the stem of a plantain tree. I will come alone to your apartments to be with you so that your Gandharvas will know nothing.'

Draupadi says, 'No! When it is dark, go to the dance-hall that the Matsya king has built. The girls who use it during the day return to their homes at night. The Gandharvas do not know that place, and we will escape their notice.'

Dwelling on her conversation with Kichaka, impatient for revenge, the rest of the day seems as long as a month to Krishnaa. Not dreaming that it was Death who had assumed the perfect form of a sairandhri, Kichaka goes home in a fog of delight. His mind athrong with images of passion, he anoints his body with fragrant oils and adorns himself with jewels and garlands. All the while absorbed with thoughts of that doe-eyed beauty, he waits for the interminable day to end.

The magnificent Kichaka, who is about to lose his beauty forever, seems to shine more radiantly, like the flame of a lamp before it dies. Deceived by lust into trusting Draupadi, absorbed in lascivious imaginings of his tryst with her, Kichaka hardly notices the day pass.

Meanwhile, Draupadi goes to Bhima, stands before him in the kitchen, and she of the raven-black tresses says, 'O Parantapa, I have asked Kichaka to meet me in the hall of dance. He will come there alone at midnight. Kill him there, Bhima, this Sutaputra Kichaka who is so vain that he dares mock my Gandharva husbands. O strongest of all Kshatriyas, despatch him from the world, just as Krishna did the Naga Kaliya from the Yamuna. Pandava, dry my tears; and may you be blessed by protecting your own and Kshatriya dharma.'

Bhima says, 'Lovely one, this good news you bring is all I need to hear. I feel as elated as I did when I killed Hidimba. I swear by truth itself, by the lives of my brothers and by dharma that I will kill Kichaka even as Indra did Vritrasura. I will tear him apart, out in the open if I need to, and if the Matsyas fight on his part, I will kill them too.

And when that is done, I will kill Duryodhana and win back the Earth. If he wants to, let Yudhishtira continue to pay homage to the king of Matsyas.'

Knowing Bhima and the danger his unleashed fury could put them in, Draupadi says, ‘My Bhima, kill him in secret so that you do not break your word to me.’

Bhima reassures her, ‘I will kill Kichaka and all his friends tonight, but secretly and under cover of darkness. Perfect one, like an elephant crushes a mango, I will crush the vile Kichaka’s head, for daring to crave the unattainable.’

When night falls, Bhima covers himself in a silken sheet and goes in advance to the meeting-place where he lies on the fine couch like a lion waiting to ambush a deer, waiting for Kichaka. The Matsya senapati arrives at the appointed time, perfumed and adorned and quivering in anticipation of meeting the sairandhri of his dreams.

Instead, in that pitch-black hall the evil one encounters Bhima of the matchless prowess, who is already there, waiting on the couch. Like a moth to a flame, or a small animal to a lion, Kichaka comes to Bhima, death personified, lying covered on the couch, smouldering at the thought of what the Matsya senapati said and did to Krishnaa.

Filled with ecstatic expectation, lecherous Kichaka comes near Bhima and says, smiling, ‘O you of the arched brows, I have given you all kinds of precious things from my store-houses, a hundred maids, many beautiful clothes and a fine mansion with an antahpura full of lovely young sakhis, and furnished with everything to amuse and entertain you. Having arranged all these for you, I have come running to your side. You must know that women admire me, saying that no one is as handsome as I or as richly clothed.’

Pretending to be Draupadi, Bhima whispers, ‘I am glad that you are so handsome and it is just that you praise yourself. But I do not think you would ever have felt a touch as pleasurable as mine. You are gallant and strong, and your fingers burn my skin. You are an artist at lovemaking and a favourite with women, and surely there is none other like you in this world!’

Then, suddenly, mighty-armed, splendid and terrifyingly powerful Bhimasena, son of Kunti, rises from the couch and says with a laugh, ‘Wretch, today your sister will see me drag you along the ground, as lion does an elephant he has killed. With you dead, the sairandhri and we, her husbands, will live in peace.’

Saying this, Bhima takes Kichaka by his flower-decked hair. But the strong Kichaka pulls loose from Bhima's grasp and seizes Bhima's arms. Full of fury, those two lions among men fight like two bull-elephants over a female in season, why, bringing to mind the long-ago titanic battle between the Vanara brothers Vali and Sugriva.

Their arms raised like five-hooded snakes, Bhima and Kichaka tear at each other in a frenzy of fury. Kichaka's onslaught takes Bhima by surprise, but the Pandava does not falter.

Fiercely they fight, locked together, dragging each other this way and that, like two humped bulls, like snarling tigers. With teeth and nails, they fight unarmed; like elephants with temples cracked and oozing the wild juice of musth, they fling each other down. When Bhima seizes Kichaka, Kichaka the strong hurls him violently to the ground. The crash of arm against arm resounds like splitting bamboo.

Then summoning all his great strength, Vrikodara hurls Kichaka across the dance hall; he tosses him about like a tree in a hurricane. Besieged by Bhima, Kichaka begins to tremble with weakness but then he repels the Pandava and even Bhima stumbles. Kichaka strikes him with his knees and fells him, but Bhima gets up quickly, like Yama himself with mace in hand.

At midnight in that lonely place, intoxicated with their own strength, the Suta and the Pandava battle; and the whole edifice shudders with their roars.

Bhima clenches his great fist and strikes Kichaka squarely on his chest, but his lust for Panchali gives Kichaka unnatural strength and he stands his ground, but only for a moment. The Suta is exhausted; Bhima is overpowering and, seeing Kichaka weaken, Bhima pulls him to his chest and begins to crush him in iron arms. Panting in rage, Vrikodara seizes Kichaka's hair and roars like a hungry tiger that has killed some massive prey. Knowing his enemy is near the end, Vrikodara holds him fast, as if trussing an animal with rope.

The dazed Kichaka roars horribly like a broken trumpet as Bhima whirls him round and round; and then, to appease Krishnaa's anger, Vrikodara grasps his enemy's neck and squeezes it with his hands. By now all Kichaka's limbs are broken, and his eyelids are swollen shut, but Vrikodara smashes his knees into Kichaka's belly and unrelentingly crushes the body of that man, the worst of his clan, and kills him as if he is an animal.

At last, seeing that his prey lies motionless, Bhima rolls the inert Kichaka on the ground and, with a heartfelt sigh of deep release, says, ‘This dog who wanted to ravish our wife, this thorn in the flesh of the sairandhri is dead. I have discharged my debt to my brothers, and I am at peace.’

Then, still red-eyed, Bhima rises away from Kichaka, whose clothes and ornaments have been torn off but whose eyes roll in his head as his blood-drenched body still twitches in spasms. Wringing his hands and biting his lip in undiminished fury, Bhima launches himself once more upon his enemy.

He thrusts Kichaka’s head, neck, arms and legs into his torso and reduces him to a shapeless mass, as the wielder of the Pinaka once did the deer which Yagna became to escape his ire. Having crushed him to pulp, Bhima rolls Kichaka into a ball of flesh, and he calls out to Krishnaa, hiding in a corner, watching riveted, her breast heaving in excitement.

Mighty Bhimasena grinds Kichaka’s body under his feet and says to Draupadi, ‘Come, Panchali, and see what has become of the lecher!’

And, showing Kichaka’s body to Draupadi by the light of a lamp, he says to her, ‘Gentle, chaste one, I will kill anyone who lusts after you, exactly as I have done Kichaka.’

Having accomplished his difficult task to please Krishnaa, and having pacified his own rage, Bhima leaves Krishnaa, and hurries back to his kitchen. Her torment assuaged by Kichaka’s death, Draupadi, best among all women, is ecstatic.

She calls to the guards of the dance-hall, ‘Come all of you and look at Kichaka who lusted after other mens’ wives; look where he lies slain by my Gandharva husbands.’

The guards of the dance-hall hear her and rush in, torches in hand. They see Kichaka’s bloodied, dismembered body on the ground. They gaze at him in shock and say in amazement, ‘Where is his neck and where are his legs?’

When they see how their general has been slain, surely by superhuman forces, they decide that he has indeed been killed by a Gandharva.”

Vaisampayana said, "Kichaka's kinsmen rush to the dance-hall, see him there and gather round his body, wailing loudly. The sight of him lying there mangled, like a dead tortoise dragged out of the water on to dry ground, is too much for them; the hair on their bodies stands on end in horror. They take his body, crushed by Bhima like a Danava by Indra, and prepare it for the funeral rites.

The Suta clansmen assembled there then notice Krishnaa of the perfect body leaning against a pillar and exclaim, 'This loose woman, for whom Kichaka has given his life, must die. Or even better, instead of killing her here, let us cremate her alive on the pyre of the one who desired her. It is our dharma to do what the dead Sutaputra would have wanted.'

They go to Virata and say, 'It is because of her that Kichaka has died. It is only right that she is cremated along with him, and you must give us leave to do this.'

Virata is aware of the extent of the power the Suta wields and agrees to let the sairandhri be burnt alive with the body of the Suta's son. Kichaka's clansmen violently seize lotus-eyed Krishnaa, who is paralysed with terror. They tie up the slender-waisted one, haul her onto the funeral cart and set off excitedly for the smasana.

O King, as she is forcibly carried to the burning ground by the Sutas, the chaste Krishnaa, who is protected by her husbands, cries out aloud to them, 'Jaya! Jayanta! Vijaya! Jayatsena! Jayadbala! The Sutas are taking me away! O swift Gandharvas, whose chariot-wheels rumble and whose bowstrings sound like thunderclaps, hear me. Oh, the Sutas are going to burn me alive!'

Bhima hears Krishnaa's cries, leaps out of his bed without a moment's thought and roars, 'I hear you, sairandhri! Have no more fear of the Sutas, gentle one.'

Bhima of the mighty arms stretches his body and dresses with care. He creeps out of the palace, climbs a tree and vaults over the lofty city wall. He runs to the smasana, where Kichaka's kinsmen have gone, and he charges the Sutas with dreadful roars.

On his way, he sees a large tree, tall as a palmyra, with a gigantic trunk and withered top-branches. Bhima grasps this tree that spans ten vyamas and uproots it as easily as an elephant would. With that tree across his shoulders, looking like Yama with his mace, the Kshatriya runs at the Sutas. In his wake, banyans, pipals and kinsukas crash to the ground.

The Sutas see Bhima rushing towards them like a furious lion; they tremble in panic and say fearfully to each other, 'Look! The Gandharva comes full of rage, with an uprooted tree in his hands. It is the sairandhri who has put us in danger; let us set her free.'

Staring at the tree uprooted by Bhimasena, they release Draupadi and run frantically back towards the city. Seeing them run away, Vayu's mighty son flings the tree at the fleeing Sutas and, just as Indra killed the Danavas, despatches a hundred and five of them to Yamaloka. O King, he frees Draupadi from her bonds and comforts her.

Irrepressible Vrikodara says to the agitated Panchali, her face bathed in tears, 'See, gentle one, I have killed those that wronged you. Krishnaa, return to the city; you need no longer be afraid. I will take another way back to the palace kitchens.'

Bhaarata, this is how one hundred and five Kichaka clansmen are slain; and their corpses lie on the ground like a copse of trees felled by a hurricane. The slaughtered Sutas number one hundred and five; including Virata's senapati Kichaka they number one hundred and six. The men and women gathered there watch the incredible feat and are all spellbound, O Bhaarata, speechless."

Vaisampayana said, "The citizens witness the massacre of the Sutas and report back to Virata, 'O great king, the mighty sons of Sutas have all been killed by the Gandharvas and lie scattered on the earth like mountain peaks fractured by thunder. The sairandhri has been released and is returning to the palace. Her presence here will endanger your kingdom. The sairandhri is unnaturally beautiful, and her Gandharvas are as powerful as she is lovely. Men are irresistibly drawn to her. O Virata, protect your kingdom from the vengeance of the Gandharvas for the wrongs done to her.'

Virata, lord of vast hosts, says, 'Perform the last rites of the Sutas. Let all the slain men of Kichaka's clan be cremated on one pyre with gemstones and frankincense.'

Then, fearful of what might happen, the king says to his queen Sudeshna, 'When the sairandhri comes back, say to her from me, "Blessings upon you, my beautiful sairandhri. You are free to go wherever you wish. You of the graceful hips, what your Gandharva husbands did has alarmed the king. Because these Gandharvas watch jealously over you, he dares not say this to you himself. A woman, however, cannot give offence by speaking to you; and so, he speaks through one." '

Saved by Bhimasena's slaughter of the Sutas, now the intelligent Krishnaa has no cause for fear. However, after she bathes her body and washes her clothes, she approaches the city, still nervous, like a doe frightened by a tiger. Rajan, terrified of the Gandharvas, the people run in all directions when they see her. Some even shut their eyes!

Panchali sees Bhima standing at the palace-gates like an infuriated tusker. With eyes wide in adoring wonder, Draupadi whispers to him so no one else can hear, ‘I salute you, O prince of Gandharvas, my saviour!’

Bhima declares loudly, ‘All who have been living in servitude or debt, who hear these words of hers, are hereby freed from all their obligations.’

Draupadi sees Arjuna in the dance-hall teaching Virata’s daughters dance. When Krishnaa arrives there, all the girls come out with Arjuna to meet her.

They say, ‘Sairandhri, it is fortunate indeed that you have been rescued from danger, and you are lucky to return safe. We are glad that the Sutas who abused you are dead.’

Brihannala says, ‘How were you saved, sairandhri? And how did those sinful men die? I want to hear exactly what happened.’

The sairandhri replies, ‘Brihannala, you live contentedly in the women’s apartments. Why do you concern yourself with what has happened to a mere sairandhri? You do not face the trials that I have been through. Your questions are only to ridicule me in my distress.’

Brihannala says, ‘Blessed one, Brihannala, too, has sorrows of her own. She has become as low as an animal. Dear sairandhri, you do not understand this. I have lived with you and you with us; when you are beset with sorrow, who does not grieve for you? But no one can read another’s heart, and you do not know what I feel, gentle Malini.’

Draupadi then goes with the girls to the antahpura to see Sudeshna. When she comes before the queen, Virata’s wife says to her, ‘Sairandhri, I set you free this moment to go wherever you wish. The king is fearful because of what your Gandharvas have done. Lovely one, you are young and your beauty is without compare in this world. Besides, you are an object of desire for all men, and the Gandharvas are easily provoked to anger.’

The sairandhri says, ‘O gracious queen, I beg that the king allow me to live here for just another thirteen days. The Gandharvas, too, will be grateful to him for this. Then they will do what the king asks of them and take me away from here. Virata will reap great benefits if he agrees.’ ”

GO-HARANA PARVA

Vaisampayana said, "O Rajan, the slaughter of Kichaka and his kinsmen fills people with awe. The talk in the city and provinces is that the king's cook Ballava is as brave and mighty a warrior as Kichaka but with the notable difference that Kichaka was cruel, lecherous and dishonoured the wives of other men; and that this was why that sinner was killed by the Gandharvas. In provinces all across the kingdom people say this of the hitherto invincible Kichaka, scourge of his enemies.

Meanwhile, the spies sent by Dritarashtra's son comb villages, towns and kingdoms. They fulfil their assignment and return to Nagarupa, pleased with at least one thing they have learnt.

Dhritarashtra's son, Duryodhana of the Kurus, sits in his court with Drona, Karna, Kripa, noble Bhishma, his own brothers and the great warriors the Trigartas, when his spies return to him.

Their leader says 'O Lord of men, we have searched meticulously for the Pandavas. We scoured unpeopled jungles full of deer and other animals, and thick with all kinds of trees and plants; we looked in wooded glades, but we did not discover where Pritha's sons may have gone. We searched everywhere for their footprints—in the mountains and on their unscaleable peaks, in every kingdom, in provinces and towns and in densely peopled cities. We found no sign of the sons of Pandu; bull among men, they seem to have vanished without a trace.

Although we followed those Kshatriyas like shadows we lost them suddenly and do not know where they are now. We even followed their chariots and gleaned some information. The charioteers reached Dwaravati without the sons of Pritha. Rajan, neither the Pandavas nor the chaste Krishnaa are in that Yadava city.

Since, we have not been able to discover where they went or where they are now. We must inform you that the sons of Pandu have disappeared without trace. We know what the Pandavas are like and the feats of which they are capable. Lord of men, tell us what more we should do to discover them.'

The man pauses, then continues, 'However, we do have some news which might please you. The senapati of the Matsya king, evil Kichaka who repeatedly vanquished and brutally killed the Trigartas, is dead along with all his kinsmen. They were killed by invisible Gandharvas. We were delighted to hear this news, O Kaurava.

Lord, now command us what we should do next.' "

Vaisampayana said, "Duryodhana reflects a while on what his spies tell him and then addresses his courtiers.

He says, 'It is a difficult task but you must find the sons of Pandu, at any cost, in this the thirteenth year, which they must pass undiscovered by us. Most of their ajnatavasa is already over; only a short time of it remains. If the Pandavas, who are punctilious about keeping their word, can stay hidden for the rest of this year, they will have fulfilled their oath. They will then return like mighty elephants with rent temples, or like venomous snakes; and filled with wrath as they will be, their vengeance on the Kurus will be terrible.

Do whatever is necessary, and immediately, to find the Pandavas and make them go back into the forest, swallowing their rage like the bitterest bile. Use any means; make this kingdom peaceful and harmonious with no discontent, rebellion or enmity anywhere, and secure our borders.'

Karna adds to this, saying, 'Let better, more cunning spies be sent out immediately, Bhaarata. Let them disguise themselves well and travel throughout the land, through every populous kingdom and province. Let them make their enquires wherever learned men gather; in pleasant rural retreats; in the inner apartments of palaces; in shrines and holy tirthas; in deep mines and other secret places. The search for the disguised sons of Pandu must be exhaustive and carried out by an army of expert spies who are able, conscientious, and who keep themselves hidden and know the Pandavas and their ways well. Let them search river banks, holy tirthas, villages and towns, asramas, in mountains and caves.'

The bestial Dussasana says to his elder brother, 'Lord of men, this time send out only those spies in whom we have complete confidence and pay them in advance. We approve of Karna's plan as well. Let these spies renew their search but more rigorously. Let others, too, go from province to province, combing every village and town, every forest and hill.

Yet, I do not believe that we will discover the Pandavas. They are surely well concealed; perhaps they have crossed the ocean. Or it may be that, despite their strength and courage, wild animals have devoured them. Possibly they have died in some rare, unforeseen circumstance. Therefore, O my brother, do not be anxious but do the best you can to achieve what you want.' "

Vaisampayana said, “Drona says, ‘Men like the Pandavas do not die in the ways you imagine. They are masters of all sciences and arts; they are brave, intelligent and have all their senses under control; they are humble and honest; they obediently follow Yudhishtira Dharmaraja. He is knowledgeable about neeti, artha and dharma; he loves them like a father; he is unswervingly truthful and lives strictly by the dictates of dharma.

The Pandavas are devoted to their illustrious elder brother, who is gifted with great intelligence, who never knowingly harms anyone and who, in turn, listens to his younger brothers: such men never die in the ways that you so fondly hope.

Why should Yudhishtira not be able to restore the prosperity of his noble and devoted brothers? They are only waiting for their exile to end. To my mind men like these never perish misfortunately. Therefore, without wasting time and with careful thought, do what has to be done.

Also, think hard and deeply where the Pandavas might have hidden themselves. They are spiritually disciplined, pure and heroic Kshatriyas, and it will be difficult indeed to find them. Yudhishtira is intelligent, possesses every virtue, is devoted to truth, principled, a holy man and the embodiment of immeasurable tejas. This son of Pritha can make ashes of his enemies with a mere glance.

Knowing all this, do what you think you should. Let us search for them once more by sending out holy Brahmanas and well-schooled Charanas, and others who know about those peerless Kshatriyas.' "

Vaisampayana said, "Shantanu's son Bhishma, great uncle to the Kurus, who is well-versed in the Vedas, who is conscious of the appropriateness and timeliness of things, and who has a deep knowledge of the dictates of dharma applauds Acharya Drona's words. He speaks to the Bhaaratas with sage advice that would beneift them; what he says is dharma and expresses his fondness for Yudhishtira. His words are honest and commendable; impartial and revered by the wise are the words of Bhishma.

The Kuru pitama says, 'I approve of what Acharya Drona says; he knows everything that has transpired. I say this without hesitation. The Pandavas are blessed with every auspicious mark; they are strict in their observance of dharma-vratas and have studied the Vedas; they are devout and know all the sciences; they obey their elders and are always truthful. They know how to use time wisely; they have been true to the oath they have sworn; they are honourable and principled; and they live by Kshatriya Dharma. They are always obedient to the exalted Kesava; they are above reproach and have prowess beyond compare; and they are the guardians of Rishis. Misfortune can never put down those noble Kshatriyas.

Their noble qualities support the sons of Pandu who live in hiding, as they vowed to; and they will not die; of this I am convinced. Therefore, Bhaarata, let us be thoughtful about how we should deal with them. It would not be wise to use spies to discover where they are. I will tell you what I think we ought to do about the Pandavas.

Understand that what I say is not from ill-will towards you. I would never offer devious advice to anyone, for one should only ever offer honest counsel. My child Suyodhana, regardless of circumstances, the wise man who is devoted to dharma and respects the wisdom of elders should always speak the truth if he wants to acquire virtue. And so, I am bound to say that I disagree with the rest of you about where Yudhishtira spends the thirteenth year of his exile.

Child, the ruler of the city or province where Yudhishtira Dharmaraja lives will suffer no misfortune. The people of that kingdom will be charitable, generous, humble and modest. Their speech will be pleasing; they will be moderate, truthful, cheerful and healthy. Their conduct will be virtuous, and they will be skilled at what they do. The people who live where Yudhishtira is, will be without envy, malice, vanity or pride; and all will faithfully keep their svadharma.

Where king Yudhishtira lives, Vedic hymns will be chanted everywhere and yagnas performed; the last libations will always be fully poured, and gifts to Brahmanas will be generous. The clouds will bring abundant rain, the harvests will be plentiful and safety will prevail. Every grain of paddy will be full, every fruit juicy, flower garlands fragrant and the conversation of the people will be friendly.

Where Yudhishtira lives, the breezes will be fragrant, the meetings of men always congenial, and never will there be any cause for fear. Cattle will thrive in that kingdom, in robust health and numbers; milk, curds and butter will be sweet and nutritious. Every kind of grain will be wholesome, and all food will be full of taste.

Where Yudhishtira Dharmaraja dwells the five senses will be finely tuned, the lands all around beautiful and the Dvijas virtuous and steadfast in their duties.

Indeed, in the place where the Pandavas spend this thirteenth year of their exile the people will be contented, cheerful and free of sorrow and suffering. They will be devoted to the gods and guests, and worship them with equal reverence. They will be generous, tireless and assiduously practice all the virtues.

Where Yudhishtira is, the people will avoid evil and only strive for what is good. They will conduct yagnas and observe appropriate vows. They will hate lies and always work for what is auspicious and beneficial. They will only aspire to achieve what is honourable; they will be principled and, because they observe proper vows, they will constantly acquire spiritual merit and great punya.

O child, even keen Brahmanas will not discover Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, who is a repository of intelligence, charity, tranquillity of soul, forgiveness, modesty, prosperity, fame, great vitality and compassion for all living things; how, then will your common spies find him, when he wants to remain hidden? Yudhishtira lives disguised in a place such as I have described. I need say no more about his exemplary life.

If you have any faith in me, O prince of Kurus, think carefully about what I have said and do what you think best.' ”

Vaisampayana said, "Now Saradvata's son Kripa says, 'What Bhishma pitama says is full of good sense; it is in keeping with dharma and artha, reasonable and worthy of him. But listen to my views as well.

You owe it to yourself to put forth your agents and discover where the Pandavas are and then to do whatever benefits you. My child, anyone who is concerned about his own welfare should not disregard even an ordinary enemy. What can I say then about the sons of Pandu who are master Kshatriyas? When the time comes for the return of the Pandavas who, having lived twelve years in the forest, now hide in disguise, you should assess your own military strength and that of other kings, both those allied to you and those who are loyal to Yudhishtira. The return of the sons of Pandu is imminent.

When their term of exile ends, the illustrious and infinitely powerful sons of Pritha will come back full of vigour and with vengeance on their minds. Be clever, Duryodhana; increase your armed forces and build up your treasury so that you can make a treaty with them that is to your advantage. Estimate your power by assessing the strengths and weaknesses of your allies, and the contentment and dissatisfaction, willingness or otherwise of your own forces. And then we must either fight the enemy or negotiate a treaty of peace with Yudhishtira.

You have studied diplomacy; you are experienced in dealing with rebellion, corruption and loyalty, and you know when to reward or to punish. Attack your enemies and subdue those that are weak, and then win over your allies and their troops with persuasion. When you have augmented your army and filled your treasury, you will be able to fight any enemy at all, let alone the sons of Pandu who have few troops, horses or elephants. Follow this strategy with dharma and you will attain lasting happiness, Purushottama.' "

Vaisampayana said, "Susarman, powerful king of the Trigartas, who has a large force of chariots of war, who suffered many and frequent defeats at the hands of the Matsya's senapati Kichaka and his allies the Salyas, sees that the circumstances are advantageous for him and loses no time in speaking up.

Susarman lets Karna see scepticism in his eyes and says to Duryodhana, 'My kingdom has been invaded many times by the king of the Matsyas, with the mighty Kichaka his senapati. The perfidious and violent general, whose prowess was universally famed, who was cruel and sinful in all he did, has been killed by unknown Gandharvas. With Kichaka's death, Virata has been stripped of his strength and pride, and has no reason left to be courageous. Sinless friend, I think this is a good time to invade his kingdom, if it pleases you, the noble Karna and all the Kauravas.

Destiny has favoured us, so let us invade Virata's bountiful kingdom. We will take his jewels and other wealth, empty his coffers and share all his lands and villages amongst us. Let us plunder his city and seize his superb herds of cattle. If the Kaurava and Trigarta forces unite, we can have all his cattle for ourselves. Together, we can force him to beg for peace after we can destroy his armies. We will defeat him in fair fight, and then return happily to our kingdoms, and your might will surely increase by acquiring the Matsya kingdom.'

Karna says, ‘Susarman is right. The circumstances are favourable and promise us great profit. So, if it pleases you Anagha, let us marshal our forces for battle, array our divisions and set out at once. Or let Saradvata’s son Kripa, Drona and the wise Bhishma tell us how better to plan our strategy. Lord of the Earth, we must confer together and carry out our plans swiftly.

Why should we worry about the sons of Pandu? They have no wealth or power and have either disappeared for ever or are dead. Without misgivings or qualms, let us go forth and forcibly take the Matsya cattle for ourselves and the wealth of Virata’s city.’

Duryodhana agrees with Karna and says to his brother Dussasana, next in line and always obedient to him, ‘Consult the elders and gather our forces without delay. We will take the Kaurava armies and march on the Matsya kingdom. Let king Susarman precede us, with all the chariots and horses he needs, as well as the Trigarta legion of foot-soldiers.

Let Susarman attack with stealth, and we will follow closely the next day and pillage the prosperous Matsya lands. The Trigartas must enter the Matsya city without warning, surprise the cowherds and seize their fine herds; we will do the same the next day, swooping down from another direction, and together we will seize thousands of those invaluable Matsya cattle with the auspicious marks.’

The Trigarta warriors march to the south-east with their powerful foot-soldiers, full of hostile fervour, intent on taking Virata’s herds. Susarman sets out on the seventh day of the dark fortnight when the moon wanes; and, on the eighth day, the Kauravas and their troops capture thousands of Matsya cattle.”

Vaisampayana said, “O great king, the Pandavas of fathomless souls and measureless might, who have entered into king Virata’s service and live disguised in his city, reach the end of their exile. After Kichaka is killed, Virata, bane of his enemies, begins to rely greatly on the sons of Kunti. O Bhaarata, it is on the very day that the thirteenth year of the Pandavas’ exile ends that Susarman seizes thousands of Virata’s cattle.

When the cattle are taken, Virata’s chief herdsman comes running into the city and its palace, where the king of the Matsyas sits on his throne surrounded by his ministers, jewel-adorned warriors all; those bulls among men, the Pandavas, are also present.

In the sabha, the cowherd bows to king Virata, enhancer of his kingdom, and says, ‘O foremost of kings, the Trigartas have defeated us in battle and taken hundreds of thousands of your cattle. You must rescue our herds as soon as you can. O, my lord, do not lose them.’

The king immediately assembles the Matsya force of chariots, elephants, horses, foot-soldiers and flag-bearers in battle array. The kings and all the noblemen put on armour that gleams in beauty and in worthiness of its heroic owners.

Virata’s beloved brother Satanika, next in line to him, puts on his coat of unyielding mail decorated with burnished gold. The second brother Madiraksha wears his gilded coat of mail, which can withstand every kind of weapon. The king himself dons his splendid kavacha, impenetrable, adorned with a hundred suns, a hundred circles, a hundred auspicious tilakas and a hundred eyes.

The golden plating of the armour that Suryadatta puts on dazzles like the Sun and is as broad as a hundred fragrant kalahara lotuses. The mail of Virata's eldest son, Sankha, is made of inviolable polished steel and decked with a hundred golden eyes.

Thus do hundreds of godlike, mighty warriors arm and protect themselves with weapons and armour, and eagerly prepare for battle. They yoke their armoured horses to handsome white chariots. They hoist the king's glorious Matsya standard onto his radiant ratha, adorned with gold and incandescent as a heavenly body.

The other Kshatriya warriors also raise their banners of many shapes, all with gold thread woven into them, each with its own device.

When all is ready, the king of the Matsyas says to Satanika, 'Kanka, Ballava, Tantripala and Damagranthi—these men of the dazzling tejas, will surely fight for me. Give them chariots with banners; let them have comfortable, impervious mail and arm themselves with suitable weapons. They have such powerful arms, like the trunks of mighty elephants, and warriors' bearing. I do not believe that they cannot fight.'

O Rajan, Satanika immediately orders chariots for the royal sons of Pritha—Yudhishtira, Bhima, Nakula and Sahadeva—and the king's charioteers swiftly ready them in obedience to his command. Those Parantapas put on the fine coats of mail that the king gives them, those Kshatriyas of legendary fame in disguise. The four sons of Pritha, crushers of their enemies, best among all men, climb onto their chariots yoked to excellent horses, and their hearts sing within them. In their gold-decked rathas, the four master Kshatriyas, bulls of Kuru's race, the sons of Pandu of undiminished might, follow Virata into battle.

Awesome elephants in their prime—huge tuskers, wild juices of musth trickling from their cracked temples and making them look like dark clouds pouring rain—skilled and accomplished warriors mounted on them, amble behind the king like mountains on the move. The principal Matsya warriors who follow the king have eight thousand chariots, a thousand elephants and sixty thousand horses.

And, O Bharatarishabha, as it follows the trail of the hoof-marks of the seized cattle, Virata's army of fighting men who carry shining, powerful weapons, accompanied by majestic elephants, steeds of the purest bloodlines and glittering chariots, is extraordinary and beautiful; it is splendid indeed.”

Vaisampayana said, “The valorous Matsya legions leave the city and overtake the Trigartas in the afternoon. The two impassioned armies do fervid battle, and they roar in fury as weapons clash and spraks fly everywhere, while the Trigartas are as intent on capturing king Virata as the Matsya are on taking Susarman. Warriors riding enraged elephants manoeuvre them with spiked goads. And O Rajan, when the setting Sun is low on the horizon, the battle between the opposing infantries, cavalries, chariots and elephants is like the long ago one between the Devas and Asuras. The bloody encounter makes brave men’s hair stand on end, dyes the earth red and adds to the numbers in Yama’s kingdom.

The two armies loose arrows, hurl spears and slash each other with swords, spraying gore everywhere. A cloud of dust rises in a heavy fog, obscuring vision and even settling on birds, which fall to the ground under its weight. Arrows fly so thickly that they block out the Sun, and the sky is lit up as if by myriad swarms of fireflies. The archers spin around and move their gold-inlaid bows from one hand to the other to release their arrows in all directions. Chariots, horsemen, foot-soldiers and elephants crash against each other in the dark. Warriors hew viciously at their enemies with sword and axe and iron club; they shoot feathered shafts, cast long, slender javelins, all with utmost force. But, O King, for all their fercotiy, neither army prevails.

Severed heads roll in the dust, some with handsome noses divided, some with lips cleft, some with crimson gashes in well-tended black hair. And soon the battlefield is covered with the limbs of Kshatriya warriors, cut off and strewn everywhere like the trunks of sala trees. Beheaded faces glitter with earrings, and severed arms smeared in sandalwood paste resemble snakes as they lie on the ground, and they make the field of carnage eerily beautiful.

As chariots, horsemen, foot-soldiers and elephants fight, rivulets of blood soak the frightful dust, and even hardened soldiers faint at the horrible spectacle. Warriors abandon compassion, friendship and fairness, and fight ferally. Though blinded by the unending deluge of arrows, vultures swoop down to land on the field. Still, the armies fight on, and still neither side can vanquish the other.

Satanika has killed a hundred of the enemy; Visalaksha has claimed four hundred lives; and both these penetrate deep into the heart of the Trigarta formations. There, in close combat, the two Kshatriya heroes escalate the battle to even more savagery, as the men of both sides seize each other by the hair and tear at each other with their nails.

Turning away, Satanika and Visalaksha storm a dense cluster of Trigarta chariots. With Suryadatta and Madiraksha behind him, Virata kills five hundred of the enemy, as well as eight hundred horses and five Maharathas fighting from great chariots. Expertly manoeuvring his own chariot, at last the Matsya king encounters Susarman of the Trigartas, mounted on his golden ratha of war. Eager for this duel, the two kings roar to drown every other sound on that field and rush against each other like two bulls in a cow-pen. Truly a bull among men, Susarman meets Virata in single combat on chariots.

The enraged twain warriors shower arrows at each other even like clouds do torrents of rain. Both are masterly and, flitting here and there on the battlefield, attack each other with swords, short and bearded darts, maces and arrows from every direction. Virata pierces Susarman with ten shafts and each of his four horses with five. Irrepressible Susarman, as skilled in war, wounds Virata with fifty whetted shafts. In the swirling dust of that contention, Susarman's and Virata's men cannot distinguish one king from the other."

Vaisampayana said, “Dust and nightfall envelop the world, and the warriors of both sides rest awhile. When the moon emerges to dispel the gloom on the field and in their hearts, the Kshatriyas resume the battle with greater ferocity than ever, by silvery moonlight.

With his younger brother and all his chariots, Susarman charges king Virata of the Matsyas. Maces in hand, the Trigarta brothers, bulls among Kshatriyas, leap down from their rathas and mount a furious attack on the enemy chariots. Savagely, the hostile legions fall at each other with maces and swords, scimitars and battle-axes and sharply-tempered darts.

Routing the entire Matsya army, Susarman and his brother rush towards Virata. The Trigarta brothers kill Virata’s chariot horses, his charioteer and his two bodyguards; and, when he is stranded and alone, they capture him. Susarman attacks Virata brutally, much as a lust-driven man might a defenceless woman, flings the Matsya king into his own chariot and races off the field.

The Matsyas see Virata captured and flee in terror, chaotically. Yudhishtira sees that panic-stricken flight and says to Bhima, ‘The Trigartas have taken the Matsya king. O Mahabaho, rescue him from the enemy’s clutches. We have lived happily in Virata’s city and wanted for nothing. You must free him, Bhimasena, and thereby repay our debt to him.’

Bhimasena replies, ‘My brother, I will do what you say. Watch me fight the enemy with my bare hands. Stand aside with our brothers and witness my might today. I will uproot this great tree and, using its trunk as a mace, rout the Trigartas.'

Yudhishtira sees Bhima eyeing the tree like an angry elephant and says, 'Bhima, do not be rash. Leave the tree alone. You must not use the tree as is your wont, or the people will know who you are. Instead, take some ordinary weapon—a bow, a spear, a sword or an axe—and rescue Virata without being recognised. Nakula and Sahadeva will defend your chariot, and together you can free the king of the Matsyas.'

Without more ado, Bhimasena takes up his bow and lets fly a gale of arrows, thick as a torrent of rain from a thundercloud. Red-eyed, he goes in pursuit of Susarman, roaring, 'Stop, coward!' at Susarman, and so reassuring Virata.

Susarman sees and hears Bhima, like Yama behind him, crying, 'Stop! And see what I do to you.'

The Trigarta king quickly takes up his bow and turns back with his brother. In an instant Bhima shatters all the chariots that face him. Virata watching, awesome Bhima demolishes thousands of chariots and slaughters elephants, horses, brave and skilled bowmen; this done, he pounds the foot-soldiers to death with his mace.

The irrepressible Susarman sees this fearsome onslaught and thinks, 'My brother seems to have succumbed with his vast legion. Shall my army also be annihilated?' And he draws his bowstring to his ear and shoots a rich salvo of keening arrows.

Seeing the Pandavas on their chariots come to help them, the Matsya warriors are encouraged; they urge their horses forward and grind the Trigarta army into the earth. Now Virata's son performs brave and quite amazing feats on the field. Yudhishtira kills a thousand hostile warriors, and Bhima despatches seven thousand to Yamaloka. Nakula slays seven hundred and Sahadeva three hundred fighting men.

Yudhishtira attacks Maharatha Susarman with a sizzling volley of shafts. The enraged Susarman strikes Yudhishtira with nine arrows and draws blood from the Pandava's four horses, piercing them with four barbs each.

But then Kunti's great and mercurial son Bhima kills Susarman's horses and bodyguard with bloody strokes of his mace, and drags his charioteer to the ground. Madiraksha, defender of the Susarman's chariot, sees his king without a sarathy and rides swiftly to help him, but Virata seizes Susarman's mace, and though he is old, leaps down from the chariot to chase Madiraksha away with all the vigour and fierceness of a young man.

Bhima calls out to Susarman, who is now fleeing, 'Stop, Kshatriya! It is not dharma for a warrior to flee from battle. How could a mighty king like you stoop to lifting cattle? How can you abandon your companions and lose face before your enemies?'

Provoked by this son of Pritha's, Susarman, lord-commander of countless chariots, roars at Bhima, 'Stay!' and turns around and rushes at him. Bhima leaps down from his ratha and attacks the Trigarta king like a lion may a small deer. Titanic Bhima seizes Susarman by his hair and, raising him high, dashes him to the ground. As he lies crying in agony, Bhima kicks his head, then plants his great knee on the fallen king's chest and rains blows on him until he is senseless.

The fall of Susarman strikes panic into the Trigarta army, and his men flee in all directions, in perfect confusion.

The Pandavas have vanquished Susarman, retrieved the Matsya cattle, and saved Virata's life. They now stand before the Matsya king.

Bhimasena says, 'Wretched Susarman does not deserve to live but what can I do when the king is so forgiving!'

Picking up the dazed Susarman from the dust by his throat and tying him up, Pritha's son Vrikodara takes him in a chariot to Yudhishtira at the heart of the battlefield and displays him to his elder brother.

Seeing Susarman's plight, Yudhishtira smiles and says to Bhima, 'Let this worst of men be set free.'

Bhima says to Susarman, 'If you want to live, dog, listen carefully to me. You must declare in every court and assembly of men, "I am a slave." Only if you do this will I grant you your life. This is the law of the victor and the vanquished.'

His elder brother affectionately says to Bhima, 'If you respect my authority, liberate this evil man. He has already become king Virata's slave.' Turning to Susarman he says, 'You are a free man. Go now, and never repeat what you did today.' "

Vaisampayana said, “On being spoken to thus by Yudhishtira, Susarman hangs his head in shame. He goes to Virata, salutes him wretchedly and leaves, a free man. Having routed the enemy and freeing their captive Susarman, the Pandavas spend that night on the battlefield.

Virata showers these mighty sons of Kunti with wealth and honours. He says to them, ‘From now, all my treasures are as much yours as mine. If it pleases you, continue to live happily with me. Parantapas, I will give you maidens decked with ornaments, riches in plenty and whatever else you want. I am victorious today because you four saved me from defeat. Be lords of the Matsyas beside me.’

The Pandavas join their hands in salutation and Yudhishtira says, ‘We thank you, O Rajan, but for us it is enough that your enemies have been defeated and that you are free.’

Virata says to Yudhishtira, ‘Come, we will install you as king of the Matsyas; we will bestow on you rare and coveted treasures of the earth, for you deserve everything we can give. O Kanka, foremost of Brahmanas of the Vaiyaghra family, I will give you gems and cattle, gold, rubies and pearls. I bow to you. It is because of you that I see my sons and my kingdom once more. I was attacked and my very life threatened, and you saved me.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘We are delighted at what you say. May you always be happy and compassionate to all the living. Send your messengers back to the city to give the good news of your victory to the people.'

The Matsya king commands his messengers, 'Go to the city and proclaim my victory. Let young girls and mature courtesans, duly bedecked with ornaments, come out of the city and welcome us with music and dance.'

At the king's word, his men leave at once for the city to joyfully carry out his command. They arrive there by nightfall and, at daybreak, proclaim the king's victory all over the Matsya capital."

Vaisampayana said, "When the king of the Matsyas leaves the city to recover his stolen herd of cattle from the Trigartas, Duryodhana and his allies invade Virata's kingdom from another direction. In this army are Bhishma and Drona, Karna and Kripa, Drona's son Aswatthama, Subala's son Sakuni and Dussasana, Vivimsati and Vikarna, Chitrasena, Durmukha and Dussaha and many other great rathikas. They quickly enter the Matsya lands, drive off king Virata's cowherds and lift the rest of his magnificent herds.

The Kauravas come with a multitude of chariots and seize sixty thousand head of cattle. Loud is the wail set up by the cowherds when they are attacked by the matchless Kuru warriors. In terror for his life, the chief among the cowherds hastily climbs into a chariot and rides to the city, crying in fear.

He drives straight to the palace, jumps off the chariot and runs inside. He sees the proud younger son of the Matsya king, prince Uttara, also called Bhuminjaya, and tells him about the seizing of the royal herd.

He says, 'The Kauravas have taken sixty thousand cows. Rise, O enhancer of the kingdom's fame, and bring back your herd. O prince, do not waste a moment, set out yourself! The king of the Matsyas has left you in the empty city, and as he went your father boasted, "My son Bhuminjaya is my equal; he is a Kshatriya and the upholder of our glory. He is a great warrior, skilled with a bow and every other weapon, and he is brave as a lion."

O, may what the king said be true; best of all owners of cattle-herds, defeat the Kurus and their troops with your arrows and bring back our cows. Just as a mighty bull-elephant charges a herd, cut down the enemy with gold-feathered arrows from your bow.

Your bow is like a veena—its two ends the ivory rests; its string the main chord; its staff, the finger-board and the arrows its notes. Let your bow sing in the midst of the enemy. Lord, yoke your silvery horses to your chariot, hoist your standard with its golden lion; let your razor-sharp and gold-winged arrows flay the Kuru host and eclipse the very Sun.

Vanquish all the Kurus in battle, as the wielder of the thunderbolt did the Asuras of old; return victorious to the city and achieve great fame. O prince of Matsyas, you are the sole refuge of this kingdom even as the great Arjuna is the guardian of the sons of Pandu. As his brothers look to Arjuna for sanctuary so do we look to you. We, the people of this kingdom, look upon you as our protector and saviour.'

The prince's courage is boosted by what the cowherd says to him in the antahpura in the presence of the women of the harem, and he responds valiantly."

"Prince Uttara says, 'I am a master archer and I would set out at once after our herd if only I had an expert charioteer. But I do not know of such a man. I am ready to leave, so look for a sarathy for me. My own sarathy was killed in the great battle that raged for twenty-eight days. The moment you find me an able charioteer, I will hoist my flag and ride forth. I will cut a swath in the enemy's force of elephants, horses and chariots; I will rout the ill-armed, feeble Kurus and bring back our cows.

Like a second Indra, and as he did the Danavas, I will strike terror into Duryodhana and Bhishma, Karna and Vikartana's son Kripa, Drona and his son, and all the others who have dared come to our kingdom. The Kurus seized our cattle because there was no one to oppose them. I could do nothing for I was not there. Today the Kurus will see my prowess and wonder if it is Arjuna himself who stands against them.'

Arjuna, who is in the antahpura, hears the prince and, well aware of the danger the moment is fraught with, quickly says to Krishnaa of the perfect form, Drupada's slender daughter born from the sacrificial fire, the sairandhri who is virtuous, chaste, truthful and entirely devoted to her husbands.

He says, 'My beautiful one, go at once and say to prince Uttara, "Brihannala was once Arjuna's own charioteer. He has seen many battles; he is a master sarathy and can drive your chariot." '

Panchali cannot bear to hear Arjuna saying this about himself, over and over, in the midst of the women. Shyly the princess of Panchala steps forward and softly she says to the prince, ‘This handsome youth Brihannala, who looks like a mighty elephant, used to be noble Arjuna’s charioteer. He was that illustrious Kshatriya’s disciple and as good an archer as any Kshatriya in the world. I knew him when I lived with the Pandavas. It is he who held the reins of Arjuna’s fine steeds when Agni consumed the Khandava vana. It was with him as his sarathy that Partha slew all the fell creatures in Khandavaprastha. In fact, there is no charioteer equal to Brihannala.’

Uttara says, ‘Sairandhri, you know this young eunuch and what he is, or not, capable of. However, I cannot myself beg Brihannala to drive my chariot.’

Draupadi says, ‘O Kshatriya, Brihannala will surely obey your younger sister, she of the graceful hips. If he agrees to be your sarathy, you will certainly defeat the Kurus and rescue your herd.’

Uttara is persuaded by Draupadi and says to his sister, ‘Go yourself, blemishless beauty, and fetch Brihannala to me,’ and at her brother’s request, she hurries to the dance-hall where the mighty-armed son of Pandu lives in disguise.”

Vaisampayana said, "Wearing a gold necklace, her waist slender as a wasp's, she who has the splendour of Devi Lakshmi, her slim and graceful form decked in peacock-feathers, her hips girdled by strings of pearls, she of the curled eyelashes, that enchanting princess of the Matsyas flies to the dance-hall like a streak of lightning to a dark cloud. Like a she-elephant her mate, Virata's faultless daughter seeks out the son of Pritha. Like a precious gem, the embodiment of Indra's wealth, her loveliness enhanced by her great, shining eyes, the adored and celebrated princess greets Arjuna.

He says to this golden-skinned girl of the closely set thighs, 'What brings you here, O devi wearing a golden necklace? Why have you come in such haste, gazelle-eyed one? Why the solemn face, lovely child? Tell me.'

Thus Arjuna demands to know why she, his pupil at dancing, has come to him in such distress.

Accompanied by her sakhis, the princess approaches that bull among men and says to him, 'The Kurus are driving away our cows, Brihannala, and my brother wants to ride after them and rescue our herd. His charioteer was killed in battle recently, and there is no one to drive my brother's chariot.

The sairandhri told my brother of your skill with horses and even said that you were Arjuna's favourite sarathy. She says it was with you in his chariot that the mighty Arjuna single-handedly subjugated the Earth. Brihannala, I beg you, drive my brother's horses!

The Kurus must already have taken our cattle far away. I will die if you refuse this favour I ask of you with affection.'

Implored by his friend and disciple of the graceful hips, Arjuna, scourge of his foes, accedes and goes to the prince. As he strides along like an elephant in musth with rent temples, the young princess of the large eyes follows the Kshatriya with quick steps, like a mother elephant running behind her young one.

The prince sees him and says, 'With you as his charioteer, Kuntiputra Dhananjaya pleased Agni in the Khandava vana, why, he conquered the whole world! The Sairandhri, who knows the Pandavas, has spoken of you to me. So Brihannala, take the reins of my horses as you did Arjuna's, for I am eager to fight the Kurus and rescue my cattle. You were Arjuna's favourite sarathy and it was with you that that Pandavarishabha conquered the Earth.'

Brihannala replies, 'What qualifies me to be your charioteer on the field of battle? Yes, I can entertain you with song, dance and music, but what skills do I have to drive your chariot?'

Prince Uttara holds out a coat of armour and says, 'O Brihannala, you may be a singer and a dancer, but for now, don this kavacha, mount my chariot and take the reins of my superb horses.'

Now Arjuna pretends to fumble and be clumsy as he does what the prince asks. He puts on the armour back to front much to the amusement of the wide-eyed women, who burst out laughing. Impatiently prince Uttara himself fastens the rich coat of mail to Brihannala's rippling, powerful body. Then donning his own armour that shines like the Sun, and hoisting his lion-emblazoned standard, the prince hands the reins of his yoked and eager horses to Brihannala. With Brihannala at his chariot-head, the splendid young Kshatriya arms himself with many fine bows and beautiful quivers of arrows, and goes forth to face the Kurus.

Princess Uttaraa and her sakhis say to their friend and teacher, 'Brihannala, when you have defeated the Kurus led by Bhishma and Drona, bring back some special and fine silks for us to make clothes for our dolls.'

Brihannala smiles at their request and says in a voice deep as thunder, 'If prince Uttara can vanquish those mighty warriors in battle, I will certainly bring back some exquisite fabric.'

Heroic Arjuna flicks his reins expertly and urges his horses towards the Kuru army, its countless banners shimmering above a sea of chariots. But before they leave, the older women, young girls and Brahmanas of stern vows see Uttara on his chariot, his leonine standard hoisted high and Brihannala for his sarathy. They walk around the chariot in pradakshina and call down blessings upon them, saying, ‘Let victory like Arjuna had when, treading like a bull, he burnt Khandava vana be yours, O Brihannala, when prince Uttara and you meet the Kurus today.’ ”

Vaisampayana said, "As they leave the city, Virata's brave son says to his charioteer, 'Ride swiftly to where the Kurus are. They have come certain of victory, but I will crush them, rescue my herds and return to the city.'

Brihannala urges his horses forward; and with their reins in his hands, the wind-swift steeds, caparisoned in chains of gold, seem to fly through the air. They have not gone far when Dhananjaya and the Matsya prince see the awesome Kuru army arrayed in battle formation near the cemetery; it looks like an ocean or a forest of countless trees, its warriors silhouetted against the horizon.

O Kurusthama, the cloud of dust that army raises obscures everything around it. Virata's son sees the mighty force of elephants, horses and chariots led by Karna and Duryodhana, Kripa and Bhishma, the great Drona and his son Aswatthama, and he begins to tremble with fear and the hair on his body stands on end.

He whispers to Arjuna, 'I dare not fight the Kurus. Look how the hair on my body stands on end. I cannot fight this Kuru host, ah, with its fierce and heroic warriors that even the Devas would find difficult to vanquish. I could never hope to penetrate this great Bhaarata army of bowmen, horses and elephants, chariots, foot-soldiers and flag-bearers.

My mind trembles at the very sight of the enemy, with Drona and Bhishma, Kripa and Karna, Vivimsati, Aswatthama and Vikarna, Saumadatti and Bahlika, Maharatha Duryodhana and countless other splendid archers amidst their heroic legions. O! I feel faint with fear at the sight of the Kurus in battle array.'

The weak-minded and callow Uttara begins to whimper like a child before the battle-ready Arjuna, his charioteer. He says, 'My father took our whole army to meet the Trigartas, leaving me alone in the city. There are no troops to fight for me, and I am alone, a mere boy with little experience of battle. I cannot face these matchless warriors. Brihannala, stop the chariot!'

Brihannala says, 'Why do you add to the joy of your enemies by showing them your fear? You have not yet engaged the enemy. It was you who ordered me to bring you to the Kauravas, and I will take you where their flags fly. I will bear you, Kshatriya of the mighty arms, into the very midst of the hostile Kurus, who will fight for mere cattle like pariah kites over meat, though I would face them even if I thought they fought for the sovereignty of the Earth.

As we set out, you boasted of your manliness before the women of the harem; now why do you shy away from this fight? If you return without the cattle, all men and even women will ridicule you for ever.

As for myself, having been praised so highly by the sairandhri for my skills as a charioteer, I cannot go back to the city without rescuing the livestock. It is the sairandhri's praises and your asking me that made me come. So why should I not fight the Kurus? Control your fear, mighty prince.'

Uttara says, 'Let the Kurus rob the Matsyas of all their wealth; let men and women laugh at me, Brihannala; let my cattle die; let the city be a desert; let me stand stripped of honour before my father; but I shall not go into battle against these dreadful Kurus.'

And the terrified prince, who wears gleaming earrings, jumps down from his chariot, flings down his bow and arrows and, abandoning honour and pride, takes to his heels.

Brihannala cries, 'Fleeing a battle is not Kshatriya dharma. Even death while fighting is better.'

Arjuna climbs down from the glorious chariot and runs after the fleeing prince, his long braided hair and red clothes streaming behind him. Some Kuru soldiers, who are unaware that this is Arjuna himself, laugh at the sight of his plait flapping in the air as he goes.

The greater Kurus see him and say among themselves. 'Who is this person, disguised like fire hidden in ashes? He is part man and part woman; but even in this form, he resembles Arjuna. He has the same head and neck, the same mace-like arms, the same tigerish stride. He can be none other than Dhananjaya. As Indra is among the Devas, is Dhananjaya among men. Who in this world other than Arjuna would dare ride against us by himself?'

'Virata left only one son of his in the empty city. Childish bravado and not heroism brought him here. This must be Uttara who has come from the city; he must have made Pritha's son Arjuna, who is in disguise, his charioteer.

But seeing us, he runs in panic and beyond doubt Arjuna pursues him to bring him back.'

And thus, O Bhaarata, the Kauravas speculate on seeing the disguised son of Pandu, but they cannot be certain that the strange figure is indeed Arjuna.

Meanwhile, Brihannala runs after the fleeing Uttara, and within a hundred paces seizes him by his hair. Virata's son wails loudly, as if from some great affliction. He cries, 'Listen to me, O Brihannala of the handsome waist; turn the chariot around! He who chooses to live will prosper. I will give you a hundred coins of pure gold, eight brilliant gemstones of great clarity and chrysoberyls, cat's-eyes, set in gold, a chariot with a golden flagstaff and drawn by the finest horses, and also ten royal elephants. I beg you, release me, Brihannala.'

In reply, Arjuna, tiger among men, laughingly drags the sobbing, incoherent Uttara back to the chariot.

The son of Pritha says to the prince who is almost fainting from fear, 'If, O Parantapa, you are afraid to fight the enemy, take the reins of your chariot-horses and I will fight them. With the might of my arms you will easily penetrate the formidable array of chariots in which the Kuru heroes ride.

Fear not, O punisher of your enemies, you are a Kshatriya and the bravest of princes. Why do you yield to fear when faced with the enemy, Purushavyaghra? I will break open this seemingly impenetrable formation of chariots, vanquish the Kurus and recover the herds. Purushottama, you be my charioteer; I will fight the Kurus.'

Speaking thus to Virata's son Uttara, the unconquered Bibhatsu calms him down. Arjuna, greatest of all warriors, soothes and exhorts the timid, collapsing prince and helps him back onto his chariot."

Vaisampayana said, "The great Kuru warriors led by Bhishma and Drona watch that bull among men in a eunuch's guise persuade Uttara back onto the chariot; they watch the chariot drive into the forest and to the sami tree in it, and growing ever more certain that this eunuch is Arjuna, their skins crawl with fear.

Bharadvaja's son Drona, first among Acharyas of weaponry, sees the distraught Kurus; he also notices extraordinary omens all around them.

He says, 'Hot and wild gusts of wind raise palls of gravel and blow them about. The sky is overcast with an ashen gloom; dark clouds are all dry; our weapons magically unsheathe themselves; and jackals howl hideously in fear of the fires that spring up with no apparent cause and proliferate. Our horses weep and our banners wave as if from their own volition.

We must be vigilant of the danger that these fell omens portend. Arm yourselves and prepare the troops for battle. Expect a terrible slaughter and guard the cattle well.

This mighty bowman, this best of all warriors, this Kshatriya who comes disguised as a eunuch is Pritha's son Arjuna. Of this there is no doubt.'

Then to Bhishma the Acharya says, 'O Gangeya, this man is he who has been named after a tree; he is the son of the enemy of the mountains and has on his banner the form of the ravager of the lord of Lanka's gardens. He will defeat us and take back the Matsya herd.

This slayer of foes is Pritha's inexorable Savyasachi. He does not shy away from battle even against the gods and demons combined. Having endured hardships in the forest he comes in anger. In war, he is like his sire and teacher Indra. O Kauravas, I do not see anyone here who can withstand him. This son of Kunti held up the Lord Mahadeva himself, who came as a hunter to test him in battle, on the slopes of Himavat.'

Stung to hear this praise for Arjuna, Karna says, 'You always demean us by speaking of Phalguna's great qualities. But Arjuna does not measure up to even a sixteenth part of Duryodhana or me.'

And Duryodhana says, 'Karna, if this eunuch is indeed Arjuna, I will have achieved my purpose. For, if they are discovered during this thirteenth year, the Pandavas must go into exile for another twelve years. And if this eunuch is someone else, I will soon bring him down with my arrows.'

Parantapa, hearing what Dhritarashtra's son says, Bhishma, Drona, Kripa and Aswatthama, his son, applaud his manliness."

Vaisampayana said, "By the time they reach the sami tree, Arjuna realises just how young and inexperienced Virata's son is. He says to the prince, 'Do as I say, Uttara. Climb this sami and bring down the stash of weapons that you will find in it. Your weapons will not compass the span of my arms or withstand my strength when I attack horses and elephants. O Bhuminjaya, on that leafy branch, you will find a bundle secured, and in it are the bows and arrows, the banners and armour of the sons of Pandu—Yudhishtira, Bhima, Arjuna and the heroic twins.

In it, also, is that mighty bow, Arjuna's Gandiva equal to thousands of other bows and which by itself extends kingdoms. It is heavy as a palmyra tree and stands the utmost strain. It is the greatest of all weapons and will stop our enemy. It is radiant, smooth and broad, unblemished and inlaid with gold; it is truly a thing of beauty and without equal in prowess. The other bows in the bundle belong to Yudhishtira, Bhima and the twins, and are just as splendid and strong.' "

"Uttara says, 'We have heard that there is a corpse tied high in this tree. Being a prince by birth, how can I touch it? It will pollute me for I am a Kshatriya, the son of a great king and I observe daily vratas and chant sacred mantras. Why do you want to make me an unclean bearer of corpses, by forcing me to handle a rotten body, Brihannala?'

Brihannala says, 'You will not be tainted, great Kshatriya; have no fear, there is no corpse in the tree, but only weapons. Why would I make an heir to the Matsya throne do such a vile thing?'

Hearing this, the prince gets down from the chariot and reluctantly climbs the sami tree.

Waiting in the chariot, Arjuna says to him, 'Fetch the bows down quickly, prince, our time is short.'

When the prince cuts away their wrappings and removes the ropes that bind the bundle, he sees the Gandiva and four other shimmering bows. Even as they are being uncovered, the bows radiate splendour like the Sun and blaze like the planets at their birth. At the sight of the awesome weapons like hissing serpents, prince Uttara is afraid. His hands trembling to touch those glorious bows, Virata's son speaks to Arjuna and his voice is also unsteady."

"Uttara breathes, 'To which illustrious warrior does this magnificent weapon belong, which has a hundred golden studs and shines blindingly at both its ends? Whose is this that has such wide and smooth sides and such an excellent grip, this bow that is embossed with golden elephants that glisten so brightly? And whose is this bow decorated with sixty, evenly-spaced golden dragonflies, indragopakas? Whose is this that has on it three golden suns that blaze with brilliance? And whose is this beautiful bow inlaid with gold and gemstones, and with figures of insects of gold and priceless jewels?

Whose are these thousand gold-tipped, winged arrows in their golden quivers? Who owns these great shafts, so thick and flighted with vulture feathers, stone-sharpened, yellowish in hue, with razor-sharp points made of tempered iron? Whose is this quiver of fur with images of five tigers that holds ten arrows including some boar-eared ones? Whom do these seven hundred arrows belong to, that are long and thick, with ends like the crescent moon and which can surely drink the blood of enemies? Whose are these gold-feathered arrows whetted on stone, winged with parrot-green feathers and their shafts made of tempered steel?

Whose is this remarkable sword, invincible and surely terrible to enemies, with a frog engraved on it and pointed like a frog's head? Whose is this large sword with its exquisite blade embossed with gold and its hilt tinkling tiny golden bells and encased in tiger-skin? And whose is this beautiful one with a blade polished like a mirror and a golden haft? Whose is this surely unbreakable and irresistible one made in the Nishada country with its blade gleaming in a leather scabbard? And whose is this wonderful, long, cloud-hued sword chased in gold and sheathed in goat-skin? Who owns this heavy, tempered sword, longer than thirty fingers, that shines from many battles and is kept in a case of fiery gold? Whose is this beautiful grey sword covered with golden studs that will cleanly divide an enemy's body with a single stroke, whose touch is as fatal as the bite of a king cobra, and which is inexorable and invokes terror in any adversary?

Answer me, Brihannala; tell me truly. I am awestruck at the sight of these wondrous weapons.' "

"Brihannala says, 'The first that you asked about is Arjuna's celebrated bow, called Gandiva, which devastates hostile armies. It is embellished with gold; it is the best and the biggest of all weapons, this bow of Arjuna's. It alone is equal to a hundred thousand others and can conquer kingdoms. It is with this bow that Partha defeated all the world's kings and even the Devas in battle. It is worshipped by the Devas, Danavas and Gandharvas; it is great and smooth, many-hued and flawless. It first belonged to Siva for a thousand years; then Prajapati owned it for five hundred and three. Later, Sakra had it for eighty-five years, then Soma for five hundred and Varuna for a hundred years. Now it is Partha Swetavahana's and it has been his for sixty-five years. This divine bow of dazzling tejas is the best of all bows. Partha was given this bow by Varuna.

The golden-hafted bow of the beautiful sides is Bhima's, with which that son of Pritha, chastiser of his foes, conquered all the eastern kingdoms. The exquisitely shaped bow adorned with figures of indragopakas belongs, O Virataputra, to Yudhishtira Dharmaraja. This one here, sparkling in splendour with golden suns on it, and radiating blinding light all round, belongs to Nakula. And this bow inlaid with golden figures of insects and set with gemstones is Madri's son Sahadeva's.

O Uttara, these feathered arrows, numbering one thousand, sharp as razors and deadly as venom, belong to Arjuna. When loosed in battle, these blaze more brilliantly still and become inexhaustible. The long, thick, crescent-headed shafts, keen and capable of thinning enemy ranks, belong to Bhima. This quiver with five tigers on it, full of yellowish stone-sharpened arrows with golden wings, belongs to Nakula. And this is the quiver of Madri's son Sahadeva of the lofty intellect, with which he conquered all the western realms; his vari-coloured arrows, bright as the Sun, can raze enemies by the thousands. These short, thick, finely-honed shafts with long feathers, golden heads and three knots, belong to king Yudhishtira.

The long-bladed sword, with a frog carved on it and its tip like a frog's head belongs to Arjuna. Sheathed in tiger-skin, this other huge, wonderful and fearsome sword, the longest of all, belongs to Bhimasena. The exquisite sword with a golden hilt and an exquisitely decorated scabbard belongs to the wise Dharmaraja. This next versatile sword with its strong flexible blade and sheath of goat-skin belongs to Nakula. And this long one, encased in goat-leather and irresistible, is Sahadeva's.' "

"Uttara says, 'Ah, these weapons adorned with gold and belonging to the heroic, light-handed and exalted Partha are handsome indeed. But where are Arjuna and Yudhishtira of the Kurus, and Nakula, Sahadeva and Bhimasena, the sons of Pandu? The noble Pandavas, who can vanquish any foe, have not been heard of since they lost their kingdom at dice. And where is Draupadi, princess of Panchala, famed as a jewel among women, who followed the Pandavas into the forest after their defeat at dice?'

Arjuna says, 'I am Arjuna, also called Partha. Your father's courtier is Yudhishtira, and your father's cook Ballava is Bhimasena; Virata's chief equerry is Nakula, and Sahadeva is his cowherd. The sairandhri is Draupadi, for whose sake the Kichakas were killed.'

His eyes growing ever wider, Uttara whispers, 'I will believe you if you can tell me the ten names of Arjuna, which I already know.'

Arjuna says, 'I will name you my ten names, son of Virata; compare them with what you know. Listen carefully. My names are are Arjuna, Phalguna, Jishnu, Kiriti, Swetavahana, Bibhatsu, Vijaya, Krishna, Savyasachi and Dhananjaya.'

Uttara says, 'Tell me why you are called Vijaya and why Swetavahana. Why are you named Kiriti and Savyasachi? Why are you Arjuna, Phalguna and Jishnu? And why Krishna, Bibhatsu and Dhananjaya? I know the meanings of all the names of that peerless Kshatriya and I will believe what you say if you do, as well.'

Arjuna says, 'They call me Dhananjaya because I won great wealth during my conquest of all the kingdoms, when I took their treasures.

They call me Vijaya because I am always victorious in battle, even against invincible kings.

I am called Swetavahana because white horses in golden armour draw my chariot when I go into battle.

They call me Phalguna because I was born on Himavat Mountain when the nakshatra Uttara Phalguni was rising.

I am named Kiriti because a crown that dazzles like the Sun was placed on my head by Indra during my battle against the Danavas of Devaloka.

I am known as Bibhatsu among gods and men as I have never done anything dishonourable on the battlefield.

Since I am perfectly ambidextrous when I draw the Gandiva's bowstring I am known as Savyasachi.

They call me Arjuna because my complexion is rare and like that of the arjuna tree, and because my actions are always pure.

I am known among men and celestials as Jishnu because I am irrepressible, a tamer of my enemies, and son of the slayer of Paka.

And my tenth name Krishna was given me by my father out of his affection for a dark-skinned boy of great purity.'

The enthralled son of Virata stands very erect before Arjuna, and folding his hands in reverence, formally introduces himself. 'My name is Bhuminjaya and I am also called Uttara,' he says. 'It is my greatest good fortunte that I meet you, O mighty Arjuna. Welcome, Dhananjaya! You of the flashing red eyes and the arms that are each like an elephant's trunk, I beg you, forgive what I said to you in my ignorance. Knowing your unmatched achievements, all my fears are dispelled. Ah, great indeed is my admiration for you.' "

"Uttara says, 'O Kshatriya, which enemy division do wish to attack first, mounted on this chariot, with me for your sarathy? Command me and I will drive you there.'

Arjuna says, 'I am pleased with you, O tiger among men. Do not be afraid; I will put your enemies to rout in battle, great warrior. Watch my feats of terror against our foes. Quickly tie my twin quivers to your ratha and draw the gold-adorned sword with the polished blade from its sheath.'

In a trice, Uttara shins down the tree with Arjuna's weapons. Arjuna says to him, 'Yes, I will fight the Kurus and recover your herd. Under my protection the canopy of this chariot will be your fortress, its many sections the streets and buildings of that fort, my arms its ramparts and gateway, this bow and these quivers its impregnable defences. And this single, grand banner, will it not be equal to all the standards of your city? My bowstring is the great catapult of war which will loose missiles at the invaders. My anger will make this a most formidable fortress. And the din of our chariot-wheels, will it not sound like drumrolls of thunder? Riding this chariot, I, with my Gandiva, render it invincible, O son of Virata. So banish your fear.'

Uttara says, 'I am no longer afraid. I know that, even like Indra or Kesava, you never waver in battle. Yet, I am bewildered by the guise and form in which I find you. I wonder what circumstance could have deprived one of such a powerful body with every auspicious mark of his manhood.

Indeed, to me you seem to be Mahadeva, or Indra or the lord of the Gandharvas. But, O Arjuna, in the guise of a eunuch?'

Arjuna says, 'The truth is that I am keeping this vow for one year at the behest of my elder brother. Mighty-armed, I am no eunuch but only became one at another's curse, to serve a higher purpose and gain spiritual punya. Know, O prince, that I have now fulfilled my vow and am fully a man again.'

Uttara says, 'You have done me a great service today, for I now know that my suspicions were not unfounded. Such a one as you, O Manavottama, could not be a eunuch. I now have an ally with whom I can fight the Devas themselves. My fears are gone. What shall I do? Command me!

I was taught the art of chariotry by an expert sarathy and, Purushavyaghra, expertly will I drive this chariot so it will scythe through the massed formations of the enemy. Bull among men, I am as skilful as Vasudeva's charioteer Daruka or Sakra's Matali. The first horse, yoked on the right, whose hooves are barely visible when he gallops, is like Krishna's Sugriva; the handsome one on the left, the best of steeds, is as swift as Meghapushpa. This beautiful creature at the rear left is as fast as Shaibya and even stronger. And the one yoked at the rear right is fleeter and more powerful than Balahaka.

This chariot is worthy of bearing an archer like you into battle, and you are an equally worthy warrior to ride in it. This is my opinion.'

Arjuna, of the measureless tejas, takes the bracelets off his arms and takes up archer's gloves embroidered with gold thread. He ties his wavy, black hair with a piece of white cloth. Then, sitting on that superb chariot, the mighty-armed Kshatriya folds his hands and faces the east to purify his body; he meditates to summon all his astras.

And all the divine weapons come to him and speak to the son of Pritha. 'We are here, O Illustrious. Indraputra, we are yours to command.'

Partha bows to them and receives them, saying, 'Stay with me in my mind,' and in a blur he strings his bow, the Gandiva, which no other man can bend; and he thrums on it, echoingly. That sound reverberates like two mighty bulls colliding. The twang that fills the air is dreadful; violent are the winds that rise and blow. Meteors rain down in torrents and a deep gloom falls everywhere. Birds fly about in alarm and great trees tremble.

From the thunderous sound the Kurus know that it is Arjuna’s hands that drew the string of that best of bows.

Uttara says, ‘Pandavottama, you are alone, and many are these warriors on their chariots. How will you vanquish all these Maharathas? O Kaunteya, you have no one to help you, while the Kurus are many. But I will be by your side, even if paralysed with fear.’

Laughing, Partha says to Uttara, ‘Do not be afraid, Kshatriya. Who did I have to help me when I fought the Gandharvas during the ghoshayatra? What ally did I have in the battle against the Devas and Danavas in Khandava? Who fought by my side when I fought for the Devas against the Nivatakavachas and the Paulomas? Child, who did I have beside me in battle against innumerable kings at the swayamvara of the princess of Panchala?

I was trained in the use of weapons by Acharya Drona, by Sakra and Vaisravana, by Yama and Varuna, by Agni, by Acharya Kripa, by Krishna of Madhu’s clan and by Siva who wields the Pinaka. Why would I not fight these who stand before us? Drive my chariot with all speed, and calm your fearful heart.’ ”

Vaisamayana continued, “Gathering his weapons, and making Uttara his sarathy, the son of Pandu circles the sami tree in pradakshina and sets out. That Maharatha takes down the lion flag of the Matsya prince and leaves it on the ground beside the sami tree. And he hoists his own golden ensign emblazoned with the figure of a lion-tailed vanara, the emblem of Hanuman, as well as other fierce and warlike beings.

This standard is Visvakarma’s divine creation. The moment that Arjuna thinks of Agni Deva, the superhuman creatures take their places on the Pandava’s banner. A flagstaff of celestial craft, which holds this wondrous flag, with quivers attached and adorned with gold, falls from the heavens softly onto the chariot. Seeing the staff and its banner on his ratha, Arjuna walks around both in pradakshina.

Flying the monkey-standard, eases his hands into the lizard-skin gloves, takes up his bow and arrows and rides north towards the enemy. That Parantapa blows hard on his conch, a deafening blast that makes men’s hair stand on end. The swift horses fall to their knees. Uttara too, sits down in sheer fright. The son of Kunti takes up the reins himself, gently lifts up the horses and guides them back into their proper positions.

He embraces Uttara, saying, ‘Have no fear, O best of princes; you are a Kshatriya, a chastiser of your foes. Why do you, Purushavyaghra, lose courage in the face of the enemy? You must often have heard the blare of conches, the blast of trumpets and the roar of elephants from armies arrayed for battle. Why does the sound of this conch terrify and weaken you as if you were just an ordinary youth?'

Uttara says, 'I have heard the bass of many a conch, the sounding of many a horn and the trumpeting of many an elephant on the battlefield, but never have I heard the sound of such a conch before. Nor have I ever seen a banner like this unworldly one or heard the twang of such a bow. The blast of your conch, the sound of your bow and the raucous cries of the macabre creatures on your banner affright me, and I tremble, for my heart clenches in shock. This flag seems to cover the whole sky, hiding everything above, and the sound of the Gandiva's bowstring has deafened and numbed me.'

Arjuna says, 'Stand firm, press your feet down hard on the floor of the chariot and hold the bridle tight. I am going to blow the conch again.'

Arjuna sounds his conch, the reverberant Devadatta, once more, this sea-shell that fills his enemies with grief and his friends with joy. And the sound is so loud that it seems to split mountains and go echoing through the deepest caves; and it reaches the four corners of the Earth. Uttara falls into his seat again and clings to it. The Earth quakes with the blare of the Devadatta, the rumble of the chariot-wheels and the twanging of the Gandiva. Seeing that Uttara is still afraid, Dhananjaya reassures him once more.

Meanwhile, Drona says, 'The clamour of the chariot, the way the clouds fill the sky and the trembling of the Earth tell me that this warrior can only be Savyasachi. Our weapons have turned dull, our horses droop and our fires do not burn despite being fed. Our horses whinny dreadfully at the Sun, and crows perch on our banners: dire omens all.

The vultures and kites to our right foretell some great danger. Notice the jackal that howls as it skitters through our ranks. Look! It escapes unscathed. This, too, portends some imminent calamity. All of you have your hair standing on end, warning of a great slaughter of Kshatriyas in battle.

All bright things have paled, while animals and birds look fierce; dark omens foretelling the slaying of Kshatriyas abound and warn of havoc coming upon us. O Duryodhana, your forces seem to be overwhelmed by fear at these meteors flaring down from above; your horses and elephants seem to weep; more and more vultures and kites circle overhead, as if come to a feast of corpses that will soon litter the ground.

You will rue this day when you see your army attacked by Partha’s arrows. Why, our forces seem to be defeated already, no man among them eager to fight. The faces of our warriors are pale, and they seem stupefied. We should send the cattle ahead and remain here, ready for battle.’ ”

Vaisampayana said, "Then, on that field, Duryodhana speaks to his grandsire Bhishma, to that tiger among warriors Drona, and to that Maharatha Kripa. He says, 'Both Karna and I have said this to our Acharyas and I will say it again, for it seems that once is not enough. The Pandavas vowed that, if they lost at dice, they would live in the open for twelve years in the forest, and then for one more year hidden from us. That thirteenth year is not over yet. Arjuna, who should still be hidden, is before us; and if he appears before their ajnatavasa ends, the Pandavas must spend another twelve years in the wilderness.

Whether they have lost count of time in their eagerness for a kingdom or whether we are mistaken is for Pitama Bhishma to say.

Uncertainty always stalks the path of anyone who has a goal in mind. Decisions may not always have the desired outcome. Even philosophers are puzzled when judging their own actions. As for us, we have come here to fight the Matsyas and seize their herds that they keep in the north. If, meanwhile, Arjuna comes to us, we are not to blame. We have come here as allies of the Trigartas to fight against the Matsyas, for Susarman and his people have been attacked many times by the Matsyas. We have come to help our allies the Trigartas, who are full of fear.

It was agreed between us that on the afternoon of the seventh day of the moon they should seize the Matsyas' most valuable herd in the east, and that at sunrise of the eighth day we would seize the rest of the Matsya herds, while king Virata pursues Susarman's army.

It may be that the Trigartas now herd the Matsya cattle this way; or, having been defeated, they come to us to negotiate with Virata. Else, possibly, the Matsya army has driven away the Trigartas, and Virata comes with his fierce legions to attack us at night. It may be that one powerful warrior among them advances to vanquish us, or perhaps it is the king himself.

Be it Virata or Arjuna, we must fight, for we are sworn to battle. Why do all these superb rathikas—Bhishma, Drona and Kripa, Vikarna and Drona's son—sit panic-stricken in their chariots?

There is nothing for it but to fight. So stand firm and bold even if we meet Indra or Yama himself in our battle for the Matsya herds. Who can now return safely to Hastinapura? The enemy's arrows flying after them, how will the foot-soldiers escape on foot, when it is doubtful whether our horsemen and Maharathas can ride to safety?'

Hearing Duryodhana, Karna says, 'Ignore the Acharya and prepare for battle. He knows what the Pandavas wish to do and strikes terror into our hearts, for he bears them love. I see that his affection for Arjuna is great indeed, and, seeing him come alone, Drona praises him. Make sure that our troops do not break ranks. We have only heard the neighing of horses and a conch being blown, and instantly all is fear and confusion. Our soldiers travelled far from home to this thick forest in the summer heat; let them not fall into disarray and suffer defeat at the enemy's hands.

The Pandavas have always been Acharya Drona's favourites. They have cleverly planted the Acharya amongst us, and he betrays himself by what he says. Who would extol an enemy merely upon hearing the whinnying of his horses? Horses will neigh whether standing still, walking or galloping; the wind blows; Indra showers rain; it thunders frequently: what has Arjuna to do with these? Why are these attributed to him? All this foolish talk is only because Drona wants to help Arjuna, or perhaps because of his anger and hatred towards us.

Brahmanas are wise, pure-hearted and compassionate. However, they should never be consulted in a military crisis. The best place for learned men who make speeches is in grand palaces, their courts and pleasure gardens. They say many wonderful things in a royal sabha, and it is there they had best stay.

They are best consulted about the proper cleaning and placing of sacrificial utensils. It is in seeing others' shortcomings, in studying people's characters, in the science of horses, elephants and chariots, in treating the diseases of livestock—donkeys, camels, goats, sheep and cattle, in planning buildings and arches and in pointing out the imperfections in food and drink that learned Brahmanas come into their own.

Ignore the learned Drona who extols the heroism of Arjuna, and prepare for battle. Secure the cattle in a safe place; array the troops in battle-order and position guards in the proper places so that we can face and kill the enemy, whoever he might be.' "

"Karna says, 'I see in all these great men alarm, indecision and an unwillingness to fight. Be it Virata or Arjuna, I will contain the one who comes even as the shore does the swollen sea. Arrows will stream like snakes through the air from my swift hands and find their mark. My golden-winged arrows will shroud Partha as locusts do a tree. Stretched to loose them, my bowstring will slap against my leathern gloves like the booming of two great drums.

These past thirteen years, Arjuna has led the life of an ascetic and his skills will have turned mild. Kunti's son will have acquired the saintly qualities of a Brahmana and will meekly allow thousands of my arrows to pierce him. This mighty archer is, indeed, celebrated across the three Lokas, but I am in no way inferior to Arjuna Manavottama. My golden arrows, flighted with vulture-feathers, will fill the air and make the firmament seem to swarm with fireflies. I will kill Arjuna in battle today and, at last, repay my long-standing debt to Dhritarashtra's son.

What man exists, even amongst the Devas and Asuras, who can resist my unerring arrows? My light and lethal shafts, for they are both hollow and of perfect balance, will indeed swarm Partha like fireflies. He may be as strong as Indra's thunderbolt and have the same limitless urjas as the king of the Devas, but I will subdue him like branding an elephant. He may be a Maharatha and the best of all wielders of weapons, but I will snatch the hapless Partha from his ratha as Garuda would a snake in his talons. He is the weapon-fed Pandava fire that burns up enemies, but I am the thundercloud that lashes down rain to extinguish him; my army of chariots is the thunder, and the speed of my horses, the wind.

My arrows will pierce Arjuna like poisonous snakes, like serpents burrowing through an anthill. My tempered shafts with golden wings, straight and true, and blistering with energy, will draw blood from his body today, and you will see Kunti's son decked in them like a hill covered by crimson karnikara flowers.

My weapons were given me by Jamadagni's son Parasurama Bhargava, and with them I am confident to battle even the Devas. My spear will strike the ape on his flag and it will fall to the ground with terrible cries. The sky will be filled by the howls of the other un-human creatures on his banner and they will fly in all directions.

Today I will pluck out the thorn that has long been in Duryodhana's heart by casting Arjuna down from his chariot. Today the Kauravas will see the great Partha, his chariot shattered, his horses dead, his valour gone, sighing like a snake. Let the Kauravas take the cattle and leave if they wish, or they can stay in their chariots and witness my victory.' "

"Kripa says, 'O Radheya, your twisted mind is always bent on war and bloodshed. You do not understand the true nature of these things, nor do you consider their consequences. The Shastras tell of many grave matters, and those who have studied them speak of battle as being the most sinful of them.

Battles result in victory only if they are fought at the right place and time. All the omens show that this moment is palpably inauspicious, and no good will come of this encounter. A display of prowess at the apt time and in the right place is beneficial. The appropriateness of any action is determined by its timeliness. Wise men do not follow the rash counsel of a sutaputra. Considering all this, a battle with Arjuna is foolhardy.

It is Partha who, on his own, saved the Kurus from the Gandharvas; alone, he satisfied Agni; alone, he took up Brahmacharya for five years on Himavat; single-handed, he rescued Subhadra on his chariot and challenged even Krishna to a duel. By himself, Arjuna fought Rudra who came to him in the guise of a vetala. Partha rescued Krishnaa from the clutches of Jayadrata in this very forest; he studied the astra shastra from Indra for five years; on his own, he vanquished all enemies and spread the fame of the Kurus throughout the world. Alone, this Parantapa defeated the Gandharva king Chitrasena and all his invisible troops. Alone, he quelled the fierce Nivatakavachas and the Kalakhanjas, whom the gods themselves could not conquer.

O Karna, what have you achieved compared to any of the sons of Pandu? They have each subdued many great kings. Even Indra cannot face Partha in battle. Therefore, he who finds himself filled with a desire to fight Arjuna should instantly disabuse himself of his absurd thought. You might as well want to pull out the fangs of an angry snake by stretching out your right hand and extending your forefinger; whilst wandering alone in a forest, you may want to try mounting an infuriated wild-elephant in musth or to attack a great boar without a hook or a weapon in your hand; you might want to walk through a blazing ghee-and tallow-fed fire, clad in silk and having smeared yourself all over with clarified butter, as you now want to fight Arjuna.

Which man would tie his hands and feet, tie a heavy stone to his neck and try to swim across the ocean? What manliness is there in such folly? Karna, only a fool, who despite being weak and having no real skill at arms, would want to fight the consummate warrior Partha.

Having been deceived by us and now freed from his exile of thirteen years, will the noble hero not destroy us all? We have come unknowingly to the place where Arjuna lay in wait like a fire in a well, and we have exposed ourselves to great danger.

Yet, alas, though he is invincible, we must fight him for that is our dharma. Let our armoured troops stand ready. Drona, Duryodhana, Bhishma, Drona's son, you, Karna, and all of us must go into battle against the son of Pritha.

O Karna, do not be foolish enough to fight Arjuna by yourself. If we six maharathas unite, we might be a match for the dauntless Kaunteya, who is as fierce and mighty as Indra Vajradhari. Supported by our troops, we six will face Arjuna as the Danavas did Vasava.' "

"Aswatthama says, 'Karna, the cattle are not yet ours, for they have not yet crossed the Matsya borders, nor have they reached Hastinapura. Why do you boast so? Truly heroic men do not brag about having won many victories, or of having amassed vast fortunes or of the enemies they have vanquished. Fire burns silently and so too does the Sun shine. The Earth mutely sustains life, both mobile and unmoving.

Brahma, the self-existent, has ordained the duties of the four varnas so that they can acquire wealth by following their svadharma, without sinning. A Brahmana studies the Vedas, performs yagnas and officiates at sacrifices performed by others. A Kshatriya lives by his weapons and performs his own yagnas but does not officiate at those of others. A Vaisya ensures that the proper Vedic rituals are performed for him after he has acquired wealth. A Sudra always serves the other three orders. Flower-sellers and butchers may use some deceit to make their livelihood.

The noble sons of Pandu became sovereigns of the Earth by living according to their svadharma, as prescribed in the Shastras. They are always respectful to their elders, even if they are their enemies. What true Kshatriya shows delight at having obtained a kingdom by means of cheating at dice, as this evil and shameless son of Dhritarashtra does? Having gained untold wealth through deceit and fraud, like a vendor of meat, which wise man would boast of it?

You have taken their wealth, but have you ever defeated Dhananjaya or Nakula or Sahadeva in combat? In what battle did you best Yudhishtira, or that strongest of men Bhima? In which battle did you conquer Indraprastha? What you have done, however, O unscrupulous Duryodhana, is to drag the princess Krishnaa into court while she was in her period and wore just a single piece of cloth. You have hewn at the very root, delicate as that of the sandalwood, of the Pandava tree. When greed made you enslave the Pandavas, do you remember what Vidura said?

Men and other creatures, even insects and ants, show as much forgiveness as lies in their power. The Pandava may forgive you for everything else, but he will not forgive you for tormenting Draupadi. Dhananjaya comes to kill Dhritarashtra's sons. In an affectation of wisdom you make brave speeches, but Arjuna Parantapa will kill us all.

Dhananjaya will not flee even from Devas, Gandharvas, Asuras or Rakshasas. When inflamed, he will slay whoever he encounters like Garuda crushes a tree in his talons. He is far more powerful than you are; he is equal to Indra at archery and to Krishna himself in battle. Who would not praise Partha? What man is a match for Arjuna who can counter devastras with devastras and wordly weapons with mundane ones.

Those who are well-read in the scriptures say that a disciple is no less than a son in every way; that is why Arjuna is Drona's favourite.

Use the same deceit now, as you did when you played dice, the same stratagems by which you subjugated Indraprastha and the same bravado with which you dragged Krishnaa into the Kuru sabha. Let your clever uncle, who knows full well what Kshatriya Dharma is, the cheating Sakuni, prince of Gandhara, show us his mettle today!

The Gandiva does not cast dice as do the Krita or the Dwapara, but it looses countless fiery, winged arrows at adversaries, with lethal accuracy. The deadly vulture-feathered arrows of inexorable speed that fly from the Gandiva can penetrate even mountains. Yama, the destroyer, Vayu and the horse-faced Agni all leave something behind, but Dhananjaya with his wrath unbridled, does not.

You played dice with your uncle Sakuni's help; fight this battle today with him beside you. Let my father Drona fight if he chooses to, but I will not fight Arjuna. We came here only to do battle against the king of the Matsyas if he comes to retrieve his herds.' "

"Bhishma says, 'Drona's son speaks well and Kripa is also right. As for Karna, he wants to fight only out of respect for Kshatriya Dharma. No man of wisdom can find fault with Acharya Drona. It is my view that we must fight, giving consideration both to the time and the place.

It is not surprising that any man is bewildered in the face of five adversaries, radiant as suns, Kshatriyas, beside, who have just emerged from adversity having been honed by it. Even those who know dharma would be confused about what they should do. Duryodhana, that is why I say this to you, whether or not you like what I say.

Aswatthama, what Karna said was only to boost our courage; forgive him for it. The task at hand is grave. The appearance of the son of Kunti is not a good time for us to quarrel among ourselves. Acharya Kripa and you must forgive everything. As light is innate to the Sun, the mastery over weapons is within you. As beauty is never separated from Chandrama, the Moon, so are the Vedas and the Brahmastra part of you. Usually, the four Vedas dwell in one man and Kshatriya attributes in another. We have never heard of these two existing together in any person other than the preceptor of the Bhaaratas and his son.

In the Vedantas, Puranas and Itihasas, O king, who other than Jamadagni is Drona's superior? The Brahmastra and the Vedas have never before co-existed in one person. Acharyaputra, be forgiving, for this is no time for disharmony among us. Let us unite and fight Indra's son who has come to battle. Of all the calamities that may befall an army, wise men say the worst is dissent among its leaders.'

Aswatthama says, 'Purusharishabha, you have been fair and just in what you say. In his anger the Acharya elaborates on Arjuna's virtues. The qualities of even an enemy should be admitted, while the faults of even one's Guru may be pointed out. Therefore one must, to the best of one's ability, declare the merits and shortcomings of a son or a disciple.'

Duryodhana says, 'Let the Acharya grant his forgiveness and let peace be restored. If he is with us, all will be done as it should.'

Then, O Bhaarata, Duryodhana pacifies Drona with the help of Karna, Kripa and Bhishma Mahatman.

Drona says, 'I was already appeased by what Shantanu's son Bhishma said. We must ensure that Partha does not meet Duryodhana in battle lest Duryodhana is captured from his own rashness. Arjuna will surely not have shown himself before the term of his exile expired; nor will he pardon us by merely recovering the cattle. So, make sure that he does not attack Dhritarashtra's son and in one sroke defeat us all and our purpose. Like Duryodhana, I, too, am unsure exactly when the term of exile ends. Only Bhishma can clarify this.' "

"Bhishma says, 'The Kaalachakra, the wheel of time, revolves with its divisions—kaalas, kashtas and muhurtas; days, fortnights, months and years; periods of the different constellations, planets and seasons. Every five years, their fractional increase of duration and the deviations of the planetary orbits create an excess of two months in time's measure. By my calculations, in thirteen years there would be an excess of five months and twelve nights. Therefore, the sons of Pandu have completed their exile exactly; they have kept their sworn oath. Arjuna makes his appearance because he is sure of this.

The Pandavas are virtuous and deeply-versed in the Shastras. With Yudhishtira to guide them, they would not deviate from the path of dharma, not by a hair's width. The sons of Kunti do not yield to temptation, and they have achieved a difficult feat. If they had wanted to establish their rights to the kingdom through adharma, those Kurus would have displayed their might even during the game of dice. Bound by dharma, they did not flout Kshatriya Dharma. He who thinks that they are ever capable of deceit will surely meet with defeat.

The sons of Pritha would prefer death to falsehood. When the time comes, however, those Purusharishabhas endowed with the limitless vitality of Sakra, will not give up what is theirs even if is defended by the wielder of the thunderbolt.

But now we must face the best of all warriors in battle. So let us plan our strategy without delay, and with the approval of good and honest men, so that Arjuna does not take what is now ours.

Duryodhana, I have never seen a battle in which one side can be certain of victory. In a battle there is victory and defeat, prosperity and adversity; and one side must have one of the two. Therefore, king of kings, despite the propriety, or lack thereof, of a battle at this moment, make your arrangements quickly, for Dhananjaya is here.'

Duryodhana says, 'Pitama, I will not give back the Pandavas their kingdom. So let us prepare for battle in every way, without a moment's delay.'

Bhishma says, 'I will tell you what is wise, if you care to hear it. I always speak for your good, O Kaurava. Ride at once to Hastinapuraa and take a fourth of the army with you. Let another fourth escort the cattle. With half our legions we will fight Pandu's son. Drona, Karna, Aswatthama, Kripa and I will withstand Bibhatsu, or the king of the Matsyas or indeed Indra himself if he comes. We will contain any of them as the shore restrains the surging sea.'

Duryodhna sees the sagacity of what Bhishma says, and the king of the Kauravas immediately does as he is told. When Duryodhana and the cattle have left, Bhishma begins to array his soldiers in battle formations.

He addresses Drona, saying, 'Acharya, stand at the heart of our legions with Aswatthama on the left; and let the wise Kripa defend the right wing. Encased in golden mail, let the Suta Karna station himself at the head of our forces. I will be at the rear and protect the whole army from there.' "

Vaisampayana said, "O Bhaarata, the Kauravas take their positions, and the din of Arjuna's chariot-wheels fills the air as he flies towards them. The Kurus see his banner; they hear the rumble of his ratha and the deafening twang of the Gandiva.

Drona sees that Maharatha coming towards them and says, 'That glimmer in the distance is Partha's standard, the rumble is his from his chariot-wheels, and that frightful roar is of the ape on his banner. O, the Vanara strikes terror into our troops. And standing on the superb chariot is the greatest Maharatha, who draws the thunderous Gandiva, best of all bows.

Look! Two arrows fall together at my feet and two more skim past my ears. Having completed his exile and achieved many wonderful feats during these thirteen years, Arjuna salutes and whispers to me. It is after so long that I am seeing Dhananjaya, radiant with beauty and grace, this wise son of Pandu, beloved of his family. He blazes like fire in his chariot, with his bow and quivers of arrows, his conch and banner, his splendid armour, his crown, sword and bow, like a roaring ghee-fed yagna fire surrounded by sacrificial urns.'

Arjuna sees the Kurus ready for battle and says to Virata's son, 'O sarathy, rein in the horses as soon as the enemy is within bowshot. Meanwhile, let me locate Duryodhana, wretch of the Kuru vamsa, in the midst of his forces. I will ignore the others, single out that vain prince and strike him down, for his death will signal the defeat of all the rest.

There stands Drona, and his son Aswatthama behind him, and there are those great archers Bhishma, Kripa and Karna. But I do not see Duryodhana. I suspect that, in his anxiety to save himself, he flees by the southern path, taking the cattle with him. Leave this formation of chariots and ride after Suyodhana. It is him that I will fight, O Virataputra, and the battle will not be in vain. Defeat him I shall, and return with your herds.'

The son of Virata holds back the horses and adroitly steers them away from where the Kurupumgavas stand in their chariots. He guides them towards Duryodhana.

Seeing Arjuna's chariot veering away from the dense cluster of Kuru chariots, Kripa guesses his intention and says to his men, 'Arjuna is after Duryodhana. We must outflank the Pandava's chariot. When his anger is roused, no one can challenge him other than thousand-eyed Indra, Devaki's son Krishna, Dronacharya, his son Aswatthama and Maharatha Bhargava. Of what use would these herds be to us if Duryodhana were to sink like a ship in the ocean that is Partha?'

Meanwhile, Arjuna rides at Kripa's division, announces himself, and in a blur covers the troops with a swarm of arrows, thick as locusts. Enveloped by Partha's countless shafts, the Kuru warriors cannot see, and the earth and sky become overcast, covered by a dome of arrows. The soldiers, who were ready to fight, stand still in stunned awe, unable even to flee; and in their minds they applaud Partha's astounding dexterity.

Arjuna blows his conch, the Devadatta that always makes the hairs of the enemy stand on end; he pulls on his bowstring, to excite the creatures on his flagstaff into even more frightful roars and screams. The boom of his conch, the drumroll of his chariot-wheels, the echoing twang of the Gandiva and the terrifying yowls of the un-human creatures on his flagstaff make the earth tremble.

The cattle low piteously and whisk their tails in terror; and they turn back, now heading south."

Vaisampayana said, "Having thrown the enemy forces into disarray and recovered the cattle, Arjuna, supreme archer, rides avidly towards Duryodhana. The Kuru lords see the herds running wildly towards the Matsya city and know that Kiriti has already prevailed. As he advances on Duryodhana, they charge Arjuna.

Arjuna Parantapa sees their legions in tight formation, flying a sea of brilliant banners, and he says to the Matsya prince, 'Spur your white horses to fly as fast as they can. Do your best, for I want to confront this mass of Kuru lions. Like an elephant eager to fight another tusker, the evil son of a Suta is impatient to fight me. Take me to him, Uttara, he has grown arrogant under Duryodhana's patronage.'

At Partha's command, Virata's son flicks his whips over his great horses in golden armour. They fly like the wind, break into the formation of chariots and take the son of Pandu into the midst of the battlefield and the Kuru army. The Kuru Maharathas Chitrasena, Sangramajit, Satrusaha and Jaya rush to help Karna, spears and arrows at the ready to meet Arjuna's onrush.

With flaming shafts, the enraged Pandava hero sets all their chariots afire, and incinerates them as a great conflgration does a forest.

The battle rages furiously when, mounted on his ratha, the Kuru hero Vikarna rides at Arjuna and covers him with a rain of thick, long, vicious barbs. Arjuna severs Vikarna's rugged, gold-tipped bow and cuts down his flagstaff, and that Kshatriya flees in some haste.

Vikarna's flight leaves Satruntapa in an uncontrollable rage, and he looses a deluge of arrows over Partha. Arjuna is wounded by Maharatha Satruntapa but, though he seems to be drowning in a sea of Kuru warriors, he retaliates to Satruntapa's attack. Arjuna pierces that Kshatriya with five razorlike arrows and kills his sarathy with another ten. Then, shot by the bull of the Bhaaratas with another shaft that can cleave the sturdiest armour, Satruntapa falls dead on the field, like a tree on a mountain-top blown down by the wind.

Other valiant Narapumgavas are mangled in battle by that bravest bull among men; they stagger and tremble like vast forests shaken by the wind of the Mahapralaya, that blows at the dissolution of the universe. Struck by Partha, son of Vasava, the gloriously-attired Kshatriyas, those givers of wealth, heroes invested with the vital prowess of Indra, are vanquished and lie senseless on the field, like elephants clad in mail of black steel and gold.

Gandiva in hand, Arjuna rages across the battlefield in all directions, spreading death like a forest fire at the end of a dry summer. Kiriti, greatest of maharathas, like the spring wind that breaks thunderheads open and blows about fallen leaves, strews his adversaries all around him.

First killing the russet horses yoked to the chariot of Vikartana's brother's son, Sangramajit, Arjuna of boundless energy cuts off Sangramajit's head with a single crescent-tipped arrow. When his cousin is slain, Suryaputra Karna rushes at Arjuna like an elephant with tusks lowered, like a tiger at a mighty bull.

The Sutaputra wounds the Pandava with twelve arrows, pierces his horses all over and strikes prince Uttara's hand which holds the reins. Arjuna responds with an impassioned attack as fierce as that of iridescent Garuda swooping on a snake. Both men are superb archers, indefatigable and deadly.

The Kauravas excitedly stand aside to watch the duel between Karna and Arjuna. Incited to fury at the sight of Karna, and glad to be facing him at last, the Pandava casts a dark mantle of arrows over him, rendering him, his horses and chariot invisible. Bhishma's legion of warriors, whose horses, elephants and chariots too Arjuna shrouds and pierces with his arrows, scatter, wailing in terror and pain.

Breaking through the Pandava cloud of arrows, exploding into view like a mass of brilliant flame, illustrious Karna, bow in hand, gives Arjuna answer with countless arrows of his own. Loud applause breaks out as the Kurus cheer Surya's son with booming conches, trumpets and drum-rolls; and the air resonates with the sound of Karna's bowstring slapping his leather gloves. At the sight of Kiriti, who fills the air with the thunder of the Gandiva, of the upraised tail of the Vanara on his flag and of the other terrible creatures screeching furiously from the top of the flagstaff, Karna roars like a pride of lions.

Arjuna attacks Karna, his horses, his chariot and his sarathy with arrows; he releases an unrestrained cloudburst of arrows over him, while glancing briefly at Bhishma, Drona and Kripa. Karna replies with a torrent of his own arrows, and the crown-adorned Arjuna unleashes another downpour of keen-edged barbs. Attacking each other with arrows and astras beyond count, the two create so many arrow-clouds that they appear to the onlookers like the Sun and the Moon in a stormy sky.

Karna, of the light hands, wounds four of Arjuna's horses with whetted shafts and then strikes his sarathy and flagstaff with three arrows each. Provoked, like a lion woken from slumber, Jishnu, crusher of foes, bull of the Kurus, lets fly a hot stream of shafts at Karna.

A blizzard of arrows spumes at the Pandava, as Karna displays his prowess. Arjuna covers Karna's chariot with so many arrows that it looks like the Sun radiating his light over many worlds. Like a lion set upon by an elephant, Arjuna draws his bowstring to his ear and shoots crescented arrows into all parts of the Sutaputra's body. These seething shafts strike Karna's arms and legs, his head and neck, and every other limb like thunderbolts.

At last, somewhat mangled by Partha's superhuman archery, Karna, son of Vikartana, surrenders his position at the van of the Kuru army, and flees the battle like an elephant routed by another."

Vaisampayana continued, "After Radheya leaves the field, the other warriors, led by Duryodhana, attack the son of Pandu. As the shore withstands the fury of the sea, Arjuna withstands the rage of the teeming legions that rush towards him in battle-formations, shooting fusillades of arrows.

Kunti's son Svetavahana, first among all warriors, rushes at them, now loosing divine astras. Partha's arrows radiate from his Gandiva everywhere like rays from the Sun; amongst rathikas, horsemen, the elephant-mounted, and mail-clad foot-soldiers—there is not one who has even a two finger space left uninjured on his body. For his dexterity with Devastras, for the superbly trained horses and Uttara's skill in maneouvering them, for his infallible aim, for his strength and light-handedness, Arjuna is like the apocalyptic fire that burns to end the world with all its creations; and none can bear to look at him for he blazes in blinding splendour.

Devastated by Arjuna's tirades of arrows, the enemy legions look like clouds rising over the brow of a hill that reflect rays of sunlight, or like groves of upright asoka trees resplendent with clusters of flowers. Afflicted by Partha's arrows the enemy soldiers are like scalded garlands from which withered blossoms fall. Torn flags and royal parasols swirl about in the wind that blows everywhere. Terrified by bloody chaos, horses run in all directions, unyoked by Arjuna's sure arrows, and dragging shards of broken chariots behind them; and beleaguered elephants, their chests, ears, tusks and trunks pierced, drop on the battlefield, making the ground tremble. Soon the earth is strewn with the corpses of Kaurava elephants and looks like a dark sky, overcast with black thunderheads, with no wind to blow them away.

O King, just as the conflagration at the end of the yuga consumes all that can perish in the world, so does Partha consume his foes in this battle. With the might of his arms, the twang of his bow, the inhuman cries of the creatures on his flagstaff, the dreadful roar of the great monkey and the blast of his conch, the all-powerful Parantapa Arjuna strikes terror such as they have never known into the hearts of Duryodhana's forces. Soon, the courage and strength of every hostile warrior seems to drain into the dust at the very sight of Arjuna.

Unwilling to sin by killing those that are defenceless, Arjuna rides another path and attacks the Kuru army from behind with a storm of feathered barbs that fly, like trained falcons, to find their marks. Soon the very world seems covered by arrows and the sky to stream blood. Just as the infinite rays of the mighty Sun break out from being crowded into an inadequate vessel, so do Arjuna's countless arrows find the vast sky too small.

Those who face him see his chariot only once, for a moment, when it nears them, for then they and their mounts leave this world. His arrows pass unobstructed through men's bodies, and his chariot flies unimpeded through hostile ranks. Arjuna tosses enemy troops carelessly about as if he is the thousand-headed Vasuki playing in the ocean. The noise made by the ceaseless tide of arrows from Kiriti's bowstring exceeds all other sounds, so loud that its like has never, ever, been heard before.

Their bodies pierced closely with arrows on fire, the elephants throng the field like black clouds flashing with lightning braids. As he looses his endless tide in all directions, Arjuna's bow draws perfect circles. The arrows from the Gandiva never miss their mark, not one, even as the eye dwells surely, solely, on things beautiful. The trail made by Kiriti's chariot is like that of a herd of elephants marching through a forest. Struck by Partha's uncanny gales of missiles, his enemies might well believe that, wishing for his son's victory, Indra himself, with all the Devas, is upon them. They see Vijaya, the ever-victorious, at his terrible sacrifice of slaughter, as Death incarnate.

Beset by Partha, the Kuru troops are devastated in a manner that only Arjuna could achieve; just its own metaphor, it cannot be compared to anything but the battles of Partha himself. He beheads his enemies as easily as a reaper snips the tops of paddies, and the Kurus are weak with fear.

Tossed about and torn by the hurricane that is Arjuna, the forest of his enemies bleeds into the earth and stains it purple; and the bloody dust whipped up by death's wind reddens the Sun's rays. Soon the sky is so red that it seems like the hour of sunset. But though the Sun stops shedding his light after he sets, the son of Pandu does not stop his stream of shafts. That Kshatriya of energy beyond imagining, who knows no fatigue, overwhelms all the great archers of the enemy with his divine weapons, despite their irresistible and combined prowess.

Arjuna shoots seventy-three arrows at Drona, ten at Dussaha, eight at Drona's son, twelve at Dussasana and three at Kripa the son of Saradvata, all inside a moment. The Parantapa wounds Shantanu's son Bhishma; he strikes Duryodhana with a hundred arrows; he slashes Karna's ear with a slim eagle-feathered shaft. When Maharatha Karna, who is truly a master of all weapons, is wounded and his chariot shattered, and his sarathy killed, his troops break up and flee.

Seeing Karna's army disintegrate, Virata's son wants to know what Partha intends, 'O Partha, to which division shall I now take you in my glorious chariot? Command me and I will bear you to it like the wind.'

Arjuna replies, 'Uttara, that great warrior you see yonder, clad in tiger-skin, mounted on a chariot with a blue flag and drawn by red horses, is Kripa. You can see the frontlines of his legions. Take me to him and I will show that great bowman my swiftness of hand.

That other Maharatha whose flag bears the device of a golden water-pot is Acharya Drona, greatest among all masters of weapons. I have always revered him, as have all Kshatriyas. Therefore, drive around him in pradakshina and let us bow our heads to him, for that is our dharma. I will strike him only if he strikes me first; then he will not be able to fault me.

The warrior beside Drona, whose flag has the emblem of a bow on it, is the Acharya's son, Maharatha Aswatthama. I and all Kshatriyas honour him too. So pause again when you come to his chariot.

The warrior who sits on his chariot wearing golden armour, surrounded by a third of the army consisting of the best troops, and whose standard bears an elephant against a background of gold, is the illustrious Duryodhana, son of Dhritarashtra. O Kshatriya, take this chariot to him who can smash enemy chariots. This king is difficult to overcome and he can crush any enemy at all. He thinks of himself as the best of Drona's disciples in lightness of hand. Today, I will show him that I am the superior archer.

The warrior whose flag bears the device of a thick rope used for tethering elephants is Vikartana's son Karna, whom you already know. When you come before that evil son of Radha, be very careful, for he always challenges me to a fight, and he is a great warrior indeed.

The warrior whose flag is blue and has five stars and a Sun at their heart, who has limitless prowess, who sits on his chariot holding a huge bow in his richly-gloved hands, whose head is shaded by a pure-white royal parasol, who stands at the head of a multitude of chariots flying various banners, who looks like the Sun in front of massed black clouds, whose mail of gold sparkles like the light of the Sun and Moon together, and who in his golden helmet strikes fear into my heart, is Shantanu's son Bhishma, the grandsire of us all. Entertained with regal splendour by Duryodhana, he is partial to that prince, and very fond of him. Approach him last, for he might pose an obstacle to us. Now guide our horses with all your great skill.'

Virata's son responds by briskly guiding Arjuna's chariot towards where Kripa stands eager for battle.' "

Vaisampayana said, "Those ranks of fierce Kuru fighters resemble massed monsoon clouds drifting on a slow wind. Near them are innumerable horses and their riders; there are also ferocious elephants, resplendent in beautiful armour and ridden by skilled warriors who goad them with iron hooks and ankushas.

And O King, in the firmament above, accompanied by the divine Viswas and Maruts, and seated in a splendid vimana is Sakra. Yakshas, Gandharvas and Nagas also crowd the sky, so it seems bejewelled as a clear, star-spangled night. All the Devas have come, each in his own chariot, to see how well mortals use Devastras and to witness the great duel between Kripa and Arjuna. Indra's divine vahana, embellished with myriad gemstones and commanded by the will of its rider, its roof held up by a hundred thousand golden posts and a central one entirely jewel-encrusted, stands out conspicuous among the others.

Thirty-three Devas with Vasava at their head, and Gandharvas, Rakshasas, Nagas, Pitrs and Devarishis have come with the Lord Indra. Seated in the vimana of the king of Devas are radiant Rajarishis of old—Vasumanas, Balaksha and Supratardana, Ashtaka, Sibi and Yayati, Nahusha and Gaya, Manu and Puru, Raghu, Bhanu and Krisasva, Sagara and Nala. Then comes a magnificent procession—the chariots of Agni and Isa, Soma and Varuna, Prajapati, Dhatri and Vidhatri, Kubera, Yama, Alambusha and Ugrasena, and the Gandharva Tumburu. All the Devas, the Siddhas and the foremost of Munis have come here to witness the encounter between Arjuna and the Kurus.

The sublime fragrance of heavenly vanamalas pervades the air like woodlands redolent with the perfumes of the blossoms of spring. Glorious are the great red parasols, the clothes, the garlands and the waving plumes on the heads of the gods. The dust of the earth has settled; lustre is everywhere, and the divinely-scented breezes waft soothingly over the combatants.

The sky is ablaze with the beauty of the shining craft of the Devas that adorn it—those that have already arrived and the ones that still come, in a train behind the Lord of gods. They surround him, the magnificent Indra, wielder of the thunderbolt, who sits in his awesome vimana, wearing a garland of lilies and lotuses. And the slayer of Bala gazes insatiably at his son on the battlefield below."

Vaisampayana said, “Partha, scion of the house of Kuru, looks at the Kuru army arrayed for battle and says to Virata’s son, ‘Ride at Kripa, son of Saradvata; approach the chariot whose flag flies the device of a golden altar from the south.’

At once, Uttara sets out, urging his silver-white horses protected by golden kavacha. Encouraging each of them to run faster and faster, he spurs those spirited, moon-silver steeds forward. As they near the Kuru legions, he expertly reins in his wind-swift steeds. The prince of the Matsyas skilfully wheels them around, making them go in circles and turning them to the left, bewildering the Kurus. Virata’s intrepid son finally makes a full circle and arrives near Kripa’s chariot; then he stops, facing the Brahmana.

Crying out his own name, Arjuna announces himself and blows a blast on the tremendous Devadatta. Blown on the field of battle by mighty Jishnu, the stentorian sound is like the roar of a mountain splitting. Amazed that the conch has not shattered with the force of Arjuna’s blowing, the Kurus and all their warriors begin to applaud it. The din reaches up into the sky and resounds there like a thunderbolt hurled at a mountain by Maghavat.

The fearless Maharatha Kripa is roused to fury by Arjuna; he cannot bear that sound and takes up his own conch-shell and blows it emphatically. Filling the three worlds with that sound, Kripacharya angrily pulls on the string of his enormous bow. Like two suns, the two warriors stand face to face in their chariots, turbulent as monsoon clouds.

In a flash, then, Saradvata's son Kripa pierces Partha Parantapa with ten light-swift arrows that can penetrate deep into the body. Pritha's son raises the celebrated Gandiva and shoots back a cataract of iron arrows. Kripa shreds Partha's blood-sucking deluge into slivers even as they fly at him.

Arjuna employs every manner of manoeuvre to spray arrows all around him. He fills the sky with them, does Pritha's son of fathomless soul, and cloaks Kripa in a night of dark arrows. Wounded and bleeding, Kripa roars out his rage and looses ten thousand calescent shafts at the noble Partha of the boundless might.

Arjuna responds by wounding Kripa's four horses with four searing arrows from the Gandiva: sharp, straight and golden-winged. Struck by these flame-hot shafts, his horses rear up and Kripa loses his balance. Seeing him stagger in his chariot, Arjuna suspends his onslaught out of respect for his old master; but Kripa quickly composes himself and shoots ten kanka-feathered arrows at Savyasachi, piercing him deep. Partha severs Kripa's bow and shreds his gloves with a crescent-tipped barb. With great care, so as not to injure him, he cuts away Kripa's coat of mail, with arrows that could pierce the heart beating in any man's body. Divested of armour, Kripa looks like a snake that has shed its skin.

As soon as he loses his bow to Partha's arrows, Kripa takes up a new one and strings it in a flash, but Arjuna breaks that one too. And the Pandava breaks all his opponent's bows, one after the other, as soon as the son of Saradvata takes them up.

When most of his bows are broken, Kripa casts his javelin at Arjuna like a thunderbolt. Even as the golden spear flares at him meteor-like, Arjuna cleaves it with ten shafts of iron.

Kripa seizes up another bow and smoothly looses a hundred arrows of curved flights at Arjuna; but Partha cuts these, also, into shards with just ten uncanny barbs. Infused with furious urjas on the battlefield, the son of Pritha shoots thirteen stone-sharpened arrows that are like flames. With one of these, he severs the yoke of his opponent's chariot; with four he bloodies his four steeds; with the sixth he beheads the charioteer; with three he shatters the triple bamboo axle of the chariot, and with two its wheels; his twelfth chops down the flagpole; and with the thirteenth, Phalguna, looking like Indra, and smiling disdainfully, pierces Kripa's chest.

With his bow riven, his chariot broken, his steeds slain and his charioteer killed, Kripa leaps down, quickly takes up a mace and hurls it at Arjuna; but Arjuna uses his miraculous arrows to send that heavy, gleaming weapon back to its source. Kripa's warriors attack Partha from all sides in an effort to rescue the son of Saradvata.

The son of Virata turns his horses to the left and drives in the circular yamaka fashion, holding all those warriors at bay. Those bulls among men lead the chariotless, helpless Kripa away from the dangerous Dhananjaya, the son of Kunti."

Vaisampayana said, "Now that Kripa has been rescued, invincible Drona takes up his bow with an arrow already notched and ready to fly; he charges Arjuna and his white horses with his own chestnuts.

Arjuna sees his Guru flying towards him on his golden chariot no great distance away and says to Uttara, 'Blessings on you, my young friend; take me before that warrior atop whose lofty banner you see a golden altar that looks like a tall flame, around which many flags fly, whose chariot is drawn by large and handsome chestnut horses, as well-trained, pleasant and docile as they are mighty, whose bodies are the colour of corals and their faces copper-hued. That warrior is Drona, whom I wish to fight.

This son of Bharadvaja is long-armed; he is irresistibly vigorous and illustrious; his prowess is celebrated across the three worlds; his mind is as brilliant as Usanas' and his knowledge of dharma as vast as Brihaspati's; he is well-versed in the four Vedas, and he is a chaste and devout Brahmachari. O my friend, he has mastered the loosing of devastras, as well as the mantras to withdraw them; indeed the science of weaponry, the very Astra Shastra, dwells within him. Forgiveness, self-control, truthfulness, abhorrence of causing injury and faultless conduct are some of the virtues of this Dvija. I would fight this most blest one on this field; so, Uttara, drive me to the Acharya.'

Virata's son urges his horses towards the chariot of Bharadvaja's son. At the same moment, Drona, too, plunges towards the onrushing Partha, like one enraged elephant charging another, and blows on his conch a blast that equals the sound of a hundred trumpets. At that sound, the whole army is agitated like a tempestuous sea.

Seeing those beautiful, red horses mingling in battle with Arjuna's swan-white ones, all racing swiftly as thoughts, those watching are wonderstruck. Seeing Drona, the guru, and his sishya Arjuna confront each other on the field of battle—both are magnificent—the Bhaarata host trembles.

Arjuna is full of joy when he reaches Drona's chariot, and he salutes his teacher. That Parantapa humbly and affectionately addresses Drona, 'We have completed our term of exile and now want to avenge the wrongs done to us. You who are invincible in battle, there is no need for you to be angry with us. O Anagha, I have no intention of striking you unless you strike me first. It is for you to decide.'

Drona promptly sends more than twenty arrows whistling at Arjuna, but the swift Partha cuts them off before they can reach him. Displaying awesome lightness of hand, the Acharya covers Arjuna's chariot with a thousand arrows, and to provoke Partha he cloaks his silvery white horses with kanka-feathered arrows. The battle between Drona and Kiriti erupts, with both Maharathas shooting arrows of blazing splendour at each other.

The two adversaries are renowned for their achievements; they are both as swift as the wind, masters of all the devastras and invested with extraordinary prowess. They loose clouds of fiery shafts at each other and stupefy the Kshatriyas who watch. All the warriors there are filled with wonder at the sight, and they give Drona a great accolade.

Those that stand there on the battlefield say to one another, 'Well done! Who except Phalguna is worthy of fighting Drona in battle? How stern the dharma of war is: Arjuna fights his own guru!'

Inflamed, inspired, neither mighty-armed hero gains any advantage, as each covers the other with arrows. His rage mounting, Bharadvaja's son draws his huge gold-plated bow and stabs Arjuna repeatedly with a flurry of arrows; he assails Arjuna's chariot with arrows so numerous and so dazzling that they dim the light of the Sun. That Brahmana Maharatha rains arrows on Arjuna like a cloudburst on a mountain, and pierces him with many.

The son of Pandu takes up his Gandiva, the supreme bow, and nonchalantly responds with variegated shafts and checks Drona's lethal deluge. All who watch are amazed. The handsome Savyasachi whirls about on his chariot, switching the Gandiva from one hand to the other, spraying his arrows on all sides simultaneously. They cover the sky in an expanse of dense shade, and Drona is invisible like the Sun hidden by fog. Shrouded by the golden arrows, Drona looks like a mountain on fire.

Seeing his chariot enveloped by Partha's archery, Drona, that jewel on the battlefield, bends his terrible bow that resounds like clashing clouds. It is a circle of flames as he draws it and lets fly a volley of crescented arrows; and the battlefield echoes with a sound like bamboo crackling in a forest fire.

Still, the smooth, golden-winged arrows of Arjuna's—he of unfathomable soul—choke the air on all sides and obscure the Sun. Planed smooth as mirrors and flighted with golden wings, the Pandava's shafts look like flocks of birds in the sky; while, touching each other, tip to end, Drona's arrows draw an unbroken line in the sky. The gilded arrows of the two splendid archers cover the heavens like a meteor shower, and surely the kanka-feathered ones look like rows of cranes coursing through the autumn sky.

The fierce and terrible encounter between Drona and Arjuna is like that ancient one between Vritrasura and Vasava. Drawing their bows into circles, loosing endless rills of missiles at each other, they are like elephants battling with lowered tusks. Enraged though they may be, those jewels of the battlefield fight strictly by the sacred laws of war, even while exhibiting their mastery over celestial weapons.

Arjuna resists his Acharya's astras with his own; the Pandava puts his marvellous skills on show: that most brilliant Kshatriya fills the air with a bounty of astras. The Acharya sees how fiercely and intently Arjuna fights, and he playfully fights back, in affection. The duel with unearthly weapons between Bharadvaja's son and Phalguna, those lions among men, each invincible to the other, is truly like the Devasura yuddha of old.

The son of Pandu repeatedly checks Drona's Aindra, Vayavya and Agneya astras with his own. The arrow-clouds of the two peerless archers cover the sky and cast a great shadow over the earth.

Arjuna's arrows fall on the hostile warriors like thunder and lightning, O Rajan. Elephants, chariots and horses are bathed in blood and look like kinsuka trees in full bloom. After the savage encounter between Arjuna and Drona, the spectacle of the field strewn with braceleted arms hewn off at the shoulder, other dissevered limbs, the crimsoned corpses of grandly attired rathikas, gilded armour stained scarlet, horsemen and foot-soldiers and banners cut down, sends waves of panic through the Kuru host.

Wielding their invincible bows, the two sublime archers pare each other's forces. Bharatarishabha, this dread duel between Drona and Kunti's son is akin to the one of yore between Bali and Vasava. Bows drawn into circles of light, they assail each other, staking their lives.

A voice from the sky applauds the Brahmana, 'Drona performs a difficult feat indeed as he fights the firm-handed Arjuna, crusher of foes, invincible bowman, conqueror of Devas and Daityas, greatest of all Maharathas.'

Drona is wonderstruck at Partha's infallible aim, his unflagging vigour, his swiftness and the formidable range of his missiles. O bull of the Bhaaratas, Partha looses a blizzard of arrows at his Acharya. Those who watch from the field applaud on seeing his arrows like locust-swarms, and exclaim, Excellent! So swift and continuous is the stream of arrows he unleashes that there is no space between them even for air, and the onlookers see his movements only as a blur.

Lightness of hand rules the duel. Arjuna now shoots his arrows ever more swiftly, and hundreds of thousands of them fall at once on Drona's chariot.

The Kuru forces watch Drona being hidden from view by Arjuna's arrows and set up a dismal wail. Maghavat and the Gandharvas and Apsaras who have come here cheer Partha's magic fleetness of hand.

Then the Acharya's son, Maharatha Aswatthama, confronts the Pandava with a large force of chariots, and despite his rage to see his father sorely embattled, is filled with admiration for the noble son of Pritha. He charges Arjuna and inundates him with a pralaya of arrows. Partha turns his horses towards Aswatthama, giving Drona an opportunity to escape. Wounded, bereft of armour and banner, Drona hastily leaves the field."

Vaisampayana said, "Now Drona's son thunders forward to meet Arjuna in battle. Seeing Aswatthama charge him, covering him in an arrow-storm and riding at him like a rain-charged hurricane, Arjuna greets his Acharya's son with a flash-flood of his own arrows.

Harrowing is the encounter between them, like that between the Devas and Asuras. They shoot at each other as Virata and Vasava once did, completely enclosing the sky with their shafts and hiding the Sun. The very air falls hushed; and as they strike each other, the explosions of their weapons ring out like dry bamboo stalks bursting in a raging fire. Rajan, Arjuna draws deep blood from Aswatthama's horses; they falter and drag his ratha about in a daze, weakly.

Partha is everywhere at once, but Drona's tremendous son lifts his archery and severs the bowstring of the Gandiva with a horseshoe-headed arrow. The Devas watch this incredible feat and cry, Well done! Well done! So, too, do Drona, Bhishma, Karna and the great Kripa excitedly applaud Aswatthama's deed. The Acharya's son draws his own superb bow round and, with kanka-feathered arrows, pierces his adversary, that bull among warriors, squarely through his chest.

But Partha Mahabaho only laughs and restrings the Gandiva in the twinkling of an eye. Moistening the new bowstring with sweat from his brow dark as the new moon, he rushes at his adversary, an infuriated bull of a great elephant herd charging another tusker.

The contention between the two refulgent warriors makes the onlookers' hair stand on end, and they watch in awe, in disbelief as the heroes fight on, calmly, fiercely. They fight on with fiery, hissing, snakelike arrows: narachas. The Pandava's two quivers are inexhaustible, and he dominates the field, immovable as a mountain. Aswatthama's arrows, discharged without let, are soon exhausted, and only so does Arjuna prevail.

Then Karna pulls on the string of his awesome bow with great force, sounding it like spring thunder, and the fighting men of the Kuru army tremble and cry out in fear. Pritha's son turns his gaze in the direction of that sound and sees Radheya. His anger ignites and the Pandava bull stares at Karna with death in his eyes.

Seeing Arjuna now turn away from Drona's son, O King, the Kuru warriors shoot thousands of arrows on him. But Mahabaho Dhananjaya just wheels away and, his eyes turning red as plums, makes a dash at Karna. Eager for single combat with him, the son of Kunti speaks to his inveterate enemy."

"Arjuna says, 'Karna, the time has come for you to make good the boast you made in the sabha, that you have no equal in battle. Today, Karna, you stand before me in battle; you will discover the limits of your prowess and never again be proud or dismissive. You abandoned good breeding and spoke brashly, but you will find it hard to translate your glib bragging into deeds. Radheya, you will fight me today before all the Kurus; let me see how you make good your lofty claims and all the insults you flung at me.

You will now face the consequences of exhorting evil men to outrage Panchali in the Kuru sabha. Fettered by dharma, I did not avenge her on that darkest of all my days. Today I will unleash my long withheld anger against you. Evil one, we suffered for twelve years in the forests; today you will reap the harvest of our vengeance. Come, Karna, face me in battle and let your Kaurava friends, my vile cousins, be witnesses to what I do to you.'

Karna replies, 'Partha, translate your boasts into deeds, if you dare. The world knows that your arrogance far exceeds your ability. It was not dharma but cowardice that prevented you from seeking revenge earlier. Prove yourself against me and we will acknowledge your prowess. If, as you claim, your forbearance was truly due to dharma, know that you are as bound by dharma today as you were before, although you consider yourself freed from that bond.

But how can you want to fight me, after living a vanaprastha's life for twelve years? Son of Pritha, even if Sakra fought at your side you would cause me no anxiety. Your wish is about to be fulfilled, Kaunteya. Fight me and you will see who the greater archer is and by how much.'

Arjuna replies, 'O Radheya, it is because you fled while fighting me that you are still alive. I have killed your younger brother. What other true warrior but you would flee from the battlefield after seeing his brother slain, and then boast, as you still do, before all these honourable men?'

With that, invincible Arjuna rides at Karna and discharges a salvo of barbs that can pierce any armour. But Maharatha Karna responds with alacrity and covers Partha in a lashing downpour of the keenest shafts. In the fierce duel that follows, arrows fly in tempests from every direction; they lacerate the combatants' arms and horses, and even shred each one's leathern gloves.

Arjuna severs Karna's bowstring but, undeterred, Karna takes up another one and draws blood from the Pandava's hand, loosening his grip on his bow. His rage stoked, Partha Mahabaho desiccates Karna's weapon in his very hands, so it falls to his feet in pieces. Karna picks up a javelin and casts it, like another Vajra, at his sworn enemy; but Arjuna carves it up with a sharp burst of arrows.

The forces that follow the son of Radha rush at Arjuna, who kills them all with deadly fire from the Gandiva. Drawing his bowstring to his ear, Bibhatsu fells Karna's horses with a refrain of rough-hewn arrows; and they drop to the ground, dead. The mighty Kaunteya strikes Karna's chest with a smoking shaft of untold vitality that pierces his armour and embeds itself deep in his body. Karna's vision blurs and he briefly faints. When he recovers, he is in great pain; without further ado, he flees the field and rides away, leaving Arjuna and Uttara looking after him in scorn."

Vaisampayana continued, "Having defeated Vikartana's son, Arjuna says to Uttara son of Virata, 'Take me towards that division where you see the flag with a golden palmyra tree. My godlike pitamaha, Bhishma, waits there, eager to meet me in battle.'

Uttara, who is badly wounded, sees the great host of chariots, elephants and horses and says, 'O Kshatriya, I can no longer steer your horses. My spirits droop and my mind is clouded. The power of the devastras that you and the Kurus have used makes the world spin before my eyes. The stench of blood and fat from wounded flesh makes my senses reel. The sights I see make my head ache in fear.

Never have I seen such a vast army of war-horses. The slapping of gauntlets, the raucous blare of conches, the roars of the warriors, the shrieking of elephants and the thunderous twang of the Gandiva stupefy me.

O Arjuna, my heart pounds and my vision fails me from watching you draw fiery circles with your blazing Gandiva. I am terrified by the sight of your dreadful arrows and your savage mien when you fight, so like an enraged Indra, even like Rudra wielder of the Pinaka.

I am blinded every time you take up an arrow, fix it to your bowstring and send it forth. Though I am here, my very senses desert me and I cannot see what you do. I wilt and the earth churns before me, leaving me too weak to even hold my whip and reins.'

Arjuna says, 'Do not be afraid; take heart. You have performed many wondrous feats in battle, O great Kshatriya. You are blessed that you are born into the royal house of the illustrious Matsyas. It does not become you to be downcast when punishing your foes. So, my prince, Parantapa, stay on my chariot, muster your courage and guide my horses once more into battle for me.'

Arjuna Maharatha speaks again to Virata's son and says, 'Take me now to the front of Bhishma's army, and I will sever his bowstring. Today you will see me shoot divine weapons of great wonder and beauty, that flash like lightning amidst dark clouds.

Today the Kauravas will see my gold-backed Gandiva and they will argue about which hand I use—right or left—to shoot my arrows. Today I will create a hideous river to the netherworld; blood will be its waters, chariots its eddies and elephants its crocodiles. Today I will strip the Kuru forest of its branches by hewing off heads, arms and legs, by shredding mighty chests and muscle-rippling backs.

Alone, bow in hand, a hundred paths will open before me as I raze the Kurus. Today you will see the Kuru army beset by me, whirling in a blood-drenched spiral. Today I will show you my true skill at archery. Be the ground rough or smooth, stay firm on the chariot, for my winged arrows can pierce even Mount Sumeru that reaches up into Swarga.

Once, at Indra's behest, I killed hundreds and thousands of Paulomas and Kalakhanjas, and from him I have inherited my steadfast grasp of my bow. My lightness of hand comes from Prajapati Brahma, and from him I have learnt the tactics of attack and defence when surrounded by enemy forces. On the other side of the great ocean, I defeated sixty thousand chariot mounted warriors—all fierce archers from Hiranyapura.

Today I will vanquish the multitude of the Kuru host as easily as a tempest would blow away a pile of cotton. My fiery arrows will set the Kuru forest aflame, its banners the trees, its infantry the shrubs, its chariot-warriors the wild animals. Just as the wielder of the thunderbolt crushed the Danavas, I will bring the Kuru Maharathas down from their chariots.

In addition to my other weapons, I have obtained the Raudra from Rudra, the Varuna from Varuna, the Agneya from Agni, the Vayavya from Vayu and the Vajra from Sakra. Despite all the great warriors that protect it, I will bring the Dhartarashtra force to its knees. O son of Virata, do not be afraid.'

Thus assured by Savyasachi, prince Uttara penetrates that indomitable array of rathas protected by Bhishma. The illustrious son of Ganga, he of the fierce deeds, however, easily withstands the mighty-armed and relentless Kshatriya. Arjuna confronts Bhishma and, with a magic golden shaft, cuts down his standard, severing it cleanly at its base; and the flag bearing the golden palmyra crashes to the ground.

At this, four great Kauravas, Dussasana, Vikarna, Dussaha and Vivimsati—all of them masters in the use of astras, all decked in beautiful garlands and jewellery—charge towards that fearful bowman and surround hm. Dussasana pierces Uttara with a crescent-tipped arrow and also draws blood from Arjuna's chest. Partha shatters Dussasana's gilded bow with a vulture-feathered shaft, and he bloodies the most bestial Kaurava's hirsute chest with five more.

He cannot withstand the terrible Arjuna, and Dussasana flees the fight; swiftly, his brother Vikarna attacks the raging Pandava with a slew of his own vulture-winged shafts. But the son of Kunti stuns him with a thick, blunt shaft that strikes his head, and Vikarna falls out of his chariot. Dussaha, supported by Vivimsati, smothers Arjuna with a cloud of shining arrows.

Unperturbed, Dhananjaya strikes both of them, simultaneously, with two flashing darts and kills their horses immediately after. Chariotless and bleeding, those sons of Dhritarashtra are spirited away in his chariot by another Kaurava who dashes up to rescue them, with a host of other chariots.

Wearing his crown, the undefeated Bibhatsu, son of Kunti, continues to assail the enemy from every side with his supernal archery."

Vaisampayana said, "Then, O Bhaarata, all the Maharathas of the Kurus unite; they surround Arjuna and put forth all their might to subdue him. But he of the fathomless soul envelops them all in a fog of arrows, as mist covers the mountains. The trumpeting of enormous elephants and the booming of conch-shells mingle into deafening bedlam.

Partha's arrows fly in their thousands, piercing elephants and horses, as well as steely coats of mail. With incendiary archery, Pandu's son appears to vie with the midday Sun in brilliance.

Terror-stricken warriors leap from chariots and horseback, foot-soldiers flee helter-skelter. All the while, the air reverberates with the deadly clamour of Arjuna's arrows as they bore through armour of steel, silver and copper, and in a short time the field is littered with the corpses of elephant-warriors and horsemen, mangled by hissing serpentine shafts from the Pandava's bow. It is as if Dhananjaya, bow in hand, dances on the field of battle even like Siva at his Tandava.

Terror-struck by the thunderous twang of the Gandiva, many soldiers run from the stained field strewn with severed heads—some turbaned, some with earrings and necklaces of gold. Torsos, butchered by arrows, litter the ground, as well as torn limbs decked in ornaments, some still holding weapons in dead hands.

The Earth looks spectrally beautiful. O Bull of the Bhaaratas, heads sliced off by Arjuna fall in showers like meteors from the sky. And menacing, formidable Partha ranges the field spewing the fire of his anger over the sons of Dhritarashtra.

Seeing how Arjuna scorches the enemy, the Kuru warriors lose all courage and stop fighting, although they are in Duryodhana's presence; while Arjuna, who has succeeded in terrorising the Kuru host and routing its Maharathas, one by one, continues to wreak havoc.

The son of Pandu creates a ghastly river of blood with rolling waves, quite like the river of death that time creates at the end of a yuga. This blood-river has the dishevelled hair of the dead and dying for its weeds, bows and arrows as its boats, and the flesh and the dying tissues of animals for its mud. Coats of mail and helmets float thick on its surface; it bears elephants instead of crocodiles, and chariots are its rafts; marrow, fat and blood form its foam; and it strikes abject fear into the hearts of those who look at it.

Hideous, horrible, and rippling with the howling of wild carrion-eaters, the scarlet river floats keen-edged weapons menacingly like crocodiles. Rakshasas and Pisachas stalk its banks from end to end. Strings of pearls form its beads of froth and other gemstones its sparkling bubbles. With clutches of arrows for eddies and horses for its tortoises, that river is unfordable. The great Kuru Maharathas form the large island in the ruddy stream, island that echoes with the blast of conches and the boom of drumbeats.

Thus does Partha create an uncrossable river of blood, river of death. So swift is he that no one discerns his taking up an arrow, notching it to his bowstring, drawing the string and loosing the shaft from the Gandiva as separate movements."

Vaisampayana said, "Duryodhana and Karna, Dussasana and Vivimsati, Kripa, Drona and his son charge Arjuna with their bows bent, determined to kill him. Great king, Arjuna rides forward to meet their attack from his glittering chariot. Kripa, Karna and Maharatha Drona are the clouds that rain arrows on Dhananjaya. Keeping their distance, they cover his body with their arrows, so there is not even a two-digit space left unpierced on him.

Bibhatsu smiles unperturbed and sets the shimmering Aindrastra to the Gandiva. Sunlike, he stands wearing his crown on the battlefield and, like the Sun's rays, covers it with arrows. As lightning flashes in a stormy sky, as a flame flares in a rock cleft, the Gandiva flashes, glorious as the Indradhanush, the rainbow.

Like a thunderhead roaring and lashing down rain to soak the ground, the resonance of the Gandiva and the arrows that fly from it fill the air; and all the Kuru rathikas want to flee. Confusion and dismay strike the hitherto calm foot-soldiers; and despair spreads among those broken men who lose all hope of living."

Vaisampayana said, "From the midst of the havoc amongst the devastated Kurus, Shantanu's son Bhishma, Pitama of the Bhaaratas, rushes at Arjuna with his golden bow and strikes him with scorching clutches of arrows. With his white parasol unfurled above him, Bhishma Purushavyaghra is full of deep splendour; he is as radiant as the Sun rising over the mountains. The son of Ganga blows his conch to cheer Dhritarashtra's sons, then wheels to his right to confront Arjuna.

The heroic son of Kunti sees him coming and receives him joyfully, as a mountain welcomes a rain-filled cloud. But Bhishma of boundless might cuts down Partha's flagstaff with eight arrows. These arrows flare on to reach the banner and strike the Vanara and the other creatures perched resplendently on it.

Pandu's son fells Bhishma's regal parasol with a great javelin, and it falls onto the earth. Kunti's son of the light hands strikes his grandsire's flagstaff, his horses and the two chariot-warriors who protect Bhishma's flanks.

Bhishma cannot bear Arjuna's onslaught and envelops him in a devastra. The Pandava of the deep soul invokes another divine weapon against Bhishma at the same time as he receives Bhishma's missile of enchantment lightly, as a mountain wears a cloud. Relentless is the duel that ensues between Partha and Bhishma, and the Kaurava troops and warriors stand by watching in thrall. Arrows meet arrows and glimmer in the air like fireflies of the monsoon.

O Rajan, bent by the ambidextrous Partha, the Gandiva is a hoop of fire as the Pandava's missiles flow from it in a ceaseless stream. The son of Kunti covers Bhishma with a thousand shafts and Bhishma contains the cascade with his own astras, just as its shore does a swollen sea; he batters the Pandava with a fierce torrent in return. Shards of splintered arrows rain down around Phalguna's chariot, whilst the Pandava's golden-winged barbs swarm thickly from his bow like locusts. Bhishma deflects his grandchild's deadly shower with a thousand stone-whetted arrows.

The Kauravas shout Excellent! Well done! and applaud Bhishma's marvellous feats as the Pitamaha battles great Dhananjaya who is young, powerful, swift and dexterous. Who but Bhishma son of Shantanu, Devaki's son Krishna and Bharadvaja's son Drona, greatest among Acharyas, can withstand Partha in battle?

Countering astras with other astras, the two Bharatarishabhas, both astoundingly strong, fight as if they are at play, delighting all those who watch them. These two warriors flit here and there at will across the battlefield, wielding unearthly weapons given to them by Prajapati and Indra, Agni, Rudra and Kubera, Varuna, Yama and Vayu. All are wonderstruck by the contention between the illustrious twain, and they shout, Partha Mahabaho! Ah, Bhishma! So rare and awesome is the display of devastras that Bhishma and Partha invoke.

The duel between the two, both masters of all the astras, rages on as if it will never end. When they have exhausted the divine astras, they take up their bows and arrows once more. Now Arjuna flies at his Pitamaha and rives Bhishma's gold-covered bow with a razor sharp arrow, but without a moment's pause Mahabaho Devavrata takes up another and strings it.

In a flash the seething Bhishma casts a cupola of arrows over Dhananjaya; the tireless Pandava pierces the crafty dome at all the right points with a flurry of impossible accuracy. Again, Bhishma aims a ferocity of arrows at Pandu's son. Great king, no distinction can be made between those two noblest Kshatriyas as they fight, both masters of mundane and divine weapons.

The ten cardinal points of the sky are obscured by the arrows of Kiriti and the son of Shantanu, as each repeatedly attempts to smother his adversary with shafts of fire and water, wind and sky. O king, it is past belief that this most wonderful duel is fought in this world of mortals.

Arjuna savagely cuts down the warriors who protect Bhishma's chariot. The Pandava's shafts flare from the Gandiva in all directions, as if they themselves want to slaughter the enemy indiscriminately. As they fly from his chariot, his enchanted barbs with golden wings look like a flight of unworldly swans in the sky. Indra and the Devas watch in wonder from the heavens as Arjuna, amazing archer, invokes yet another devastra.

A joyful Chitrasena sees the supreme Gandiva and says to Indra, 'Look how these arrows of Partha's course through the skies in an unbroken line! Dazzling is Jishnu's skill with this divine bow. It is beyond the power of any other mortal to wield the Gandiva; no other weapon like it exists on Earth. Wondrous and formidable is Arjuna's arsenal of ancient weapons. His movements are so swift that no gap of time or space can be discerned as he takes an arrow, fixes it to his gleaming bow and releases it from the bowstring drawn back to his ear.

The Kuru soldiers are blinded by the brilliance of the son of Pandu who blazes like the Sun at high noon. Neither does anyone try to gaze upon Bhishma, the son of Ganga. Both are celebrated for their achievements; both are powerful; both are equal in their heroic feats, and both are impossible to quell in battle.'

Upon hearing the Gandharva extol Partha and Bhishma, the king of the Devas showers divine blooms of petals of light over them.

Bhishma attacks Arjuna from his left flank. Laughing in delight at the sublime duel, Bibhatsu shatters Bhishma's bow with another vulture-feathered arrow and, although Bhishma fights as fiercely as he can, the Kaunteya pierces his chest with ten more whining shafts. Sorely wounded by these, pain lancing through him, Ganga's hitherto undefeated son staggers and has to lean against his chariot post. Then Bhishma swoons and, knowing what he must to save his warrior's life, his charioteer swiftly bears him away to safety."

Vaisampayana said, “When Bhishma leaves the battle, Duryodhana hoists his flag high and comes roaring at Arjuna. He bends his bow into a circle and shoots Arjuna squarely through his forehead with a spear-headed shaft. With the arrow embedded in his brow, that Kshatriya looks strange and splendid, O Rajan, somehow like a lone mountain peak. Warm blood gushes from the wound and flows shining down his body like a mala of kinsuka flowers.

Arjuna’s rage billows up, and he pierces Suyodhana with clutch after clutch of hissing shafts. A duel erupts between Duryodhana and Partha, first among Kshatriyas, both Purushottamas. Both are born into the Ajamida race; both are formidable; and they attack holding nothing back.

Riding an enormous elephant, with four chariots around him in support, Vikarna also charges Arjuna. Dhananjaya sees the elephant lumbering at him and strikes it between its temples with a blistering arrow. Like a thunderbolt cast by Indra, that barb buries itself to its feathers in the mountainous creature’s head. The mastodon trembles in agony and, its knees buckling, crashes down onto the ground, its head riven like a mountain summit by the Vajra. When his great beast falls, Vikarna jumps off its back and runs some eight hundred paces in moments, to clamber onto Vivimsati’s ratha.

After he kills the elephant, Partha strikes Duryodhana in his chest with another lightning streak of an arrow, drawing a font of his cousin’s blood.

When they see the elephant slain and Duryodhana wounded, all the surrounding warriors, already bleeding from wounds inflicted by the Gandiva, lose their nerve and run in panic, following Vikarna and the Kuru king's bodyguard. And Duryodhana Kurusthama, seeing them go, turns his chariot around and speeds away from the terrible Partha.

He is sorely wounded and vomits blood as he flees, but Kiriti, his battle-lust undiminished, calls after him in anger, 'Why do you sacrifice your honour and glory? Why do you run away? Why don't you sound your trumpets now, as you did when you set out from your kingdom? I, who obey Yudhishtira, am the third son of Pritha; and I stand here ready to do battle.

Do not abandon Kshatriya Dharma; turn and face me, O son of Dhritarashtra. Your name Duryodhana has no meaning left. Where is your famous ferocity and fortitude that you run from battle? I do not see your bodyguards, Duryodhana, in front of you or behind. Go, great man, fly; save your precious life, coward, or this Pandava will take it!' "

Vaisampayana continued, "Stung deeper than arrows by the searing insult, Duryodhana turns back like an elephant prodded by a goad, like a snake trodden on.

A broad golden necklace shimmering upon his great chest, Karna sees Duryodhana turn back and prevents him from going to certain death. After soothing his beloved friend, Karna himself swings his ratha round to face north, and Partha, in battle. A recovered Bhishma also turns his great tawny horses round and, bow raised, rushes to protect Duryodhana from the fearsome Pandava. Drona, Kripa, Vivimsati, Dussasana and others turn back as well and, bows drawn, ride to defend Duryodhana.

Pritha's son Dhananjaya sees these warriors and their legions flash towards him in a tide and he rushes eagerly at them, as a crane to a rain-charged cloud. Arjuna is quickly surrounded by Maharathas, all armed with devastras.

They scathe him with a torrent of arrows, like clouds lashing a mountain's crest with rain. Arjuna cuts down every last shaft in flight, and then invokes an inexorable weapon against the Kuru bulls, the Sammohana which he got from Indra, an astra of sleep.

Covering all the cardinal points of the sky with his gorgeously-feathered arrows, the great Pandava pulls violently on his bowstring, stunning his enemies. Partha take up his Devadatta in both hands, and he blows it with such force that the sound fills the skies and echoes in the far corners of the Earth. The Kuru heroes are stupefied and stand entranced from the enchantment of the Sammohana, still holding their bows, which hang limply from nerveless hands.

Seeing the transfixed Kuru army, Partha remembers princess Uttaraa's request and says to her brother, his sarathy, 'Purushottama, go amongst the Kurus while they are still frozen in trance and bring me Drona and Kripa's white silk scarves; bring Karna's beautiful golden one and the blue ones of Duryodhana and Aswatthama. I suspect that Bhishma is not under the astra's spell, for he knows how to repel the power of Sammohana. So pass him by, keeping his horses on your left, for you must avoid any great warrior who is awake.'

The Matsya prince promptly drops his reins, jumps down from the chariot and does what Arjuna asks. He returns with the warriors' silks and takes up the reins of his silver horses again, flicking them lightly over the white steeds' necks, and bearing Arjuna away from the battlefield, beyond the footsoldiers and standard-bearers.

Bhishma sees the Pandava go and strikes him with a flock of arrows, but Partha kills his Pitama's horses and sarathy in a flash and pierces the old warrior with ten vicious shafts. Leaving Bhishma helpless on the field, Arjuna bursts out from the multitude of chariots with the beautiful bow in his hands, surely like the Sun breaking out from behind dark clouds.

Duryodhana wakes from his trance and, seeing Partha riding away at his leisure, as majestic as the king of the Devas, says to Bhishma, 'How did he pass you, Pitama? Attack him; he must not escape!'

Shantanu's son smiles and says, 'Did you lose good sense as well as your strength and weapons whilst you were unconscious? Bibhatsu is not addicted to killing, nor does his soul incline towards sin. He will not violate his dharma even to gain the three worlds, and only because of this are all of us still alive.

Duryodhana, return to your city and let Arjuna go with the herds he has taken back from us. Do not be foolish and disregard what is good for you. Indeed, a man must always keep his own welfare in mind.'

Listening to his grandsire, Duryodhana quickly loses his hunger for battle. He sighs and falls silent. Meanwhile, the other warriors all awaken, one by one, and ponder Bhishma's counsel; they see the wisdom in it and that Arjuna is indomitable and, wanting to protect Duryodhana, decide to turn home.

Arjuna happily watches the Kuru warriors leave; he makes the Matsya prince turn his chariot around and follows them: he wants to pay his respects and speak to them. He honours and worships his Pitama Bhishma and his Acharya Drona with a salvo of beautiful arrows that fall at their feet; he also salutes Aswatthama, Kripa and the other Maharathas. Then, with a final arrow, the son of Pritha breaks Duryodhana's haughty, jewelled crown into pieces.

Having paid his homage to those he reveres and having humiliated his cousin he despises, he fills the three worlds once more with the reverberant twang of the Gandiva. He blows the Devadatta, and the sound pierces the hearts of all his enemies. Having humbled them all, he stands resplendent on the chariot flying the banner which mighty Hanuman adorns.

As the Kurus ride away, Arjuna says to Uttara, 'Turn back your horses. We have recovered your herds, the enemy has retreated, and you can ride home happily to your city.'

The Devas, who have witnessed the astounding encounter between the lone Phalguna and all the Kurus, also turn their invisible vimanas homewards and return to their ethereal abodes. Arjuna's feats are imprinted on their lustrous hearts."

Vaisampayana said, “Having vanquished the Kurus in battle, he with the eyes of a bull is taking the valuable Matsya herd back to Virata when he sees some wounded soldiers of Dhritarashtra’s routed army coming out of the forest. They are terrified when they see Partha; and they stand before him with folded hands, their hair dishevelled, exhausted with hunger and thirst. Confused and afraid, for they are in a strange land, they bow down before Partha and say, ‘We are your slaves.’

Arjuna says, ‘Welcome, and may you be blessed. Go your way, you have nothing to fear from me. I will not take the lives of the injured. You have my protection.’

The band of soldiers greets this with salutations and they sing praises of his achievements and fame, and bless him with long life. The Kauravas cannot face Arjuna while he is on his way back to the city of Virata; he is like an elephant with rent temples. He has scattered the Kuru army like a gale does fleecy clouds.

Partha, slayer of foes, thoughtfully says to the prince of Matsya, ‘You are the only one who knows that the sons of Pritha live in your father’s kingdom. Do not speak of them or praise them when you enter the city, for the king himself may hide in fear. Instead, in your father’s presence proclaim the defeat of the Kurus as your own doing. Say to him, “I have vanquished the Kurus and recovered our cattle.”

Uttara says, ‘What you have done is beyond my power; I could never achieve it. But if you command me, I will not expose you to my father for as long as you forbid it, O Savyasachi.’

After he has vanquished the hostile Kurus and retrieved the precious herds from them, Arjuna goes back to the sami tree in the smasana and stands before it, his body wounded by enemy arrows. In a flash of light, the monkey on his banner flies up into the sky and vanishes, along with the other supernatural creatures on the magical flagstaff; the illusion created by Visvakarma melts away, leaving prince Uttara’s own banner, bearing the device of a lion, on the chariot once more. The Matsya prince fastens the Pandavas’ arrows and quivers back in the tree, along with the matchless Gandiva. With Arjuna for his charioteer again, he rides towards his city in joy.

Having accomplished the stupendous rout of the enemy, Partha braids his hair as before, takes the reins from Uttara, and that glorious one will enter the city of Virata as Uttara’s sarathy Brihannala. Meanwhile, the defeated and dejected Kurus are well on their way back to Hastinapura.

On the way back to Virata’s city, Arjuna says to Uttara, ‘O Kshatriya, Mahabaho, send the cowherds with the cattle in advance, and we will enter the city in the afternoon after bathing our horses and giving them water to drink. Tell the cowherds to go speedily and proclaim the good news of your victory.’

Uttara commands the messengers, saying, ‘The enemy has been routed and the cattle have been recovered. Go and proclaim the king’s victory.’

Thus, well pleased with their victory, having restored the Pandavas’ weapons to the sami tree, having put on the garments and ornaments they left there, the two Kshatriyas triumphally ride into the city of Virata: the heroic son of Virata with Brihannala as his charioteer.”

Vaisampayana said, "Meanwhile, that morning, his wealth recovered and his own vast forces intact, Virata himself enters his city accompanied by the four still disguised Pandavas. The king and the sons of Pritha bask splendid in glory after shaming the Trigartas in battle and recovering all the Matsya herds. When Virata, enhancer of the joy of his friends, is seated on his throne, his subjects led by Brahmanas come before him. They adulate him, and happily he acknowledges their adoration and dismisses them.

Virata of the Matsyas asks where Uttara is. With some pride and pleasure, the royal women and young girls of the palace and the other women of the antahpura say, 'The Kurus came from the north and took the rest of our herds. Valiant prince Uttara rode against them alone, with Brihannala for his sarathy. He has gone to vanquish the six Maharathas who have come with the Kuru army—Shantanu's son Bhishma, Kripa, Karna, Duryodhana, Drona and Drona's son Aswatthama.'

Virata is filled with dread. He says nervously to his ministers, as if to console himself, 'I am sure that the Kauravas will turn back once they learn that the Trigartas have been defeated. But let my warriors who were not wounded by the Trigartas take a great force out to protect Uttara. Let them go at once.'

A vast army of horses, elephants, chariots and a teeming legion of foot-soldiers, equipped with all kinds of weapons, is mustered without delay, and ready to go forth against the Kurus. They await their king's command.

A trembling Virata says, 'Go at once to my child. With a eunuch for his charioteer, I fear he may not be alive.'

Kanka, the king's dice-player, smiles and says to the distressed Virata, 'If, O King, Brihannala is his charioteer, the enemy will not escape with your cattle. If Brihannala protects him, your son will vanquish the Kurus today, even if they come with all the lords of the Earth, and even the Devas, the Asuras, the Siddhas and the Yakshas together.'

Just then, the swift dutas despatched by Uttara arrive in Virata's city with their joyful tidings. His chief minister quickly brings the amazing news to Virata in his court. He says, 'It is passing strange, but all our cattle have been rescued, the awesome Kurus defeated and prince Uttara, scourge of our foes, is well, and also his charioteer Brihannala.'

Yudhishtira says, 'These are happy tidings that the herds have been recovered and the Kuru army routed, but I do not find it strange that your son defeated the Kurus, for Brihannala was his charioteer.'

The hair on Virata's body stands on end in unbridled joy to hear of his son's incredible feat. He makes gifts of clothes to the messengers and issues orders to his ministers.

He says, 'Let our highways be lined with flags; let all the gods and goddesses be worshipped with offerings of flowers. Let princes, warriors, musicians and dancing-girls decked in jewels go out to receive my son. Let the bell-ringer go out on a swift elephant and proclaim Uttara's victory at every crossroad. Let Uttaraa put on her finest robes and, surrounding herself with maidens, musicians and singers of eulogies, go out to receive my heroic son.'

Beside themselves with excitement, all the people go to welcome Uttara, of the boundless prowess—some with auspicious gifts in their hands, many with cymbals, trumpets and conches, beautiful women in gorgeous attire, encomiasts and chanters of hymns along with minstrels, drummers and other musicians.

Having sent out his army, as well as maidens and bejewelled courtesans, to welcome his son home, the overjoyed monarch of the Matsyas says, 'Sairandhri, fetch the dice. Come Kanka, let us play.'

Kanka says, 'They say that one whose heart is overflowing with joy should not play against a cunning gambler. Therefore I would rather not gamble with you for you are in a transport of joy and as I am always conscious of your welfare. However, if that is what you truly want, let us play.'

Virata says, 'Even if we do not gamble, you cannot be protecting my women, my cattle, my gold and all my wealth.'

Kanka replies, 'O king, bestower of honours, why do you want to gamble when it is fraught with evil? It should be shunned. You might have seen or at least heard of Yudhishtira, the son of Pandu. He lost his vast, prosperous kingdom and his godlike brothers at dice. That is why I am averse to the game; but if it is your wish, Rajan, I will play.'

While they play, the Matsya king says to the Pandava, 'Ah, my son has vanquished the formidable Kauravas in battle.'

To which the illustrious Yudhishtira says, 'And why should he not, when Brihannala was his charioteer?'

This cuts the Matsya king to the quick, and he cries, 'Wretch of a Brahmana! Dare you compare a eunuch to my son? Do you know nothing of what to say to your king, that you insult me so? Why should my son not vanquish all the Kurus led by Bhishma and Drona? Brahmana, it is only because of our friendship that I forgive you. But if you want to live, never speak such words to me again.'

But Yudhishtira says, 'Who other than Brihannala can fight a force consisting of Bhishma, Drona, Drona's son, the son of Surya, Kripa, Duryodhana, other Maharathas and, indeed, if the need arises, Indra himself surrounded by the Maruts? None has been, nor ever will be, his equal in prowess. Only Brihannala's heart fills with joy at the prospect of a terrible battle. He vanquished the Devas, the Asuras and Manavas. With such an ally, why should your son not conquer the enemy?'

Virata growls, 'Though I warned you, vile Kanka, you don't care to hold your tongue. If there is no punishment, no one would practise virtue.'

And the enraged king flings his heavy dice in Yudhishtira's face. 'Let this not happen again!' he thunders.

Yudhishtira's nose bleeds from being struck, but he contains the blood in his hands before it falls to the ground. He glances meaningly at Draupadi who stands at his side. Immediately understanding him, she brings a golden vessel filled with water to catch the blood that flows from his nose.

Meanwhile, Uttara enters the city being feted with sweet perfumes and flower garlands by the Matsyas, their women and even people from the provinces. As he nears the gate of the palace he sends word of his arrival to his father.

The gatekeeper goes to the king and says, 'Your son Uttara is at the gate with Brihannala.'

The joyful Matsya king rises and says to him, 'Show them both in, ah, I am impatient to see them!'

Yudhishtira takes the dwarapalaka aside and whispers, 'Let Uttara enter alone; Brihannala must not come in yet. That Mahabaho has sworn a vow that whoever wounds me or sheds my blood, other than in battle, will not live. He will be enraged to see me bleeding and will kill Virata, even in the presence of his guards and ministers.'

Bhuminjaya enters and, having worshipped the feet of his father, approaches Kanka. He sees him seated in a corner of the sabha, bleeding, and waited upon by the sairandhri.

Uttara asks his father, 'O Rajan, who struck him? Who did this sinful thing?'

Virata says, 'I struck the devious Brahmana, and he deserves further punishment, for while I was praising you, he dared praise the eunuch.'

Uttara says, 'My lord, you have sinned gravely. You must appease him at once so the venom of a Brahmana's curse does not consume you.'

Calming down, his heart brimming over to receive his triumphant son, Virata turns to soothe Kanka the gambler, Yudhishtira like a fire hidden in ashes, and begs his forgiveness.

The Pandava replies, 'My lord, I was never angry that I need to forgive you. I was only worried because if blood from my nose fell on the ground, you and all your kingdom would have burned. Rajan, I do not blame you for having struck me, for those with great power sometimes succumb to unreasonable anger.'

When the bleeding has stopped, Brihannala enters the sabha. He greets Virata and Kanka and stands silent. Having appeased his gambler, Virata begins to sing the praises of his son Uttara in Savyasachi's hearing.

The Matsya king says, 'O you who gives the Kekaya princess so much joy, in you I truly have a son! I never had, nor shall have, another son who is your equal. My child, how did you do battle with the great Karna, whose aim is so unerring that he strikes every one of a thousand targets at once? How did you contend with Bhishma, who has no equal in the world of men? How did you fight Drona, that foremost of all wielders of weapons, the Acharya of the Vrishnis and Kauravas, the Dvija who is seen as the preceptor of all Kshatriyas? How did you withstand the celebrated Aswatthama? How did you fight Duryodhana, who can pierce a mountain with his arrows?

My foes have all been destroyed and a delicious breeze seems to waft around me. And when you recovered my wealth which the Kurus stole, it seems that all those Maharathas were struck with panic. Without doubt, Purusharishabha, you have routed the enemy single-handedly and snatched the wealth that is my herds from them like his prey from a tiger.' ”

"Uttara says, 'It is not I who retrieved the cattle and vanquished the Kurus. All this was done by the son of a Deva. That divine youth saw me running away in fear when I saw the fearsome Kuru army; he stopped me and himself mounted my chariot, making me his sarathy. It was he who put the Kauravas to rout and recovered the cattle. This incredible deed, father, is that hero's and not mine.

It was his arrows that repulsed Kripa, Drona, the Acharya's powerful son, the Sutaputra Karna and Bhishma. He it was who said to the terrified Duryodhana who fled like the leader of a herd of elephants, "O prince of Kurus, you will not be safe even in Hastinapura. Do all you can to protect yourself, because you will not escape me by fleeing. Prepare to fight. If you win, you will be sovereign of the entire Earth; if you lose, it is Swarga you will gain."

Hissing like a snake, and surrounded by his Maharathas, Duryodhana turned back to fight. He shot arrows like thunderbolts, and my legs trembled at the sight, respected father. Then, that heavenly youth raised his unearthly bow and sprayed the Kuru army of chariots and brave warriors with his divine arrows. He transfixed that throng of Maharathas with an astra of sleep, and that lionish, irradiant youth laughed as he robbed them of silks of different hues.

Indeed, the six greatest rathikas of the Kurus were vanquished by that hero alone, like a whole herd of deer in a forest falling prey to one ferocious tiger.'

Virata says, 'Where is this mighty-armed youth of celestial origin, this hero who recaptured my wealth from the Kurus? I am agog to see him and pay my homage to that mighty warrior, for has he not saved you as well as my herds?'

Uttara replies, 'The Devaputra vanished immediately. I believe, however, that he will show himself either tomorrow or the day after.'

Virata remains ignorant of the Pandava whom Uttara describes to him, and who lives in his very palace in disguise.

With the noble Virata's leave, Partha gives with his own hands the Kuru silks he has brought to Virata's daughter, and the lovely Uttaraa and her sakhis are delighted with the fine and brilliant cloths with which they make clothes for their dolls."

VAIVAHIKA PARVA

Vaisampayana said, "Three days later, at dawn, the five Pandavas bathe, clothe themselves in royal white robes, put on their ornaments, and enter Virata's palace with Yudhishtira at their head, looking as splendid as five fierce elephants. They walk into Virata's sabha, seat themselves on thrones reserved for kings, and they look like five sacrificial flames ablaze upon an altar.

In a while, Virata comes into the sabha to hold court; he sees the brothers in their splendour and stops short.

Angrily, he addresses Kanka who sits on the Matsya king's throne like a god, like Indra surrounded by Maruts. He says, 'I employed you as a courtier, a player of dice. How dare you sit on my throne wearing white silk and ornaments?'

Arjuna smiles and says, 'O king, this man is worthy of sharing a throne with Indra himself. He reveres Brahmanas, is well-read in the Vedas and indifferent to luxury and pleasures of the flesh. He performs sacrifices, is firm in his vows and, indeed, he is the embodiment of dharma. He is the very best among all men of power, more intelligent than anyone in the world, devout in his observance of ascetic rites and a master of all weapons. In fact, he knows more about astras than anyone else does, or ever will, in the three Lokas.

There is no one like him even amongst the Devas, Asuras, Manavas, Rakshasas, Gandharvas, Yakshas, Kinnaras and Uragas. He is blessed with foresight and vitality, and he is much loved by all the people both in the cities and villages. He is the Adiratha, the best chariot-warrior, among the sons of Pandu. He is the Yajaman at countless sacrifices, a man of piety and self-control.

Like the greatest sage, this saintly king is celebrated across the three worlds. He is strong, brilliant, capable, truthful and has his senses under perfect control. He is as wealthy as Indra and has amassed as much treasure as Kubera; he is as mighty a protector of the three worlds as the powerful Manu.

This great man who is as compassionate as he is powerful is none other than that bull of the Kurus, Dharmaraja Yudhishtira.

This king's achievements are like the Sun in brilliance; his fame has travelled over the world even like the rays of the Sun; and, as sunbeams follow the rising Sun, ten thousand elephants and thirty thousand chariots and carriages adorned with the purest gold and drawn by the noblest horses followed him when he lived amongst the Kurus. Eight hundred vabdhis and magadhis, wearing earrings set with shining gemstones, accompanied by minstrels, chanted his praises in those days, even as the Rishis sing in praise of Indra.

And, O Virata, the Kauravas and other lords of the Earth waited upon him like slaves, just as the Yakshas do on Kubera. This great king, who is as glorious as Surya at his zenith, once received tribute from all the lords of the Earth as if they were tenant farmers.

Eighty-eight thousand chaste Snatakas depended on him for their subsistence while they observed stern and lofty vows. This illustrious king of kings took care of the old, the helpless, the crippled and the blind as if they were his children, and he ruled justly over his subjects. Unflinching in dharma and self-control, keeping anger on a tight leash, generous, dedicated to Brahmanas, respectful and truthful, he is the eldest son of Pandu.

His prosperity and power inflamed the minds of Suyodhana and his followers, Karna and Subala's son Sakuni. O lord of men, the virtues of this man cannot be enumerated. This son of Pandu is ever virtuous and never does harm. Possessing such qualities, O Virata, is this bull among kings not worthy of a royal seat?' "

"Virata says, 'If this is, indeed, the Kuru king Yudhishtira Kuntiputra, which amongst these is his brother Arjuna, and which the mighty Bhima? Which of these is Nakula, which is Sahadeva, and where is the celebrated Draupadi? After their defeat at dice, the sons of Pritha have not been heard of by anyone.'

Arjuna says, 'O King, the man you know as Ballava your cook is Mahabaho Bhima of unrivalled strength and mercurial energy. It was he who killed the angry Rakshasas on Mount Gandhamadana and plucked the fragrant saugandhikas for Krishnaa. He is the Gandharva who killed evil Kichaka, and it was he who killed tigers, bears and boars in the antahpura of your palace, for your pleasure.

He who has been the master of your stables is Parantapa Nakula; this one is Sahadeva, the man in charge of your herds. These handsome sons of Madri are famed Maharathas. These two bulls of the Bhaaratas, who, today have again put on royal garments and fine jewellery, are a match for a thousand great chariot-warriors.

This devi of the lotus-petal eyes, slender waist and sweet smiles, your wife's sairandhri, is Drupada's daughter, for whose sake the Kichaka clan perished.

And, O king, I am Arjuna whom you know of already—son of Pritha, Bhima's younger brother and elder brother to the twins.

Rajan, we have happily spent our ajnatavasa in your kingdom, as safe as infants in the womb.'

After Arjuna has identified the five Kshatriyas, the Pandavas, Virata's son Uttara speaks of Arjuna's prowess and confirms the identities of the sons of Pritha.

Uttara says, 'That one, with the glowing, golden complexion, who is tall, majestic as a lion, of the prominent nose, large eyes and broad, ruddy face, is the king of the Kurus.

Look at this other Kshatriya, whose tread is like a mighty elephant's, whose complexion is like molten gold, whose shoulders are huge, and arms long and powerful: he is Vrikodara.

That one who stands beside him, the dark-skinned youth who is like the king bull in a herd of elephants, who has leonine shoulders and an elephant's proud gait, whose eyes are large as lotus leaves, is Arjuna, greatest of all archers.

The two who stand close to the king are those Purushottamas, the twins who, like Vishnu and Indra, are unrivalled in beauty, strength and demeanour.

That devi who stands close to them is Krishnaa, who is beauty personified, the embodiment of light, dark like the blue lotus—a divine queen, like Sri Lakshmi come to life.'

Then Virata's son describes Arjuna's prowess. He says, 'It is he who killed our adversaries like a lion rampaging through a herd of deer. He cut a swath through a host of enemy chariots, slaying so many of their best rathikas. With a single arrow, he killed an enormous, angry war-elephant so it fell in its golden armour and its tusks gored deep into the ground. It is Arjuna who retrieved our herds and vanquished the Kurus in battle; and I was deafened by the boom of his conch. It is this hero of the fierce deeds who quelled Bhishma, Drona and Duryodhana. These achievements were his, not mine.'

The king of the Matsyas is full of both guilt and fear at having offended Yudhishtira. He says quickly to Uttara, 'The time has come for me to appease the sons of Pandu. If you approve, I will give my daughter Uttaraa to Arjuna.'

Uttara says, 'Do so, father. And let us so worship the sons of Pandu who are entirely worthy of worship.'

Virata says, ‘Bhimasena rescued me from the clutches of the enemy, and Arjuna recovered my cows. It is because of their might that we are alive and victorious. We and our ministers will pay our respects to Yudhishtira son of Kunti.’

And to Yudhishtira he says, ‘O Pandavarishabha, Dharmaraja, may you and your brothers be blessed! If we have unwittingly offended you, you must forgive us, most noble and honourable son of Pandu.’

Then the good Virata joyfully proposes an alliance to Yudhishtira by offering him his kingdom, his crown, his treasury and his city.

He says to the Pandavas, and to Arjuna in particular, ‘How fortunate I am to see you!’ and he embraces Yudhishtira, Bhima and Madri’s sons repeatedly and sniffs the top of their heads; but Virata, lord of a vast army, is still not satisfied.

The delighted king says to Yudhishtira, ‘I am the most fortunate man alive that you chose to spend your ajnatavasa in my home, and fortune continued to smile on us that you spent the thirteenth year of your exile undiscovered.

I hereby make a gift of my kingdom and whatever else I own to you sons of Pritha. Pandavas, accept these without hesitation. And let Arjuna Savyasachi accept the hand of my daughter Uttaraa; he is the best of all men and worthy of being her husband.’

In response, Dharmaraja Yudhishtira looks at his brother, and Arjuna says to the king of the Matsyas, ‘Rajan, I gladly accept your daughter, whose virtues I know well; but I will have her for my daughter-in-law. Let her become my son Abhimanyu’s wife. This alliance between the Matsyas and the Bhaaratas is fitting and brings us profound joy.’ ”

"Virata says, 'Pandavottama, why do you not wish to accept my daughter as your wife?'

Arjuna says, 'When I lived in your antahpura I would see your daughter every day and, whether alone or accompanied, she trusted in me as in a father. I know about music and dancing, and she liked and respected me. She always considered me her teacher. I lived with her for a whole year even after she had attained puberty.

Given this circumstance, you or other men may entertain unfounded suspicions about me, or, worse, about her purity. And so, O Virata, I prefer to have Uttaraa for my daughter-in-law and bear witness to her chasteness. There is no difference between a daughter-in-law and a daughter just as there is none between a son and one's self. I am wary of slander and false accusations. I gladly accept your daughter Uttaraa as my daughter-in-law.

My son Abhimanyu excels every warrior on Earth in skill and prowess in battle; he is as handsome as a Deva. He is the favourite nephew of his uncle Krishna, who wields the Sudarshana chakra. O king, he is fit to be your daughter's husband, and your son-in-law.'

Virata says, 'What you say is wise, O Arjuna. Partha, do what you think best and you decide what we should do next. He whose daughter marries Arjuna's son has all his wished fulfilled.'

Yudhishtira gives his consent to the proposal. Bhaarata, Kunti's son and Virata send messengers who bear invitations to the wedding, to Krishna and to all their friends and relatives.

At the end of the thirteenth year of their exile, the five Pandavas move to Upalavya, one of the finest towns in Virata's kingdom. Arjuna himself rides to fetch Abhimanyu, Krishna and many others of the Dasarha family from the country of Anarta. The king of Kasi and Saibya, who are Yudhishtira's friends, arrive with an akshauhini of troops each. The mighty Drupada, Draupadi's heroic sons, the unvanquished Sikhandi and the invincible Dhrishtadyumna arrive with another akshauhini of troops.

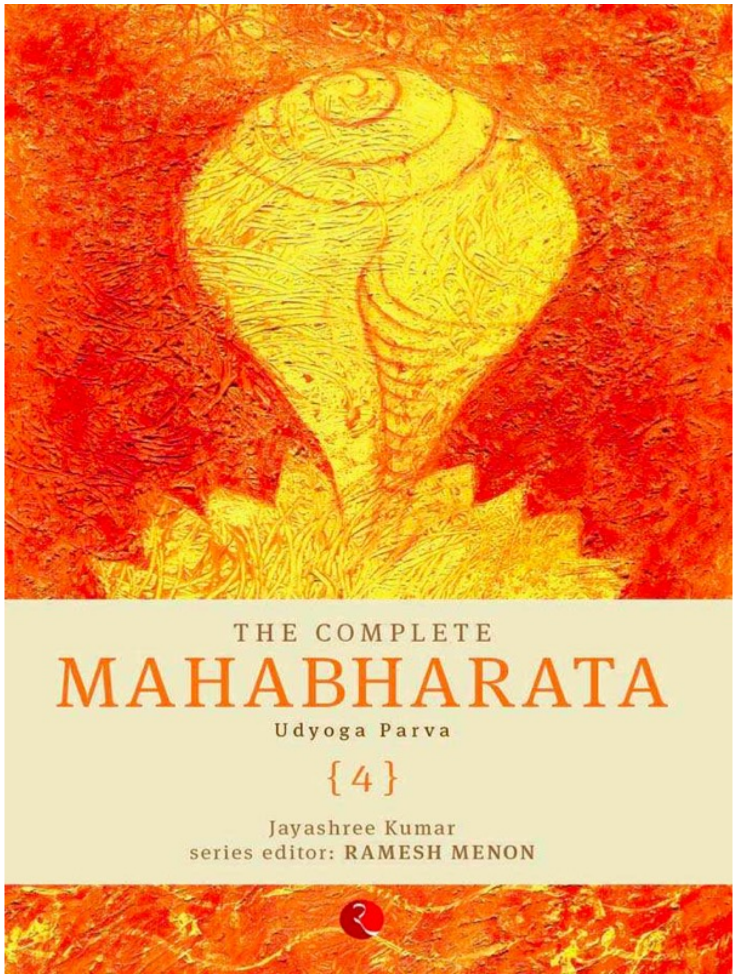
All the kings who come are not only lords of armies, but also conduct sacrifices, give bountiful gifts to Brahmanas, are deeply learned in the Vedas, heroic and always ready to die in battle. As they arrive, the virtuous king of the Matsyas honours them and provides entertainment for their armies, their servants and attendants; great is his gladness at giving his daughter to Abhimanyu.

Others come from different parts of the country. Then, Krishna arrives draped in bright, wild vanamalas made from forest blooms; Balarama, Kritavarma, Hridika's son Satyaki, Satyaki's son Anadhristi, Akrura, Samba and Nisatha, all magnificent Yadavas, come with Krishna. All these Parantapas come to Upalavya, bringing Abhimanyu and his mother Subhadra with them.

Indrasena and the others who have been living in Dwaraka for a year come in Krishna's train, bringing the Pandavas' chariots. Ten thousand elephants, ten thousand chariots, a hundred million horses, a billion foot-soldiers, and countless Vrishni, Andhaka, Kukura and Bhoja warriors of untold prowess form the entourage of the great Vrishni tiger, Krishna the Avatara. Krishna brings many nubile young women, ancient and magical jewels past compare and garments of unearthly weave and design for each of the illustrious sons of Pandu.

Soon, the wedding festivities are underway between the families of the Matsya king and the Pandavas. Conches, cymbals, horns, drums and other instruments sound, making music deep and wondrous, in Virata's palace. Hundreds of deer and other pure animals are slaughtered; wines and other intoxicating fruit juices are pressed and fermented, and flow in rivers. Actors, vabdhis, who are eulogists, and other singers and pauranikas entertain the kings by chanting their praises and genealogies, as well as recounting legends from time out of mind.

With Sudeshna at their head the royal Matsya women, wearing pearls and earrings of every other precious stone, come to the auspicious pandal where the marriage rites will be performed. Krishnaa by far outshines all the lovely, fair-skinned and bejewelled women in beauty, fame, virtue and splendour; dark Panchali is truly like a Goddess among them.



The women lead in princess Uttaraa, wearing rich red silk and ornaments handed down from antiquity in her family, and she looks like a daughter of Indra himself. Gravely, formally, Arjuna of the Kurus accepts Virata's flawless daughter on behalf of his son by Subhadra, and Yudhishtira Dharmaraja, who stands there like Indra, also receives her as his daughter-in-law.

With the formal acceptance, Partha, with Krishna before him, conducts the sacred wedding rituals of Subhadra's son. Virata gives him seven thousand horses, swift as the wind, two hundred elephants of the highest birth and wealth past telling. Libations of ghee are poured on the fire, and the Brahmanas are honoured. Now Virata offers his kingdom, his army, his treasury and himself to the Pandavas.

When the solemn and joyful ceremony is completed, Yudhishtira gives all the wealth that Krishna of immortal glory has brought, in daana to the great Brahmanas who have come to the Matsya kingdom from every corner of Bharatavarsha. He also gives thousands of the purest cows, all kinds of garments, extraordinay ornaments, chariots and carriages, mattresses of swan's-down and serves them the most varied and delicious food and drink. With the proper ceremonies, the king bestows vast lands on the Brahmanas. He gives away thousands of horses, treasuries of gold and other wealth to all the wedding guests, young and old.

Janamejaya, O Bharatarishabha, Virata's city teems with well-fed, contented, festive, celebrant men and women, and is lit by a festive glow, which, for the presence of Krishna, is unearthly and divine."

A Brief Introduction

The last complete version of the Mahabharata to be written in India in English prose was the translation by Kisari Mohan Ganguli in the late 19th century. He wrote it between 1883 and 1896. To the best of my knowledge, it still remains the only full English prose rendering of the epic by any Indian.

More than a hundred years have passed since Ganguli achieved his monumental task. Despite its closeness to the original Sanskrit and its undeniable power, in more than a hundred years the language and style of the Ganguli translation have inevitably become archaic.

It seemed a shame that this most magnificent of epics, a national treasure, an indisputable classic of world literature, believed by many to be the greatest of all books ever written, is not available in complete form to the Indian (or any) reader in modern, literary and easily accessible English: as retold by Indian writers.

So we, a group of Indian writers and editors, warmly and patiently supported by our publisher Rupa Publications India, undertook a line-by-line retelling of the complete Mahabharata, for the contemporary and future reader. Our aim has not been to write a scholarly translation of the Great Epic, but an eminently readable one, without vitiating either the spirit or the poetry of the original, and without reducing its length.

This is not a translation from the Sanskrit but based almost entirely on the Ganguli text, and he himself did use more than one Sanskrit version for his work. However, as will be obvious, the style of this new rendering is very much our own, and our hope is to bring as much of the majesty and enchantment of this awesome epic to you as is possible in English.

SENODYOGA PARVA

AUM! I bow down to Narayana and Nara, the most exalted Purusha, and to the Devi Saraswati and invoke the spirit of Jaya!

Vaisampayana said, “After the joyful celebrations of Abhimanyu’s wedding, the Kurus of the wedding party rest that night and present themselves in the morning before Virata in his sabha. King Virata’s court is full of treasures, the choicest vaiduryas and other precious stones; exquisitely wrought thrones and deep silk-covered armchairs are carefully laid out and the great hall is fragrant with the scent of a wealth of garlands.

The visiting kings are all present, when Virata and Drupada, the eldest among them, enter and occupy the thrones at the head of the sabha. Balarama, Krishna and their father Vasudeva are present. Satyaki, great Kshatriya of the Sini vamsa, and Rohini’s son Balarama sit beside the Panchala king. Krishna and Yudhishtira sit beside the king of the Matsyas and with them are all the sons of Drupada, Bhima and Arjuna, Madri’s sons, Virata’s princes, and Pradyumna, Samba, Abhimanyu. Draupadi’s sons, young lions who rival their fathers in courage, grace and prowess, are there as well, and they sit upon rich, gold-inlaid seats.

All these glittering heroes in their resonant ornaments and grand attire make that sabha of kings sparkle like the star-filled sky. Greetings exchanged all round and pleasantries done with, the assembled Kshatriyas fall quiet, their pensive gazes fixed on Krishna. And rising, he calls their attention to the circumstances of the Pandavas. The sabha is hushed and the Kshatriyas are absorbed by what he says, which is grave and profound.

Krishna says, 'You all know how Yudhishtira was deceitfully defeated at dice by Subala's son, and how his kingdom was stolen from him. You also know of his oath to live in exile in the forest. Although Pandu's sons can conquer the very Earth, they kept the oath they had sworn and those incomparable princes fulfilled the cruel conditions imposed on them. This last, thirteenth year, was the most trying for them, but they have endured their ajnatavasa, disguised, suffering silently and unrecognised. You are all aware of these things.

These illustrious men spent that thirteenth year doing menial service. You must take all this into consideration and decide what course is best, and fair to both Yudhishtira and Duryodhana. What you decide about the Kauravas and the Pandavas must be in keeping with dharma and must have your unanimous approval.

Yudhishtira would not want even Devaloka if he violated dharma to gain the realm of the gods; he would gladly accept a single small village for his kingdom if that was righteous. All you kings and noble princes know how the sons of Dhritarashtra robbed Yudhishtira of the kingdom that was his birthright, and how he has suffered untold adversity. Although Dhritarashtra's sons cannot hope to resist Arjuna's prowess, Yudhishtira and his brothers still wish their cousins well; they wish for peace.

These matchless sons of Kunti and Madri only ask for what is theirs—what they won by vanquishing other kings in battle. When they were mere boys, you know how, many a time and using diverse methods, Duryodhana, his brothers and Sakuni plotted to kill the sons of Pandu, because Duryodhana always wanted the kingdom for himself. Consider how greedy those twisted, evil men are and how virtuous Yudhishtira. Consider deeply the relationship between them. I beseech you all to consult together and to decide on which side dharma lies.

The Pandavas have always been devoted to truth. They have fulfilled their oath faithfully. If the sons of Dhritarashtra do not give them justice now, and their kingdom back, the sons of Pandu will kill them all. When kings friendly to the Pandavas hear about the long suffering inflicted on them, they will all rally behind them and risk their very lives to see their tormentors punished, to see them die. Do not presume that the Pandavas are too few or too weak to prevail over their enemies. United, and with the support of their allies, they will destroy those who oppose them.

However, we do not know Duryodhana's mind, or what he might do. How can we form any opinion about what is best for both the Pandavas and the Kauravas without knowing what Dhritarashtra's son intends? So, let an able ambassador—a high-born man who is virtuous, honest and alert—go to Duryodhana and persuade him to give half the kingdom to Yudhishtira.'

Full of wisdom and dharma, Krishna's words hang over the hushed sabha; he speaks impartially and for peace. His elder brother listens and then Balarama rises to addresses the gathering of kings."

"Baladeva says, 'You have all heard Krishna. What he says is in keeping with dharma, prudent and impartial, and equally beneficial for both Yudhishtira and Duryodhana. The sons of Kunti are prepared to give up half their kingdom to Duryodhana; the sons of Dhritarashtra should be willing to do the same. The Kurus should be grateful to us and rejoice that the conflict between them has been so amicably resolved. The Pandavas will be content with this arrangement, provided their cousins do the honourable thing. And the satisfaction of the Pandavas is conducive to the welfare of all mankind.

I would be happy if one amongst us, committed to pacifying both the Kurus and the Pandavas, goes as a duta to Hastinapura, taking Yudhishtira's thoughts with him, and also to discover Duryodhana's intentions. This man must pay his respects to the noble Bhishma, to Dhritarashtra, to Drona and his son Aswatthama, to Vidura and Kripa, to Sakuni prince of Gandhara and to the Sutaputra Karna. Let him also pay his respects to the other sons of Dhritarashtra, who are all renowned for their strength and learning, who know dharma well, who are brave and aware of all that has happened, and who read the signs of the times.

When all these and the elders are assembled, let our messenger speak with humility, since this will best serve the interests of Yudhishtira.

While it is true that Dhritarashtra's sons took the kingdom with some deceit, our messenger must spare no effort to avoid provoking them. When Yudhishtira had his throne he forgot himself; he gambled wildly at dice and lost his kingdom.

Yudhishtira was never adept at dice-play, and despite his brothers and friends trying to dissuade him, he foolishly challenged Sakuni, who is a master gambler. Hundreds of other dice-players were present, whom Yudhishtira could have beaten, but he ignored them and, of all men, he challenged Sakuni. Naturally, he lost game after game but he still refused to play anyone but Sakuni, who easily routed him and took everything he owned. How can Sakuni be blamed for this?

Therefore, our messenger must employ the utmost humility and first placate Dhritarashtra, who might then persuade Duryodhana to deal in peace. We must not incite a war with the Kurus, but approach Duryodhana in conciliation. War can never achieve what a peaceful agreement would, an enduring result.'

While the great and ponderous Balarama is still speaking, suddenly Satyaki, prince of the Sinis, jumps up and, his face red with indignation, roundly condemns what Baladeva advocates."

"Satyaki says, 'What a man says reflects what is in his heart; as do your words. Men are either brave or cowardly; of two branches of the same tree, only one might bear fruit; in the same dynastic line, there may be foolish men as well as those who have great strength of character.

O you whose banner bears the image of a plough, it is not what you say that I condemn, but those who listen to you. How can they allow a man who dares blame virtuous Yudhishtira to speak in this sabha? Clever dice-players challenged Yudhishtira even though he had little skill and, trusting in their integrity, he was vanquished. Can such men be said to have won honourably?

If they had come to Yudhishtira in his own house, whilst he played dice with his brothers, and bested him there, their victory would have been righteous. They challenged him, who was bound by Kshatriya dharma, and they won by deceit. How can what they did be called dharma? Having agreed to what they made the stakes in the game, a life in the forests, how could Yudhishtira demean himself by asking to be freed from his wager, even if he was beaten with cunning sleight of hand? Even if, by rights, Yudhishtira still owned his ancestral kingdom, it would have been beneath him to beg.

How can the Kauravas be termed righteous and their intentions honourable when they accused the Pandavas of having been discovered, although the sons of Pandu had completed their ajnatavasa unrecognised? Bhishma and Drona begged them to return the Pandavas' rightful throne, but they refused.

I would use arrows rather than words to convince them. I would use force to make them prostrate at Yudhishtira's feet. They and their allies must bow before him, or they must die. When I, Yuyudhana, am provoked by anger to fight, they will not resist me, even as mountains cannot withstand a striking thunderbolt.

Who can withstand Arjuna in fight? Who can resist him who has the discus for his weapon? Who can stand against me? Who can face the inexorable Bhima? And who that values his life would come near the sons of Madri, whose bows are firmly held and who are like twin embodiments of Yama?

Who would dare face Drupada's son Dhrishtadyumna, or these five sons of Pandu, who glorified Draupadi's name, who rival their father in valour and in every other way, and who are full of Kshatriya pride? Who would ride against Subhadra's son, whose mighty bow neither the Devas, nor Gada, nor Pradyumna, nor Samba can resist, and who is like Death himself, or like the very Vajra, or like Agni?

We will kill Duryodhana, Sakuni and Karna in battle and install Yudhishtira on the Kuru throne. There is no sin in slaying those who are intent on killing us, but to beg from our enemies is both adharma and shameful.

I ask you to do what Yudhishtira wants. Let Pandu's son regain the kingdom that Dhritarashtra surrenders. If Yudhishtira does not get his kingdom today, I will mow down our enemies.' "

"Drupada says, 'Mahabaho, it will be as you say. Duryodhana will never give up the kingdom peacefully; his doting father Dhritarashtra will go along with him; Bhishma and Drona will, too, from helplessness and loyalty, and Karna and Sakuni from bravado. I like what Baladeva said; we must do as he advises, but only if we want peace.

We should not speak to Duryodhana with mild words. He has a vicious nature, and temperance will not persuade him to see reason. Gentleness is appropriate for dealing with a donkey, but only firmness for cattle. If we speak leniently to Duryodhana, that evil one will think we are fools and presume that he has won.

Let us make preparations and send word to our friends, asking them to gather an army for us. Let swift messengers go to Salya and Dhrishtaketu, to Jayatsena and the prince of the Kekayas. Duryodhana will also send word to these kings. By dharma, men will respond to the first one who asks them. So make haste to reach out to your friends.

A great undertaking awaits us. Send word quickly to Salya and to the kings loyal to him, to Bhagadatta of immeasurable valour who rules the eastern coast, to fierce Hardikya and Andhaka, to the brilliant king of the Mallas and to Rochamanas. Summon Brihanta and Senabindu; Senajit, Prativindhya and Chitravarman; Bahlika, Munjakesa and the ruler of the Chedis; Suparsva, Subahu and that Maharatha Paurava. Call the kings of the Sakas, the Pahlavas, the Daradas; call Surari, Nadija and Karnaveshta, Neela and Bhumipala Viradharman; call Durjaya and Dantavaktra, Rukmi and Janamejaya, Ashada, Vayuvega and Purvapali; call Bhuritejas, Devaka, Ekalavya and his sons. Send also for the Karushaka kings and the valiant Kshemadhurti, and for the kings of the Kamboja and the Rishika tribes of the west coast; send for Jayatsena and the king of Kasi, for the rulers of the land of the five rivers, and for the son of Kratha; send for the rulers of the mountain realms, for Janaki and Susarman and Maniman, for Yotimatsaka and Dhrishtaketu, for the kings of Pansu, Tunda and Dandadhara, and for Brihatsena. Summon Aparajita, Nishada, Sreniman and Vasuman; call Brihadbala of untold might, Bahu the conqueror of hostile cities and the warlike Samudrasena and his valiant son; summon Udbhava and Kshemaka, Vatadhana, Srutayu and Dridhayu; summon the gallant son of Salva, the king of the Kalingas, and the unconquerable Kumara. Speedily send word to all these men. Yes, this plan appeals to me.

And let this learned Brahmana, my priest, be the messenger who goes to Dhritarashtra. Tell him what he must say to Duryodhana, how to address Bhishma, that noblest of warriors and what to say to Drona, that greatest of Maharathas.'"

"Krishna says, 'What you counsel surely befits the king of the Panchalas, for your deep kinship and allegiance towards Pandu's son. Yet, we want to adopt a wise course of action, and that is our first duty; it would be foolish to do otherwise. Our relationship to the Kauravas and the Pandavas is equal, regardless of their own inclinations towards each other. You and all of us were invited for a wedding. The marriage has been celebrated; let us go home happily.

You are the first of all the kings here, both in age and learning, and the rest of us are like sishyas to you. Dhritarashtra has always had great respect for you; and you are also a friend of the acharyas Drona and Kripa. So, I ask you to send a message to the Kurus on behalf of the Pandavas. We are unanimously resolved that you should be our duta.

If the Kuru king makes peace on equitable terms, the cordial, brotherly feelings between the Kauravas and Pandavas will be restored. If, on the other hand, Duryodhana takes a haughty stand and refuses peace, send for the others first and then summon us as well.

The wielder of the Gandiva will be ignited with anger; the dull-headed, evil Duryodhana, his kinsmen and his friends will meet their fate.'"

Virata pays homage to Krishna, bids farewell to him, and Krishna sets off home with his kinsmen. After Krishna leaves for Dwaraka, Yudhishtira and his followers join Virata and begin to prepare for war.

Virata and Drupada send messengers to all the other monarchs, and at their request many powerful kings gladly arrive to join them. The sons of Dhritarashtra hear that the Pandavas have amassed a great army and they, too, muster a force of many rulers of the Earth. O king, quickly the world teems with warriors galvanised to the cause of either the Kurus or the Pandavas. Armies composed of the four kinds of forces pour in from all sides and fill the land; and Bhumi Devi, with her mountains and forests, seems to tremble beneath their tread.

The king of the Panchalas consults Yudhishtira and sends his wise and learned priest to the Kurus."

"Drupada says to his priest, 'Of all beings, those endowed with life are superior to the inert; of living beings, those endowed with intelligence are superior to the others; of intelligent creatures, men are foremost; of men, Dvijas are the highest; of the twice-born, students of the Vedas are the best; of Vedic students, those of refined minds are first; of cultured men, the practical are the best; and of practical men, those who know Brahman, the Supreme Being, are the highest.

You are at the very apex of this pyramid of beings. Distinguished by your age and learning, you are equal in intellect to Indra or Brihaspati. You know what kind of man the king of the Kurus is, and you know what Yudhishtira is. It was with Dhritarashtra's knowledge that the Kauravas deceived the Pandavas and, despite Vidura's counsel, that king follows his son.

On behalf of the Kurus, Sakuni challenged Yudhishtira to a game of dice, although the Pandava was as a callow beginner while he himself was an expert. Unskilled in play, and guileless, Yudhishtira adhered strictly to rules of Kshatriya dharma. The ruthless Kurus cheated and won Yudhishtira's kingdom from him, and they are not going to give it up voluntarily.

If you speak words of dharma to Dhritarashtra, you will certainly gain the hearts of his warriors. Vidura will support what you say and, thereby, antagonise Bhishma, Drona, Kripa and the others. When the enemy commanders are alienated from their simple-minded fighting men, they will need to regain the confidence of their soldiers. In the meantime, the Pandavas will prepare their armies and gather their supplies, while, with you lingering in their midst and sowing subtle discord in the hearts of their men, the enemy will not be able to make adequate preparations for war. This plan of action seems the best.

It is possible that Dhritarashtra might agree to your proposal and do as you ask. You, being virtuous, must behave toward them with dharma. Win the hearts of the compassionate by discoursing at length on the trials that the Pandavas have endured and convince the elderly by reminding them about the customs of their forefathers.

I have no doubts in this regard, nor do you need to be apprehensive of any danger. You are a Brahmana, well versed in the Vedas; and you are going there as a duta; furthermore, you are elderly. So, old friend, set out at once for Hastinapura to promote the cause of the Pandavas. Set out on the day of the Pushyami nakshatra, during that part of the day called Jaya.'

The priest sets out for Hastinapura, mindful of Drupada's instructions. That learned man, who has a deep knowledge of the Artha Shastra, goes with a retinue of disciples towards the city of the Kurus, to advance the welfare of Pandu's sons."

Vaisampayana said, “After the Pandavas send the priest to Hastinapura, they send other messengers to the kings of various kingdoms, and Arjuna sets out for Dwaraka. After Krishna and Baladeva leave for Dwaraka with all the Vrishnis, the Andhakas and hundreds of Bhojas, Dhritarashtra’s son sends out spies to garner information about what the Pandavas are doing.

Duryodhana hears that Krishna is on his way home and goes at once to Dwaraka, riding on fine horses swift as the wind, and taking a small troop of warriors with him. He and Arjuna arrive on the same day in the beautiful city of the Anarta realm. On reaching there, those two lions of Kuru vamsa find that Krishna is sleeping, and they go to his bedchamber.

Krishna is still asleep when Duryodhana enters the chamber and sits on a fine seat at the head of the bed. Arjuna enters behind him and stands at the foot of the bed, his head bent and hands folded. When Krishna awakes his gaze falls first on Arjuna. He greets both him and Duryodhana, and after asking if they had a safe journey, mildly enquires why they have come to see him.

Duryodhana says, ‘You must help me in the impending war. Arjuna and I are both your friends, Madhusudana, and you are related to both of us in the same way. Today, it is I who petitions you first. Men of dharma take up the cause of the one who approaches them first. This is the way of the ancients.

Krishna, you are the first of all men of dharma, and everyone respects you, at all times. I ask you to follow dharma and do what is right.'

Krishna replies, 'That you have come first, O king, I do not doubt in the least. But, it is Arjuna that I saw first. Because you were the first to approach me and because Arjuna was the first one I saw, I shall help you both. It is said that those who are younger should choose first. That gives Dhananjaya the first choice.

There exists a vast force of Yadavas, numbering ten crores, known as the Narayanas. Each of them is stronger than me and each one can fight in the very thick of any battle. One of you can have these irresistible soldiers. The other will have me; but I will bear no arms and neither will I fight on the field.

Arjuna, you decide first which you will choose, because law dictates that you have the first choice.'

Arjuna chooses Krishna, who will not fight on the battlefield, who is Vishnu himself, creator, preserver and slayer of men, the uncreated one, born among men of his own will, foremost of all Kshatriyas, beyond all the Devas and Danavas. Duryodhana gladly accepts the Yadava army of Narayanas and, though he knows that Krishna will not be with him, he is thrilled at having acquired the massive force. Having secured that awesome army, Duryodhana goes in some delight to his old master, Rohini's son Balarama, to tell him of the reason for his visit and its outcome.

Baladeva says to Duryodhana, 'Remember all that I said at Virata's daughter's wedding. It is for your sake that I spoke against Krishna there and contradicted him. Again and again, I spoke of the equality of our relationship to both sides. However, Krishna did not adopt my views, and I cannot separate myself from Krishna for even a moment. Since I cannot go into battle against him, I have resolved not to fight, either for Kunti's sons or for you.

O Bharatarishabha, born as you are into the noble race of Bharata, go bravely into battle and fight with Kshatriya dharma.'

Duryodhana embraces that hero whose weapon is the plough and, despite being aware that Krishna is not on his side, he still considers Arjuna and the Pandavas as having already been defeated. He then goes to Kritavarman, who gives him an akshauhini of troops. And surrounded by that terrifying host, he rides forth, to the great joy of his friends.

After Duryodhana has left, Krishna says to Arjuna, ‘Why did you choose me, when you knew that I will not fight at all?’

Arjuna answers, ‘I have no doubt that you will slay all our enemies, even without fighting yourself. I, too, can kill them all, by myself, Purushottama. You are the most illustrious being in this world, and your renown and honour will come with you. I wish for that, and that is why I chose you. I have always wanted to have you for my sarathy, and I ask you now to fulfil my long-cherished desire.’

Krishna says with a deep smile, ‘I am glad that you chose me, son of Kunti. As for your wish, yes, I will be your charioteer.’

Vaisampayana said, "O king, Salya hears the news that the messengers bring and, accompanied by his sons and a teeming legion of soldiers, every man mighty in battle, he sets out to come to the Pandavas.

His encampment extends over one and a half yojanas, so vast is Salya's force. Rajan, this most powerful king commands an entire akshauhini. In his army are heroes wearing armour of different colours, carrying a myriad of banners and all sorts of bows, adorned with diverse ornaments, garlands and jewellery, and wearing beautiful clothing. Hundreds of thousands of the foremost Kshatriyas are the leaders of his troops, and they are clothed and decorated, each in the tradition of his native land.

Salya moves slowly, majestically, toward the Pandava camp, frequently giving his men time to rest. The Earth's little creatures are crushed and the ground trembles under the tread of his legions. Hearing that the great and mighty warrior is on the march, Duryodhana makes all haste to win him over to his side. He swiftly has finely-decorated, palatial pavilions erected at many enchanting sites for Salya's comfort and pleasure, and sends performers to entertain that king.

The first of these retreats is adorned with garlands and stocked with meat and the choicest delicacies and refreshments. There are fine pools and tanks of different shapes, all delightful to see; there is plentiful food, and there are spacious apartments. Salya arrives at the first exotic pavilion, and Duryodhana's best servants wait upon him as if he is a Deva.

Salya reaches another hall of entertainment that is as resplendent as an arbour of the gods. And there, luxuriating in comforts fit for any celestial, he thinks himself superior to the lord of the Devas and even thinks of Indra as being shabby in comparison.

The delighted Salya asks the servants, 'Where are Yudhishtira and the others who have arranged for these lavish mansions? Bring the men who built them before me; they deserve to be richly rewarded. I must acknowledge their work. I hope Kunti's son will approve.'

The surprised servants inform Duryodhana, who stays hidden until Salya's pleasure is so great that he is ready to grant even his life, and then he comes forward and reveals himself to his uncle. The king of the Madras sees him and understands that it is Duryodhana who has taken all these pains to fete him.

And Salya embraces Duryodhana and says, 'I want to give you something that you truly want.'

Duryodhana says, 'Auspicious one, let it be as you say, and grant me this boon: I ask you to lead my armies in battle.'

Salya says, 'So be it. What do I need to do?'

The son of Gandhari cries again and again, 'It is done! It is done!'

And Salya says, 'O best of men, go back to your city. I must pay Yudhishtira a visit. I will do that first and come to you very soon.'

Duryodhana says, 'O Bhumipala, come quickly indeed after seeing the Pandava. I depend on you entirely, so remember the boon you have granted me.'

Salya says, 'Blessings upon you! I will hasten back. Go in peace to your city, O protector of men.'

The two kings, Salya and Duryodhana, embrace and Duryodhana returns to his capital. Salya goes to inform the sons of Kunti of what has happened.

When he reaches Upaplavya and enters the encampment there, Salya sees all the sons of Pandu before him. The mighty-armed Salya meets them and accepts the customary courtesies—water to wash his feet with and honourable gifts, including a cow. The king of the Madras asks how they are and, with great joy, embraces Yudhishtira, Bhima, Arjuna and his sister's twin sons.

When they are all seated, Salya says to Yudhishtira, 'Naravyaghra, is all well with you? How fortunate it is that you have completed your exile. Such a difficult task you, your brothers and the princess have accomplished by living in the wilderness! No less trying was the year of your ajnatavasa.

When a man has his throne taken from him, there is nothing but hardship to look forward to. Rajan, what happiness is there for such a one? But after killing your enemies you will gain as much, no, a hundredfold more, felicity and joy than the torment that Dhritarashtra's son inflicted on you.

You are wise in the ways of the world and, so, my son, you never do anything out of avarice. You walk in the footsteps of the ancient Rajarishis. You must remain firmly on your path of generosity, selflessness and truth. Mercy, self-control, truth, universal compassion and every other wonderful quality present in this world are also present in you.

You are mild, generous, devout and large-hearted; and you look on virtue as the highest good. Many are the laws of dharma that prevail amongst men, and you know them all. In fact, you know everything there is to know of this world of ours.

Bharatottama, how great it is that you have emerged from your travails. How fortunate I am to see you, who are a treasure-house of dharma, now free and among your followers.'

Then, Bhaarata, the king tells Yudhishtira of his meeting with Duryodhana, and about the boon he granted him.

Yudhishtira says, 'Pledging your allegiance to Duryodhana out of heartfelt gratitude is dharma indeed. But, Bhumipala, I ask you to do one thing for me. Even if what I ask is not dharma, you must do it for my sake. Listen to my plea.

On the battlefield you are Krishna's equal as a charioteer. When Karna and Arjuna come face to face in a mortal duel, I have no doubt that you will be Karna's sarathy. At that time, I beg you, protect Arjuna, even while you are his enemy's sarathy. You must dampen the Sutaputra's spirits, for his lack of confidence is his only weakness, and only through that can Arjuna prevail over him. Uncle, you must do this, even though it is unseemly. For if Karna is not slain, we will lose the war.'

Salya says, 'Bless you, Pandava, and now listen to me. You ask me to dispirit Karna in battle. Yes, I am sure I will become his charioteer, for he does consider me equal to Krishna. When he prepares to fight Arjuna, I will point out the dangers he faces. I will extol Arjuna and convince Karna that he is no match for your brother. Shorn of courage and pride, he will be easy to kill.

I swear that I am determined to do what you ask. Whatever else I may be able to do for your good, I will do as well. The anguish you suffered along with Draupadi during the game of dice; the savage words that the Suta's son spoke then; the misery that Jatasura and Kichaka inflicted on you; Draupadi's torment, which was like Damayanti's—this will all end in joy, O Kshatriya.

Do not grieve over what happened, for destiny is inexorable. From time out of mind, the noblest men have endured all manner of suffering; why, even the Devas have found grave misfortunes, Rajan. It is told that Indra and his wife had to endure great grief once, and were plunged in black despair.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Best of kings, how did Devendra and his queen come to endure such torment?'

Salya says, 'Listen, and I will tell you this ancient itihasa. Hear, Bhaarata, how affliction befell Indra and his consort.

Once, Tvashtri, the lord of creatures and among the foremost of Devas, sat in austere tapasya, and out of his rancour against Indra, created a son with three heads. That lustrous being of universal form, Viswarupa, hankered after Indra's throne. He had three awesome faces that resembled the Sun, the Moon and Fire. With one he read the Vedas, with one he drank wine and his gaze from the third seemed to imbibe the whole world. With unflinching tapasya, this imperturbable and self-controlled being lived a life of devout spiritual discipline. Severe and terrible was his penance.

Observing the sternness, courage and truthfulness of this being of immeasurable tejas, Indra worried that he would take his place as the lord of the Devas.

Indra thought to himself, "How can this one be made addicted to sensual pleasures? How can he be made to forsake his tapasya? If he grows any stronger, he will absorb the entire universe."

Having pondered thus within himself, Indra sent Apsaras from Devaloka to tempt the son of Tvashtri.

He commanded them, saying, “Hurry! Go and tempt the three-headed one to plunge deep into pleasures of the senses. You, who are blessed with captivating hips, adorn yourselves in provocative attire, deck yourselves in fine necklaces and employ passionate gestures and language. My lovely ones, my heart is perturbed; distract him and alleviate my dread. Beautiful nymphs, avert this peril that hangs over me. May well-being be yours.”

The Apsaras said, “O slayer of Bala, have no fear, we will seduce him. Together, we will tempt this rishi who sits in tapasya so fearful that his eyes seem to scorch everything they see. We will bring him under our control and put an end to your fears.”

They went to the three-headed one and, arriving there, those exquisite temptresses teased him with gestures of love and their beautiful bodies. Absorbed in deep tapasya, he looked at them but was unmoved. With subdued senses he was like the ocean, full to the brim and unshakeable.

Their efforts were to no avail. The Apsaras came back to Indra and, with hands joined, said, “O, we could not shake that tranquil one. Now do whatever you must.”

Indra honoured the Apsaras and dismissed them, thinking all the while about other ways of destroying his enemy. He soon lit upon a way to be rid of the three-headed one.

He said to himself, “Today, I will cast my thunderbolt at him, and he will die. Even the most powerful man must not take a nascent enemy lightly, of little account though he may yet be.”

And so, with the exhortations of the Shastras in mind, he decided to kill the three-headed being and hurled his Vajra at him. It was terrible to see, such a fire, and struck dread into the heart. Struck by that all-powerful thunderbolt, the three-headed one died, and as he fell he loosened the summit of a mountain.

The lord of the Devas saw that he was dead and lay still, like a mountain, but Indra found no peace. Instead, he was scalded by the effulgence of that being, who blazed in death as he had in life. Lying on the field, his three heads seemed eerily alive. Overawed and in fear of that dazzling lustre, Indra was plunged in dismay.

Just then, he saw a carpenter walking through the forest with an axe on his shoulder.

Indra said to him, “I ask a favour of you. Cut off this dead one’s heads.”

The carpenter said, “His shoulders are broad, and my axe is not big enough. Also, I will not do this sinful thing.”

Indra said, “Have no fear but quickly do as I say. At my command your axe will be as powerful as a thunderbolt.”

The carpenter said, “Who are you, who have done this dreadful thing? Tell me the truth, I want to know.”

Indra said, “Then know this: I am Indra, the lord of the Devas. Now do as I tell you. Do not hesitate, carpenter.”

The carpenter said, “O Indra, why are you not ashamed of your bestial crime? How it is that you do not dread the sin of killing a Brahmana, particularly this son of a Mahamuni?”

Indra said, “I will perform rigorous atonement to purify myself of these sins. He whom I killed with my Vajra was a powerful enemy. I am still uneasy; I fear him even now. Waste no time; cut off his heads and I shall bestow my favour upon you. I grant that in all sacrifices, you will get the head of the sacrificial beast as your share. Now do what I ask!”

Hearing this, the carpenter cut off the heads of the three-headed one with his axe. When the heads were severed, partridges, quails, pigeons and all kinds of birds flew out from the naked throats. From the head which the three-headed one used to recite the Vedas and drink Soma nectar, partridges flew out in a flock. From the head with which he looked at the cardinal points as if to absorb them all, quails emerged. From that head which he used to drink wine came sparrows and hawks.

With the heads removed, Indra’s trepidation left him. He returned to Devaloka with a light heart, and the carpenter went home. Indra was pleased that he had accomplished his objective.

When Tvashtri heard that Indra had killed his son, his eyes reddened, and he said, “Indra has killed my son, who was innocent of any offence, who was absorbed in constant tapasya, who was merciful, who was self-controlled and who had subdued his senses. To destroy Indra, I will create Vritra.

Let the Lokas behold my power; let the worlds see my tapasyashakti; let that inhuman, evil-minded Deva see what I do.”

With these words, the furious Tvashtri, famed for his tapasya, washed his mouth with water in achamana, offered oblations to the fire and created the dreadful Vritra. He spoke to the Asura he had made, saying, “O Vritra, who are destined to slay Indra, may your might swell by the power of my tapasya."

And that Asura grew prodigiously in strength. Born of fire, like Agni's son, he towered towards the sky.

He said, "I have risen like the apocalyptic Sun; tell me what am I to do."

"Kill Indra," said Tvashtri, and left for the celestial realms.

A great battle ensued between Vritra and Indra. Both were fired with wrath, and the duel between them was terrible. The heroic Vritra seized the lord of gods and whirled him round and threw him into his open maw.

The Devas were terrified to see how easily Vritra had swallowed Indra, and they created Jrimbhika to kill Vritra. Waiting his chance, Indra drew his body into itself and flew out when Vritra opened his mouth to yawn. It is since then that the yawn became a characteristic of living beings in the three worlds. Great was the joy of the Devas at Indra's escape. And the furious battle between Indra and Vritra resumed.

They fought for a long, long time and, finally, Indra could not withstand Vritra, who was infused by the power of Tvashtri's tapasya; the Deva king fled and the Asura prevailed. In disarray after Indra's retreat, all the other Devas were easily overpowered by Tvashtri.

O Bhaarata, they consulted the greatest rishis and deliberated on the proper thing to do. Seized with dread, they sat on the top of the Mandara Mountain and invoked the indestructible Vishnu,' says Salya."

"Salya continues, 'Indra said, "O Devas, Vritra has consumed the universe, and no-one can withstand him. Once I could have vanquished him, but not any more. What can I do now? He is unassailable: he has inexorable tejas; he is a Mahatman; victory will always be his in battle; he can swallow the three worlds with its Devas, Manavas and Asuras.

Swargavasis, I have decided that we must go to Vishnu and seek his counsel. He will help us find a way to kill this evil one.

At Maghavat's word, all the Devas and the Rishis went to the omnipotent Vishnu, to place themselves under the protection of that protector of all.

They said to the Supreme God, "O Narayana, it was you who once covered the three worlds in three strides. It was you who procured the Amrita and quelled the Asuras in battle. It was you who restrained the Asura Bali and placed Sakra on the throne of Devaloka. You are the Lord of the gods and the Soul of the universe. You are the almighty God whom all beings worship.

Best of Gods, be the means of our salvation, of all the Devas and Indra. O Asurasudana, all creation is pervaded by Vritra."

Vishnu said, "It is my dharma to do what benefits you. I will tell you how Vritra can be killed. Go with the Rishis and the Gandharvas to Vritra, who has absorbed the universe into himself. Go in an attitude of conciliation and win him over with feigned humility.

By virtue of my power, Indra will be victorious, for I shall invisibly enter his Vajra. Go now, all of you, with the Rishis and the Gandharvas, and make peace between Sakra and Vritra."

When he had spoken, the Rishis and the Devas, with Indra at their head, left all together. As they approached, they saw Vritra's splendour, ablaze as if to incinerate the ten cardinal points and consume the three worlds; and glorious, like the Sun or the Moon.

The Rishis came up to Vritra and said to him in a soothing tone, "O unconquerable one, your energy has consumed the universe. However, you have not vanquished Indra, although you have fought him for so long. All beings, including gods, men and demons, suffer from your conflict. Let there be peace between you and Sakra. You will be happy and live forever in Indra's realm."

The mighty and noble Vritra heard what they said and, bowing his head to them, said, "Great ones, I hear you and the Gandharvas clearly. Now listen to what I have to say. How can there be friendship between Indra and me? How can there be amity between two inveterate enemies?"

The Rishis said, "Concord between righteous beings happens at a single meeting and is always desirable. After that first contact, whatever is destined will happen. One should not lose the opportunity of forming an alliance with a man of dharma. Indeed, one should actively seek the friendship of the righteous. Wise men say that friendship with a good man is like wealth in a time of poverty, for the friend will give sage advice when it is needed. The friendship of a good person is of great benefit and, so, a wise man should never want to kill a righteous being.

Indra is honoured by the just; he is the refuge of the magnanimous; he speaks the truth, always; he is without blame; he knows what dharma is; and his judgment is refined. Let there be eternal friendship between you and Indra. Have faith in him and let your heart not be otherwise inclined."

The illustrious Asura said, "I revere you Rishis who are endowed with supernatural powers. Do as I say, exactly as I say, and then, Devas, I will do everything these Brahmanottamas advise.

My condition is: I shall not be killed with anything that is wet or dry, with anything made of stone or wood, with a weapon used in close combat or with an astra, neither during the day nor at night, not even by Indra himself or any of the gods. On these terms I will make eternal peace with Indra."

The Rishis agreed. Peace was restored, and Vritra was glad. Indra, too, was pleased, but thoughts of killing Vritra continued to fill his mind. The lord of the Devas passed his time, always uneasy and looking for a chink in the compact he had made with Vritra.

One day, in the eerie twilight of evening, Indra caught sight of the mighty Asura on the sea shore. He thought of the boon that had been granted to the Asura, and he thought, 'It is evening now—neither day nor night. I must kill Vritra, my enemy, who has stripped me of my power. Unless I slay this mighty Asura, even if I have to use deceit, I will not prosper."

At that moment, thinking these thoughts and bearing Vishnu's promise to him in mind, Indra saw a mass of foam in the sea, as big as a hill, and he said, "This is neither dry, nor wet, nor is it a weapon. Let me cast it at Vritra, and he will die."

And he infused that mountain of foam with the Vajra and cast it. Vishnu entered the foaming Vajra and sloughed off Vritra's head, and the matchless demon fell onto white, damp sands, his bare throat spouting a rill of blood. With the Asura's death, the universal pall of darkness lifted and the cardinal points shone again; fragrant breezes blew; and gladness filled all the living. The Devas, with the Gandharvas, Yakshas and Rakshasas, and with the great Nagas and Rishis, glorified Indra with hymns in his praise; and all of them bowed to him.

Indra and the Devas were happy, and Indra spoke soul-stirring words in joy at having killed his enemy. Ever conscious of dharma, Indra worshipped Vishnu, the most praiseworthy One of all.

However, having killed Vritra, bane of the gods, Indra was overcome by his crime of deceit, and black dejection seized his very soul. Terrorised by his sin of Brahmahatya, for he had killed a Brahmana when he slew Tvashtri's three-headed son, he withdrew from the world. He became like one who had lost his very mind. Haunted constantly by his sins, he was unrecognisable. He hid under water, writhing like a snake and, bereft of his presence, the Earth looked as if she had been devastated by a storm of the pralaya.

Bhumi became treeless, and her forests withered; rivers stopped in their courses, and lakes and even seas dried up; and animals were stricken because it never rained and a drought without remit gripped the world. The Devas and all the great Rishis were seized in fear; the world, without a king, was wracked by cataclysms of every kind. With no lord, panic took the Devas and the Devarishis. They wondered desperately who could replace Indra, but none amongst them had any inclination to be the king of the gods.'"

"Salya says, 'Then all the Rishis and Devas said, "Let us crown the radiant Rajarishi Nahusha as king of the Devas. He is strong and famed, and always devoted to dharma."

They went to him and said, "O Bhumipala, we want you to be our king."

Nahusha, with self-interest at heart, said to the Devas, Rishis and Pitrs, "I am feeble and cannot protect you. You need a powerful god to be your king. Only Indra always owned that prowess."

The Devas with the Rishis at their head said, "It is true that we all have weaknesses. Rule the realms of Devaloka with the help of our tapasya. Rajarajan, accept the crown of heaven and this boon from us: whatever being stands within your sight—be he a Deva, an Asura, a Yaksha, a Rishi, a Pitr or a Gandharva—you shall absorb his power. Thereby your own power will be enhanced and you will grow in strength. Be guided only by dharma and rule the worlds. Protect the Brahmarishis and the Devas."

Nahusha was crowned king of Devaloka and, placing dharma before everything else, he became sovereign of all the worlds. Nahusha had led a virtuous life, but when he obtained the precious boon and reign over Devaloka, his mind began to turn to sensual thoughts.

He surrounded himself with Apsaras and other celestial nymphs. He began to enjoy myriad pleasures in the Nandana vana, on Mount Kailasa, upon the crest of Himavat, on the Mandara Mountain, on the slopes of the Sweta, Mahendra and Malaya mountains, and in the oceans and rivers. He listened to captivating stories and enjoyed the sweet strains of musical instruments and divine voices singing. Viswavasu and Narada, bevies of Apsaras, bands of Gandharvas and the six seasons embodied attended upon him. Scented breezes wafted around him, cool and refreshing.

Once, while the profligate king was enjoying himself in this way, he caught sight of Sachi Devi, Indra's favourite queen. He looked at her, and his soul in the grip of lust, he said to his courtiers, "Why does this Devi, Indra's queen, not minister to me? I am the lord of the Devas and the ruler of all the worlds. Let Sachi come to me at once."

Saddened when she heard this, Sachi said to Brihaspati, "O Brahmana, protect me from Nahusha. I take refuge with you. You have always said that I bear auspicious marks, being the favourite of the lord of the Devas; that I am chaste, devoted to my lord and destined never to become a widow. You say all this repeatedly; now let your words be proven true. You have never said anything in vain; therefore, Brahmanottama, all that you have said must come to pass."

Brihaspati said to Sachi, who was beside herself with fear, "What I have said will come true, Devi. It will not be long before you see the return of Indra. Truly, you have nothing to fear from Nahusha, and I shall unite you with Indra very soon."

Nahusha heard that Indra's queen had taken refuge with Brihaspati, the son of Angiras, and he was furious.'"

"Salya says, 'Seeing that Nahusha was angry, the Rishis and Devas said to their king, who looked so fearsome now, "O Devaraja, shed your rage. When you are angry, the entire universe trembles, with its Asuras, Gandharvas, Kinnaras and Nagas. Let go of this wrath, righteous one. A man like you should not lose his equanimity.

Devi Sachi is another man's wife. Calm yourself. Turn your mind away from the sin of ravishing another's wife. You are the king of the Devas, and may you prosper! Protect your subjects with dharma."

Nahusha was mindless with desire and paid no heed to what they said. Accusing Indra, he said, "Ahalya of the blemishless reputation was the wife of a Muni. Indra ravished her while her husband still lived. Why did you not stop him? Many were the deeds of inhumanity, of unrighteousness and of deceit that Indra committed in times past. Why did you not prevent him?

Let the Devi serve my pleasure; it will do her good and will protect you all, as well."

The Devas said, "We will bring Indra's queen to you, as you command. Set aside your anger and be at peace."

The Devas and Rishis went to inform Brihaspati and Sachi about what had transpired. They said, "Brahmanottama, we know that Sachi Devi has come to you for refuge and that you have promised to protect her. But we, the Devas, Gandharvas and Rishis, beg you to give her up to Nahusha. The lustrous Nahusha is now the king of the Devas and is above Indra. Let the beautiful Devi accept him as her lord."

Hearing this, Sachi began to sob pitifully, and she said to Brihaspati, "O best of Devarishis, I do not want Nahusha for my lord. I have placed myself in your protection; save me from this calamity."

Brihaspati said, "I am resolved not to abandon you. You of the blemishless life, I shall not forsake you, for you are virtuous and devoted to truth. I do not want to commit a sin, especially since I am a Brahmana who knows dharma, for I worship the truth and am aware of all the dictates of dharma. No, I will never betray you. Go your ways, Devas. But first, hear what Brahma has said about this:

He who surrenders to a foe the terrified person who has asked for protection will not find refuge when he himself is in need of it. The seeds he plants will not grow, and rains will fail.

He who gives up to an enemy the terrified one who has asked for his protection never succeeds in anything that he undertakes. He will lose his senses and fall stricken from heaven. The gods refuse the offerings he makes. His progeny die untimely deaths, and his Pitrs fight among themselves. The Devas with Indra at their head will cast the Vajra at such a one.

Know this to be true. I shall not give up Sachi, who is Indra's queen and his favourite. I, Brihaspati, tell you this, which is for her good and mine. I will never surrender Sachi."

Then the Devas and the Gandharvas said, "Acharya Brihaspati, think of a solution."

Brihaspati said, "Let this auspicious Devi ask Nahusha for some time before she decides what to do. This will be to her advantage and ours, for Kaala might create many obstacles in Nahusha's way while we wait. Only Time knows the future. Nahusha has become powerful and haughty because of the boon you granted him."

Brihaspati's words pleased the Devas, who said, 'You have spoken well, O Guru. This is, without doubt, for the good of all the Devas. However, we must pacify this Devi."

Then the Devas led by Agni spoke soothingly to Indra's queen, saying, "You are the holder of the universe of mobile and immobile things. You are chaste and true. Go to Nahusha. That degenerate who lusts after you will fail to have what he wants, and Indra will regain sovereignty over Devaloka.”

Indra’s queen went bashfully to Nahusha of the dreadful mien, but to attain her end, not his. Struck mindless with lust, Nahusha saw her, how young and lovely she was, and was ecstatic.’”

"Salya says, 'Nahusha saw Sachi come, and said, "O sweet smiles, I am the lord of the three worlds. Take me for your lord as well."

That chaste Devi quivered in terror, like the slender stalk of a young plantain tree in the wind. She bowed her head to Brahma, then joined her hands and spoke to the truly fearsome Nahusha.

She said, "Devaraja, I need time. No one knows what became of Indra, or his whereabouts. I have sent my friends and servitors forth to look for him; if I get no news of him, I will come to you. I tell you this truthfully."

Nahusha was pleased, and said, "It shall be as you say. Come as soon as you discover what has happened. I hope you will keep your word."

The auspicious Sachi Devi went back to Brihaspati's home. There, she told Agni and the other Devas what had happened, and they began to deliberate on what they should do to best benefit Indra.

They went to the all-powerful Vishnu for refuge and said, "Indra has been overcome by the sin of killing a Brahmana. Devadeva, you are the Primeval One, the first creator, the ruler of the universe, and our refuge. You have assumed the form of Vishnu for the protection of all beings. When, by dint of your power, Indra slew Vritra he was guilty of the direst sin of killing a Brahmana, of Brahmahatya. How can he be absolved of his sin?"

Vishnu said, “Let him offer a yagna to me, and I will purify the Vajradharin. If he performs the Aswamedha yagna, the slayer of Paka will regain his position as king of the Devas. Nahusha’s hubris and indulgences will destroy him. Be patient and bide your time, Devas, but remain vigilant.”

Knowing that they are always true, Vishnu’s words were like amrita to their ears. And the Devas, their Acharya and the Rishis went to where the troubled Indra waited in constant terror. And there, they performed a great horse-sacrifice, which could expiate the sin of killing a Brahmana, so that Indra would be purified.

O Yudhishtira, Mahavishnu divided Indra’s sin among trees, rivers, mountains, the Earth and women; and Indra was rid of it. His fever of dread left him and he was himself once more.

From that place, Indra looked at Nahusha, before whom all living beings felt cowed, and who was unapproachable because of the boon that the Rishis had granted him. Sachi’s lord made himself invisible and wandered the universe, biding his time.

When Indra disappeared, Sachi sank into a well of grief. In utter misery she cried, “O Indra! If I have ever given you a gift, if I have ever made an offering to the gods, if I have ever propitiated my gurus, if there is any truth in me, then I pray that my chastity remains inviolate. I bow to Nisha Devi, Goddess of Night, who is holy and pure, and who rules during uttarayana, the northern course of the Sun. I pray that she answers my plea!”

Saying this, she purified herself in body and soul and worshipped Nisha Devi, whom she was able to invoke because of her chastity and devotion to truth, and she said, “Show me where the king of the Devas is. Let truth reveal the truth.””

"Salya says, 'Devi Upasruti appeared before the virtuous and beautiful woman. Indra's queen gazed at this young and exquisite goddess and, with a glad heart, paid her worship.

She said, "Who are you, lovely one?"

Upasruti said, "I am Upasruti. I have made myself visible to you because of your truthfulness, noble one. You are devoted to your husband, you are self-restrained, and you are devout in your worship; and so I will show you where Vritrasudana Indra is. Follow me quickly; and you shall see him."

Upasruti, with Sachi following her, crossed celestial groves and many mountains. She crossed the Himavat Mountain and, by its northern flank, arrived at the sea. Many yojanas over the ocean, she flew to a large island covered with marvellous trees and plants of all kinds.

And there the two devis came to an enchanting and heavenly lake, eight hundred yojanas long and wide, with flocks of birds all around and upon the shimmering water. Bhaarata, on its crystalline surface grew full-blown lotuses of five colours with thousands of bees humming above them. In the middle of the lake was a large and exquisite bank of these flowers, at the heart of which stood a singular white lotus upon a tall stem.

Upasruti infused herself and Sachi into the stem of this wondrous flower, and there Sachi saw her lord Indra in a miniature form. Sachi and Upasruti contracted themselves into tiny forms as well; and Indra's queen began to glorify her lord by reciting a litany of his celebrated deeds.

The divine Purandara said to Sachi, "Why have you come? How did you find me?"

Devi Sachi told him what Nahusha had done. She said, "O performer of a hundred sacrifices, he obtained the sovereignty of the three worlds and became powerful and haughty, and his soul became corrupt and vicious. He commanded me to serve him, and the wretch has even appointed a time by which I must go to him. If you do not save me, my lord, he will force me to give myself to him. That is why I have to come so desperately to you.

Mahabaho, kill the terrible Nahusha of the black soul. Reveal yourself, slayer of Daityas and Danavas. Assume your own power and rule Devaloka again.""

"Salya says, 'The illustrious Indradeva said to Sachi, "This is no time for rashness. Nahusha is more powerful than I am, beautiful one. His power has been augmented by the benefits that the Rishis gain every time they make offerings to the Devas and the Pitrs. I have a judicious plan, which you will have to carry out. You must not disclose it to anyone, but do it secretly.

Go to Nahusha in private, address him as lord of the universe and invite him to visit you, riding on a palanquin borne by Rishis. Tell him that if he does this, you will gladly place yourself at his disposal."

Returning to Amaravati, the lotus-eyed Sachi went to Nahusha, who saw her and, smiling, said to her, "Welcome, devi of the rounded thighs and sweet smiles. What is your pleasure? Give yourself to me. I am devoted to you and I will do whatever pleases you. Do not be shy; trust me. I swear by truth that I will do whatever you ask."

Sachi said, "O Lord of the universe, I want the time that you granted me. After that, you will be my lord. And I do have a wish that you must fulfil before I become yours. I ask this indulgence, knowing your love for me. If you grant my wish, I will be yours to command.

Indra had horses to ride on, and elephants and chariots as well. I want you to have a unique vehicle, the like of which neither Vishnu nor Rudra, nor any of the Asuras and Rakshasas possess. Let a number of exalted Rishis carry you in such a palanquin. This is what I wish. You should not think of yourself as being merely equal to any Asuras or Devas. You absorb their strength as soon as they look at you and, thus, there is no one as great as you."

Nahusha was pleased, and he said to that perfect goddess, "Fairest one, you speak of a conveyance never heard of before. I am taken with your thought, Devi; ah, I am in your power! A man who has Rishis as his palanquin-bearers cannot be a feeble person. I have practised tapasya and am mighty. I am the lord of the past, the present and the future. The universe would cease to exist if I were to be moved to wrath, for all the universe is established in me.

Devas, Asuras, Gandharvas, Nagas and Rakshasas together cannot withstand me when I am angry. My very gaze divests the man it falls on of his energy, whoever he is. And I am pleased to grant your request. The Saptarishis and other lofty sages will carry me, and you will look upon our greatness and splendour, lovely one."

Saying this with arrogant confidence, Nahusha dismissed Sachi. He harnessed a number of Rishis, all devout tapasvins, to him. Contemptuous of Brahmanas, capricious and intoxicated with power and pride, Nahusha made those divine sages bear his palanquin.

Meanwhile, Sachi went to Brihaspati and said, "Just a brief time remains of the period of grace that Nahusha granted me. Out of compassion for one who reveres you so much, I beg you to find Indra quickly."

Brihaspati said to her, "Excellent one, there is no need for you to fear Nahusha. He will not keep his power for much longer. Indeed, the wretch has already fallen for having ignored dharma and making the Maharishis his palanquin-bearers. I will perform a yagna for his destruction, and I will find Indra. Have no fear; for now, farewell."

Brihaspati kindled a sacred fire, in accordance with the Shastras, and made the choicest offerings into it, in order to discover where Indra was. After making his offerings, he commanded Agni to search for Indra.

Agni Deva, the consumer of burnt offerings, assumed a wonderful feminine form and vanished from there. With the speed of the mind, he searched everywhere—on mountains and in forests, on Earth and in the sky—and came back to Brihaspati within the blink of an eye.

Agni said, "Brihaspati, nowhere can I find the king of the Devas. The only place I have yet to search is the waters, which I am loth to enter, O

Brahmana. What would you have me do?"

The Acharya of the Devas said to Agni, "O Illustrious Deva, you must go into the water."

Agni said, "I cannot enter the water, for extinguishment awaits me there. I put myself into your hands, effulgent one; O may you be blessed. Fire originated in water; Kshatriyas rose from Brahmanas; iron was born in stone. All three, which can consume all other things, are powerless over the sources from which they spring.""

"Salya says, 'Brihaspati said, "O Agni, you are the mouth of all the gods. You are the conveyor of sacred offerings. You see into the inmost souls of all creatures. The poets call you single and three-fold at the same time. Consumer of burnt offerings, the Universe would cease to exist if you abandoned it.

By worshipping you, Brahmanas, their wives and sons win in Swarga the rewards of their good deeds. Agni, it is you who are the bearer of the havis offered at every homa and yagna. Why, you are yourself the finest offering. In the most sacred of yagnas, it is you who are worshipped with gifts and oblations.

You created the three worlds, and it is you who will unleash your power and consume them when the time comes. You are the mother of the Universe, and its destroyer, as well. Wise men say that you are the clouds and their lightning; your heat supports all life. All the waters are contained in you, as is this entire world. You purify all things. There is nothing in the Trilokas that you do not know. Every being looks kindly on its parent; enter the water without fear. I will imbue you with strength by chanting mantras from the Veda."

Agni was pleased at being glorified by Brihaspati and said, "I will reveal Indra to you. I say this truthfully."

Then Agni entered the waters, including seas and little ponds, and came to the lake where, as he searched among the flowers, he saw the king of the Devas lying among the fibres of a lotus stem. Quickly, he returned and told Brihaspati how Indra had made himself minuscule and taken refuge inside a lotus stalk. And Brihaspati, accompanied by the Devas, the Rishis and the Gandharvas, went to where Indra lay and eulogised him by reminding him of his great deeds.

He said, “O Indra, you killed the great Asura Namuchi, as well as the terrible Sambara and Bala. Now rouse yourself and vanquish your enemy. Rise, Indra, and see the Devas and Rishis who are gathered here.

You delivered the three worlds by killing the Danavas; with the foam of the sea, infused with Vishnu’s fervour, you slew Vritra. You are the refuge of all creatures and worthy of worship. There is no one equal to you. You are the support of all creatures. And you made the Devas great. Now, regain your sway over the worlds and all living beings by reclaiming your might, O Mahatman.”

Thus glorified, Indra became bigger, little by little, and finally assumed his own resplendent, magnificent form. His strength flaring, he said to Brihaspati, who stood before him, “What more needs to be done? I have annihilated the two terrible Asuras—Tvashtri’s son and the gigantic Vritra who savaged the three worlds.”

Brihaspati said, “The mortal king, Nahusha, who gained the throne of Devaloka through the power of the Devarishis, now persecutes us.”

Indra said, “How did Nahusha gain the throne of heaven, which is well nigh impossible to have? What tapasya did he perform? How great is his power, O Brihaspati?”

Brihaspati said, “The Devas became insecure when you renounced the lordship of Devaloka, and they wished for a king to rule over them. The Devas, the Pitrs, the Rishis and the Gandharvas met together and asked Nahusha to be their king and protector of the universe. Nahusha claimed that he was feeble and asked them to infuse him with the power of their tapasya.

The Devas and Devarishis obliged him, O Indra, and Nahusha’s strength grew and became terrible. That is how he became Trilokapati. And now the wretch has harnessed the Devarishis to his palanquin and travels, thus, over the three worlds.

May you never come within the dreadful Nahusha's vision, for he emits venom from his eyes and absorbs the strength of every being he looks at. All the Devas are in terror of him. They hide from Nahusha and do not dare even cast a glance at him."

While Brihaspati was speaking, there came to that place Kubera guardian of the worlds, Yama the son of Surya, the luminous Soma Deva and Varuna.

They said to Indra, "We are fortunate that you killed Tvashtri's first son and Vritrasura. How lucky we are to see you safe and well, with your enemies dead."

Indra received those Lokapalas and greeted them gladly and with proper ceremony. He said, "Nahusha is the king of the Devas, and is dreadful. You must help me overcome him."

They replied, "Nahusha is truly fearsome. His vision is poison, and we are afraid of him. If you overthrow Nahusha, we, too, should be entitled to a share of the punya.

Indra agreed, "So be it. You Devas—Varuna, Yama and Kubera—will be crowned alongside me. With the help of all the Devas, let us vanquish Nahusha of the venomous eyes."

Agni said to Indra, "Give me a share in sacrificial offerings, and I will help you, too."

Indra said to him, "O Agni, you will receive a large share in Mahayagnas; you and I will have an equal share each."

Accordingly, Indra conferred upon Kubera sovereignty over the Yakshas and the wealth of the worlds; upon Yama authority over the Pitrs; and upon Varuna dominion over the waters."

"Salya says, 'While the brilliant Indra was with the Lokapalas and other Devas, deliberating the destruction of Nahusha, there appeared at that place the venerable Rishi Agastya.

Agastya paid his respects to the lord of the Devas and said, "How happy I am that you, who killed Vritra and his brother who assumed the form of the universe, are well and growing in strength. Purandara, we are fortunate that today Nahusha has been removed from the throne of Swarga and that you have slain all your enemies."

Indra said, "Have you had a pleasant journey here, Maharishi? I am glad to see you. Oblige me by accepting this padya to wash your face and feet, this arghya and this cow for your yagna."

After the Brahmanottama accepted these, and when he was seated, the happy Indra said to him, "Dvijottama, tell us how Nahusha was cast out of Swarga."

Agastya said, "Listen, Indra, to how the vicious Nahusha, intoxicated with the vanity of power, was cast down from Devaloka.

The chaste Brahmanas and Devarishis who were his palanquin-bearers, weary from carrying him, questioned the haughty one, asking if he believed that the hymns in the Vedas to be recited while sprinkling water over cows were authentic. Nahusha, whose mind had been overpowered by tamas, said that they were not. The Rishis then told him that in fact they were, and that the Maharishis had declared their sanctity. They accused him of having veered from dharma and of treading a sinful path.

At this, driven by evil, he touched me on my head with his foot. Immediately, he lost his power and majesty, and became agitated and frightened. I said to him, 'Because you have rejected the veracity of the Vedic hymns that the Brahmanas and Rishis validated, because you touched my head with your foot, and because, ignorant wretch, you have turned these exalted tapasvins who are like Brahma into your beasts of burden, I hereby divest you of your grandeur and cast you out of Devaloka.

You will fall straight down into Bhumi, for all your punya is exhausted. For ten thousand years, you will range the Earth in the form of an enormous snake. At the end of that time you may re-enter Swarga.'

O Parantapa, that is how black-souled Nahusha lost his throne. It is fortunate that our strength is waxing and that the thorn in the flesh of the Brahmanas has been removed. Go to Devaloka; subdue your senses, suppress your foes, protect the worlds and let the great Rishis glorify you."

The Devas and Rishis were joyful, as were the Pitrs, the Yakshas, the Nagas, the Rakshasas, the Gandharvas and all the Apsaras; and the lakes, rivers, mountains and seas, as well.

Together they came before Indra and said, "We are filled with gladness at your prosperity, O slayer of your enemies. How fortunate it is that Agastya cast the vicious Nahusha out of Amaravati and turned him into a snake on Earth!"' says Salya."

"Salya says, 'With the adulation of the Gandharvas and Apsaras echoing all round, Indra mounted his Airavata, the king of elephants blessed with every auspicious mark. Accompanied by Agni, Maharishi Brihaspati, Yama, Varuna and Kubera, he went to Amaravati, surrounded by all the Devas, Gandharvas and Apsaras. There the performer of a hundred sacrifices was united with his queen and joyfully resumed his role as guardian of the three worlds.

The illustrious Devarishi Angiras came, too, to Indra's sabha and eulogised him with hymns from the Atharva Veda. Indra granted him a boon, saying, "Henceforth, your name will appear in the Atharva Veda as Rishi Atharvangiras, and from now on you will receive a share of all yagnas that are performed anywhere."

Maharajan, when Atharvangiras left after this honour was conferred on him, Indra honoured all the Devas and Rishis, rich with the wealth of tapasya and, in happy contentment, he ruled the Trilokas with dharma.

This is the story of the misery that Indra endured before being reunited with his wife; and, in order to slay his enemies, even he had to spend a time in hiding. Rajadhiraja, do not feel sorry for yourself because you, your brothers and Draupadi have suffered privations in the forest.

O joy of the Kurus, you will regain your kingdom in the same manner that Indra did after he killed Vritra. In the same way that Agastya cursed the arrogant Nahusha, bane of Brahmanas, reducing him to a snake for many long years, you will soon quell your enemies—Karna, Duryodhana and other evil ones. Then you and your brothers, with Draupadi, will enjoy dominion of the Earth, as far as the sea.

When his forces are arrayed in battle formations and ready to fight, the king who desires victory must listen to this story of Indra's triumph. That is why, Yudhishtira, I have narrated it to you, to ensure your victory. Exalted men attain prosperity when they are glorified. The destruction of countless noble Kshatriyas is imminent because of the crimes that Duryodhana has committed, and by virtue of the might of Bhima and Arjuna.

He who reads this story of Indra's victory, with faith in God, is cleansed of his sins. He attains a state of beatitude, both in this world and in the next. He will never need to fear his enemies; he will have sons; he will never encounter peril of any sort; and he will enjoy great longevity. Everywhere his victory will be proclaimed; and he will never face defeat,"' says Salya.

That best of virtuous men, Yudhishtira whom the Madra king Salya so exhorts, honours him with due ceremony and says to Salya, 'There is no doubt that you will be Karna's charioteer. You must dampen his spirits by praising Arjuna.'

Salya says, 'So it shall be. I will do as you ask, and whatever else is within my power to do for you.'

Then Salya bids farewell to the sons of Kunti and goes with his army to Duryodhana."

Vaisampayana said, "Satyaki, that great hero of the Satvata vamsa, comes to Yudhishtira with a vast army of foot-soldiers, horses, chariots and elephants. His soldiers, all men of valour, hail from diverse lands. Carrying weapons of various kinds, and all of them fierce and doughty, they embellish the Pandava army.

Yuyudhana's army looks splendid, with battle-axes, missiles, spears and lances; with mallets, clubs and staves; with cords; with gleaming swords and daggers; and with a variety of sharp, tempered arrows. The splendid army, made more magnificent by these weapons, is the colour of a cloudy sky, like a mass of clouds flashing with lightning. It consists of an akshauhini of troops, yet when it merges with Yudhishtira's force it is subsumed like a small stream flowing into the sea.

Dhrishtaketu, the powerful king of the Chedis, brings his akshauhini of troops and comes to the sons of Pandu. The immensely powerful Jayatsena, king of Magadha, adds his akshauhini of warriors to Yudhishtira's army; and the Pandya king from his coastal kingdom does the same with his troops.

O king, when all these legions are massed, the army with its finely attired, mighty warriors is a joy to behold. Drupada comes, too, with his tremendous sons and heroic fighting men from different lands, and they further enhance the splendour of that army. Virata, king of Matsyas, accompanied by the king of the hill kingdoms, leads his legions to the sons of Pandu.

Seven akshauhinis augment the Pandava army, and a multitude of banners flutters in the air. Their eagerness to fight the Kurus gladdens the hearts of the Pandavas.

Raja Bhagadatta gives an akshauhini of his men to Dhritarashtra's son, pleasing him enormously. The unassailable mass of Duryodhana's army, filled with gold-clad Chins and Kiratas, sparkles in beauty, like a forest of Karnikara trees. To Duryodhana's aid come, also, the courageous Bhurisravas and Salya, each with one akshauhini. Kritavarman, the son of Hridika, comes with the Bhojas, Andhakas and Kukuras, with another akshauhini. All those terrific soldiers wear flower garlands and look as captivating as playful elephants ambling through a forest.

Other forces from the land of Sindhu and Sauvira, led by Jayadratha, come in such vast numbers that the mountains seem to tremble under their tread. One akshauhini they are, and as they move they look like clouds driven by the wind.

Rajan, more kings and their forces join the Kuru king. Sudakshina, the king of the Kambojas, along with the Yavanas and Sakas, comes with an akshauhini of troops that resembles a swarm of locusts. This force is absorbed by the Kuru army and blends seamlessly into it. King Nila comes from his capital Mahishmati with great warriors from the southern regions, who carry delicately wrought and lethal weapons. The two kings of Avanti come, each with a separate akshauhini of their men. Those tigers among men, the five princely brothers of Kekaya, hasten to Duryodhana with an akshauhini of warriors, adding to his elation. Illustrious kings from other parts of the land arrive with three divisions of fighting men.

Duryodhana now has an army of eleven akshauhinis, a sea of colour with countless flags, eager to do battle with the sons of Kunti. So crowded is Hastinapura that there is no space in it even for the commanders of Duryodhana's own army. This massive combined force fills the city of elephants and its surroundings.

The land of the five rivers, the entire region of Kurujangala, the wild forest of Rohitaka, Ahichatra and Kalakuta, the banks of the Ganga, Varana and Vatadhana, the hills bordering the Yamuna—the whole of this rich and extensive tract, abundant with corn, is entirely occupied by that Kaurava army. And the priest whom the king of the Panchalas has sent to the Kurus sees this.”

SANJAYA-YANA PARVA

Vaisampayana said, “Drupada’s priest, the emissary of the Pandavas, comes to the Kaurava king Dhritarashtra who, with Bhishma and Vidura, greets him with ceremonial honour. The priest gives them news of the Pandavas and goes on to enquire about the welfare of the Kauravas. After this, he speaks in the presence of all the leaders of Duryodhana’s army.

The wise and seasoned Brahmana says, ‘You all know what the dharma of kings is. However, I will remind you of some things again before I begin what I have really come to say. Dhritarashtra and Pandu are sons of the same father. It is clear that they should inherit their father’s wealth equally. How is it that the sons of Dhritarashtra possess ancestral wealth, but the sons of Pandu have none? Why did Pandu’s sons not receive their share?

You are all aware that Pandu’s sons did not receive their inherited share of their father’s wealth because Dhritarashtra’s sons usurped it. Dhritarashtra’s sons attempted to remove them from their path to power even by trying to have the Pandavas murdered; but their destined time on Earth had not run out, and they could not send the Pandavas to Yama’s halls. Then, when those noble princes had carved out a kingdom for themselves by dint of their own strength, the wretched sons of Dhritarashtra, helped by Subala’s son, robbed them of it by low deceit. As was his wont, Dhritarashtra gave his approval, even to this.

For thirteen years the sons of Pandu were exiled, to live in the wilderness. Honourable though they were, in the sabha they and their wife were scorned, humiliated. Great was the suffering they had to endure in the forests; and unspeakable were the sorrows they had to bear, comparable only to the suffering that sinners undergo when they are reborn into inferior species.

O Kurusattama, the sons of Pandu are willing to overlook all past miseries and injustices; they want a peaceful settlement with the Kurus. Bearing in mind the exemplary conduct of the Pandavas, as well as Duryodhana's sinful ways, his friends should persuade Duryodhana to make peace. The heroic sons of Pandu are not eager for war with the Kurus. They want to reclaim their rightful inheritance without bringing the world to disaster and ruin. If Dhritarashtra's son finds an excuse for war, it can never be a just one.

The sons of Pandu are more powerful than him. Yudhishtira has gathered seven akshauhinis of troops, who are so eager to fight the Kurus that they just wait for his command. He has in his forces tigers among men, who are equal in strength to a thousand akshauhinis—Satyaki and Bhimasena, and the twins of untold prowess.

Yes, truly, these eleven oceanic divisions are arrayed on one side, but they are balanced on the other by the mighty-armed Dhananjaya of many forms. Arjuna's prowess is greater than that of all these legions put together. There is also Vasudeva's son of dazzling effulgence and tejas. Faced with Arjuna's awesome valour and Krishna's plumbless wisdom, who is there that can fight them? So, I ask you to give what ought to be given, in accordance with dharma and the agreement you made. Do not lose this opportunity to do the right thing, and save yourselves and other lives beyond count.'"

Vaisampayana said, "Bhishma hears what the Purohita says and, after paying his respects to him, speaks wise words, fitting to the occasion.

He says, 'I am glad that the Pandavas and Krishna are well. I am glad that they have found help and that they have set their hearts on a course of dharma. How fortunate that those sons of the Kuru vamsa want peace with their cousins. There is no doubt that you speak the truth; however, you speak bluntly. I presume that is because you are a Brahmana.

The sons of Pandu must indeed have been sorely afflicted, here and in the forest. By law, they are entitled to their father's kingdom. Arjuna is powerful, a master of all weapons and a Maharatha. Who can withstand Dhananjaya in battle? Even the wielder of the thunderbolt cannot, let alone mortal warriors. Arjuna is unmatched in the three worlds.'

Now, an angry Karna insolently interrupts Bhishma even while he is speaking. He directs his glance at Duryodhana, while saying to the priest, 'There is no one in the world, Brahmana, who is not aware of all this. What point is there in repeating them over and over again? Sakuni played the game of dice on Duryodhana's behalf, and won. Yudhishtira went into the forest according to the agreed stipulation, which was that if any of them was seen before thirteen years had passed they must spend another thirteen years in the vana. He now ignores that covenant and, confident of his alliance with the Matsyas and Panchalas, he wants his kingdom back.

Learned one, Duryodhana will not yield even a single foot of land if you try to threaten him; but if dharma required it, he would give up the whole Earth, even to an enemy. If the Pandavas want their ancestral throne back, they must pass another thirteen years in exile. Afterwards they can live as Duryodhana's liegemen, in safety and peace.

Let them not, out of stupidity, adopt a clearly sinful course. If they decide to abandon the path of dharma and go to war, they will, when they meet the unimpeachable Kurus, remember my words.'

Bhishma says, 'Of what use are your lofty, boastful speeches, Radheya? You would do better to remember the time when Arjuna single-handedly vanquished six Kuru Maharathas in battle. If we do not do what this Brahmana says, you can be sure that Arjuna will kill us all in battle.'

Dhritarashtra lauds Bhishma's words; then he rebukes the son of Radha, 'What Bhishma says is salutary—good for us, for the Pandavas and indeed for the whole world. I will deliberate over this and send Sanjaya to the sons of Pandu.

Brahmana, there is no need for you to wait; you can return today.'

The Kaurava king honours Drupada's priest and sends him back to the Pandavas. He then summons Sanjaya to the sabha and speaks to him."

"Dhritarashtra says, 'O Sanjaya, we hear that the Pandavas have arrived in Upaplavya. Go and enquire after them. You must greet Ajatasatru with these words: It is fortunate that you have come out of the wilderness and arrived at a city such as this. And to all of them you must say: Are you well, after having endured the hardships of exile, which you did not deserve? In no time they will think kindly of us, for, though we treated them treacherously, they are righteous and good.

Never have I known the Pandavas to be untruthful. It was their own efforts that won them their prosperity, yet they were always obedient to me. Despite the most severe scrutiny, I cannot find a single transgression for which I can blame them. They always conduct themselves with their status and with dharma in mind. They never yield to sensual temptations, to heat and cold, to hunger and thirst. They subdue sloth and apathy, joy, anger and thoughtlessness. The sons of Pritha are always conscious of dharma and are always pleasant and cordial.

When occasion demands, they give of their riches to their friends. Friendship with them never cools with passing time, for they bestow justly deserved honours and wealth on everyone. No one amongst the Ajamidas has ever hated them, excepting this vile, capricious and foolish Duryodhana and the even more evil-minded Karna. These two always envy and goad those Mahatmans who have been divested of friends and happiness.

The spoilt and pampered Duryodhana, full of initial bluster, thinks he has done well for himself. He is foolish to think that he can rob the Pandavas of their rightful inheritance while they still live. Before war breaks out, he would be wise to yield what is due to Yudhishtira, who has the support of Arjuna, Krishna, Bhima, Satyaki, Madri's two sons and the warriors of Srinjaya. From his chariot, Savyasachi, the wielder of the Gandiva, can devastate the whole world on his own; and so can the ever-victorious and exalted Krishna, the invincible Lord of the three worlds.

What mortal could face him who is the worthiest man in all the world, whose countless arrows roar like clouds and fly like locust-swarms to cover all sides? Alone on his chariot, with his Gandiva in his hands, he conquered the northern realms, including the Kurus who live there, and took all their wealth. He made the Dravida soldiers part of his own army. It was Arjuna who defeated the Devas and Indra in the Khandava vana, he who made offerings to Agni and enhanced the honour and fame of the Pandavas.

Of all mace fighters there is none to equal Bhima, nor any as skilful riding an elephant. On his chariot, he yields not to even Arjuna. As for the power of his arms, he is equal to ten thousand elephants. Of boundless energy, he is bitterly hostile, and his anger would consume my sons, making short work of them. Quick-tempered and immensely strong as he is, even Indra cannot subdue him in battle.

Large-hearted, powerful and endowed with lightness of hand, the twin brothers, Madri's sons, have been meticulously trained by Arjuna. Like a pair of hawks preying on flocks of small birds, they will not leave a single enemy alive.

If truth be told, despite being so vast, our army will be as nothing when it encounters the sons of Pandu. On their side they have Dhrishtadyumna of the boundless tejas, whom the Pandavas consider one of themselves. They have the king of the Somakas, with his legions, who is devoted to their cause and ready to lay down his life for them. Who would be able to withstand Yudhishtira who has the jewel of the Vrishnis, Krishna, for his lord?

I have heard that, though old now, Virata, king of the Matsyas, with whom the Pandavas lived for a year and whose wishes they fulfilled, has espoused the Pandava cause and is loyal to them, as are his sons. The five great princes of Kekaya, who were deposed from their thrones and want to regain their kingdom, have become allies of the Pandavas; they wield mighty bows and are ready to fight.

All the bravest kings on Earth have come together on the side of Pandu's sons. All these, who have become allies of Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, are infused with great new courage, honour and devotion, by virtue of their love for him. Many warriors from the mountain kingdoms and other inaccessible fastnesses, many old and venerable ones and many Mlechcha tribes boasting weapons of myriad kinds have pledged themselves to the Pandava cause and gathered under the Pandava banner.

The Pandya king, who is as mighty as Indra, has come with innumerable warriors all eager for fight. Extraordinarily brave and of unparalleled might and energy, he is devoted to the Pandavas. Then there is Satyaki who, I have heard, was trained in the use of astras by Drona, Arjuna, Krishna, Kripa and Bhishma, and who is said to be equal to Krishna's son Pradyumna; and he, too, is faithful to the Pandavas.

Once, the kings of the Chedi and Karusha tribes assembled and combined their resources together. And there was one amongst them who blazed in beauty like the Sun, who was considered unassailable in battle and the best archer the Earth had known. Krishna killed him and, in an instant, robbed those Kshatriya kings of all their power. Kesava looked at that Sishupala, adulated by all the kings led by the king of Karusha, and beheaded him to enhance the glory of the Pandavas.

The other kings saw Krishna in his chariot drawn by Sugriva and his other horses, abandoned the king of the Chedis and fled like small animals at the sight of a lion. Left on his own and, from sheer audacity and folly, Sisupala faced Krishna in single combat. Krishna killed him, and he lay dead, looking like a karnikara tree uprooted by a storm.

O Sanjaya, the things I have heard about what Krishna has done for the sake of Pandu's sons, and what I know of his achievements, disturb me and drive away my peace of mind. No adversary can withstand those that have that lion of the Vrishnis for their lord. My heart trembles with fear when I hear that the two Krishnas will be together in one chariot.

If my dull-witted son abstains from fighting those two, he may yet do well. Otherwise, the two Krishnas will consume the very Kuru race, as Indra and Upendra did the Danavas. Arjuna is equal to Indra; and Krishna is Immortal Vishnu himself.

Pandu and Kunti's son Yudhishtira is virtuous and brave, and shuns any low deed. Duryodhana has wronged this man of awesome power. If not for his noble character, he would burn us all in a wink with his rage. Suta, I do not dread Arjuna, Bhima, Krishna or the twin brothers as much as I dread the wrath of Dharmaraja when his anger is kindled. He has practised austere tapasya and kept the vows of brahmacharya, and all his wishes will be fulfilled. When I think of his wrath and how justified it is, I am filled with alarm.

Go swiftly in a chariot, as my emissary, to the encampment of the Panchala forces. Ask Yudhishtira about his well-being and repeatedly address him in affectionate terms. Meet Krishna, bravest of all men, who is the most magnanimous soul. On my behalf, ask him, as well, about his well-being. And tell him that Dhritarashtra desires peace with Pandu's sons. There is nothing that Yudhishtira would not do at Krishna's bidding, for Kesava is as dear to the Pandavas as their life-breath. And wise beyond understanding or description, he is devoted to them. Declare yourself as my messenger and also enquire after the welfare of all the sons of Pandu, the Srinjayas, Satyaki and Virata, and the five sons of Draupadi.

In the midst of all those kings, Sanjaya, as the occasion arises, say whatever you deem appropriate and beneficial for the very race of Bharata, anything that is not distasteful or provocative.'"

Vaisampayana said, “Sanjaya goes to Upaplavya to see the mighty Pandavas. He goes to Yudhishtira and pays his respects to him before he speaks.

Sanjaya says to Ajatasatru, ‘O king, I am so happy to see you in good health and surrounded by your friends, you who are as powerful as Indra. The aged and wise Dhritarashtra, the son of Ambika, enquires after your welfare. I hope Bhimasena is well, and Dhananjaya, and the two sons of Madri also. I hope Drupada’s daughter, the princess Krishnaa, is well, too—she who never swerves from the path of truth, that devi of great tejas, that wife of heroes—as I hope are her sons, who are your joy, all that you hold dear, and whose welfare you constantly pray for.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘O Sanjaya, have you had a safe journey here? We are pleased to see you. I hope that you are well. I am in good health and so are my brothers. It is after a long time that I hear news of that Bhaarata, the revered king of the Kurus. Seeing you makes me as happy as seeing the king himself. Is our grandsire Bhishma, who is blessed with boundless energy and the highest wisdom, and who is always devoted to Kshatriya dharma, in good health? I trust he is as he ever was.

I hope the noble Dhritarashtra is well, and also his sons. I hope the great and learned king Bahlika, the son of Pratipa, is also in good health. I hope Somadatta is well, and Bhurisravas, and Satyasandha, and Sala, and Drona, and Drona's son, and Acharya Kripa. I hope all those mighty bowmen enjoy robust good health.

O Sanjaya, the greatest and best archers, all the most intelligent and deeply learned, and the best of warriors, have allied themselves with the Kurus. I hope they receive the honour that they deserve and that they are well. How happy the people are in whose kingdom that mighty and handsome archer, Aswatthama, the honourable son of Drona, lives.

I hope Yuyutsu, the brilliant son of Dhritarashtra by his Vaisya wife, is in good health. I hope Karna, whose counsel the dull-witted Suyodhana takes so to heart, is also well. I hope the elderly mothers of the Bhaaratas are well, and that the kitchen-maids, the servants, the daughters-in-law, the nieces and nephews, and the grandchildren of Dhritarashtra's house are all free from ill health.

I hope the king continues to provide a livelihood to good Brahmanas. I hope Dhritarashtra's son has not appropriated from the Brahmanas the gifts I gave them, and that Dhritarashtra and his sons treat any hauteur on their part with forbearance. I hope he never neglects to provide for them, for that is the only way to Swarga. This is the excellent and clear path that Brahma has revealed to all living beings. If the sons of the Kuru house foolishly abandon tolerance of Brahmanas' shortcomings, they will be ruined.

I hope king Dhritarashtra and his son look after the administrators of the kingdom. I hope they have no enemies who, disguised as friends, plot their downfall. I hope none of these Kurus talk of our having committed any crimes, and that Drona, his son and the heroic Kripa do not think we are guilty in any way.

I hope all Kurus look up to Dhritarashtra and his sons as their protectors. I hope that, when they see a band of criminals, they remember Arjuna's deeds as the greatest warrior of all. I hope they remember how swift, unerring arrows flew from his Gandiva, its bowstring pulled taut, and the thunderous sound his dexterous fingers made as he stretched and released the string again and again. I have yet to see an archer to equal Arjuna, who can shoot sixty-one sharp, feather-flighted arrows with a single fluid motion of his hand.

Do they remember the mighty Bhima, who, like an elephant with the juice of rut trickling from rent temples trampling through a forest of reeds, makes hostile armies arrayed for battle tremble with dread? Do they remember the powerful Sahadeva, who conquered the Kalingas in Dantakura by shooting arrows with both hands? Do they remember Nakula, whom you accompanied: how he subdued the Sibis and the Trigartas and brought all the western lands under my control?

Do they remember the disgrace they had to face when they came, ill-advised, to Dwaita vana on the pretext of inspecting their cattle? Those malevolent men were crushed in battle by the Gandharvas, and it was Bhimasena and Arjuna that rescued them. In the battle that ensued, Bhima protected Arjuna and Madri's sons from behind, and Arjuna emerged unscathed after savaging the enemy. Do they remember that?

O Sanjaya, a single deed cannot bring happiness now when, despite our many endeavours, we have not been able to win over Dhritarashtra's son.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'It is just as you say, noble son of Pandu! Those you ask about—the Kurus and the foremost among them—are in good health and spirits.

Dhritarashtra's son is surrounded by noble and righteous men, as well as by sinful, evil ones. He, who gives gifts even to his enemies, is not likely to withdraw the livelihood he provides to the Brahmanas. You Kshatriyas follow a dharma that makes you harm even those that bear you no ill will. Such dharma is fit only for butchers. If Dhritarashtra and his sons harbour ill will against you, who are righteous, they must be held guilty of treachery.

Dhritarashtra does not condone the injury done to you; he is sorry for it. The old man grieves, Yudhishtira, for he has learnt from wise Brahmanas that treachery is the greatest of all sins. O king of men, the Kurus remember your prowess on the battlefield, and that of Arjuna who leads your forces. They remember Bhima wielding his mace, and the sounds of his conch-shell and drum rising to a deafening, maddening pitch. They remember those fearless Maharathas, the sons of Madri, ranging in all directions on the battlefield, endlessly unleashing torrents of arrows at the enemy.

We cannot know what destiny has in store for anyone. See how you, Yudhishtira, who are endowed with every virtue, have had to suffer unendurable trials. I am certain that your wisdom will help you forget all that misfortune, and cleave to fortitude. The sons of Pandu are all equal to Indra and would never abandon dharma for the sake of pleasure. You in your wisdom will secure peace for the sons of Dhritarashtra and Pandu, for the Srinjayas and all the other kings assembled here. Listen to what your uncle Dhritarashtra said to me after consulting his ministers and sons. Lend your attention to his message.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'O Suta, we are all gathered here—the Pandavas, the Srinjayas, Janardana, Yuyudhana and Virata. Tell us everything that Dhritarashtra asked you to say.'

Sanjaya says, 'I greet you all—Yudhishtira, Bhima, Arjuna and the two sons of Madri; Vasudeva, Chekitana, Virata, Satyaki, the venerable Drupada and his son Dhrishtadyumna. Hear what I say; I speak with a desire for the welfare of all the Kuru vamsa.

King Dhritarashtra welcomed the opportunity for peace and wasted no time in having the chariot prepared for my journey here. I hope Yudhishtira and his brothers, and his sons and kinsmen will accept the message I bring: Let there be peace.

The sons of Pritha are blessed with every virtue, with steadfastness, gentleness and candour. Born into a noble house, they are humane and generous, and eschew any shameful deed. They know dharma.

A base deed does not befit you, Yudhishtira, for you are noble, and the lord of a vast army. If you committed a sin, it would be a stain on your good name, like a smear of kohl on a white cloth. No one would ever knowingly acquire the guilt of an action that would result in universal slaughter; it is sinful and will lead to Naraka. Genocide is such an act, regardless of whether it results in victory or defeat.

The truly blessed are they who work for the success of their kinsmen's cause. The true son, relative or friend of the Kurus is he who would lay down his life, even at the risk of it being abused by evil, in order to ensure the welfare of the Kuru vamsa. If you, sons of Pritha, punish the Kurus by killing all your enemies, your life after that would be as death. Is life worth living after having killed your kinsmen?

Not even Indra himself, with all the gods on his side, can defeat you, who have Kesava, Chekitana and Satyaki by your side, and the protection of Dhrishtadyumna. On the other hand, who can defeat the Kurus who have Drona and Bhishma, Aswatthama, Salya, Kripa and Karna, and a host of Kshatriya kings supporting them? Who will be able to slay, without great loss of life on his side, the vast force that Dhritarashtra's son has assembled? I do not see any possible good ensuing from this war, either in victory or in defeat.

How can the sons of Pritha commit such a heinous crime, as if they were lowborn men who know nothing of dharma? I beg of you; I prostrate myself before Krishna and the venerable king of the Panchalas; I put myself under your protection, with folded hands, so that both the Kurus and the Srinjayas may prosper. Krishna and Arjuna are unlikely to ignore my words and spurn my plea. Both, if asked, would give up their lives for truth.

All this I say to ensure the success of my mission. The king and his mentor Bhishma both want to secure peace between you and the Kurus.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'What have you heard me say, Sanjaya, that suggests that we wish for war, and which makes you apprehensive? Peace is always preferable to war, Sarathy; which man who had an alternative would choose to fight? If a man can have everything he wants without having to actually do anything, he would not make the smallest discomfiting effort in any direction, far less go to war. Why should a man ever go to war? Who is so cursed by the gods that he would choose this horrible option?

The sons of Pritha do desire happiness, but their conduct is always marked by dharma and promotes the welfare of the world. The only happiness they want is that which accrues from deeds of dharma. The man who, in order to avoid sorrow, allows his senses to lead him in his quest for happiness is lured into actions that are wretched and miserable. A man's hankering for pleasure results in suffering; he who is free of such craving knows no sorrow. Like a fire that blazes more fiercely when fuel is added to it, desire is never satiated with the acquisition of its object; rather, it flares up, like embers when ghee is poured on them, always wanting more.

Compare the abundance that the fortunate king Dhritarashtra enjoys with what we possess. Unfortunate is the man who is never victorious; who does not enjoy music; who does not take pleasure in the fragrance of garlands and perfumes, or in cool, scented salves; and who does not enjoy wearing fine clothes. If this were not so, we would not have been driven from our kingdom; and although all this is true, none of us brooded over our torments.

The king, in his troubled state, looks to the might of others for protection. This is not wise. Let their behaviour towards him reciprocate his own to them. The man who, at midday in spring, throws a burning log into the dense undergrowth in a forest has every reason to rue his lot as he tries to escape from the fire that is fanned into a blaze by the wind.

Sanjaya, why does Dhritarashtra complain even though his own prosperity is intact? It is because he followed the course of action espoused by his vicious and foolish son? Duryodhana disregarded Vidura, the best of his well-wishers, as if he were his enemy. Dhritarashtra, who wanted only to please his sons, knowingly chose a path of sin. Indeed, from his fondness for his son, he would not pay heed to Vidura who, of all the Kurus, is his wisest and most sincere friend, who is vastly learned, eloquent and virtuous in all that he does.

Dhritarashtra wants to please his son and, at the same time, have the respect of others. His son Duryodhana is full of envy and anger; he breaks the sacred laws laid down for the acquisition of dharma and artha. He has a foul tongue, allows anger to dictate his behaviour; and his soul is absorbed in indulging his senses and his vanity. He harbours hatred for so many; he obeys no law; his life is evil; he is obstinate and ruthless. For such a son as this, Dhritarashtra knowingly abandons dharma and true joy.

Even as long ago as the time when I was playing that game of dice, I suspected that the destruction of the Kurus loomed near, because Vidura's wise words received no praise from Dhritarashtra. It was when they ignored Vidura that the Kurus' downfall began. As long as they placed themselves under the guidance of his wisdom, their kingdom flourished.

Let me tell you, Sanjaya, who greedy Duryodhana's advisors are now: Dusasana, Subala's son Sakuni and the Sutaputra Karna. Look at his foolishness. However hard I think about it, I cannot see how the Kurus and the Srinjayas can prosper when Dhritarashtra has usurped the throne unlawfully and even once banished the far-sighted Vidura. Dhritarashtra and his sons now want undisputed sovereignty over the whole world. Peace is impossible. He thinks of what he has taken with deceit and treachery as being his own.

When Arjuna takes up his Gandiva, Karna believes that he can stand up to him. Why, then, was Karna not able to prevail in any of the battles that have already been fought? Karna, Drona, Pitamaha Bhishma, as well as many other Kurus know that there is no bowman to compare with Arjuna. All the kings know how Duryodhana became a king although Parantapa Arjuna was alive. He continues to convince himself that he can rob the sons of Pandu of what is theirs, despite knowing that it was Arjuna who once came to his rescue when he was helpless, with nothing but a bow, four cubits long, to fight an unearthly Gandharva host.

Dhritarashtra's sons are alive only because they have not yet heard the reverberation of the fully-stretched Gandiva. Duryodhana thinks that he has achieved his objective, because he has not yet seen Bhima's rage. Even Indra would not rob us of our rightful sovereignty as long as Bhima, Arjuna, heroic Nakula and patient Sahadeva live. The old king and his son fondly imagine that his sons will not be consumed on the battlefield by the fire of the Pandavas' anger.

Sanjaya, you know what misery they have made us suffer. Out of regard for you, I would forgive them all. You know what happened between the Kauravas and us, and how we conducted ourselves towards them; let things continue in the same way. I will take your advice and seek peace. Let me have Indraprastha for my kingdom; let Duryodhana give it to me.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'O Pandava, your unswerving dharma is known the world over. I also see it, Prithaputra. Considering that even a great life is transient, you must not kill the Kurus. Yudhishtira, if the Kurus will not give you your share peaceably, I think it is better for you to live on alms in the kingdom of the Andhakas and the Vrishnis than win your kingdom back through a bloody war.

Our mortal existence is short; blame easily attaches to us; we are subject to constant suffering; life is uncertain; and life can never be as important as a good name. Therefore, never sin. O king, desires cling to men and keep them from leading a virtuous life. A wise man, having extinguished all desire, acquires unblemished fame in the world. The thirst for wealth is a fetter; and the virtue of men who pursue it suffers. The wise man is one who seeks only dharma. Even as a man's worldly desires increase, their impermanence makes his miseries increase.

The man who places dharma before all else shines like the Sun at his most glorious. A man devoid of dharma, of sinful soul, is ruined, although he may gain the very Earth.

You have studied the Vedas and lived the austere life of brahmacharya; you have performed yagnas to satisfy the needs of Brahmanas and have given generously to them. With a view to achieving the loftiest state that a man can, you have devoted yourself, for years on end, to the pursuit of tapasya.

He who devotes himself excessively to mundane indulgences cannot concentrate his mind on yogabhyasa, spiritual discipline; and such a man is always miserable. These fleeting sensual pleasures forsake him after his wealth is gone, and his lusts continue to drive him, even in frustration. He who has never lived a spiritually disciplined life, and sins, abandoning the path of dharma, has no belief in the permanence of the soul. This fool is slated for torment after death.

In the next world, a man's actions, both good and evil, are not nullified. All his deeds precede a man as he journeys from the mortal world to the next, and he cannot but follow them. Your deeds in this life are celebrated as being exceptionally noble and pure. They are like the delicious sattvik food specially prepared to offer, along with gifts, to Brahmanas and officiating priests at religious ceremonies. All karma is performed only as long as the mortal body lives, Prithaputra. After death there is no karma to be done.

You have performed mighty deeds that righteous men admire, and they will benefit you in the world to come. Death brings entry into the next world and, with it, freedom from old age, fear, hunger and thirst, and from everything that is disagreeable to the mind. After death, there will be nothing to do except to delight; such will be the fruit of your actions.

So, do not allow desire for temporal happiness to spur what you do in this world. At the end of your life and deeds do not, Pandava, take a path that forsakes truth, sobriety, honesty and compassion. You may perform the Rajasuya and the Aswamedha yagnas, but do not even think about any action that is sinful in itself.

If, after such a long time, you sons of Pandu yield to hatred and commit such a horrific crime as this war, you will have endured all these years of suffering in the forests in vain. It will have been for nothing that you went into exile, parting with your army, which was then under your control; from your loyal friends Krishna and Satyaki, golden-charioted Virata of the Matsyas and his son at head of his warriors, and from all the other kings, whom you once vanquished, and who have now come to fight by your side.

With all these mighty resources, with this army, with being held in dread by all, and supported by Krishna and Arjuna, you could well have slain your worst foes in battle; you could have long ago crushed

Duryodhana's pride. Why then have you allowed your enemies to grow so powerful and your friends so weak? What for have you lived in the wilderness for so many years? Why, having let slip the opportune moment, do you now want to fight?

A sinner of no wisdom may win apparent prosperity by fighting; a wise and righteous man can win enduring felicity by shedding his pride and, guided by his higher instincts, refraining from war. Yudhishtira, your instincts do not make you lean towards any adharma, and never have you committed any sin from anger. Why then do you now want to do this ghastly thing, against every dictate of dharma?

Wrath, mighty king, is a drug that cures no disease. Rather, indulging in it brings on a sickness of the mind; it robs a man of his justly earned fame, and leads him to sin. Good men quickly swallow and hold down anger, but not evil ones. I ask you to abjure your wrath and desist from war.

Who would indulge in anger which leads to mortal sin and perdition? Forbearance would be far better for you than the pleasures you would enjoy if your enemies—Bhishma, Drona and his son, Kripa, Somadatta's son, Vikarna, Vivimsati, Karna and Duryodhana—were killed. What happiness can you hope to enjoy after killing them? Tell me.

Even if you win all the sea-girdled Earth, you can never be free from decrepitude and death, pleasure and pain, bliss and misery. Knowing all this, do not go to war. If you want to take this savage course because it is what your advisors recommend, then abdicate everything to them and go away yourself. You must not leave the path that leads to Swarga.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Sanjaya, what you say is true; deeds of dharma are the best of all deeds. But, before you censure me, you should first determine whether my conduct has been in accord with dharma or not.

Sometimes, vice appears to be virtue and virtue to be vice; and sometimes, goodness is truly just that. The learned should use their discernment to distinguish one from the other. Then again, during times of distress, virtue and vice, which are indeed eternal and absolute, can appear to be the other.

A man should live according to the svadharma of his varna; however, one's dharma changes during a crisis. When his means of living are gone, the destitute man should certainly look for ways, other than those prescribed, by which he may fulfil his dharma. Not only such a man, but also one who is not destitute, must both be reproached if they act in contrariness to the condition of their lives at that moment.

The Creator decrees atonement for Brahmanas who, in their desire to avoid being destroyed, act in a manner opposed to their svadharma. Surely, then, all men may, in times of dire distress, do what is contrary to the dharma of their varna. Sanjaya, you should regard as worthy those who live according to their dharma during normal times, as well as those who do not in a time of crisis. Equally, you should censure those who flout their dharma during normal times and those who live by it during a time of distress.

For men who wish to gain self-knowledge and bring their minds under control, the same practices that are ordained for Brahmanas are prescribed. However, for those who have no immediate desire for mukti, and who are not Brahmanas, the code that is prescribed for their particular varnas is the best. This is the path that our fathers, grandfathers and ancestors followed. As for those that want knowledge of the Atman and also to avoid all karma, they, too, hold the same view and consider themselves orthodox. There is no other way.

O Sanjaya, whatever wealth the Earth or the gods have; whatever is beyond reach—in the realm of Prajapati, in Devaloka or in Brahmaloka—I would not seek it by means that violate dharma.

Krishna is Dharmeswara—the lord of virtue; he has an all-lustrous mind and is a master of the artha shastra; he has waited upon Brahmanas; he is all-knowing; and he counsels many mighty kings. Let him say whether I shall be held to blame, whether I would be acting against my dharma by abandoning peace and pursuing war, for he is impartial and desires the welfare of both sides.

Satyaki, the Chedis, the Andhakas, the Vrishnis, the Bhojas, the Kukuras and the Srinjayas follow Krishna's advice and slay their enemies, to the delight of their friends.

The Vrishnis, the Andhakas and Ugrasena, led by Krishna, have become like Indra—high-spirited, devoted to truth, powerful and happy. Babhru of Kasi, having got Krishna, the fulfiller of wishes, as his brother, and upon whom Krishna showers all life's blessings, even as clouds shower the Earth's creatures with rain after the arid summer, has attained great prosperity. So great is Krishna.

Know that he is the authority on the propriety of all karma. Moreover, he is dear to us and our friend. I will never do anything against his advice.'"

"Krishna says, 'O Sanjaya, my wish is that the Pandavas live and prosper, and that their desires are fulfilled; and I wish the same for Dhritarashtra and his sons. I have always wanted to say to the Pandavas that peace is what king Dhritarashtra wants above all else; and I think it is best for them, too.

Yudhishtira has shown an extremely rare inclination to peace, but Dhritarashtra and his sons are so avaricious that I can understand why the Pandava's hostility has been aroused. You cannot claim to be more knowledgeable about dharma than Yudhishtira or me. Why then do you speak reproachfully of Yudhishtira's conduct? He has great tejas; he is devoted to his svadharma; he fulfils his familial duties thoughtfully and in keeping with justice.

Brahmanas have held various opinions on the matter we are discussing. Some say that success in the world to come depends upon karma; some declare that all action should be shunned and that salvation is attained by knowledge alone. Brahmanas say that although man knows there is food, his hunger is not appeased until he has actually eaten it. They say that only the knowledge that helps a man perform his duties bears fruit, for actions have visible results.

A thirsty man quenches his thirst by drinking water—effort produces results, and therein lies the efficacy of work. If anyone thinks that there is something more productive than effort, his work and his words are meaningless. In the other world, it is by virtue of work that the Devas flourish. It is by effort that the wind blows. It is by effort that sleepless Surya rises every day and causes day and night, and Soma passes through the months and fortnights and the constellations. Fire uses energy to kindle itself and burn, doing good to mankind. The sleepless Bhumi Devi sustains her great burden by dint of her ceaseless effort. The sleepless rivers carry their waters without rest to sustain all beings. The ever-wakeful Indra pours down rain, making his power resound through the heavens and the cardinal points.

Wanting to be the greatest of the Devas, Indra led an austere life of wakefulness, like a holy Brahmana. He renounced pleasure and the gratification of his senses. Scrupulously and diligently he devoted himself to virtue, truth and self-control, forbearance, impartiality and compassion. It was by no small effort of devoting himself to this way of life that he acquired kingship over the Devas.

Brihaspati, too, did the same. He lived the austere life of brahmacharya with his mind closed to everything else. He gave up pleasure and controlled his senses, and became the Acharya of the Devas. Similarly, the Navagrahas, the Rudras, the Adityas, the Vasus, Yama Deva, Kubera, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas and the Apsaras, all worked hard to attain their positions. In the other world the Rishis shine as a result of their life of study, austerity and work.

O Sanjaya, knowing that this is the way followed by the best of Brahmanas, by Kshatriyas and Vaisyas, you being one of the wisest men, why are you making this plea on behalf of the Kauravas? You must know that Yudhishtira is constantly engaged in the study of the Vedas; that he is inclined to performing the Aswamedha and Rajasuya yagnas. Also, he rides horses and elephants, has a chariot, is arrayed in armour, and bears a bow and all other weapons.

If the Pandavas could see a course of action that does not involve the slaughter of the Kurus, they would take it. Their virtue would be saved, and they would achieve an act of punya, even if meant forcing Bhima to restrain himself. On the other hand, they might, as destined, die whilst fighting. If so, in trying their utmost to fulfil their dharma, their deaths would be praiseworthy.

If you approve of peace, I would like to hear your answer to this question: Is the dharma of a king to fight or not to fight? You must, O Sanjaya, take into consideration the division of the four varnas and their respective callings. You must hear the course of action the Pandavas plan to take. Then you may allot praise or censure, as you wish.

A Brahmana's dharma is to study, offer sacrifices, do charity and go on pilgrimages to holy tirthas; he should teach, officiate as a priest in yagnas offered by those who merit his help, and accept gifts from persons he knows.

A Kshatriya protects the people lawfully; he should practise charity, offer sacrifices, study the Vedas, marry and lead the virtuous life of a grihasta. If his soul is noble, and if he lives by the scriptures, he will easily attain the realm of the Brahman.

A Vaisya's svadharma is to study, work hard to earn and accumulate wealth through commerce, agriculture and cattle-rearing. He should conduct himself in a way that pleases Brahmanas and Kshatriyas; he should be upright, do good works and be a householder.

From olden times, the Sudra has been ordained to serve Brahmanas and be obedient to them. A Sudra should not study or perform sacrifices; he should be conscientious and alert in performing his service.

The king protects all these with care and ensures that all the varnas perform their svadharma. The king should not be addicted to sensual indulgence; he should be impartial and treat all his subjects equally. The king should never give in to sinful desires. If there is, in his kingdom, a man who is more praiseworthy than himself, and who is well-known and gifted with all the virtues, the king should encourage his subjects to recognise that man. An unworthy king, however, would not understand this. He would increase his own strength and grow in inhumanity, and become a target for the wrath of destiny. He would cast a covetous eye on the riches of others.

Now we come to war, for which weapons, armour, bows and arrows came into being. Indra invented these for putting plunderers to death. Punya is acquired by doing away with thieves. Many horrible evils have manifested themselves because the Kurus have been unrighteous and neglected law and religion. This is not dharma, Sanjaya.

Dhritarashtra, with his sons, has taken what rightfully belongs to Pandu's sons. He does not care about the eternal dharma of kings. And all the Kurus follow him. The thief who steals wealth stealthily and the one who seizes it openly must both be condemned. What is the difference between them and Dhritarashtra's sons? His greed has convinced him that what he does out of anger springs from righteousness.

The share of the kingdom that the Pandavas are entitled to is clear. Why should that share be seized by that fool? This being the state of things, it would be great punya for us to be killed in battle. A kingdom gained as a birthright is preferable to a throne conferred by a stranger. Sanjaya, you must explain these time-honoured laws to the Kurus in the presence of the assembled kings—all those witless ones who have been brought together by Duryodhana and who are already marked by death.

Look once more at that vilest of all their deeds—what they did in the Kuru sabha on the day of the dice. It is shameful that the Kurus, with Bhishma at their head, did nothing while the beloved wife of the Pandavas, the chaste Draupadi of unblemished fame, was seized, even as she wept, by Dusasana, that monstrous slave of lust. All the Kurus, young and old, were there. If they had prevented the humiliation inflicted upon her that day, I would have been pleased with Dhritarashtra, and that would have boded well for his sons also.

Dusasana brutally dragged Krishnaa into the midst of the sabha, where her fathers-in-law sat. Expecting sympathy, she found none to take her part, except Vidura. None of the kings uttered a word of protest, because they were all fools. Vidura alone, from a sense of dharma, spoke just and righteous words; he alone opposed Duryodhana. Sanjaya, at that time you did not speak of law and morality, but now you come to instruct Yudhishtira about dharma.

Panchali, on the other hand, even though she was dragged shamefully into the sabha, set things right; and like a ship at sea, she rescued the Pandavas and herself from a tidal wave of misfortune.

As Krishnaa stood in that ancient hall, in the presence of her fathers-in-law, the Sutaputra said to her, "O daughter of Drupada, you have no refuge. Consider yourself a slave in Duryodhana's house. Your husbands are defeated and are no longer of any consequence. You have a loving heart, so choose someone else for your lord."

Karna's words were like arrows, cutting down all hope, piercing the very soul, so dreadfully. They buried themselves deep in Arjuna's heart.

When the sons of Pandu were about to put on garments made of black-deer skins, Dusasana said, scornfully, "These all are mean eunuchs, ruined, and damned for a long time to come."

And Sakuni, the prince of Gandhara, spoke slyly to Yudhishtira during the game of dice. He said, "I have won Nakula from you; now what else have you got? You had better stake your wife Draupadi."

Sanjaya, you know all the shameful things that were said at the dice-game. I want to go myself to the Kurus to settle this most difficult matter. If, without injury to the Pandava cause, I succeed in bringing about peace with the Kurus, not only will it fetch great punya, but the Kurus will be saved from certain death. I hope Duryodhana will take heed of what I say to the Kurus, which will be wise, founded in dharma, full of good sense and compassion. I hope that when I arrive, the Kurus will pay me proper respect, or else Dhritarashtra's vile sons, already branded by the evil of what they have done, will be consumed by Arjuna and Bhima, who are keened for battle. Of this you can be certain.

When Pandu's sons were beaten at dice Duryodhana spoke vile and searing words to them. You can be sure that Bhima will remind him of what he said, at the first opportune moment.

Duryodhana is a mighty tree of evil; Karna is its trunk, Sakuni its branches, Dusasana its blossoms and fruits, and the wise Dhritarashtra himself its roots. On the contrary, Yudhishtira is a great tree of truth, Arjuna its trunk and Bhima its branches. Madri's twin sons are its copious flowers and fruits; and I, dharma, and men of dharma are its roots.

Dhritarashtra and his sons are the forest, and the Pandavas are the tigers in it. Do not cut down the forest with its tigers in it, nor drive the tigers from it. The tiger makes easy prey when it is outside its home; and the forest without tigers is easily entered and destroyed. The tiger protects the forest, which shelters it. Dhritarashtra and his sons are creepers, while the Pandavas are Sala trees. Creepers cannot flourish unless they have trees to cling to.

Pritha's sons are as eager to wait on Dhritarashtra as his own sons are keen for war. Let King Dhritarashtra do the right thing. The virtuous sons of Pandu, though well prepared for war, still keep the peace. Learned one, tell Dhritarashtra everything as it truly is.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Farewell, O divine one. Pandava, I will leave now; may you be prosperous. I hope I have not been carried away by my emotions and said anything to offend you.

Farewell also to you Janardana, Bhima and Arjuna, sons of Madri, Satyaki and Chekitana; I take my leave of you. May peace and happiness be yours; and I pray that all the kings here will look upon me with affection.'

Yudhishtira says, 'You have our leave, Sanjaya; may peace be yours. Learned one, you harbour no ill will towards us. We all know that amongst those in the court of the Kurus, you are a pure-hearted soul. Besides, you are a faithful ambassador, loved by us, gifted with eloquence, of distinguished deportment and sympathetic to us. Your mind is never clouded and, even if spoken to harshly, you never retort in anger. You never speak harsh or slighting words, or false or bitter ones. We know that what you say is without malice, always full of truth, and serious. Amongst all dutas you are our favourite. Besides you, the other who is welcome here is Vidura. We used to see much of you, and you are as dear to us as Dhananjaya. Go with all speed, Sanjaya.

Go to those Brahmanas of pure tejas, who are devoted to learning and live as brahmacharis, who study the Vedas whilst living on alms; go to the ascetics who live in the forest, as well as to the aged ones of other varnas. Pay your respects to them and enquire about their welfare on my behalf. Go to Dhritarashtra's priest, his acharyas and his ritvijas; ask after their well-being, too.

There are those who, though not of high birth, are intelligent, righteous and are men of strong moral fibre; men remember us and speak of us; and who live to the extent they are able by their dharma—tell them I am well and ask after their health. Enquire about the welfare of the tradesmen in the kingdom and the officials.

In our name, salute our beloved Acharya Drona—our mentor, who is well versed in dharma; who took a vow of brahmacharya in order to master the Vedas; who has made the astra shastra full and complete and who is always gracious to us.

You should also greet Aswatthama from us and ask after his welfare. He is learned and devoted to Vedic study; by living as a brahmachari, he has acquired lustrous energy, even like a Gandharva youth; and he, too, has made the science of weapons full and complete. Sanjaya, you must go to the home of Saradvata's son Kripa, that Maharatha, that best of all realised souls. Repeatedly salute him and touch his feet in my name.

Convey news of my good health to Bhishma, the foremost of Kurus, who is always valiant and abstains from doing harm; in whom asceticism, wisdom and Vedic learning reside; that steadfast and most excellent of men.

Greet the wise and venerable king Dhritarashtra, the blind lord of the Kurus, who has vast gyana, and is respectful of the old.

Enquire, also, after Dhritarashtra's eldest son Duryodhana, that evil, ignorant, deceitful and vicious man, who now rules the world; and ask about the violent and vile Dusasana, hero and mighty bowman, who is like his elder brother, only more bestial.

Sanjaya, greet the wise chief of the Bahlikas, whose most cherished wish is for peace among the Bhaaratas. You must also pay our respects to Somadatta, who is endowed with the most noble qualities, who is wise and merciful, and whose affection for the Kurus makes him patient with them. The son of Somadatta is worthy of the greatest reverence among the Kurus. He is my friend and a brother to us. A mighty bowman and the foremost of rathikas, he is worthy in every way. Ask after his welfare, from me, as well that as of his friends and advisors.

Then there are the younger Kurus, our cousins. Ask about their health and prosperity and speak to each of them in ways that you deem appropriate. Enquire about the welfare of the kings who have been brought together by Duryodhana to fight the Pandavas—the Kekayas, the Vasatis, the Salvakas, the Amvashtas and the leading Trigartas; the brave warriors from the east, north, south and west; those who have come from the mountain kingdoms; and all among them who are not cruel and who lead pure lives. Let that mighty host of honourable men know that I am well and that I ask after them; let all the elephant warriors, the horsemen, the chariot warriors and the footsoldiers know that I am well. Ask kindly after the king's servants—the revenue officials, the guards, the leaders of his troops, the accountants and officials who monitor other aspects of the affairs of the kingdom.

Sanjaya, enquire about the welfare of Dhritarashtra's son by his Vaisya wife—that young man who is among the best of all the Kurus, Yuyutsu, who never errs, who has great wisdom, who is blessed with every virtue, and who abhors the idea of this war.

Ask about Chitrasena, who is unrivalled at the intricacies of dice, whose tricks others never detect, who plays with great skill, who is a master of the game, who is unbeatable at the dice-board but not in battle.

Enquire after the health of Sakuni, the king of the Gandharas, native of the mountainous country, who has no equal in cheating at dice, who boosts Duryodhana's pride, and whose cleverness leads him only to ruthless deceit.

Ask about the well-being of Vikartana's son Karna, that hero who, alone on his chariot and unassisted, is ready to vanquish all the Pandavas whom no one else dares challenge in battle; Karna, who is peerless at beguiling the already deluded.

Ask also after the welfare of Vidura, who alone is devoted to us, who is our true guru, who raised us, who is our father, mother and friend, whose understanding is clear and unclouded, whose knowledge is deep, and who is our sagest advisor.

Greet all the elder ladies, of great good qualities, who are like mothers to us. Say this first, Mothers of living sons, I hope your sons treat you well, with kindness and compassion. Then tell them that I and my sons are well.

Greet those ladies, Sanjaya, who are equal in rank to our wives, and say to them, "I hope you are well-protected. I hope your good names are unblemished. I hope your lives are blameless and thoughtfully lived. I hope you behave with your fathers-in-law in a kind, praiseworthy manner. I hope you conduct yourselves so that you win your husbands' approval."

Then there are the younger women who are like our daughters-in-law, who have come to us from noble families, who are mothers and who deserve praise. See them all and tell them that Yudhishtira sends his affectionate greetings.

Embrace the daughters of your own house, Sanjaya, and ask kindly after their health on my behalf. Say to them, "May your husbands be kind and loving to you; may you please your husbands; may you have fine, clean homes, ornaments, clothes and perfumes; may you be happy and have all the joys of life at your command; may your faces and forms be beautiful and your words sweet."

You must ask after the others in the Kuru household, and tell them I am in good health—the maid-servants and man-servants, the humpbacked and the lame. Say to them, "I hope Dhritarashtra's son continues to provide you with the same comforts as before."

You must also see the people that Dhritarashtra supports with food and clothing—the physically and mentally disabled, the dwarfs, the blind, the old, the lame and the legless. Tell them I am well and that I ask about their well-being. Say to them, "Have no fear; do not be dispirited by your unhappy lives that are full of pain. They are the consequence of your sins in past lives. When I have defeated my enemies and gratified my friends, I will give you food and clothes in plenty."

I ask that you also see the weak and unprotected, those who strive in vain to make a living, the ignorant and all who lead sorry lives, and anyone who you consider deserving of our concern. Ask on my behalf about their welfare and peace of mind. You should also enquire after any outsiders who have sought Dhritarashtra's protection, those who have come to the Kurus of their own accord or who have been invited, and the ambassadors from other countries. Tell them all that I am well.

As for the warriors that Duryodhana has amassed, there are none on Earth to equal them. Dharma, however, is eternal; dharma is my strength, with which I will destroy my enemies. Sanjaya, say to Duryodhana from me:

That desire which tortures your heart, the desire to rule all the Kurus without a rival, is unreasonable and unjust. We will never do anything that harms you. Most heroic of the Bhaaratas, give me back my own Indraprastha, or fight me.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'O Sanjaya, the Creator controls everyone—the righteous and the sinners, the young and the old, the weak and the strong. It is that Supreme Being who imparts knowledge to the child and bestows innocence on the learned, at his will.

If Dhritarashtra asks you about our strength, tell him everything honestly, having first talked with all of us here and ascertained the truth. Go to the Kurus, greet the mighty Dhritarashtra, touch his feet and enquire about his welfare in our name. Then, when he is seated in the midst of his people, say to him,

"O king, the Pandavas live happily, because of your prowess. It was by your grace that those children got a kingdom. Having bestowed their kingdom on them, you should not neglect them now, for they would then be ruined."

Sanjaya, one person cannot rule over the entire kingdom. Say to him for us, "We wish to live united with you. Do not allow your enemies to divide us and vanquish you."

Sanjaya, with head bent, salute our grandfather Bhishma, the son of Santanu. Say to him, "You revived Santanu's race when it was threatened with extinction. Pitamaha, do what you think is best to make sure that your grandsons live in friendship and unity."

Then address Vidura, and say, Dear friend, for Yudhishtira's sake, counsel peace.

Then address that brash Duryodhana, when he is amongst all the Kurus; plead with him on my behalf. Say to him:

"We will forget the insults you heaped on our innocent and helpless Draupadi in the midst of the sabha, only because we have no desire to see the Kurus killed. The Pandavas have silently borne all the other injuries too, both before and after that, although they have the power to avenge them. The Kauravas know all this. Dear cousin, you even sent us into exile wearing deer-skins. This also we have endured because we do not want to see all the Kurus slain.

Commanded by you, and ignoring Kunti, Dusasana dragged Krishnaa into the sabha. That too we will forgive. But, Parantapa, we must have our rightful share of the kingdom. Turn your covetous heart away from what belongs to others. Peace will then reign amongst us, and we wish for peace.

Give us each even a single province of the empire. Give us Kusasthala, Vrikasthala, Makandi and Varanavata, and any province of your choice for the fifth. This will end the enmity. Duryodhana, give your five brothers at least five villages."

Wise Sanjaya, let there be peace between our cousins and us. Tell him also, "Let brothers be loyal to each other; let fathers and sons unite; let the Panchalas and Kurus come together in joy, and let the two clans be one. This is my fervent wish. Bharatarishabha, with joy in our hearts, let us make peace."

O Sanjaya, I am as able to make war as I am to strike peace; I am as prepared to acquire wealth as to earn punya; I can be as harsh as I am soft,' says Yudhishtira," said Vaisampayana.

Vaisampayana said, "Given leave to go, and having listened to what Yudhishtira wants of him, Sanjaya sets out at once for Hastinapura. He enters the city and presents himself at the gate of the palace apartments.

He says to the gatekeeper, 'Dwarapala, inform Dhritarashtra that I have returned from meeting the Pandavas. Do this without delay, if the king is awake. I have important things to tell him.'

The gatekeeper goes to the king and says, 'Bhumipala, Sanjaya is at the palace gate and wants to see you. He comes with a message from the Pandavas. Command me, my lord; what shall I do?'

The king says, 'Tell Sanjaya that I am in good cheer and health. Bid him enter, and welcome him; I am always ready to receive him. Why does he, who is free to enter at any time, wait outside?'

Sanjaya enters the palace and, with folded hands, comes before Dhritarashtra who sits on his throne surrounded by his courtiers—the wise, the heroic and the noble.

Sanjaya says, 'Lord of the Earth, I, Sanjaya, bow to you. Rajan, I went to the Pandavas from here. After paying his respects to you, Yudhishtira, the lustrous son of Pandu, enquired after your welfare. He enquired about your family and asked whether you are pleased with your sons and grandsons, friends and counsellors, and all your dependents.'

Dhritarashtra says, ‘O child, my blessings upon Ajatasatru. Is Yudhishtira in good health, and are his sons, brothers and ministers all well?’

Sanjaya says, ‘Pandu’s son is well, as are those with him. He, who acquires wealth and virtue without doing anything dishonourable, who is intelligent, learned, far-sighted and good-natured, now desires what was once his. Yudhishtira regards ahimsa as being superior to dharma, and dharma as superior to artha. His mind always inclines toward tapasya and inward joy, and to deeds of dharma which are spiritually exalting.

In his worldly life, man is like a wooden puppet controlled by an outside force. Seeing how Yudhishtira has suffered, I realise that the power of destiny is stronger than the force of human endeavour. And seeing your adharma, which is not only sinful and shameful, but will also surely lead to misery, I am convinced that a man like you will enjoy praise only so long as your enemies bide their time.

Having renounced all wrong-doing, like a serpent sloughing its old skin, the heroic Yudhishtira shines resplendent in perfection; his sins are now transferred to you. Rajan, reflect on your actions, which are dishonourable and violate both dharma and artha, and which have earned you evil karma in this world and inevitable misery in the next.

You have followed your son’s evil advice, in order to enjoy wealth that would, otherwise, have been hard to come by; and you hoped to keep your enemies at bay. The world has denounced this sin, which is so unworthy of you. Calamity befalls a man who lacks wisdom, or is low-born or cruel, who holds grudges for a long time, who is not steadfast in Kshatriya dharma, who has no tejas, or who is base and shameless.

It is fate that makes a man take birth into a good family, or become strong, or famous, or learned. It is fate that gives him life’s comforts and fate that gives him the ability to subdue his senses and discriminate between virtue and vice. No man, who is waited upon by the best of advisors, who is intelligent and can tell right from wrong in times of distress, who performs the necessary rites and rituals, who has full use of all his faculties, would knowingly sin.

These, your loyal counsellors, are united in their determination that the Pandavas must not get back their share of the kingdom. Circumstances seem to move inexorably towards the destruction of the Kurus. Provoked by your crimes against him, if Yudhishtira wants to punish you, the very race of the Kurus will be prematurely extinguished. He will shift all his sins, such as they are, to you and you shall bear the blame and the burden for them. Nothing other than the will of the gods can prevent this, for Arjuna was honoured by them in Devaloka when he left this world and went there. In the face of fate, all individual effort is as nothing.

The advantages of a noble birth and courage depend on what a man does for their development; and seeing that prosperity and adversity, stability and instability hold equal sway over a man and his possessions, Mahabali the Great, in his quest for the roots of suffering, failed to discover where the chain of karma of a former life began. He thought that the eternal Essence is the cause of everything. The eye, the ear, the nose, the skin and the tongue are the portals of a man's knowledge; if he suppresses desire, he achieves spontaneous gratification through them. Therefore, one must control one's senses, happily and without misgiving.

Of course, there are those that do not agree. They believe that if a man behaves thoughtfully, his actions will produce the desired result, like a newborn child growing when nurtured with food and drink. Men in this world are subject to love and hate, pleasure and pain, praise and blame. The honest man deserves praise, but you I censure for being the root cause of the enmity between the Bhaaratas, which will result in the erasure of countless lives. If peace is not restored, it will be your fault that Arjuna burns the Kurus, as a blazing fire does a heap of dry grass.

Rajan, in this world you are singular in the way you have given in to your son, who is completely unrestrained; in the way you complacently wear the crown of success, having done nothing to prevent the shame that occurred during the game of dice. Now reap the fruit of your weakness. By rejecting the advice of faithful friends and accepting the counsel of treacherous men, undeserving of your confidence, and by acting like a servant to your evil son's whim, you have as good as lost your great and prosperous empire.

I am tired from my journey and ask your leave to retire to bed now, Purushavyaghra, for tomorrow morning the Kurus will assemble to hear Yudhishtira's message to you.'"

CANTO 33

PRAJAGARA PARVA

Vaisampayana said, "When Sanjaya leaves, Dhritarashtra says to an attendant, 'I want to see Vidura; have him come here at once.'

The messenger goes to Vidura and says, 'Wise one, our mighty king wishes to see you.'

Vidura comes immediately to the palace and tells the servant to inform the king of his arrival. The man goes to Dhritarashtra and says, 'Maharajan, Vidura is here as you commanded. He wants to worship your feet. What shall he do?'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Bid him of the great wisdom and foresight enter. I am never unwilling or unprepared to see Vidura.'

The attendant goes out and says to Vidura, 'Kshattri, the king bids you go into his inner apartment. He says he is always ready to see you.'

Vidura goes into Dhritarashtra's chamber and, with hands joined, says to his brother, who is sunk in dark thought, 'Wise one, here I am at your command, to do whatever you want.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Vidura, Sanjaya has returned and has gone home after rebuking me. Tomorrow in the sabha he will deliver Yudhishtira's message. I could not get him to divulge what that is, and sleep evades my burning body. Tell me what is good for my feverish insomnia, my child, for you know dharma and artha well. Ever since Sanjaya came back from the

Pandavas, my heart has known no peace; and filled with anxious thoughts about the message he will deliver, my senses are in turmoil.'

Vidura says, 'Sleeplessness is for a thief, a lustful man, one who has lost his wealth, one who has failed in his endeavour, or a weak man under attack by a strong one. I hope, my lord, that none of these has overtaken you, and that you do not grieve or covet another's wealth.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'I want to hear you speak wise words of dharma. In our race of Rajarishis it is only you that the Munis respect.'

Vidura replies, 'Yudhishtira is blessed with every virtue; he deserves to be the ruler of the three worlds. Despite his worthiness to rule beside you, you exiled him.

Your qualities, on the other hand, are the opposite of his. Neither your virtues nor your knowledge of dharma entitles you to a share of the kingdom, for you are blind. As a consequence of his mildness and compassion, his righteousness and love of truth, his strength, and his reverence for you, Yudhishtira patiently endures innumerable and grievous wrongs. How can you hope to have prosperity or peace of mind when you have handed over the reins of the kingdom to Duryodhana, Subala's son, Karna and Dusasana?

The wise man is one who uses Atmagyana, hard work, forbearance and adherence to dharma to earn punya. The wise man is one who is known by his dharma, his rejection of sin, and by his faith and reverence. The wise man is one who cannot be swerved from his dharma by anger, joy, pride, false modesty, a crisis or vanity.

The man who keeps what he intends to say and do from his enemies and whose deeds become known only after he has done them is wise. The man who does not allow heat, cold, fear born of attachment, prosperity or adversity to obstruct his plans is wise. The man whose judgment is detached from desire, who pays equal attention to dharma and artha, who disregards pleasure and chooses goals that will stand him in good stead in this world and in the next is wise.

He who exerts as much effort as he can and does his very best, dismissing nothing as insignificant is wise. He who has a quick understanding, who listens patiently, who pursues his goals with good sense and not from desire, and who does not waste his energy on talking, unasked, about other people's affairs is wise. He who does not yearn for the unattainable, who does not grieve for what is lost, whose mind is clear even in a crisis is wise. He who begins something and strives until it is completed, who never wastes his time, who has his soul under control is wise.

Bharatarishabha, wise men always delight in honest deeds; they do only what leads to their happiness and prosperity and never mock at what is good.

He who neither exults at being honoured nor grieves at being slighted, who remains serene like a lake on the Ganga is wise. He who knows the nature of all creatures—that no one and nothing is immortal—who is aware of the inter-connectedness of all things and all karma, and who knows the means that men may resort to for attaining their goals is wise. He who speaks confidently, who can converse on diverse subjects, who knows the art of debate, who has keen intelligence and who can interpret the meaning of what is written in sacred books is wise. He whose studies are regulated by reason, whose thinking follows the scriptures and who always pays homage to the good is wise.

On the other hand, he who is vain though ignorant of the Shastras, arrogant though poor, and who uses unfair means to reach his goals is a fool. He who ignores his own affairs and pries into those of others, and who deceives his friends is a fool. He who craves things he should not and pushes aside the things he can justly wish for and who maligns powerful men is a fool. He who thinks of his enemy as a friend and hates his friends and who commits evil is a fool.

Bharatarishabha, he who discloses his enterprises, who doubts everything and who dawdles over what can be done quickly is a fool. He who does not perform the sraddha for the Pitrs, who does not worship the Devas and who does not cultivate noble-minded friends is a fool.

He is a fool and the worst of men who enters a place uninvited, who talks a lot without being asked and who trusts the dishonourable. He is the most foolish of men who blames others for something he himself is guilty of and who, though powerless, gives vent to anger. He is a fool who does not know his own strengths, who ignores both dharma and artha and, without equipping himself adequately, yearns for something that is difficult to obtain.

O king, he who punishes the innocent, who pays homage to the undeserving and who keeps the company of misers is a man of little sense.

But he who, having acquired great wealth and prosperity, as well as vast learning, is not haughty is wise.

Who is more heartless than the man who, though wealthy and who eats and dresses well, does not share his riches among his dependants? The sins of one person result in advantages for many; but eventually it is the sinner alone who suffers the consequences of the sin, while the others escape. When an archer shoots an arrow he may or may not succeed in killing anyone, but when an intelligent man applies his mind, he can raze a kingdom and destroy its king.

Discriminate between the two by means of the one. Control the three by means of the four. Conquer the five by knowing the six, abstain from the seven and be joyful. Poison kills only one person, as does a weapon; but one evil man can annihilate an entire kingdom, its king and all his subjects. One should not, on one's own, gorge on tasty food, think about material gains, go on a journey or be the only one awake amongst a group of sleeping people. Listen now to what these are.

O king, that Being who is the Supreme One without a second, whom you have not been able to comprehend, is truth manifest and, like a boat on the ocean, the Way to salvation.

There is only one defect in those who are forgiving by nature—they are considered weak. That defect, however, should be ignored, for forgiveness is a powerful quality—a virtue for the gentle, an ornament for the strong. Forgiveness conquers all; there is nothing that the power of forgiveness cannot achieve. What can an evil person do to one who holds the sword of forgiveness in his hand? Cinder falling on grassless ground extinguishes itself. An unforgiving man defiles himself with many atrocities. Righteousness is the highest virtue; forgiveness is the supreme peace; knowledge is the supreme contentment and benevolence the supreme happiness.

Just as a serpent swallows small animals living in burrows, the earth devours two kinds of people: a Kshatriya who is an inept warrior and a Brahmana who does not undertake pilgrimages to holy tirthas. A man may attain fame in this world by doing two things: refraining from harsh speech and ignoring those that are evil.

Naravyaghra, there are two kinds of people who have no will of their own: women who desire men only because other women want them, and persons who worship another just because others do. Two things are like sharp thorns tormenting the body: the desires of a poor man and the anger of the impotent. There are two people who never shine because of their contrary conduct: a householder who makes no effort and a beggar who plots intrigues.

There are two kinds of persons, Rajan, who live in a more blissful place than Swarga: a powerful man who is graced with the quality of forgiveness and a poor man who is charitable. There are two ways of misusing that which is honestly gained: by making gifts to the unworthy and by turning away the worthy.

Two kinds of men should be cast into deep water with weights tied to their necks: a wealthy man who does not give and a poor man who is proud. Two other kinds of men shine more splendidly than the Sun: a mendicant accomplished in yoga and a warrior who dies in battle.

Vedic scholars say that a man's means may be great, average or poor. A man's ability may be good, middling or bad. Every man should, therefore, be employed in work for which he is fit.

There are three kinds of persons who cannot have wealth of their own: the wife, the slave and the son; whatever they earn becomes the property of the man to whom they belong. There are three kinds of crimes which inspire great fear: the theft of another's property, the outrage of another's wife and the fight with a friend. There are three qualities which, besides being self-destructive, also lead to hell: lust, anger and greed; everyone should renounce them. There are three kinds of persons whom one should never abandon, even in the face of grave danger: a follower, the person who puts himself under one's protection and a guest in one's house. There are three actions that bring as much merit as rescuing an enemy from distress: conferring a boon, acquiring a kingdom and having a son.

Learned men have declared that a king, however powerful, should never consult with these four kinds of men: the dull-witted one, the procrastinator, the indolent one and the flatterer. Rajan, crowned with prosperity and leading the life of a grihasta, let these four kinds of persons live with you: elderly relatives, noblemen who have fallen on hard times, impoverished friends and childless sisters.

When Indra asked him, Brihaspati declared that there are four things that can come to fruition in a single day: the resolve of the gods, the understanding of intelligent people, the humility of learned men and the destruction of the sinful. These four, which are intended to remove fear, fetch fear when they are improperly performed: the agnihotra, the vow of silence, study and sacrifice.

A man should worship these five fires: the father, the mother, the sacred fire, the soul and the guru. Men attain great fame in this world by serving these five: the Devas, the Pitrs, other men, beggars and guests. These five follow a man wherever he goes: his friends, his enemies, those that are indifferent to him, his dependents and those that are entitled to his maintenance. If one of man's five senses develops a flaw, then from that single egress all his intelligence leaks out, like water out of a perforated water bag.

These are the six evil habits that a man who wants to attain prosperity must avoid: sleep, heedlessness, fear, anger, sloth and procrastination. These six should be abandoned like a broken ship at sea: a teacher who cannot explain the Shastras, a priest who is illiterate, a king who gives no protection, a wife who speaks unpleasantly, a cowherd who does not want to go out to the pasture and a barber who wants to leave the village to live in the forest.

Man must never forsake these six virtues: truth, charity, diligence, benevolence, forgiveness and patience. These six things are instantly destroyed if neglected: cattle, service, agriculture, a wife, learning and a Sudra's wealth.

These six forget those who have done them favours: educated disciples forget their gurus; married men forget their mothers; men forget the woman once she has gratified their sexual desires; they who have achieved success forget those who helped them; they who have crossed a river forget the boat that carried them over; and patients who have been cured forget their physicians.

These six, O king, promote happiness: good health, freedom from debt, living at home, the companionship of good men, certainty of one's livelihood and living without fear. These six kinds of persons are always miserable: the envious, the malicious, the discontented, the bad-tempered, the suspicious and those depending upon the wealth of others. These six make up the happiness of men: acquisition of wealth, continuous good health, a loving and sweet spoken wife, an obedient son and knowledge that is lucrative.

There are six desires that are ever present in the human heart; and the man who gains mastery over them by controlling his senses never sins or suffers any calamity. There are six kinds of persons who subsist on six other kinds: thieves upon those who are careless; physicians upon the ailing; women upon the lustful; priests on those that want to perform sacrifices; a king upon men who quarrel; and men of learning upon those that do not have it.

A king should renounce these seven faults that lead to disaster; they can bring even firmly established monarchs to ruin: women, dice, hunting, drinking, harsh speech, inhuman punishment and the misuse of wealth.

These eight conditions indicate a man's imminent downfall: hating Brahmanas, disputes with Brahmanas, appropriation of a Brahmana's possessions, taking the life of Brahmana, taking pleasure in abusing Brahmanas, an aversion to praising Brahmanas, forgetting Brahmanas on ceremonial occasions and giving vent to spite when Brahmanas ask for something. A wise man should understand and avoid them.

Bhaarata, only these eight conditions can produce sublime happiness: meeting with friends, accession of immense wealth, embracing a son, sexual union during intercourse, conversation with friends at proper times, the advancement of those one is allied to, the acquisition of what has been anticipated and being respected in society.

Eight qualities glorify a man: wisdom, noble birth, self-restraint, learning, prowess, moderation in speech, charity according to one's capacity to give and gratitude.

This house has nine doors, three pillars and five witnesses; and it is presided over by the soul. The learned man who realises this is truly wise.

Dhritarashtra, these ten do not know what virtue is: the intoxicated man, the inattentive one, the raving man, the exhausted one, the angry, the starving, the hasty, the covetous, the frightened and the lustful one. The wise man must avoid their company. In this connection there is an old story about what happened between the Asura lord and Duryodhana, for the sake of the Asura's son.

The king who renounces lust and anger; who gives wealth to deserving people; who is discerning, learned and active is a lord of men. The king who knows how to inspire confidence in others, who punishes the guilty with just punishment and knows when to show clemency enjoys great prosperity.

The wise man does not ignore even a weak enemy and is intelligently cautious about the foe who waits for an opportunity; he does not invite hostilities with people who are stronger than himself; and he shows his strength only when he needs to. He is the most noble-minded of men, who does not grieve once a calamity has struck him, but deals with the crisis sensibly, and who patiently endures adversity; this man will defeat all his enemies.

Always happy is the man who does not live away from home without good reason, who does not make friends with sinners, who never molests another man's wife, who is never arrogant, who never steals, who is never ungrateful and who does not drink.

He is wise, who never boastfully pursues dharma, artha and kama; who always tells the truth when asked; who does not argue even for the sake of a friend; and who never gets angry even if insulted.

Everyone praises the man who has no malice towards others but is kind to all; who, being weak, avoids disputes; who does not speak arrogantly; and who forgives a wrong done to him.

Everyone loves the man who is never haughty, who never speaks ill of others while praising himself, and who never forgets himself and speaks harshly. Sages consider him a good man who does not rake up old quarrels, who is neither arrogant nor obsequious and who never violates dharma even when in distress.

The man who neither exults in his own happiness nor delights in another's misery, and who has no regrets after giving a gift is a good man. The man who is eager to learn about the customs of other countries and the languages and dharma of different varnas knows everything—important and insignificant; and wherever he goes, he gains authority over others, even the great. The intelligent man, who renounces pride, folly, insolence, sinful deeds, treasonous actions, dishonesty, enmity and arguments with men who are drunk, mad or evil is the best of men.

The gods bestow prosperity on the man who makes a daily habit of self-restraint, self-purification, performing sacred rites, worshipping the gods and conducting rituals of penance. The learned man, whose actions are well thought out and properly executed, arranges a marriage with someone of equal status to his own; he looks up to people who are better than him; he talks, mixes and forms friendships with persons of his own status.

The man who eats frugally after dividing the food amongst his dependents, who sleeps little after working hard, and who, when asked, gives even to his enemies is a man with his soul under control. Disaster stays away from such a man.

The man who keeps his own counsel with plans and executes them without others knowing much about these, and whose actions, consequentially, never injure others, succeeds in achieving even the most trifling goal. The man who is intent upon abstaining from doing injury to all creatures, who is truthful, gentle, charitable and pure-minded shines among his kinsmen like a precious gem of the purest quality from the best mine.

The man who is ashamed of his faults, even though only he knows of them, is the most honourable of men. With his pure heart and boundless energy, with his mind turned inwards, he blazes in energy like the Sun.

King Pandu, suffering under a Brahmana's curse, had five sons born to him in the forest; they are like five Indras. You brought up those children and taught them everything; they are obedient to you. Give them back their fair share of the kingdom, and you and your sons will be happy; and then, Rajan, you will regain the trust and confidence of both gods and men.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me how a man copes with sleeplessness and burning anxiety. Only you know dharma and artha. Give me the benefit of your wisdom, generous Vidura; tell me what you think is good for both Yudhishtira and the Kurus. I think of my guilt, and I fear the dreadful things that may be in store for me. It is with terrible apprehension that I ask you this: what is Yudhishtira thinking?'

Vidura says, 'Even if one is not asked, one should be truthful in what one says—be it good or bad, pleasing or hateful—to the man whose downfall one does not wish. I will tell you what is for the good of the Kurus, which is both beneficial and dharma. Listen, Rajan.

Do not set your heart on unjust, sinful ways to achieve your ends. An intelligent man must not grieve if he does not succeed, despite using fair and righteous means. Before he embarks on a course of action, a man must take three things into consideration that all actions depend on: the competence of the person executing the plan, the nature of the deed itself and its purpose. He should think carefully about these and not act on impulse. The wise man must decide either to do something or not, after considering his ability, the act, and the consequences of failure and success.

The king who does not know the true extent of his kingdom, his profits and losses, his treasury, his population and the nature of the danda neeti—the law of punishment, cannot hope to keep his kingdom for long. On the other hand, the king who is aware of all these, as prescribed in the ancient treatises, and who is learned in dharma and artha will retain his kingdom.

Just as the planets affect the stars, the senses affect this world, regardless of whether they are directed or uncontrolled in their journey to their respective goals. Like the Moon waxing during the bright fortnight, calamities pile up for the man who allows his senses to control him and direct his actions. The man who tries to control his counsellors before controlling himself, or to subdue his adversaries before controlling his counsellors, ultimately succumbs in weakness. Hence, the man who first achieves mastery over himself, thinking of the ego as an enemy, always succeeds in subduing his counsellors and adversaries.

Great prosperity is his who has subdued his senses, controlled his soul and is able to punish all offenders; who acts with discernment and is blessed with patience. A man's body is his ratha; the inner soul is the sarathy; the senses are the horses. When this chariot is drawn by well-trained steeds, the wise man journeys pleasantly through life and finds ultimate peace. Horses that are unbroken and wild always lead an unskilful charioteer to doom during the course of his journey; so, too, do one's senses, if they are not subdued.

The inexperienced man, who is driven by his rampaging senses, thinks he can extract evil from good and good from evil, and he confuses sorrow with happiness. He who forsakes dharma and artha, and follows his senses, soon loses prosperity, wealth, his wife and his life. He who is the master of riches but not of his senses loses his riches. One should strive to know one's self by using the Self, by controlling one's mind, intellect and senses; for the self is as much an ally as an enemy. The man who has conquered his self through the Self, has his self for a friend—the self can be either friend or foe.

Desire and anger tear at wisdom, just as large fish rip apart a flimsy net. The man who strives for success, paying heed to dharma and artha, wins happiness and all that he aspires for. He who wants to vanquish his outward adversaries without first conquering his inner enemies—his five senses—is overpowered by them. Many evil kings, because of their lack of mastery over their senses, are ruined by their own actions, which are directed by their unending lust for more territory and possessions.

Just as wet fuel burns along with the dry, so, too, is an innocent man punished by association with evil men. Friendship with sinful men must be avoided. The ignorant man who fails to control his five greedy enemies, each of which has its own selfish goals, is overwhelmed by disaster.

Evil men never have these attributes: guilelessness, simplicity, innocence, contentment, sweetness of speech, self-restraint, truth and steadiness. Inferior men do not have Atmagyana; they are never stable, patient or devoted to dharma, and neither trustworthy nor charitable.

Fools try to injure the wise with false accusations and harsh words. In consequence, they acquire the sins of the wise who, freed from guilt, gain forgiveness. Malice is the strength of evil-minded men; protection of the weak and of women is the strength of kings; forgiveness is the strength of the virtuous.

To control speech is said to be most difficult. It is not easy to hold a long conversation full of meaningful words that also delight the ear. Well-spoken words produce many benefits, but harsh ones are the cause of all evils. A forest destroyed by arrows or cut down by hatchets may grow again, but a heart wounded by cruel words never recovers. Weapons such as arrows, spears and bearded darts can be removed from the body, but a dagger of words plunged into the heart cannot. The mouth shoots word-arrows that strike deep and cause anguish through day and night. A learned man should never discharge such arrows; they pierce the very soul.

The man whom the gods have destined for defeat loses his good sense and debases himself by dishonourable conduct. When one's intellect becomes clouded and one's destruction is imminent, one is convinced that wrong is right. Bharatarishabha, you do not see that your sons are in the grip of their deluded minds because of their hostility toward the Pandavas. Neither do you see that Yudhishtira, blessed with every auspicious mark and worthy of ruling the three worlds, is obedient to you.

Dhritarashtra, exclude all your sons and make Yudhishtira Dharmaraja your heir. Intelligent and wise, steeped in dharma and artha, he has suffered untold misery out of kindness and sympathy for you and in order to preserve your good name.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Effulgent one, tell me more about dharma and artha. My thirst for them remains unquenched, and your words delight my ears and my heart.'

Vidura says, 'Ritual bathing in all the tirthas and compassion towards all creatures have equal merit, with kindness having the edge. Rajan, be kind to all your sons; by that you will win great fame in this world, and heaven thereafter. A man is glorified in Swarga for as long as his good deeds are spoken of in this world. Listen to an ancient story about the conversation between Virochana and Sudhanwan, both suitors for Kesini's hand.

Once, long ago, there was a maiden named Kesini, whose beauty was unrivalled. Wanting a good husband, she decided to choose one through a swayamvara. Wanting her for himself, one of Diti's sons, Virochana, went to her swayamvara.

Kesini noticed this Daitya lord and said to him, "O Virochana, tell me, who are superior—Brahmanas or the sons of Diti? Why is Sudhanwan not sitting on the grander seat?"

Virochana said, "O Kesini, because we are the firstborn of Prajapati, we are superior to all creatures. The world is ours. Who are the Devas, and what are the Brahmanas before us?"

Kesini said, “We will remain in this pavilion, Virochana. Sudhanwan will come here tomorrow, and I want to see both of you sitting together.”

Virochana said, “Sweet and timid one, I will do as you say. Tomorrow morning, you will see Sudhanwan and me together.”

When the night passed and the Sun rose Sudhanwan came there and saw Virochana waiting with Kesini. Kesini got up; she offered him her seat, padya to wash his feet and arghya.

When Virochana invited him to share his seat, Sudhanwan said, “O Son of Prahlada, I will touch your beautiful golden seat, but since you are not my equal, I cannot sit on it with you.”

Virochana said, “You have the right to sit only on a wooden plank, an animal skin or a mat of grass or straw. You do not deserve to sit on the same seat as me.”

Sudhanwan said, “Only father and son, Brahmanas of the same age and equal learning, two Kshatriyas, two Vaisyas or two Sudras can sit together on the same seat; no others may sit together. Your father used to pay his respects to me and take a seat lower than mine. You are young, brought up in every luxury at home, and you understand nothing.”

Virochana said, “I will wager all the gold, cattle, horses and every other kind of wealth that we have among the Asuras to the one who is able to answer this question that has arisen.”

Sudhanwan said, “Leave aside your gold, your cattle and your horses, Virochana. Let us stake our lives and ask this question of those who can answer.”

Virochana said, “Who shall we go to when we wager our lives? I will not go before any of the Devas and never before any man.”

Sudhanwan said, “With our lives as wager, we will approach your father. Prahlada will never tell a lie, not even for his son’s sake.”

So, they made a wager, and Virochana and Sudhanwan, both roused, went to Prahlada.

Seeing them together, Prahlada said, “These two, who have never been companions, have come here like two angry snakes that have travelled by the same road.

He said, “Have you two become friends now, who never were before?”

Virochana said, “There is no friendship between Sudhanwan and me. Rather, we have both wagered our lives. O Lord of Asuras, I will ask you a question, which you must answer truthfully.”

Prahlada said, “Bring water, honey and curds for Sudhanwan. You deserve our worship, Brahmana. A plump white cow is ready for you.”

Sudhanwan said, “Water, honey and curds have already been given me on my way here. I will ask you a question, Prahlada; answer it truly. Are Brahmanas superior, or is Virochana?”

Prahlada said, “O Brahmana, here you both are in person—my only son and you, a Brahmana. How can I answer this question over which you two have fallen out?”

Sudhanwan said, “Keep your cattle and your other precious wealth, but you must declare the truth to settle our dispute.”

Prahlada said, “What will a person who misuses his tongue, to answer falsely rather than truly, suffer?”

Sudhanwan said, “The person who uses his tongue to lie suffers like a deserted wife who pines at night, with visions of her husband in the arms of another woman. He suffers like a man who loses at dice, or like one who is weighed down with an unbearable load of anxieties. He suffers like a man who is denied entry into a city and sits outside its gates, starving, and he is always faced with his enemies.

He who tells a lie for the sake of an animal will have five of his forefathers cast down from heaven. He who tells a lie for the sake of a cow will have ten of his Pitrs cast down from Swarga; a lie for the sake of a horse causes the downfall of a hundred; and a lie for the sake of a human being results in the fall of a thousand of one’s manes. An untruth for the sake of gold ruins the members of one’s race both born and unborn, while an untruth for the sake of land ruins everything. So never lie about land.”

Prahlada said, “Angiras is superior to me, and Sudhanwan is superior to you, Virochana; and Sudhanwan’s mother is superior to yours. You have been defeated by Sudhanwan; and he is now in command of your life.

Sudhanwan, I ask that you grant Virochana his life.”

Sudhanwan said, “O Prahlada, you have chosen dharma and not been tempted to lie. So, I grant the life of your son, who is so dear to you, and restore Virochana to you. He shall, however, have to wash my feet in Kesini’s presence.”

This is why, Rajan, you must never utter the slightest falsehood about the kingdom. Do not hasten your death and the deaths of your children and close associates by lying for your son. The gods do not protect men by taking up wooden clubs as herdsmen would; however, they grant intelligence to those they wish to protect.

There is no doubt that the degree of a man's success is in direct proportion to the attention he pays to dharma. The Vedas never save a man who lives by falsehood from the guilt of sin. They forsake him while he is on his deathbed, like fledglings flying from their nests.

Drinking, quarrels, enmity with many, marital disputes, severance of marital relationships between husband and wife, internal dissent and treason are all sins that must be shunned. A palmist, a thief turned merchant, a fowler, a physician, an enemy, a friend and a minstrel are not acceptable witnesses. Performed from motives of pride, an Agnihotra, abstention from speech, study and sacrifice become harmful, although they are intrinsically innocent.

A man who sets fire to a house, one who gives poison, a pander, a vendor of alcohol, a fletcher, an astrologer, one who injures his friends, an adulterer, one who performs abortions, one who violates the wife of an elder, a Brahmana addicted to alcohol, one who is harsh-tongued, one who opens old wounds, an atheist, one who insults the Vedas, a taker of bribes, one whose upanayanam has been delayed beyond the appropriate time, one who secretly kills cattle, one who kills the man that comes to him for protection: all these are as lacking in dharma as a man who kills a Brahmana.

Gold is tested for purity by fire, a high-born man by the way he carries himself and an honest man by what he does. A man's courage is tested in a crisis, a man's self-control in times of poverty and the strength of a man's friendship or enmity in times of danger. Old age destroys beauty; ambition destroys patience; death ends life; envy removes righteousness; anger ruins prosperity; companionship with base persons destroys good conduct; lust sheds modesty; and pride takes away everything. Prosperity is born of good deeds; it grows by dint of work; its roots penetrate deep from well honed skill; it becomes stable from self-control.

Wisdom, good lineage, restraint, knowing the scriptures, prowess, not being garrulous, giving gifts as one is able, and gratitude are the eight qualities that glorify a man. But there is one factor which, on its own, can make all these attributes coalesce: royal favour can make all these qualities cover the favoured person with their lustre. These eight are celestial qualities in this world of men.

Of the eight, four are inherent in good people, and the other four they always practise. The four that are integral to good men are sacrifice, charity, study and asceticism; and the other four that good men always practise are self-restraint, truth, simplicity and abstention from causing injury.

Sacrifice, study, charity, asceticism, truth, forgiveness, mercy and contentment constitute the eight paths of dharma. The first four of these may be practised from motives of pride, but the last four can exist only in those that are truly noble.

No gathering of people can truly be a satsanga unless there are venerable men in it; and no one can be considered worthy of veneration unless he can say what dharma is. It is not dharma if it can be separated from truth; and it is not truth if it is tinged with deceit.

Truth, beauty, knowledge of the scriptures, learning, noble birth, good conduct, strength, wealth, courage and the ability to speak on a variety of subjects are ten qualities of divine origin.

A man who sins is overwhelmed by evil consequences; a man who is virtuous reaps great happiness. So, a man must be firm in his resolve to abstain from sin. Repeated sinning destroys intelligence, and the man who loses intelligence repeatedly sins. Being constantly virtuous enhances intelligence, and the man whose intelligence increases is constantly virtuous. The virtuous man attains bliss. Thus, a man should be firm in his resolve to be virtuous.

The man who is envious, he who is hurtful, the man who is cruel, the man who is quarrelsome and one who is deceitful come to grief. The wise man who is not envious always does what is dharma and never suffers sorrow; instead, he shines. The man who acquires wisdom from wise men is himself learned and wise. He who is wise pays attention to dharma and artha, and achieves joy.

Behave during the day in a way that will ensure an untroubled night; conduct yourself during eight months of the year in a way that will ensures happiness during the monsoon; spend your youth in a way that ensures a comfortable old age; and conduct your whole life on Earth in a manner that ensures bliss in the hereafter.

The wise man thinks highly of food that is easily digested, of the wife who is young no more, of the hero who is victorious and of the sannyasin whose efforts have been rewarded with success. The empty space that a man tries to fill with wrongfully acquired wealth will never be filled; rather, new voids appear in other places.

The Guru controls those who have restrained their souls; the king controls the black-souled one; Yama controls those who sin in secret. The greatness of Rishis, of rivers, of river-banks, of mahatmans cannot be determined, like a woman's immorality.

O king, the man who is devoted to the worship of Brahmanas, he who is generous, he who is charitable to his relatives, and the Kshatriya who conducts himself honourably rule the Earth for ever. The man who is brave, learned and who knows how to protect others can always gather flowers of gold from the Earth.

Of all works, those performed by using the intellect are the best; next come those performed with the use of one's arms; those for which the legs are used are worse; and those performed by carrying loads are the lowest.

How can you expect to prosper when you have entrusted your kingdom to Duryodhana, Sakuni, the witless Dusasana and Karna? The Pandavas, who are blessed with every virtue, look up to you as a father. You must rely on them as your true sons.'"

"Vidura says, 'I know an ancient tale that is told in this connection: of the discussion between Atri's son and the Sadhyas.

Long ago, the deities known as Sadhyas approached the son of Atri, the wise Maharishi of the stern tapasya, while he wandered the world in the guise of a mendicant, and said to him, "O Maharishi, we are deities known as Sadhyas. We cannot tell who you are. You seem highly intelligent and a man of rigid self-control, which comes from a deep knowledge of the Shastras. Share your knowledge with us."

The mendicant Rishi answered, "Immortal ones, I have heard that by untying the knots in one's heart by means of tranquillity, by mastering one's passions and by following true dharma, one must learn to look on all beings—likeable or hateful—as if on oneself. One should not retaliate to slander or accusations, because when one bears pain silently it consumes the slanderer, and one also acquires the merit of his good deeds.

Do not indulge in slander or accusations; do not humiliate or insult others; do not quarrel with friends; do not seek the companionship of the vile and the base; do not be arrogant or dishonourable. Avoid speaking sharp or angry words, because they burn deep—into the heart and bones, and into prana itself. That is why the virtuous man never speaks harshly or in anger. He that does is the very worst of men. With hell on his tongue, he sears the inmost parts of a man with his piercing words, and always causes misery.

The wise man, when wounded by another's wordy arrows that scorch like fire or the Sun, endures them silently, remembering that the slanderer's blessings become his. The man who serves a good man or an evil one, a saintly man or a thief, absorbs the characteristics of his companion, like a cloth soaked in dye.

The gods like to be with the man who, when stung with criticism, neither criticises nor makes others do so in retaliation; who, when struck, neither strikes back nor makes someone else do so for him; and who does not wish even the slightest injury on the one who hurt him.

Silence is better than speech; if you must speak, then it is better to speak the truth; if the truth is to be spoken, it is better to say what is pleasing; and if what is pleasing is to be said, then it is best to say what is dharma.

A man becomes like the person he lives with, or like the one he sees regularly, or like the one he wants emulate. A man is liberated from those things from which he abstains; and if he abstains from everything, he will not suffer even the least sorrow. Such a man neither vanquishes others, nor is vanquished by any. He is never hurtful or antagonistic to anyone. He is unmoved by praise or reproach. He neither grieves nor exalts.

The best human being is one who wants the prosperity of all and never gloats over the sorrows of others; he is truthful and humble; and he has his senses under control. The mediocre man is one who never consoles another with false platitudes; he gives what he has promised; and he is mindful of others' weaknesses. The despicable man is one who is difficult to control; he is easily affected by the prospect of danger; he is short-tempered; he is ungrateful; he cannot make friends; and he has an evil heart. The worst among men is one who is unappreciative of any good that comes to him from others; he is suspicious by nature; and he drives away all his true friends.

He who wants to prosper should keep the company of good men, perhaps occasionally those that are mediocre, but never those that are bad. The sinful man does, indeed, earn wealth by working hard, by his intelligence and by his strength; but he can never win fame, nor can he acquire the virtues and ways of noble families, even if he is born into one.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'The gods, those who respect dharma and artha and do not swerve from either, and those who have great learning have an affinity to noble families. Tell me, Vidura, what families are truly noble?'

Vidura says, 'The family whose life is characterised by simplicity, self-restraint, Vedic knowledge, sacrifice, proper marriages and gifts of food is considered noble. Such vamsas never deviate from dharma; their ancestors are never pained by having to see their progeny's wrong-doings; they cheerfully practise all the virtues; they aspire to enhance the fame of their line; and they avoid every kind of falsehood.

Noble families fall and debase themselves because they neglect to perform sacrifices, make impure marriages, abandon the Vedas and insult Brahmanas. They are degraded because their members ignore or speak ill of Brahmanas, or because they misappropriate what others have entrusted to them.

Even if a family is extensive and owns much wealth and cattle, you cannot think of it as a cohesive family if its members lack good manners and deportment; whereas a family that lacks wealth, but is distinguished by good conduct, is noble indeed, and earns a great reputation. So, families must pay attention to good demeanour, for material wealth comes and goes. The man who is wanting in wealth is not really wanting, but the man who is wanting in decorum is really in want. Families that are rich in cattle and agricultural produce do not deserve fame if they lack good conduct.

Let none in our dynasty provoke quarrels, serve another king as minister, take what is not his, stir dissent, be deceitful or false, or eat before serving the Rishis, Devas and Sadasyas. Any of our vamsa who kills a Brahmana or feels antipathy towards them, or who obstructs farming, does not deserve to mix with us.

A seat of straw, a piece of ground to sit on, water to wash one's face and feet, and sweet words are never wanting in the house of a good man. Virtuous men devoted to dharma have these things ready to reverently offer to any guest who might come to his home. Just as the sandalwood tree is able to support weights that larger trees cannot, so too are those from noble families able to shoulder great cares which ordinary men cannot.

A man whose anger inspires fear, or whom people serve in fear is not a friend; but the man who is trusted like a father is. All other friendships are in name only. The man who acts as a friend, though not related by blood, is one's true friend, refuge and protector. The man of wavering affections who does not care for the elderly or one who is restless can never make friends. Like swans abandoning a tank whose waters have dried up, success forsakes a man whose heart is unsteady, a man who cannot control his mind and a man who is a slave to his senses.

Weak-minded men give in to anger and are gratified too easily; they are as changeable as clouds. Even birds of carrion will not touch the dead bodies of men who are ungrateful to friends who have helped them. Whether you are poor or rich, you must honour your friends. The sincerity of a friend is tested only when you ask for his help.

Sorrow kills beauty; it debilitates; it destroys knowledge; and it makes the body vulnerable to disease. Rather than helping a man achieve his goals, grief dries up his body, to the delight of his enemies. Do not yield to grief. Men repeatedly die and are reborn; repeatedly they wither away and grow; repeatedly they ask others for help, and they themselves are asked for help; repeatedly they lament and are lamented.

Everyone experiences happiness and misery, plenty and want, gain and loss, life and death, at one time or other. The man who is self-controlled should neither exult in joy nor wilt in sorrow at these twinned opposites.

The six senses are always restless. One's understanding leaks out through the sense that is heightened, in direct proportion to the level of its dominance, like water from a pot with holes, big and small.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'I have deceived Yudhishtira, who is like a flame. He will surely kill all my sons in battle. I see danger everywhere and my heart churns within me. Wise one, soothe my anxiety.'

Vidura says, 'Anagha, I see good only in knowledge and tapasya, in restraining the senses and in giving up greed. Atmagyana dispels fear; tapasya brings rich rewards; serving one's superiors gives learning; and self-restraint results in peace. Those who want moksha without first earning blessings by giving charity and practicing Vedic rituals go through life bound by anger and hatred. The happiness gained by a judicious course of study, by a battle fought virtuously or by stern tapasya always increases at the end.

Those who quarrel with their relatives get no sleep, even if they lie on the most comfortable beds; nor do they derive any pleasure from women or from hearing bards sing hymns and eulogies in their praise. Such men can never practise dharma; they can never be happy; they can never have honour. Peace holds no charm for them. They never appreciate good advice; they never get what they want or keep what they have. O king, such men can expect to meet with ruin.

As natural as milk is to cows, so is asceticism to Brahmanas, inconstancy to women and distrust to one's own kin. Many thin threads of equal length can, when stranded together, stand the strain of the shuttle passing constantly over them, because of their numbers. It is the same with family members who are bound by ties of dharma. Burning twigs produce only smoke, singly; but together they burst into flame. It is the same with kinsmen, Dhritarashtra.

Men who want to assert their authority over Brahmanas, women, relatives and cattle soon fall off their pedestals, like ripe fruits from their stems. The trunk of the tree that grows alone, though massive, strong and deep-rooted, is smashed and twisted by a strong wind. However, trees that grow close together in stands can resist violent gales by leaning on each other. In the same way, his enemies see the man who is alone, though blessed with all the good qualities, as being easy to bring down, like a lone tree by the wind. In contrast, relatives who are united grow in strength, like lotus-stalks in a lake.

These must never be killed: Brahmanas, cows, relatives, children, women, hosts whose food one has eaten and persons who surrender and ask for one's protection.

Rajan, without health a man's good qualities do not manifest themselves. If you are healthy, you can do much good; but if you have bad health, you might as well be dead.

Rajan, anger is a bitter, pungent, acrid and scalding drink, painful in its consequences; it is a dark draught not born of any physical illness; and those that lack wisdom can never digest it. Swallow your anger, Rajan, and be at peace. Men who are wracked by disease derive no joy from pleasures or from wealth; they are so full of sorrow that they do not know what happiness is nor enjoy wealth.

When I saw Draupadi won as a wager at dice, I told you that men of dharma never use deceit at gambling and urged you to stop Duryodhana. You paid no heed to me then. True strength is not opposed to softness; rather, the combination of both is the best and most effective course. Prosperity which is dependent on deceit is destined to be short lived; but that which depends on strength and softness is passed down to sons and grandsons intact.

Your sons and the Pandavas must love each other. Let them have the same friends and enemies and live together in happiness and prosperity.

Rajan, you are the refuge of the sons of Kuru. Indeed, the entire Ajamida vamsa depends on you. Preserve your good name by cherishing the sons of Pandu, especially for the great suffering they have endured in exile. O Kaurava, make peace with the Pandavas; do not let your enemies find a chink in your armour. The Pandavas are devoted to dharma. Draw Duryodhana away from his evil ways.'"

"Vidura says, 'Manu, the son of the Svayambhuva, the Self-Created One, spoke of the seventeen kinds of men who vainly strike air with their fists, who seek to bend Indra's heavenly bow of vapour—the Indradhanush, or want to catch the intangible rays of the Sun.

These foolish ones are the man who wants to control another who cannot be controlled; the man who is content with small gains; the man who humbly pays court to enemies; the man who seeks to control women; the man who solicits gifts from one who should not be asked for gifts; the man who boasts without having done anything; the high-born man who acts basely; the weak man who enters into hostilities with one that is powerful; the man who talks to one who listens with disdain; the man who desires the unattainable; the father-in-law who flirts with his daughter-in-law; the man who boasts about his fears being allayed by his daughter-in-law; the man who sows his seeds in another man's field; the man who speaks ill of his wife; the man who does not acknowledge having received something from another; the man who, in a holy tirtha, commits to give something away and then makes excuses when asked to make good his words; and the man who tries to prove the truth of what is false. Yama's dutas, with nooses in hand, drag these people away to hell.

A man should behave towards others in the same manner as others behave towards him, for this is good policy. One may behave deceitfully with the deceitful, but must be honest with those who are honest. Old age withers beauty; patience takes away hope; death ends life; the practice of virtue denudes worldly enjoyments; lust abandons modesty; companionship with evil men destroys good character and deportment; anger ruins prosperity; and pride destroys everything.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'According to the Vedas, man's life-span on Earth is one hundred years. Why is it, then, that not all men attain the allotted span?'

Vidura says, 'Too much pride, excessive speech, overindulgence in food, giving in to anger, yearning for pleasure and inner discord are the six swords that cut short man's life on Earth. It is these six, not death, which kill men. Know this and be blessed.

Bhaarata, these acquire the guilt of killing a Brahmana: one who steals the wife of a friend who trusts him; one who violates the bed of his Guru; a Brahmana who marries a Sudra woman or drinks alcohol; a man who wields authority over Brahmanas, becomes their master or confiscates lands that support them; and one who kills those who give themselves up into his protection. The Vedas declare that contact with these kinds of people requires penance to purify oneself.

These persons attain Swarga: one who accepts the teachings of the wise; one who knows dharma; one who is generous; one who eats only after offering his food to the Devas and Pitrs; one who has no envy; one who is incapable of doing anything injurious; and one who is grateful, truthful, humble and learned.

O king, many are those who always say pleasing things; but rare is the man whose words are not always pleasant but yet medicinal, and the man who listens to him. The man who, without worrying about whether his words will please his master or not, tells him things that may seem unpalatable but are wise and in keeping with dharma, is an asset to the king.

For the sake of the family one of its members may be sacrificed; for the sake of the village, a family may be sacrificed; for the sake of a kingdom a village may be sacrificed; and for the sake of one's soul, the whole world may be sacrificed. A man should conserve his wealth, in case calamity strikes; he should use his wealth to protect his wives; and with his wealth and his wives he should safeguard himself.

From time immemorial it has been obvious that gambling causes disputes. The wise man should never gamble, even light-heartedly. At the time of that game of dice I told you it was sinful and dangerous. To you, however, my words were as unpleasant as bitter medicine to a sick man. O king, you want to vanquish the sons of Pandu, who compare with your sons as peacocks to crows. You forsake lions in favour of jackals. The time will come when you will regret this.

The master who does not vent his displeasure against devoted servants that want only his welfare, gains their confidence. They stand by him even in times of distress. A man must never seek to save wealth by confiscating grants or not paying his employees; for, deprived of their means of livelihood and prosperity, even those who are fond of him will turn against him and abandon him in his time of need.

A king should first consider all his future plans, then fixing his servants' wages with his own income and expenditure in mind, he should make suitable contracts, for there is nothing that cannot be accomplished by just and strategic alliances. The officer who, with a complete understanding of his king's intentions, discharges his duties promptly and enthusiastically, who is respectable and devoted to his master, always tells him what is best for him. The king should regard the officer who is well aware of the strength of his own and the enemy's forces as a second self. However, the king should immediately rid himself of the servant who is so proud of his own intelligence that he disregards his master's instructions, refuses to obey him and argues with him.

Learned men say that a good servant possesses these eight qualities: he is not arrogant; he does not procrastinate; he is able, kind, clean and incorruptible; he is from a family free of disease; and he weighs his words before he speaks.

A man must never enter an enemy's house confidently after dusk, even with notice; he must never lurk in the yard of another's house at night; and he must never seek to be with a woman whom the king might enjoy.

One must never disagree with the decision arrived at by a man who keeps company with sinners and who is in the habit of consulting all and sundry. Never tell him you disagree with him; instead dismiss him on some pretext.

One must never borrow from, or lend to, these: a king who is inordinately soft-hearted, a woman of bad character, the servant of a king, one's son, one's brother, a widow with a child, one serving in the military and one who has suffered a great loss of wealth.

Eight qualities bestow lustre on a man. They are wisdom, noble lineage, knowledge of the scriptures, self-restraint, prowess, moderation in speech, the giving of gifts such as one can afford and gratitude. These qualities, sire, are mustered and held close by the wise.

The man who performs ritual ablutions acquires strength, beauty, a clear voice, the ability to clearly enunciate all the alphabet, delicacy of touch, a fine sense of smell, cleanliness, grace, delicacy of limbs and beautiful women. The man who eats sparingly wins good health, long life, ease, healthy children and freedom from sloth and accusations of gluttony.

A man should not shelter the following in his house: one who is ill-behaved, one who eats too much, one whom everyone dislikes, one who is deceitful, one who is cruel, one who does not know the correctness of time and place and one who dresses immodestly. A person, even in dire distress, should never ask a favour of a miser, of one who speaks badly of others, of one who has no knowledge of the Shastras, of a forest dweller, of one who is cunning, of one who does not respect those who are worthy of reverence, of one who is cruel, of one who is quarrelsome or ungrateful.

One should never serve these six worst types of men: an enemy, one who always errs, a habitual liar, one who wavers in his devotion to God, a cold-hearted man and one who is overconfident of his own abilities.

One's objectives depend on the means for their success; and means depend on the nature of the objective to be achieved through them. They are intimately intertwined, and success depends on both. A man must have sons, make them independent by providing for them, give daughters in marriage to suitable men and then retire to the life of a Vanaprastha. To receive the grace of the Supreme Being a man must always work for universal good as well as for his own happiness; and this is the root of success of all man's endeavours. A man who has intelligence, energy, prowess, strength, promptness and perseverance need have no anxieties about his livelihood.

Look at the evils that a quarrel with the Pandavas will bring, which would sadden Indra and all the Devas. Firstly, enmity with those who are like sons to you; secondly, a life of constant anxiety; thirdly, the ruin of the fame of the Kurus; and lastly, the joy of your enemies. O you who are as splendid as Indra, the wrath of Bhishma, Drona and Yudhishtira will consume the whole world, like a massive comet blasting through the Earth.

Your hundred sons, Karna and the sons of Pandu can together rule this vast Earth with its girdle of oceans. Rajan, your sons are the forest, and the Pandavas are its tigers. O, do not destroy the forest and its tigers. O, do not let the tigers be driven away from the forest. Without tigers there can be no forest and without a forest there can be no tigers. The forest shelters the tigers and tigers guard the forest.

Those who are sinful look more for the faults than for the good qualities of others. He who desires total success in his material ventures should be virtuous from the very beginning, for true artha is impossible to obtain without dharma, like amrita without swarga. He whose soul has been cleansed of sin and firmly fixed on dharma has understood all things, whether natural or artificial. He who pursues dharma, artha and kama at the appropriate times gains all three, in this world and the next. He who restrains the force of both anger and joy, and never loses his composure in a crisis, wins prosperity.

Listen to me, O great king. Men are said to have five different kinds of strength. Of these, the strength of arms is regarded as the least. The acquisition of good advisors is seen as the second most important. The wise have said that the acquisition of wealth is the third; the strength of one's lineage is considered the fourth. However, Bhaarata, the one by which all these are won, and which is the best and most important of all kinds of strength is the strength of the intellect.

After provoking the hostility of a man who is capable of doing great injury to others, one should not reassure oneself with the thought that one lives far away from him. A wise man does not repose his trust in women, kings, serpents, his own master, enemies, enjoyments or his longevity.

There are no physicians or physics for a man who has been struck by the arrow of wisdom; neither the mantras of homa nor auspicious ceremonies, neither the mantras of the Atharva Veda nor any of the antidotes for poison are of any use.

A man should not ignore snakes, fire, lions and blood relatives; all these are powerful. Fire is a thing of great energy in this world. It hides itself in wood but does not consume it until it is ignited by an outside agent. That same latent fire, when sparked by friction, consumes not only the wood in which it hides, but also an entire forest. Men of noble lineage are just like fire in their energy. Of a forgiving nature, they do not betray outward symptoms of wrath, and lie quiet like fire in wood.

O king, you and your sons are like creepers and the Pandavas are like Sala trees. A creeper cannot grow unless there is a large tree for it to twine round. Your sons are like a forest and the sons of Pandu are its lions. Without its lions the forest is doomed to destruction, and lions, too, are doomed without the forest to shelter them.'"

"Vidura says, 'The heart of a young man soars in joy when an older and venerable person comes to his house as a guest. His heart comes down to earth again when he goes forward and greets him. One who has self-control must first offer his guest a seat, then have his feet washed in clean water, after which he must make the usual enquiries of welcome, then give his own news and offer him food.

Wise men say that the man cannot be considered to be truly alive, in whose home a Brahmana conversant with mantras does not accept water, honey, curds or cattle from fear of either being unsure of whether he can take the gifts away, or from the miserliness and unwillingness with which the gifts are made. A householder must look on a newly arrived guest as being very dear, regardless of the fact that he may not be worthy of being offered water to wash his feet, be the guest a physician, a fletcher, a lapsed Brahmachari, a thief, a Brahmana who drinks, an abortionist, a soldier or a seller of the Vedas.

A Brahmana should never sell salt, cooked food, curds, milk, honey, oil, ghee, sesame, meat, fruits, roots, potherbs, dyed clothes, perfumes and sweets. The man who never gives way to anger, the one who is beyond grief, the one to whom friendship and quarrels are meaningless, he who disregards praise and blame and he who is detached from both the pleasant and unpleasant is completely withdrawn from the world, and is a real Yogin of the Bhikshu order.

The virtuous sannyasin who lives on wild rice, roots or herbs, who has his soul under control, who carefully maintains his sacred fire for worship, who lives in the forest and is always mindful of guests is indeed the best of ascetics.

If a man wrongs an intelligent person, he should never become complacent in that he lives a great distance away from the one he has wronged. Far is the reach of an intelligent man, by which he can avenge the wrongs done to him. One should never trust an untrustworthy man, nor indeed repose too much trust on a reliable man, for both these make one most vulnerable.

Men should renounce envy, protect their wives, give everyone their due and speak pleasantly. A man should always speak sweetly to his wife but must never be enslaved by her. It has been said that wives who are blessed and virtuous, who are worthy of worship and who are the ornaments of their homes are embodiments of domestic prosperity, of the Grihalakshmi. They should be protected.

A man should delegate the supervision of his inner apartments to his father; of the kitchen to his mother; of his cattle to somebody he looks upon as his own self; but he must himself tend to his farming. A man should assign his servants to care for guests who are Vaisyas and give his sons the responsibility of looking after Brahmanas.

Fire has its origin in water, Kshatriyas in Brahmanas and iron in stone. Their energy can affect all things but is neutralised as soon as these things come in contact with their progenitors. Fire lies hidden in wood without showing itself. Good men of a forgiving nature and fiery tejas do not betray outwardly what is within them. The king whose plans are unknown to outsiders as well as to those around him, but who knows what others are planning, through his spies, enjoys long prosperity.

One should never talk about what one intends to do. Let anything you do, with regard to dharma, artha or kama, remain unknown until it is done. Reflect over and settle on your plans secretly, climbing to the top of a mountain or the terrace of a palace or going to a deserted wilderness devoid of trees and plants to do so. O Bhaarata, neither an ignorant friend nor a learned one who has no self-restraint should be trusted with secrets.

Rajan, never make a man your minister without examining him well, for your finances and inmost thoughts are in his hands. Fortunate is the king whose ministers know what he does, with respect to dharma, artha and kama, only after he has acted. The king whose counsels are kept close, and with complete faith, has success.

He who commits reprehensible deeds from ignorance loses his life because of unexpected consequences of those actions. Commendable deeds are always followed by peace of mind, and their omission leads to repentance.

Just as a Brahmana who has no Vedic learning is not fit to officiate at a Sraddha, so too, the king who is ignorant of the six ways of protecting his kingdom is not fit to engage in politics. The king who monitors the increase, decrease and surplus to his revenue, who is familiar with the six ways of protecting his kingdom, who has self-knowledge and whose conduct is always praised brings the whole world under his rule. The king whose anger and joy always produce results, who personally oversees all activity in his kingdom and who keeps his treasury under his own control brings the very earth under subjection.

A king should be content with the name he wins and the royal parasol that is held over his head. He should divide the wealth of the kingdom among those that serve him and not keep everything for himself.

A Brahmana knows a Brahmana, a husband understands the wife, a king knows his minister, and monarchs know monarchs. An enemy who deserves death should never be set free once he is subdued. If a man is weak and he deserves death, he should pay court to his enemies who are stronger than him. However, one must kill such an enemy as soon as one is powerful enough, for otherwise the enemy will become dangerous.

A man should make an effort to control his anger against gods, kings, Brahmanas, old men, children and the helpless. The wise man should avoid unprofitable quarrels, in which only fools get involved. Thus one wins great fame in this world and avoids suffering and sorrow.

The people never want for their master a man whose grace is without favour and whose anger is ineffective, just as a woman never wants a eunuch for a husband. Intelligence does not result in the acquisition of wealth nor idleness in adversity.

Only the wise man knows what causes conditions on Earth to be so diverse. The fool, Bhaarata, always ignores his elders, those eminent in their conduct, the learned, the intelligent, the wealthy and the noble. Calamities befall those that are wicked, ignorant, filled with envy, sinful, foul-tongued and prone to anger. On the contrary, absence of deceitfulness, generosity, the observance of decorum, and controlled speech give a man domination over all creatures.

The man who is straightforward, active, grateful, intelligent and guileless wins friends, advisors and servants, even if his coffers are empty. Intelligence, tranquillity of mind, self-control, purity, refraining from harsh speech and the unwillingness to do anything unpleasant to friends are qualities that fan the flame of prosperity.

A man must avoid the wretched fellow who does not give others their due, who has an evil soul and is ungrateful and shameless. The guilty man who provokes suspicion about an innocent one cannot sleep peacefully at night, like a man in a room with a snake in it. A man must propitiate, as he would the gods, those who, when angry, put one's possessions and means of acquiring them in jeopardy. Success is doubtful for goals that depend upon women, careless persons, men who do not follow the dharma of their varna and those who are evil.

Like a stone raft has no choice but to sink, so do men who let a woman, a deceitful person or a child guide them. Those who are experts at something look down on men who are generally competent but have no particular skill. A man whom swindlers, actors and women of bad character speak highly of might as well be dead.

Bhaarata, you have forsaken the sons of Pandu, those Kshatriyas of immeasurable energy, and entrusted care of this mighty empire to Duryodhana. You will soon see your burgeoning prosperity falling away, as Bali did from Swarga.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Man has no control over his own prosperity or adversity. He is like a wooden string-puppet, and God subjects him to destiny. Go on speaking; I am listening attentively to everything you say.'

Vidura says, 'Bhaarata, words spoken at the inappropriate time, even by Brihaspati, are considered ignorant and reprehensible. There are three ways for a man to become popular—giving gifts, speaking sweet words and using spells and narcotics. However, the man who is naturally likeable is always so.

In the eyes of one who hates him, a man is always dishonest, stupid and foolish. A man attributes everything good to him whom he loves and everything bad to him that he hates.

O king, I told you on Duryodhana's birth that you should do away with this one son, for, by that, you would ensure the prosperity of the rest of the hundred of them; and that by keeping him, you would doom them all. One should never give importance to a gain that leads to loss. One must, instead, place great store by a loss that will eventually bring gain. It is no loss which results in gain; only the loss that begets greater losses is a real loss.

Some gain eminence because of their good qualities, others because they are wealthy. Dhritarashtra, keep away from the wealthy man who lacks dharma.'

Dhritarashtra says, ‘You speak wisely and for my good, but I dare not abandon my son. Let us reassure ourselves with the conviction that victory and dharma go hand in hand.’

Vidura says, ‘Those who are humble and graced with every virtue are always sensitive to the least suffering of living beings; but those who spend their time speaking ill of others always look for opportunities to quarrel with them and to inflict pain. It is wrong to accept gifts from, or to give to, those whose very presence is inauspicious and whose companionship is fraught with danger.

Those who are contentious, covetous, shameless and deceitful are without dharma, and one should avoid being with them. One should also avoid those who have other serious flaws in their character. When the circumstances which created the friendship end, one must end friendly relations with those of bad character; the good that comes from that connection, and the happiness, come to an end. Such men will then speak ill of the man who was their friend and try to make him suffer losses and be unhappy if the loss is small. Lacking control over themselves, they cannot find peace. The learned man will carefully and objectively analyse everything and shun the friendship of such evil-minded ones.

The man who helps his poor and helpless relatives will have children and animals, and will enjoy unending prosperity. Those who want their own good should always help their relatives. Therefore, Rajan, work for the glory of your great vamsa in any way you can. You will prosper if you treat all your kinsmen well and protect even those who are destitute of virtue.

Bharatarishabha, think about how much more they, who are blessed with goodness and humbly await your favour, deserve your protection. Grace the heroic sons of Pandu with your favour and give them some part of the kingdom for their livelihood. This will bring you fame in this world. You are old. You should control your sons; that alone will benefit you.

Know that I am your well-wisher. The man who wants his own good must never have enmity with his kin. Happiness must always be shared and enjoyed with one’s family, and not without them. Relatives should always eat together, talk with one another and love each other; they must never fall out. It is kinsmen who come to your rescue, and kinsmen who ruin you. The righteous ones are the ones who come to your help, while the sinful ones let you down.

O, you who are the giver of honours, use dharma in your dealings with the sons of Pandu. Surrounded by them, you will be invincible.

If a man shrinks in the presence of a prosperous kinsman, like a deer at the sight of a hunter armed with arrows, then the prosperous relative will absorb the sins of the other. Purushottama, you will regret your present course, of doing nothing to prevent a war, when you hear of the deaths of the Pandavas or your sons.

O, think of this: when life itself is uncertain, one should from the start avoid any awful deed that will plunge one into a world of fear and grief and give cause for irremediable regret later. It is true that anyone, other than Bhargava who authored the Dharmashastra, is likely, at one time or other, to sin. Intelligent men understand the justness of the consequences of their crimes.

As an elder of the Kuruvamsa, it is your duty to undo all the wrongs that Duryodhana inflicted on the Pandavas. By reinstating them to their rightful position you will be cleansed of all your sins in this world and be worshipped even by enlightened souls. The man who acts after carefully reflecting on what wise men say about the inexorable fruit of karma never loses renown.

Wisdom imparted by knowledgeable men is imperfect if misunderstood, or if understood but not put into practice. The learned man who never does anything that will result in sin and sorrow always grows in prosperity. The heedless, evil man, who stubbornly pursues the sinful course he has embarked on, falls into a deep mire.

The wise man must always be aware of these six ways by which his plans become known, and if he wants success and a lasting dynasty, he will be on his guard against them. They are intoxication, sleep, heedlessness of spies, one's own demeanour which reflects one's thoughts and confidence placed in evil-hearted advisors and inept representatives. The man who knows of these six doors through which secrets can slip out, who keeps them shut while conducting his life in dharma, artha and kama, succeeds in outwitting his enemies.

Even Brihaspati cannot win dharma or artha if he has no knowledge of the Shastras and if he does not serve the elderly. As anything cast into the sea is lost are words spoken into the ears of one who does not listen. The Shastras are lost on one who does not have his emotions under control. An offering of ghee is wasted if poured over the ashes of an extinguished fire.

The man who is blessed with intelligence forges friendships with the wise, having first used his intelligence to examine, his understanding to investigate and his ears to hear what others who have known and seen the man say about him, and then by relying on his own discernment. Humility prevents humiliation; prowess ends adversity; forgiveness conquers anger; and dharma neutralises evil omens.

Rajan, a man's lineage is judged by the things he enjoys, his place of birth, his home, his demeanour, his food and dress. Even a man who has attained spiritual freedom is tempted to indulge in pleasure, let alone the man who is still a slave to his desires. A king should treasure a minister who reveres the wise; who is blessed with knowledge and virtue; who has a pleasant appearance, good friends, sweet speech and a good heart.

Whether he is of low or high birth, the man who does not break the rules of polite conversation, who is conscious of dharma and who is humble and modest is superior to a hundred men of noble lineage. The friendship of men, whose hearts, private lives, pleasures and acquisitions are in complete accord with one's own, never cools.

The intelligent man should avoid an ignorant and evil man even like a deep pit covered by grass, for friendship with such a man is short-lived and dangerous. The wise man should never make a friend of one who is proud, ignorant, fierce or reckless and who has strayed from the path of dharma. One should want for a friend the man who is grateful, virtuous, truthful, large-hearted and devoted, and one who has his senses under control, who preserves his dignity and never forsakes a friend.

While the detachment of the senses from their objects is like death, excessive indulgence of the senses would ruin even the gods. Learned men say that humility, love of all creatures, forgiveness and respect for friends lengthen one's life. The wise say that the man who, with determination, uses means of dharma to accomplish goals that have been thwarted possesses real manhood. The man who knows of all the remedies that may be applied in the future, who is firmly resolved in the present time and who can predict at the start the result of his actions attains all his goals.

That which a man follows in thought, word and action wins him for itself; therefore, a man should always seek what is truly good for him. After achieving this, many other factors make a man prosper: effort, timely action in the right place, the means to do so, knowledge of the Shastras, diligent work, honesty and frequent contact with the good.

Perseverance is the key to prosperity, achievement and all that is beneficial. The man who pursues his goal with perseverance, without giving up in impatience, is great; and he will enjoy everlasting happiness. Then, O king, there is the quality of mercy; nothing promotes happiness, nothing is more appropriate for a powerful man than forgiveness, anywhere and always. The weak man must be forgiving under all circumstances; the mighty should show forgiveness, keeping dharma in mind; but forgiveness comes naturally to the man who is detached from the success or failure of his endeavours.

One must pursue, to the fullest extent, pleasure that does not go against dharma and artha. However, one should not be a fool and indulge one's senses indiscriminately. Prosperity never attaches itself to a man who tortures himself with grief; nor to one who is addicted to evil, who is an atheist or idle; nor to one whose senses are uncontrolled; nor to one who makes no effort. The humble man's modesty is mistaken for weakness, and the deluded persecute him.

Prosperity fearfully avoids the man who is too honest, who gives without limit, who is too brave or who is vain about his wisdom. She stays neither with the man who is highly accomplished nor with one who is not in the least so. She does not prefer a conjunction of all the virtues, nor is she pleased with their complete absence. At random, like a mad cow that cannot be steered, prosperity blindly finds her home.

The result of studying the Vedas is the performance of the homa; the fruits of knowing the Shastras are good manners and good conduct; the fruits of women are the pleasures of intercourse and children; and the consequence of wealth is the pleasure of doing charity.

He that performs rituals, with ill-gotten wealth, for his good in the next world does not enjoy the usual fruits of such rites because of the means by which the wealth used for this purpose was acquired. The man who has strength of mind knows no fear, not in the midst of the desert, in forests or other inaccessible fastnesses; not amidst dangers, crises or in the face of deadly weapons raised against him. Prosperity is born out of effort, self-control, skill, meticulousness, steadiness, a good memory and mature deliberation before any action.

Tapasya is the strength of tapasvins; the Vedas are the strength of scholars; envy is the strength of evil men; and in forgiveness lies the strength of the virtuous. Eight things could never negate a vow: water, roots, fruit, milk, ghee, obliging a Brahmana's request, obeying a guru's command and good medicine.

One should never do to others anything that is against one's own self-interest. This is virtue. There are other kinds of virtue, but these issue from caprice. Anger must be conquered by forgiveness, evil by dharma, the miser by generosity, and falsehood by truth.

One must not trust a woman, a swindler, an idler, a coward, a vicious man, one who boasts of his own power, a thief, an ingrate and an atheist. The man who is respectful of his elders and serves the elderly will always see the growth of his achievements, longevity, fame and power.

Do not set your heart on things that can be acquired only through painful exertion, at the cost of dharma or by bowing down to an enemy. A man without knowledge is pitiable, as is intercourse that does not bear fruit, and also the people of a kingdom who have no food and a kingdom without a king. These cause pain and debility in the living. Rain erodes hills and mountains; the absence of enjoyment gives women anguish; and sharp words wound the heart like arrows.

The worst thing for the Vedas is not to study them, and for Brahmanas it is not to observe vratas; the worst beings on Earth are the Bahlikas; the worst characteristic in a man is falsehood and in the chaste woman, curiosity; and the worst condition for a woman is to be away from her home. The worst part of gold is silver; of silver, tin; of tin, lead; and of lead, grit. One cannot conquer sleep by lying down, women by desire, fire by fuel and wine by drinking. The crown of success rests on the man who has won over his friends by gifts, his foes by battle and his wife with food and drink.

Those who have a hundred possessions are just as alive as those who have a thousand. O Dhritarashtra, renounce your greed for excessive possessions. There is no one who cannot live within the considerable means you own. All the paddy, wheat, gold, animals and women on Earth cannot satiate even one man. A wise man reflects on this and does not grieve for want of owning everything. Rajan, I say to you again, treat your children equally—your sons and Pandu's.'"

"Vidura says, 'The good man will win fame by abandoning pride and pursuing his goals. He must take care not to overstep the limits of his power because honourable men can make the man who pleases them happy.

The man who voluntarily gives up something, even if it is magnificent, because it is charged with adharma lives happily and shakes off his enemies, like a snake shedding its skin. A victory won by a lie, by treachery towards the king and by insincerity towards one's elders is equal to the sin of killing a Brahmana.

Envy, death and boastfulness destroy prosperity. Carelessness in serving one's elders, undue haste and vanity are the three enemies of knowledge. Idleness, inattention, mental turmoil, restlessness, passing time idly with friends, hauteur, pride and jealousy are particular shortcomings of students. How can they that seek pleasure gain knowledge? Students cannot pursue learning and, at the same time, indulge themselves. Devotees of pleasure must give up knowledge, and those who seek knowledge must first abjure pleasure.

Fire can never have enough fuel; the mighty ocean can never receive enough water from the rivers that feed it; Death cannot be satiated even by devouring all living creatures; and a beautiful woman can never have too many men around her.

Hope kills patience; Yama kills growth; anger kills prosperity; miserliness kills fame; neglect kills cattle; and the anger of just one Brahmana destroys an entire kingdom. Ensure the presence of goats, brass, silver, honey, antidotes to poison, birds, Brahmanas versed in the Vedas, aged kinsmen and impoverished noblemen in your house.

Bhaarata, Manu has said that for the worship of the gods one must always have these in one's house: goats, bulls, sandalwood, flutes, mirrors, honey, ghee, iron, copper, conch-shells, salagramas and gorochana, Brahmanas and guests. All these are auspicious.

I will tell you of another sacred lesson, more exalted than these, one which will bear great fruit: virtue should never be forsaken from desire, fear or temptation, and not for life itself. Dharma is everlasting; pleasure and pain are transitory; indeed life itself is everlasting but transitory in each phase. Abandon the transitory and devote yourself to the permanent; and contentment, that best of all blessings, will be yours.

See how illustrious and mighty kings, having ruled lands abounding in wealth and corn, have fallen to Yama, leaving behind their kingdoms and vast fonts of enjoyment. When the child who is nurtured with loving care dies, weeping and wild-haired men carry his body in grief to the smasana and throw it onto the pyre, where it burns as if it were just another log of wood. Others enjoy a dead man's wealth, while birds and fire feast on his body. Only two things accompany him into the next world: his punya and his paapa. After discarding his body his kinsmen go home, even as birds abandon a tree that has no flowers or fruit.

The one cast into the funeral pyre takes with him only his own deeds. Therefore, men should carefully and purposefully earn punya for themselves. In the worlds above and below ours are regions of terrible darkness, O king, where men's senses suffer great torture. Do not allow yourself to go to there.

If you listen attentively to me and act accordingly, great fame will be yours in this mortal world, and you will never have fear now or hereafter. The soul is like a river; deeds of punya are its sacred tirthas; truth, its water; self-control, its banks; and kindness, its waves. The righteous man purifies himself by bathing in it, for the soul is scared, and the absence of desire is the highest merit. Life is a river whose waters are the five senses, and whose crocodiles and sharks are desire and anger. Make self-control the raft by which you cross its eddies, which are your repeated births.

The man who worships and pleases friends, who are wise, virtuous, knowledgeable and mature in years, is never misguided by the advice they give him. A man must restrain lust and hunger with patience, his hands and feet with his eyes, his eyes and ears with his mind and his mind and speech with his conduct.

The Brahmana who unfailingly performs his ritual ablutions, who always wears his sacred thread, who never neglects his Vedic studies, who avoids unclean food, who always tells the truth and who honours his guru by his actions never falls from Brahmaloka. The Kshatriya who studies the Vedas, who makes offerings to Agni, who performs yagnas, who protects his subjects, who has purified his soul by arming himself with weapons in order to safeguard Brahmanas and his cattle and who dies on the field of battle attains Swarga. The Vaisya who distributes his wealth among Brahmanas, Kshatriyas and his own dependants at the appropriate time, and who breathes the sanctified smoke of the three kinds of fires gains joy in the other world. The Sudra who worships Brahmanas, Kshatriyas and Vaisyas as is their due; who has washed away his sins by gratifying them; and who peacefully casts off his mortal body enjoys celestial bliss.

This is the dharma of the four varnas. Now listen to the reason I have told you all this. Yudhishtira has been unable to fulfil his Kshatriya dharma. You must place him in a position that he may discharge his kingly duties, Rajan.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'What you teach me is always right, and I, too, am inclined to do as you say. Although, in keeping with your advice, my heart moves towards the Pandavas, it veers in a different direction as soon as I see Duryodhana. No one can avert fate, which will always take its course; and I think individual effort is futile.'"

SANAT SUJATA PARVA

"Dhritarashtra says, 'O Vidura, if there is anything you have not told me, tell me now, for I am eager to listen. Your words delight my heart.'

Vidura says, 'Dhritarashtra, the ancient and immortal Rishi Sanat Sujata, who was a celibate all his life, said that there is no death. That most brilliant of all men will clear every doubt you have.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Do you not know what the deathless Rishi would say to me? You can advise me as well as he would; you have as much wisdom.'

Vidura says, 'I am a Sudra by birth and cannot say more than I have already said. The wisdom and knowledge of that Brahmarishi is infinite. A man who is born a Brahmana does not incur the disapproval of the gods, even when he expounds the most profound mysteries. This is why I will speak no more to you on this matter.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me, Vidura, how I, in my mortal body, can meet this immortal and ancient one.'

Vidura meditates on that Rishi of stern vratas and, knowing that he was thought of, the sage appears. Vidura receives him reverently with the ordained rites and when, after a brief rest, Sanat Sujata is seated at his ease, Vidura says to him, 'O illustrious one, Dhritarashtra has doubts which I am not able to clear. I beg you to do what I cannot. He might then overcome his sorrow, which stems from being confused about gain and loss, what is agreeable and disagreeable, old age and death, fear and jealousy, hunger and thirst, pride and prosperity, dislike, sleep, lust, wrath, decrease and increase.'"

"Vaisampayana said, 'Dhritarashtra applauds what Vidura says and, eager to obtain the highest knowledge, puts his questions to Sanat Sujata without speaking.

In his mind the king asks the Rishi, 'O Sanat Sujata, I hear that you believe there is no death. On the other hand, it is said that Devas and Asuras practise austere tapasya in order to avoid death. Which of these two is true?'

Sanat Sujata says, 'Some say that death can be averted by specific karma; others are of the opinion that there is no death. You have asked me which of these is true. Listen to me, O king, while I tell you about this, so that your doubts are removed.

Kshatriya, both of these are true. The learned are of opinion that death results from ignorance. I say that ignorance is death. Thus, knowledge is immortality.

It is from ignorance that the Asuras became subject to defeat and death, and it is from the absence of ignorance that the Devas attained Brahman. Death does not devour, as a tiger does; its form cannot be known.

Some imagine Yama to be Death, deluded as they are by their weak minds. Immortality lies in the search for self-knowledge, the eternal Brahman. That imaginary Deva, Yama, rules over the realm of the Pitrs; he is the source of joy to the virtuous and a scourge to sinners. It is at his command that death walks among men, in the form of wrath, ignorance and covetousness.

Swayed by pride, men walk the ways of dharma, and none amongst such men attains Atmagyana. With darkened minds and led by their passions, when they cast off their mortal bodies they fall into Naraka, over and over, and their unruly senses follow them always. That is why ignorance goes by the name of death. So, death also attaches to men who want the fruit of their actions. When the time for enjoying these fruit comes, they cannot avoid death. They leave their mortal bodies and go to Swargaloka. Men who do not desire to see the fruit of their deeds also go to Swarga when they leave their bodies; but for them there is no death.

Creatures with physical bodies are caught in a cycle of birth and re-birth in varying states because of their inability to attain Brahman and due to their attachment to worldly enjoyment. Man has a natural inclination towards pursuits that seek illusory goals, and this is the single cause of his senses being led astray. The soul that is led towards illusions remembers only that with which it is constantly occupied and, so, worships only the mundane pleasures that surround it. The desire for pleasure is the first cause of death for man; lust and anger come next. It is these three—craving for pleasure, lust and anger—that lead foolish men to death.

Those who have conquered their souls by self-restraint escape death. The man who has restrained his soul without falling prey to his ambitious desires subdues them; self-knowledge reveals their worthlessness to him. Ignorance, in the form of Yama, cannot overcome the learned man who controls his passions.

The man who follows his desires is destroyed along with his desires. However, the man who can renounce desire can keep grief away, whatever form it may take. Desire is ignorance; it is darkness and hell for all creatures, for, swayed by it they lose control of their senses. Just as drunken men walking along a street reel towards ruts and holes, so too, men intoxicated by desire and lured by illusory joys stagger headlong towards their downfall.

What can death do to a man whose soul has not been led by desire? For him death holds no terrors; it is like a straw tiger. Kshatriya, if you want to destroy desire, which is ignorance, you must not dwell on or pursue even the smallest wish.

Your soul, which is in your body, enmeshed as it is in wrath and covetousness, is filled with ignorance, which is death. Realising that death comes in this way, the man who relies on knowledge need have no fear of it. Indeed, as surely as death destroys the body, knowledge destroys death.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'The Vedas say that the sacred and eternal realms that Dvijas can attain through prayer and sacrifice offer emancipation. Why then should a learned man not perform such karma?'

Sanat Sujata says, 'It is true that the man who has no knowledge can take the path you mention, and what the Vedas say about bliss and moksha being there is also true. The man who has given up all material wants attains Brahman at once; but even the man who confuses the physical body with the Atman attains Brahman, if he is able to renounce desire. If, however, one seeks mukti without destroying desire, one has to go step by step along the prescribed path, leaving every step he takes irrevocably behind oneself and being careful not to have to retrace one's way.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Who is it that stimulates the Unborn and Ancient One into action? If He is this universe because he is present in everything, what form do action and happiness take for him who is without desire? Tejasvin Rishi, speak to me of this.'

Sanat Sujata says, 'You should not think of two essentially different things as being one. Creatures come into being by the union of the Purusha with Prakriti, both of which have no beginning, like time. This in no way lessens the supremacy and importance of the unborn and all-pervading Brahman. Men, too, have their origin in the same Supreme Being. All that appears to you is nothing but that everlasting Paramatman. Indeed, the universe is created by the transformations that the Supreme Soul goes through.

The Vedas say that the Paramatman has the power to transform Himself, and by that, causes transformations in this world.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Some practise dharma; some do not, but renounce all action and take sannyasa. Does virtue destroy vice, or is it destroyed by vice?'

Sanat Sujata says, 'The fruits of virtue and of perfect stillness, or inaction, can both be used to attain moksha. The wise man succeeds by gyana, knowledge; the worldly man acquires punya through karma, action, but in the process he also acquires paapa, sin.

After earning the transitory fruits of both virtue and vice and existing for a limited time in Swarga or Naraka the man of karma is involuntarily drawn to a life of action because of his previous karma. The wiser amongst such men exorcises his sins by his acts of dharma; dharma is powerful and is the path to moksha.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me about those eternal realms, in the order of their importance, that Dvijas attain as a result of following their svadharma. Tell me about other, similar realms. Learned one, I do not wish to hear of man's nature, sinful and condemnable as it is.'

Sanat Sujata says, 'The Dvijas who have good reason to be proud of their skills at Yoga, as strong men are of their physique, shine in Brahmaloka when they leave this world. Those Dvijas who can take pride in their knowledge and the pure performance of yagnas and Vedic rites attain Devaloka when they are freed from their mortal lives. There are Vedic scholars who believe that the performance of yagnas will lead to moksha. They, too, seek Atmagyana but place undue emphasis on rituals. They are not worthy of the highest respect.

The Yogi should seek his sustenance in a place where sattvik food and drink is abundant, like grass during the rainy season, rather than being a burden on a householder of scanty means. By no means, however, should he suffer from hunger or thirst.

In a situation where revealing one's superiority is fraught with uncertainties, the man who does not do so is more praiseworthy than the one who does. Wise men approve of the food offered by a man who is not offended by one who makes his superiority known and who never eats without first having offered a proper share to Brahmanas and Sadasyas. Just as a dog sickens because it eats its own vomit, so, too, do Yogins who get their sustenance by making their superiority obvious.

Wise men recognise as a Brahmana the man who practices his religion discreetly, so that even his family, in whose midst he lives, is unaware of it. Only such a Brahmana is worthy of realising Brahman, who is formless, unchangeable, singular and without duality. By similar conduct a Kshatriya, too, can realise Brahman as being within himself. He who takes his Soul to be his doing, feeling self sins by robbing the Atman of its true attributes.

A Brahmana should never try too hard or accept gifts; he should earn the respect of men of dharma; he should be quiet and modest about his Vedic knowledge. Only then will he gain Atmagyana and attain the Brahman. He who is poor in material wealth but rich in punya and sacrifices, becomes unconquerable and fearless; and he is Brahman embodied.

The man who performs yagnas and succeeds in invoking the Devas and having them grant his wishes is a lesser man than one who knows that Brahman is the real performer of his yagnas; the former realises Brahman by effort, whereas the latter attains Him with ease. The man whom the Devas respect, though he does nothing for it, is truly honoured; the respect bestowed by men is not true honour. The lack of the honour of men is no cause for grief.

People generally act unthinkingly according to their natures, as involuntarily as they blink their eyes. It is only the learned who respect other men, and the man who receives respect should be aware of this. Men who are foolish, inclined towards sin and deceitful, never respect those who are worthy; in fact they go out of their way to be disrespectful.

The esteem of the world and the ascetic vow of silence, mowna vrata, can never go together. This world is enjoyed by men who want esteem, while the other world is for those who keep the vow of silence. In this world, Kshatriya, happiness rests in worldly prosperity, which is actually an obstacle to moksha, eternal bliss. Heavenly prosperity cannot be had by one who is not truly wise.

Wise men say that there are several closely guarded gates that are portals to moksha. They are truth, integrity, humility, self-control, purity of mind and conduct, and Vedic knowledge. These six portals destroy vanity and ignorance as one passes through them.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'What is the purpose of the mowna vrata? Which of its two kinds do you approve of—not speaking or dhyana? Learned one, tell me about true mowna. Can a learned man attain a state of stillness and freedom by practising it? Muni, how should it be practised?'

Sanat Sujata says, 'Veda gyana, even if acquired with concentration and discipline, cannot reach the Paramatman; therefore Brahman itself is known as mowna. It is from mowna that the Vedic sound AUM and other ordinary sounds have been born; it is the Supreme Word, O king.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Is the man who knows the Rig, Yajur and Sama Vedas tainted by any sins he may commit?'

Sanat Sujata says, 'A man who has not controlled his senses cannot escape from his sins by virtue of his knowledge of the Rig, Yajur or Sama Vedas. The Vedas never rescue a false man who lives by deceit; on the other hand, they forsake him at his end, like fledglings leaving their nests.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'O you who have restrained your senses, if, as you say, the Vedas cannot save a man from the consequence of his sins, then why do Brahmanas labour under the delusion that the Vedas destroy sin?'

Sanat Sujata says, 'Although this universe has been born from the Brahman uniting with the gunas—attributes such as name and form, the Vedas stress that it is distinct from them. Mowna and yagnas are prescribed for the attainment of Brahman, and they are the means by which a learned man acquires dharma. Sin is destroyed by virtue and the soul is enlightened by knowledge.

It is with the help of knowledge that a learned man realises Brahman. The man of little wisdom covets the four material goals and takes the fruits of these with him into the next world. There he dwells and enjoys these fruits for a limited time and, because they are only short-lived, he comes back into this world of karma. The worldly fruits of mowna are enjoyed by those who have not restrained their souls; but those who have, enjoy fruits of the other worlds as well.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Muni, how can the same ascetic austerities be sometimes successful and sometimes not? Tell us how this is so.'

Sanat Sujata says, 'Mowna that is not corrupted by desire or other failings is successful and results in moksha; the aspirant succeeds. The answers to all your questions touch the very roots of tapasya. It is with gyana and mowna that learned men realise Brahman and live forever.'

Dhritarashtra said, 'I now know the eternal mystery, with the understanding you have given me about the mowna that is untainted by defects. Tell me now, Sanat Sujata, about mowna that is marred by faults.'

Sanat Sujata says, 'Twelve human vices mar the effectiveness of mowna: anger, lust, avarice, ignorance of right and wrong, discontentment, cruelty, jealousy, vanity, grief, love of pleasure, envy, and speaking ill of others. Manavarishabha, a man should take care to avoid these twelve, for any one of them by itself can destroy him. Indeed, every one of these vices waits for its opportunity, like a hunter in ambush for a deer.

There are six forms of evil that sinful men practise, which make them arrogantly fearless of dangers in this world and the next: boasting about one's own superiority, enjoying the wives of other men, humiliating others, anger, fickleness and refusing to maintain those who deserve it.

These seven kinds of men—the man who makes the gratification of lust his main aim in life, one who is haughty, one who regrets the gifts he gives, the man who is miserly, one who oppresses his people with excessive taxes, one who delights in the humiliation of others and the man who hates his own wives—are also evil.

Twelve are the true attributes of a Brahmana's way of life: righteousness, non-violence, truthfulness of speech, self-restraint, asceticism, joy in the happiness of others, modesty, forbearance, love of others, sacrifices, gifts, perseverance and knowledge of the Shastras. The man who acquires these twelve earns the power to control the Earth. A man who has three, or two, or even one of these can consider that he has reached his goal. Moksha lies in self-restraint, renunciation and Atmagyana. Wise Brahmanas say that these attributes are founded in truth.

There are eighteen defects that, if avoided, pave the way for a man to achieve self-control: non-performance of the prescribed rituals from laziness, falsehood, malice, lust, wealth, love of sensual pleasure, anger, grief, thirst, avarice, deceit, joy in the misery of others, envy, injuring others, regret, aversion to piety, forgetfulness of duty, speaking ill of others and vanity. These eighteen faults constitute mada, pride.

Renunciation is of six kinds, and the opposite of these six are also definitions of mada, making the total number twenty-four. All six kinds of renunciation are good; only the third is difficult to practise, but by it a man overcomes all sorrow. In fact, the man who is accomplished in this form of renunciation transcends the pairs of opposites, like joy and sorrow, pleasure and pain.

O king, the first kind of renunciation is not feeling joy on gaining prosperity; the second is giving up non-performance of yagnas and prayers; the third is the abandonment of desire, or withdrawing from the world. As a result of this third kind, one renounces the objects of enjoyment without having enjoyed them, not after knowing them; nor does one relinquish an acquisition after acquiring it and having no appetite for it.

The fourth kind of renunciation is not to allow oneself to grieve at the failure of one's efforts even those made using dharma and artha, wealth. It is to feel no pain when something unpleasant happens. The fifth kind of renunciation is to not ask for anything from anyone, even sons, wives and other dear ones. The sixth kind is to give to a deserving person who asks, which always brings punya. These five enable Atmagyana or Self-knowledge.

The last kind of renunciation has eight characteristics: truth, meditation, the ability to distinguish subject from object, the capacity to draw inferences, withdrawal from the world, never taking what belongs to another, adherence to brahmacharya—the vow of celibacy, and not accepting charity.

In the same way as renunciation has characteristics, so, too, are defects characteristic of mada, which is the opposite of dama—self-restraint—that the Shastras elucidate. These faults should be avoided. I have told you about renunciation and self-knowledge. Just as self-knowledge has eight virtues, the want of it has eight faults. Those should also be avoided.

Bhaarata, the man who is liberated from his five senses, the intellect, the past and the future becomes happy. Let your soul be devoted to truth; all the worlds are established in truth. Truth is also the first attribute of self-control, renunciation and self-knowledge. Avoid these faults and practise mowna. Brahman has ordained that truth alone should be the vow of the righteous. Mowna that is dissociated from these faults and endowed with the virtues becomes the source of great prosperity.

I have now told you in brief about the sin-destroying and sacred subject which liberates a man from the cycle of birth, old age and death.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'The fifth Veda, the Akhyana, says that the Supreme Soul is the universe. Others recognise four Vedas, while some recognise three, some two and some only one. Then there are those who acknowledge Brahman alone as the one thing that exists, everything else having its existence in Him. Tell me, which of these has true knowledge of Brahman?'

Sanat Sujata says, 'There is but one Brahman, who is Truth. It is from ignorance of that One that men have conceived several Vedas. But who is there, O king, who has attained Brahman, that Absolute Truth?

Without knowing that One object of knowledge that they ought to, men think they have gained wisdom. From the hope of gaining happiness they engage in study and practice daana and perform yagnas. The purposes of such men, who have strayed from Truth, match their condition; they rely on the Vedic texts as the Truth and so emptily perform their yagna and daana.

Some perform and attain the object of sacrifices by dhyana, meditation; some by chanting prayers, japa; some by the completion of the yatishtoma and other costly rites. However, the man who seeks Brahman through Truth gets what he wants, in his very home.

When a man's objectives are aborted by lack of Atmagyana he must adopt vows such as mowna vrata and diksha vrata. In fact, the word diksha is its own root, and it means observance of vratas. For those who have attained Atmagyana, Truth is the highest object of their pursuit.

The fruits of gyana are visible; the fruits of mowna are only enjoyed in the hereafter. A Brahmana who, without gyana and mowna, has read much should only be regarded as a great reader; never assume that a man can be a Brahmagyani—one who knows Brahman—merely by reading the Shastras.

Know, on the other hand, that the true Brahmana is one who never deviates from the Truth.

O Kshatriya, the verses that were recited in olden times by Atharvan to a conclave of Maharishis are also called the Chhandas. Those who have read the Vedas but do not have knowledge of the One Being, that should follow, must not be considered as having acquired true Vedic knowledge. The Chhandas are the independent means of attaining Brahman without the need for doing anything else. Those who are only acquainted with the modes of sacrifice prescribed in the Vedas cannot be regarded as knowing the Vedas. On the other hand, those who have served men with true Vedic knowledge have as good as attained knowledge of the One Being that Veda gyana leads to.

There is no one quality of the intellect that can help a man acquire the true meaning of the Vedas, nor can all the qualities of the intellect; yet there may be some few men who have grasped it. Whatever might happen, the man who has only read them does not gain knowledge of the One Being that can be known through knowing the Vedas; it is the man who is firmly established in the Truth who knows Him.

There are no qualities, which delude men to perceive the physical body as the Self, that can lead to Atmagyana. A man's intellect alone cannot help him distinguish the Self from the not-Self. He who knows the Self also knows what is not-Self; but he who knows only what is not-Self does not know Truth.

He who knows the proofs knows that which he seeks to prove, but neither Vedic knowledge nor the Vedas themselves can perceive its true nature. But Brahmanas who have true knowledge of the Vedas succeed in knowing the One Being that a study of the Vedas can lead to.

Just as the twig of a particular tree is sometimes used for indicating the day of the new moon, the Vedas are used for indicating the highest attributes of the Paramatman. In my opinion, a Brahmana, or one who knows Brahman, is one who explains men's doubts, having first cleared his own; he is one who has true knowledge of his Self, Atmagyana.

You cannot find the Atman by searching in the East, South, West, North or in subsidiary cardinal directions, or even laterally. Very rarely can the man who thinks his body is the Self find Atman. Beyond the conception of even the Vedas, the man of Yoga dhyana can behold the Supreme Being.

Completely restrain all your senses and your mind and seek Brahman who resides in your own soul.

A man is no Muni who practises dhyana in silence, nor is he one who retires from the world and lives in the forest; a Muni is the man who knows his true nature.

A man is said to be a Vaiyakarana, or grammarian, who can trace every word to its root and explain it—Vyakarana. Every word has its root in Brahman. The man who sees all the Lokas before his eyes knows everything; the man who is established in Truth and knows Brahman is a real Brahmana; and a Brahmana possesses universal knowledge.

A Kshatriya who practises Brahmana dharma also beholds Brahman. He can also attain to that supreme state by going step by step in accordance to the teachings of the Vedas. I know all this for certain; and that is why I tell it to you.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'O Sanat Sujata, what you say of Brahman and the origin of the universe is illuminating indeed and lightens my heart. Tell me more of such things that are not to do with worldly pursuits and, so, not common among men.'

Sanat Sujata says, 'Brahman, about which you ask me so joyfully, cannot be attained in a hurry. After you have restrained your senses, when conscious thought is merged in pure intellect, the state that succeeds is one of utter absence of worldly thought. That condition is true knowledge and leads to the realisation of Brahman. It can be attained only by practising brahmacharya.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'You say that the mind is where knowledge of Brahman naturally resides, being discovered only through brahmacharya; that, dwelling in the mind, it needs no effort to manifest itself; and that this happens whilst one seeks it through brahmacharya. How then is immortality associated with the attainment of Brahman?'

Sanat Sujata says, 'Though dwelling in and inherent to the mind, the knowledge of Brahman is still unmanifest. Pure intellect and brahmacharya are needed to make it emerge into consciousness. Then, having attained that knowledge, Yogis forsake this world naturally. True gyana is found among great gurus. I will tell you now about this knowledge.'

Dhritarashtra says, ‘What should be the nature of brahmacharya by which the knowledge of Brahman might be attained without too much difficulty? Dvijottama, tell me this.’

Sanat Sujata says, ‘Those who live in the asramas of their gurus, who win their goodwill and friendship and who practise austere celibacy become earthly embodiments of Brahman. They cast off their bodies and become one with the Paramatman. Those who seek to attain the state of Brahman subdue all desires and, living in dharma, they succeed in dissociating their souls from their bodies, like a blade of grass standing upright on a flat heath.

The mother and father create the human body, but the birth that occurs as a result of obeying the guru is sacred and free from old age and death. The guru who discourses on Brahman, while granting immortality, wraps all his disciples in the mantle of Truth. The sishya should think of him as father and mother; and remembering the good he does, never do him injury.

A sishya must always greet his guru with respect; with a pure mind and body, he must direct his attention to his studies. He must not consider any service too humble to perform for him and must never feel anger. This is the first step of brahmacharya. The disciple who learns about his own duties by observing the duties of other disciples also takes the first step on the path of brahmacharya.

A sishya should do whatever pleases his guru in thought, word and deed, even at the expense of his own life and all his possessions. This is the second step of brahmacharya. Also a second step is for the disciple to behave towards his guru’s wife and son in the same way that he does to his guru.

The sishya must appreciate all that his guru has done for him and, understanding the goals, think with joy, He has taught me and made me great. This is the third step of brahmacharya. The good disciple should not leave his guru’s home without first getting his leave and without paying gurudakshina, while disassociating himself from being the giver of it. This is the fourth step of brahmacharya.

He achieves the first step towards knowledge of Brahman, which is the object of brahmacharya, in due course; the second step is through the guru’s teachings; the third is by his own intellect; and finally, the fourth is by satsanga and discussion.

Learned men have said that Brahmacharya consists of twelve virtues; the Yoga practices are called its Angas, and perseverance in Yoga dhyana is its nutrient. The man who has achieved mastery in Yoga, with his guru's help and with true understanding of the Vedas, becomes a successful Yogi.

A man must give whatever wealth he may earn, whilst he is a disciple, to his guru. It is in this way that the guru makes his livelihood by his svadharma. The sishya should do the same for his guru's son. Living in this manner as a Brahmachari, the disciple thrives and is blessed with progeny and renown. Men from all over the world shower him with wealth, and many come to his home to practice brahmacharya. It is through brahmacharya of this kind that the Devas obtained their divinity, and blessed sages of great wisdom attained Brahmaloka. This is how the Gandharvas and the Apsaras acquired physical beauty, and it is through brahmacharya that Surya rises to make the day.

In the same way that seekers of the stone that turns base metals into gold derive joy when they find what they are looking for, the Devas and others obtain great happiness on completion of their brahmacharya, for then they can have whatever they wish.

Rajan, the man who is devoted to tapasya takes up brahmacharya in its entirety and thus purifies himself. This man is wise for, by this, he becomes like an innocent child, free from dark passions; and he triumphs over death. Through karma, men can only obtain worldly wealth, which is perishable; but the man who is blessed with true gyana uses it to attain Brahman, which is everlasting. There is no path other than gyana and the attainment of Brahman that can lead to Moksha.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'You say that a wise man sees Brahman in his own soul. Is Brahman white, red, black, blue or purple? Tell me what is the true form and colour of the omnipresent and eternal Being?'

Sanat Sujata says, 'Brahman may be seen as white, red, black, brown or fulvid. But neither on Earth nor in the sky, nor in the waters of the ocean is there anything like It. You will not see the like in stars, in lightning or in clouds. It cannot be compared with anything one may see in the air, in the Moon, in the Sun or in the celestial bodies.

Neither the Rig nor the Yajur, neither the Atharvan nor the pure Saman has anything that is comparable. It is not to be found in Rathantara, Varhadratha or in great yagnas. It cannot be measured and it lies beyond the limited reach of the intellect. Even the universal Destroyer loses himself in It after the Pralaya.

One cannot see It, for It is as subtle as a razor's edge and also more immense than a great mountain. It is the basis upon which everything is founded; It is unchangeable; It is this visible universe; It is omnipresent, vast and delightful. All creatures have sprung from It and will return to It. It is free from duality; It is manifest as the universe; and It is all-pervading. Learned men say that It is changeless, except in the language that is used to describe It.

Those that know this Entity in which everything is established are emancipated.'"

"Sanat Sujata says, 'Sorrow, anger, avarice, lust, ignorance, sloth, malice, self-importance, love of profit, affection, jealousy and evil speech are grave and destructive flaws in character. Each of these waits for an opportunity to capture a man, who then yields his good sense up to them, and helplessly sins.

A man who is covetous, one who is fierce, one who speaks harshly, a man who is garrulous, one who fosters anger and a man who is boastful are evil-minded and, once they acquire wealth, treat others discourteously. A man whose life's objective is sensual gratification, one who is vain, a man who boasts about the gift he gives, a miser, a man who is feeble-minded, one who admires himself and a man who hates his own wife are seven that one must consider sinful.

The twelve characteristics of a Brahmana are righteousness, truthfulness, asceticism, self-restraint, contentment, humility, self-sacrifice, selflessness, generosity, knowledge of the Shastras, patience and forgiveness. The man who adheres to these has the power to rule the world. The man who is invested with three, two or even one of these qualities never claims exclusive ownership of anything. Moksha lies in self-restraint, renunciation and knowledge. These are the attributes of wise Brahmanas who regard Brahman as the highest of all goals. Be it true or false, it is not proper for Brahmanas to speak ill of others; those who do will surely find Naraka.

I have not yet spoken to you of the eighteen defects that mada has. They are ill-will towards others, obstruction of dharma, defaming others, dishonesty, lust, anger, excessive reliance on other people, slander, casting blame, wasting money, disputatiousness, insolence, cruelty to living creatures, malice, ignorance, disrespect of those that are worthy of deference, not recognising right and wrong, and hurtfulness. A wise man should never give in to mada, for its attributes are condemnable.

Friendship is indicated in six ways. Firstly, a true friend delights in the prosperity of his friends. Secondly, he is distressed by their adversity. Thirdly, if his friend asks him for something he values, even that which ought not to be asked for, he gives it unreservedly. Fourthly, a true friend would give away all his wealth, his beloved sons and even his own wife for the sake of his friend. Fifthly, a friend would rather enjoy only what he can earn than live in the home of his friend to whom he may have given everything. Sixthly, a friend would think nothing of sacrificing his own good for his friend.

The affluent man who wants to acquire these qualities, and who becomes charitable and keeps dharma, can do so by restraining his five senses. Such restraint is asceticism. When it grows it can take a man to realms of bliss in the hereafter. Gyana, however, can lead a man to moksha even in this world.

Men who, from impatience, are unable to acquire wisdom, can still gain such asceticism through the power of their goal of attaining moksha. As a consequence of his ability to grasp that Truth, which is Brahman, the source of all yagna, a Yogi can perform sacrifices with the power of his mind; others perform yagnas by sacred chanting, japa; and some by work, karma. Brahman resides in him who knows Brahman as being saguna, vested with attributes, but is established more firmly in him who knows Brahman as being nirguna, without any attribute.

Listen now to something else. All seekers should know this great and exalted philosophy; all other systems of belief are just so many words. The universe is established in this faith; those who know it never die. O king, one cannot attain Brahman merely by virtue of karma, regardless of how well one accomplishes one's work. The man who is destitute of knowledge can never achieve moksha through karma, even if he conducts countless homas and yagnas. He does not experience lasting joy at their end. A man must restrain all the outward senses and on his own seek Brahman. He should give up all karma and still his mind. By this, he should neither feel elation on being praised nor anger on being censured.

O Kshatriya, by conducting himself in this way, step by step as prescribed in the Vedas, a man can attain Brahman in this very world. Of this I assure you.'"

"Sanat Sujata says, 'The Seed from which the universe originated is called Mahayasas. It is pure knowledge, devoid of extrinsic attributes, and It blazes with lustre. It leads the senses; It is what makes Surya shine. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

The Seed, which is bliss itself, gives Brahma the ability to create and to grow. It is this Bija that gives heat and light to luminous bodies; It generates its own light and heat and is an object of terror to all heat-and light-giving bodies. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

From Brahman arise the five subtle elements, the mahabhutas, from which are born the five gross elements, the bhutas, which constitute the human body. The heart contains both the living soul, Atman, as well as the divine soul, Iswara, or Paramatman. Respectively, these two lose consciousness during sleep and at the time of Pralaya. Brahman, on the other hand, is ever awake. He is the Sun's Sun and holds up Bhumi and Swarga. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

The Seed supports Atman and Paramatman, Bhumi and Swarga, the cardinal directions and the whole universe. The points of the compass and the rivers spring from the Seed; It is the point of origin of the vast seas. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

The body is a chariot set on a course of destruction; its deeds, however, are undying. The wheels of that chariot are the deeds of past lives; the horses that pull it are the senses that draw a man of true knowledge through the realms of the unconscious to the Immortal Being. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

The form of the Supreme One cannot be described by comparison with any other. No one ever sees Him with the body's eye; the man of wisdom who sees Him with his mind and heart has no death. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

The river of illusion is fearful; it is guarded by the gods and it bears twelve fruits. As they swim along, men drink its waters and see many desirable things in its midst. This river has its source in the Seed. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

The Atman is destined to journey to and fro, from life to afterlife, enjoying only half the fruits of earthly actions in the other world. Iswara, however, is all pervading and the ordainer of all sacrifices. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

The Soul is originally naked. Resorting to Avidya, which is like a tree with golden leaves, it clothes itself in attributes and takes birth again and again in different castes according to its current dominant guna. Thus does the Paramatman take forms that house the Atman. Yogis see the Eternal One, in whom all souls reside, with their inner eye.

External attributes come into contact with Brahman, giving him many forms. From the One has the universe sprung, and from the One have also sprung outward attributes that are in themselves whole. When a man succeeds in dispelling everything extrinsic, what remains is Brahman who is the intrinsic whole. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

It is from the Seed that the five elements have arisen, and the Seed is the seat of power that controls them. It is from the Seed that both the one who consumes and the consumed—Agni and Soma—have sprung; it is in the Bija that all life rests. Everything originates from It. In the Vedas the Seed is named Tat, and it is beyond description. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

The vital air called apana is absorbed by the air called prana; prana is swallowed by the mind; the mind dissolves in the intellect; and intellect is consumed by Brahman. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

The Supreme Soul, when embodied, is like a man with four legs, each leg a state of being—waking, dream, deep sleep and turiya. In the last, he is like a swan wading out from the deep waters of samsara, hiding one leg deep in its wing. For the man who sees this hidden state of turiya as the means by which the other three are guided, death and moksha are the same. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

Only as large as a man's thumb, this eternal organism, the Seed, the Bija, is ever full. When It becomes part of a human body—with its prana, mind, intellect and ten senses—It is set in motion. That Supreme Sovereign, worthy of reverential hymns, capable of everything when vested extrinsically, the prime cause of everything, is manifest as Gyana in the human Atman. Only a fool does not see him. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

There are those who have gained mastery of their minds and those who have not. Yet the Supreme Soul is equally present in all men—in the emancipated and in the bound; the difference being that nectar flows in a thick stream into the emancipated Yogis, who see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

If, on his life's journey, a man attains knowledge of self and not-self, it matters little whether he performs Agnihotra or not. O king, do not let words like I am your servant fall from the lips of such a man. Brahman has another name, Pure Knowledge. Only those who have restrained their minds know Him. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

He is illustrious and complete; all living creatures are merged into Him. The man who knows this embodiment of Oneness achieves moksha whilst alive in this world. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

Everything, even that which flies away, stretching thousands of wings and with the speed of the mind, must come back to the central spirit within the body, in which the most distant things reside. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

The eye cannot perceive his form; only the pure of heart can behold him. He is pure-hearted who seeks universal good, succeeds in controlling his mind and does not allow his heart to be touched by grief. Such a man can abandon the world and all its cares and become immortal. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

Like serpents lying coiled and hidden in a pit, there are those who despite their learning follow their own instincts; but they keep their vices hidden. They deceive only those who have little sense. They deceive people by an outward show of dharma and lead them to hell. Know that Brahman may well be attained by companionship with unlikely men. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

The man who is freed knows that his impermanent body cannot give him grief or joy, or indeed any other attributes that attach to it. For him there can be no death or birth. Since he realises that Brahman, which has no dualities and which is constant everywhere and all the time, is where reality and illusion both reside, he can be emancipated. He knows that Brahman alone is the beginning and end, all causes and effects. Existing in the form of I, or Self, the divine, Eternal One is beheld by Yogis with their inner eye.

The man who knows Brahman is equal to Brahman. He is neither glorified by good deeds nor defiled by evil ones. It is only in ordinary men that good and bad karma produce different results. The man who has seen Brahman is immortal, Amrita; he is in the singular state called Kaivalya, unaffected by virtue or vice. In this way a man receives the essence of sweetness that is Brahman. Yogis see the Eternal One with their inner eye.

The heart of such a man is not distressed by slander, or by not having studied the Vedas, or by not having performed the Agnihotra. The knowledge of Brahman imparts to him the wisdom that only they who have restrained their minds have access to. Yogis see the Eternal One, the Brahman which frees the soul from grief and ignorance, with their inner eye.

The man who sees himself in everything no longer grieves, for grief is the lot of those who are occupied with worldly pursuits. Just as one's thirst may as easily be quenched in a well as in a vast reservoir, a man's knowledge of Brahman will quench his thirst for knowledge as easily as does knowledge of the entire Veda. Dwelling in the heart, and only as big as a thumb, that illustrious embodiment of wholeness cannot be seen. He is unborn, yet moves in wakefulness, day and night. The man who knows him becomes learned and is filled with ineffable joy.

I am the mother and father. I am the son. I am the soul of all that ever was and of all that shall ever be. I am the venerable grandfather; I am the father; I am the son. You live within my soul; but you are not mine nor am I yours. The Soul is the cause of my birth and procreation. I am the warp and weft of the universe. The foundation upon which I rest is indestructible. Unborn, yet awake, I move day and night. To know me is to be learned and full of joy.

Thus is the Brahman.

Subtler than the subtle, capable of looking into the past and the future, Brahman is awake in every creature. Those who know Him know that the Universal Father dwells in the heart of everything in creation.'"

YANASANDHI PARVA

Vaisampayana said, "Dhritarashtra passes the night in conversation with Sanat Sujata and Vidura.

In the morning, all the kings and princes come to the sabha, full of joy on hearing that the Suta has returned and looking forward to seeing him. Both anxious and eager, they go to the beautiful hall with Dhritarashtra at their head to hear Yudhishtira's message that is charged with dharma and artha. The capacious sabha is spotlessly clean and adorned with a golden floor. It is as bright as the Moon and sprinkled with fragrant sandalwood water; luxurious seats made of gold, wood, marble and ivory, covered with exquisite fabric, fill that majestic court.

In one body do these kings and powerful others enter the Kuru sabha, with Dhritarashtra leading them: Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Salya, Kritavarman, Jayadratha, Aswatthama, Vikarna, Somadatta, Bahlika, the immensely wise Vidura and Maharatha Yuyutsu. With the regal and choleric Duryodhana at their head, Dusasana, Chitrasena, Subala's son Sakuni, Durmukha, Dussaha, Karna, Uluka and Vivimsati enter the sabha, looking like Indra with his entourage of Devas. The hall, filled with these heroic men, their arms like iron maces, is like a mountain cave filled with lions. Those mighty and fiery archers blaze like the Sun as they enter and sit down on wonderful thrones.

Once all the kings are seated, the door keeper announces the arrival of the Sutaputra Sanjaya, saying, ‘Here comes the chariot that was despatched to the Pandavas. Borne by the fleet Sindhu steeds, our duta has returned swiftly.’

Approaching with speed, Sanjaya, adorned with golden kundalas, alights from the ratha and strides into sabha filled with noble kings.

The Suta says, ‘O Kauravas, I have returned from seeing the sons of Pandu. The Pandavas salute all the Kurus, each according to his age. They pay their homage to the elderly and send greetings and blessings to their contemporaries and the younger men. Listen, O Kshatriyas, to what I said to the Pandavas, as I was instructed by Dhritarashtra when I went from here, and hear what they said in reply.’”

"Dhritarashtra says, 'O Sanjaya, I ask you in the presence of my son and all these kings, what did the illustrious and mighty Dhananjaya, that first among warriors, the scourge of evil men, say?'

Sanjaya says, 'Let Duryodhana hear the words that noble Arjuna, who is eager to fight, said in Krishna's hearing and with Yudhishtira's approval. Fearless in battle, aware of the might of his arms and eager to fight, the heroic Kiriti spoke to me in Krishna's presence.

He said, "O Suta, say these words to Dhritarashtra's son, in the presence of all the Kurus, also in the hearing of that foul-tongued, black-souled, dull-witted Karna, whose days are numbered and who spoils for battle with me, and in the hearing of all the kings who have gathered to go to war against the Pandavas. Make sure that the king and his ministers mark my words well."

O king, as attentively as the Devas listen to Indra did the Pandavas and Srinjayas listen to Arjuna's grave words.

The wielder of the Gandiva, his eyes as red as lotuses and eager for war, said, "If Duryodhana does not give Yudhishtira of the Ajamida vamsa his kingdom, it is plain that the sons of Dhritarashtra must have committed some heinous sin whose consequences they have not yet reaped, for there can be no other reason why they should want to go to war against Bhimasena, Arjuna and the twins, against Vasudeva, Sini's son, the infallible marksmen Dhrishtadyumna and Sikhandin, and against Yudhishtira, who is a second Indra and who can consume heaven and earth by merely wishing them ill. If Dhritarashtra's son wants war with these men, then the goals of the Pandavas will be accomplished. Therefore, do not propose peace to the sons of Pandu, but let us have war if you like.

Yudhishtira lay on a bed of sorrows in the forest when he lived in exile; O, let a more painful bed than that, on bare earth, be Duryodhana's now, and let him lie down on it at his end, deprived of life. Win Duryodhana's men over to Yudhishtira's side, for my brother is blessed with modesty and wisdom, asceticism and self-restraint, courage and the might of dharma. Our king is also humble, righteous and ever truthful, and though he was deceived and betrayed in so many ways, he has forgiven it all and patiently borne great injustice.

When this eldest son of Pandu, of the controlled soul, directs the terrible anger that has accumulated for years at the Kurus, Duryodhana will repent. In the same way that a blazing fire burns dry grass in summer, so will Yudhishtira's flaming wrath consume Dhritarashtra's army, why, with a mere glance of his eye.

When Duryodhana sees the great and furious Bhimasena standing in his chariot with his mace in hand and vomiting the venom of his wrath, he will repent. When he sees the mail clad Bhima, who always fights in the front, on whom even his own followers can scarcely bear to look, felling hostile heroes and devastating the enemy's ranks, as if he was Yama himself, then vain Duryodhana will remember my words.

When he sees Bhima strike down elephants like mountain peaks, and sees blood flowing from their shattered heads like water from broken casks, Duryodhana will repent. When the fierce Bhima of fearful form falls upon Dhritarashtra's sons, mace in hand, and slaughters them, like a great lion attacking a herd of cattle, Duryodhana will repent. When the heroic Bhima, undaunted even by great danger and skilled in the use of all weapons, that crusher of enemy hosts, mounted on his chariot, grinds into the dust innumerable and better chariots, as well as entire divisions of footsoldiers, seizing enemy elephants with his iron-hard noose and mowing down Dhritarashtra's forces, like a sturdy woodsman a forest with his axe, Duryodhana will repent.

When he sees Dhritarashtra's armies consumed like a village of straw huts by fire, or like a field of ripe corn by lightning; when he sees his vast army scattered, its leaders slain and the terrified men turning to flee, and all the warriors, humbled to the dust, scorched by fire of Bhimasena's weapons, Duryodhana will repent.

When Nakula, Kshatriya of wonderful feats, foremost of rathikas, shoots endless streams of deadly arrows and mangles Duryodhana's chariot-warriors, Duryodhana will repent. When Nakula, who is accustomed to comforts and luxuries, thinks back on that bed of anguish on which he slept for years in the vana and spews his wrath in a venomous jet, like an angry snake, Duryodhana will repent.

When Duryodhana sees our allied kings, who are ready to lay down their lives for Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, urged into battle by him, furiously advance in their resplendent chariots against the enemy, the son of Dhritarashtra will certainly repent. When the Kuru prince sees the five heroic sons of Draupadi, tender in years but not in deeds, and all masters of arms, storm fearlessly at the Kaurava legions, Duryodhana will repent.

When Sahadeva, bent on carnage, and mounted on his chariot of silent wheels and inexorable course, set with golden stars and drawn by superb horses, makes the heads of kings roll on the field with his volleys of arrows; when Duryodhana sees that masterly warrior, riding his ratha in the frightful havoc of bloody war, attack the enemy in all directions, Duryodhana will repent. Indeed, when the modest but mighty Sahadeva, skilled in battle, truthful, devoted to dharma and of boundless vigour, attacks the son of Gandhari in fierce encounter and routs all his followers, Duryodhana will repent.

When he sees Draupadi's sons, all great archers, all heroes and masters of weapons and fighting from chariots, dart at the foe like vicious, poisonous snakes, then will the son of Dhritarashtra repent for this war. When Parantapa Abhimanyu, as expert in arms as Krishna, overpowers the Kaurava legions with dark gales of arrows, Duryodhana will repent.

When he sees Subhadra's son, a child in years but not in prowess, as skilled with weapons as Indra himself, attack the enemy ranks like Yama, Duryodhana will repent. When young Prabhadraka of leonine vitality, experienced in battle, is among Dhritarashtra's sons and their troops, Duryodhana will repent.

When those veteran Maharathas, Virata and Drupada, attack Dhritarashtra's sons as they stand at the head of their legions, Duryodhana will repent. When the master of astras, Drupada, seated in his chariot and eager to take the heads off your young warriors, decapitates them with inexorable arrows, Duryodhana will repent. When Parantapa Virata and his cool-headed Matsya warriors penetrate the ranks of the enemy, felling them all around as they advance, Duryodhana will repent. When he sees the eldest son of the Matsya king fighting from the van of the Pandava army, sitting in his chariot, calm and courageous, and clad in shining mail, Duryodhana will repent.

When that greatest of all Kaurava heroes, the virtuous son of Santanu, is slain in battle by Sikhandin, then all our enemies will die. This I know beyond doubt. When Sikhandin advances on his armoured ratha towards Bhishma, shattering multitudes of enemy rathas on the way, Duryodhana will repent. When Duryodhana sees Dhrishtadyumna, who has learnt all the secrets of the astra shastra from Drona, standing in splendour in the van of the Srinjaya force, he will repent.

When the Senapati of the Pandava host, of immeasurable prowess, who can withstand the charge of any army, flies at Drona, on his way razing Dhritarashtra's warriors with his arrows, Duryodhana will repent. What enemy can withstand him, who has for his lord that lion of the Vrishni race, the chief of the Somakas, who is modest and intelligent, mighty and invested with untold urjas and blessed with every noble quality?

Say this also to Duryodhana: Do not covet the kingdom. We have with us the dauntless Maharatha Satyaki, the grandson of Sini, who is an unsurpassed master of weapons on this Earth. Broad-chested and long-armed, that Parantapa, unrivalled in battle and a master of the greatest astras, wields a bow four cubits long. When that bane of his foes, the chief of the Sinis, lashes the enemy with his arrow storms, at my urging, overwhelming their leaders, Duryodhana will repent.

When that shining warrior of the long arms and firm grasp is resolved to fight, then, like cattle that scent lions on the wind, enemy forces flee, even before battle begins. This Kshatriya can split mountains and consume the universe in revelational flames. Blessed with awesome lightness of hand, he shines on the field of war like the Sun in the sky.

That lion of the Vrishnis, scion of Yadu's line, whose tutelage has been meticulous, commands supernal weapons; Satyaki commands all the greatest astras. When he sees Satyaki's golden chariot on the field, drawn by four white steeds, Duryodhana of the uncontrolled passions will repent.

When he sees my own chariot, glittering like gold and with bright gemstones inlaid, drawn by white Gandharva steeds, flying the banner of Hanuman, and driven by Krishna himself, that wretch of uncontrolled passions will repent. When, in the midst of the great war, he hears the incessant thrumming of my leather-gloved hands pulling the bowstrings of the Gandiva, loud as rolling thunder, Duryodhana will repent.

When he sees his troops abandoning him and running like deer from the field, overwhelmed by the darkness that I create with my arrow banks; when he sees countless winged arrows, which excoriate a man's bowels, flash from the Gandiva like lightning from storm clouds, and raze enemies by the thousands and devour horses and armour-clad elephants, Duryodhana will indeed repent.

When he sees me turn enemy arrows back on their courses, or shred them with my own shafts, foolish Duryodhana will repent. When my broad-headed arrows pluck the heads of young warriors from their bodies, like birds picking fruit from the treetops, Duryodhana will repent. When he sees his peerless warriors fall from their chariots, and elephants and horses roll lifeless on the field, slain by my arrows, Duryodhana will repent. When he sees his brothers fall all around him, dying even before they come within range of his enemy's weapons, and without having raised a weapon in battle, Duryodhana will repent.

I will loose an endless river of blazing arrows and, like Yama with mouth agape, swallow multitudes of chariots and foot-soldiers, and then that dog Duryodhana will repent. When he sees his own troops, covered with the dust whipped up by my chariot as it wheels swiftly in all directions, torn to shreds by shafts from the Gandiva, and the living deranged by fear, the wretched Duryodhana will repent.

When he sees his entire army flee in terror, their arms and legs mangled, and their minds unhinged; when he sees his horses, elephants and his best warriors slain, and his dry-mouthed and panic-stricken troops dead or wailing aloud as they lie dying beside their exhausted animals; when he sees hair, bones and skulls lying in mounds, like half-finished works of the Creator, that vile prince will repent.

When he sees on my chariot Krishna with his Panchajanya, and me with my pair of inexhaustible quivers, my Gandiva, my Devadatta and my white horses, Duryodhana will repent. When I consume the Kauravas, as Agni consumes all the evil souls that throng together at the beginning of a new yuga, Dhritarashtra and all his sons will repent.

When the evil and wrathful son of Dhritarashtra is deprived of his prosperity, along with his brothers, his army and his followers, that fool, stripped of pride and trembling, will repent.

One morning, when I had finished my ritual bath and prayers, a Brahmana said to me, Partha, you will have a difficult task to perform; you will have to fight your enemies. Either Indra will ride before you on his superb mount and with his Vajra in hand, razing your foes in battle, or Vasudeva's son Krishna will protect you from behind, in his chariot drawn by horses with Sugriva at their head.

With complete faith in what he said, I have passed over Indra the wielder of the thunderbolt, preferring to have Krishna on my side. I have chosen Krishna to help me annihilate these evil ones. I see the hand of God in all this. The man, whose success Krishna merely wishes for, is sure to prevail over his enemies without Krishna needing to take up arms on his behalf. This is so, even if the adversaries are the Devas with Indra leading them, let alone mere mortals.

The man who wants to vanquish that first among all heroes, Krishna of the mighty urjas, in battle, may as well try to cross the ocean by swimming across it. Such a fool is like a man who tries to split open the Kailasa mountain by striking it with his palm; he does not cause the mountain the slightest damage, while his hand might break and his nails tear. He may as well be able to put out a raging forest fire with his bare hands, or stop the Sun and Moon from moving, or steal amrita from the Devas.

This is the same Krishna who mowed down all the Bhoja warriors and carried off Rukmini in his chariot, to make her his wife; and their son is the noble Pradyumna. Krishna is the darling of the Devas; he devastated the Gandharas and defeated all Nagnajita's sons to rescue the mighty king Sudarshana from confinement. It was Krishna who killed King Pandya by striking him with his chest; and he who destroyed the Kalingas in battle. It is he who burnt the city of Varanasi, which remained kingless for many years because there was no one to succeed its prince Sudakshina.

Ekalavya, the king of the Nishadas, always challenged him to battle; but Krishna slew him and he lay dead on a hillside like the Asura Jambha of old. Krishna, with Baladeva at his side, slew Ugrasena's evil son Kansa, while he sat in the midst of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas, and then gave Ugrasena the kingdom. It was Krishna who, fearless with his fathomless powers, fought Salya, lord of Saubha, the city that floats in the skies; and Krishna caught the Satagni of a hundred fires in his hand, when Salya hurled it at him at the gates of Saubha. No mortal can face Krishna's might.

The Asuras had a city called Pragjyotisha, formidable and inaccessible. There, Narakasura, the son of Bhumi Devi, kept the jewelled ear-rings of Aditi that he had taken by force. The Devas, who do not fear death, with Sakra at their head, could not subdue Naraka. The Devas saw Krishna's prowess; they saw his irresistible Chakra; they knew the purpose of his birth, and they begged him to quell Naraka and his fell Asuras; and blithely Krishna agreed. In the city of Nirmochana he slew six thousand Asuras; he shredded their arrows and killed Mura and hosts of other Rakshasas; then he entered the city.

There, a stupendous duel erupted between the dreadful Naraka and Vishnu's Avatara; until, slain by Krishna, Naraka lay lifeless, like a karnikara tree uprooted by the wind. Having killed the Earth's son and Mura, and having recovered the incomparable ear-rings, Krishna of unearthly prowess came back, alight with divine lustre and crowned with undying fame. The Devas, who witnessed his ineffable feats, blessed him, saying, You will never tire in a fight; neither earth nor water will obstruct you; weapons shall never pierce your body. And Krishna regarded this blessing as ample reward. This is Krishna, who is beyond all compare.

Dhritarashtra's son aspires to vanquish this same Vishnu, of infinite tejas; and the evil one often thinks of imprisoning him. Krishna bears all this for our sake. And vile Duryodhana wants to create a rift between Krishna and me. He will see for himself, when he is on the battlefield, how far he will be able to take Krishna's love away from the Pandavas!

I will bow to Bhishma, to Drona and his son, and to the peerless son of Saradwat, our acharya Kripa; but then I will begin the battle to regain our kingdom. Dharmadeva will bring righteous destruction down on our sinful cousin who is so eager to fight us.

Deceitfully beaten at dice by those base men, we, of royal birth, spent twelve agonising years in the forest and one long year in hiding. While we, the Pandavas, are still alive, how can the sons of Dhritarashtra rejoice in their affluence or power?

If they defeat us in battle, with the help of Indra and the Devas, it will mean that vice is superior to virtue, and the very concept of dharma would cease to exist. If indeed a man's actions do bear fruit and if we are better men than Duryodhana, I believe that, with Krishna at my side, I will kill Duryodhana and all his kinsmen. Lord of men, if robbing us of our kingdom is evil, if our own good deeds are not in vain, Duryodhana's is doomed.

O Kauravas, you will see with your own eyes that, if they come to war, the sons of Dhritarashtra will surely die. If they desist from fighting, they might live; but if there is a battle, none of them will be left alive. I will kill all Dhritarashtra's sons and Karna, and take the entire kingdom. Do whatever you think is best and, meanwhile, enjoy the time you have with your wives and other sweet things of life.

There are many venerable Brahmanas with us, who are knowers of the Shastras, of pure conduct, of noble birth, witnesses to all the events that have transpired. They, who can understand and interpret the astrological significance of the movements of the planets and their relative positions to the stars; who can explain the mysteries of destiny and predict the future; and who know the signs of the zodiac and what is happening every hour, prophesy a great defeat for the Kurus and the Srinjayas, and final victory for the Pandavas.

Because of this, Yudhishtira, who never made an enemy, considers that he has already achieved his goal, of vanquishing his enemies. Krishna, who sees the invisible future, sees all this; and I, too, with the clear and unerring foresight that I acquired years ago, the chaksushi I had from the Gandharva Angaraparna, see into the future. If they fight, the sons of Dhritarashtra will not live. My Gandiva stretches without my touching it; the bow-string trembles without being drawn; and arrows stand up in my quiver, impatient to fly out. My gleaming sword slides out of its scabbard by itself, like a moulting snake from its old skin; and terrible voices scream from atop my flag-staff, saying, When will you yoke your chariot, Arjuna? Hordes of jackals howl hideously at night; Rakshasas land from the sky in dense swarms; deer and jackals, peacocks and crows, vultures, cranes and wolves, and golden-plumed birds follow my chariot when I yoke my white horses to it.

Single-handedly, with torrents of arrows, I will despatch all these warrior kings to Yamaloka. Just as a blazing conflagration consumes a forest in summer, I will consume my enemies with the astras I invoke. I will loose the Sthuna, Karna, Pasupata, Brahma and the other inexorable missiles that Indra gave me; and with my heart set on the death of those kings, I will obliterate all who enter the battlefield. Only after this, will I rest; this is my resolve.

Tell them all this, Sanjaya.

Look at Duryodhana's foolishness. He is planning to go to war against men who are invincible, even to Indra with the Devas. So let the wish of Santanu's aged son Bhishma, Kripa, Drona and his son, and the unfathomably wise Vidura—May the Kauravas have long lives, be proven true!" said Arjuna,' says Sanjaya."

Vaisampayana said, "O Bhaarata, in the midst of all the assembled kings, Santanu's son Bhishma says to Duryodhana, 'Once long ago, Brihaspati and Indra went to Brahma, accompanied by the Maruts, the Vasus and Agni, the Adityas, the Sadhyas, the seven Devarishis, the Gandharvas, Viswavasu and the Apsaras. Reverentially the Swargavasis bowed to the Lord of the universe and sat surrounding him. Then, the two ancient deities, the Rishis Nara and Narayana, drew into themselves the vital energies of all present there, and left the place.

On seeing this, Brihaspati asked Brahma, "Who are these two that leave without worshipping you? Pitamaha, who are they?"

Brahma replied, "These two, endowed with great tapasya, blaze in lustrous beauty, illuminating both Bhumi and Swarga. They, who are mighty, all-pervading and unequalled, are Nara and Narayana, who have come from the other world to live in Brahmaloka. Of incomparable glory, they shine with their tapasya and, by everything they do, enhance the joy of the world. The Devas and Gandharvas worship them, and their purpose is to destroy the Asuras."

Indra and the Devas, with Brihaspati at their head, went to the place where Nara and Narayana sat in tapasya. At that time, the Devas were in turmoil from a war that raged between them and the Asuras, and Indra asked the exalted pair to grant him a boon. They told him to name his wish, and Indra asked for their help, promising that the Devas would do as Nara and Narayana wished. It was with their help that Indra vanquished the Daityas and Danavas. Parantapa Nara slew hundreds of thousands of Indra's foes—the Paulomas and the Kalakhanjas.

It was Nara, as Arjuna, who, from his whirling chariot that was broken during their duel, cut off Jambhasura's head with a broad-headed arrow just as the demon was about to swallow him. It was he who stormed Hiranyapura, the Daitya city across the ocean, and vanquished sixty-thousand Nivatakavachas. It was this conqueror, Mahabaho Arjuna, who gratified Agni by vanquishing the Devas led by Indra. Narayana, also, has slain countless other Daityas and Danavas. Such is their inexhaustible tejas and urjas; and you now see them together, their purpose one.

The two Maharathas you face, Krishna and Arjuna, are the same timeless and divine Narayana and Nara. Of all who live on this Earth, they alone cannot be vanquished by the Asuras or, indeed, by the Devas with Indra at their head. Narayana is Krishna and Nara is Phalguna.

They are one soul born as two. Their karma gives them the enjoyment of many eternal and inexhaustible realms; and they are born again and again into the world when cataclysmic wars become necessary to cleanse Bhumi Devi. Their mission is to fight and make a great sacrifice of human blood. This is what Narada, who is an authority on the Vedas, told the Vrishnis.

O Duryodhana, when you see Kesava, with his conch-shell, discus and mace in hand, together with the awesome bowman Arjuna armed with various astras; when you behold those eternal and irradiant ones, the two Krishnas, riding the same chariot, then you will remember what I have just said. Child, danger threatens the Kurus because dharma and artha have deserted your mind. If you pay no heed to what I say, you will hear of an unimaginable, revelational carnage, for all the Kauravas follow your lead.

All the Kurus listen to me but, Bull of the Bhaaratas, you put your faith in the opinions of just three men: Karna, a low-born Suta's son cursed by Parasurama; Sakuni, the son of Subala; and your vile and sinful brother Dusasana.'

Karna says, 'Bhishma, it is not right for you to still mock me as a Sutaputra, for I have adopted Kshatriya dharma without abandoning those who are my own. Besides, what evil is there in me? None among Dhritarashtra's people will accuse me of having committed any wrong; never have I done any injury to Dhritarashtra's son. And I will kill all the Pandavas in battle. How can wise men make peace again with those who were once their sworn enemies? It is my duty to do whatever I can to please king Dhritarashtra, and especially Duryodhana, for the kingdom is his.'

Bhishma hears Karna and says to Dhritarashtra, 'Although this man often boasts about his intentions to kill them, he is not equal to even a sixteenth part of the noble Pandavas. The great calamity that is about to overtake your evil sons is the work of this Sutaputra. Relying on him, foolish Duryodhana insulted his cousins, those Kshatriyas of divine descent. Over the years, what feat has Karna achieved to equal any that each of the Pandavas has?

What did this man do when he saw mighty Dhananjaya kill his beloved brother? Why was he absent when Dhananjaya charged the assembled Kurus outside Virata's city, routed them in battle and stripped them of their clothes? Where was this son of a Suta, who roars like a bull now, when the Gandharvas captured your son during the Goshayatra? It was Bhima, the illustrious Partha and the twins who challenged the Gandharvas and vanquished them.

Heedless of dharma and artha, what Karna does best is boast. O may you be blessed, Bharatarishabha.'

Bharadwaja's high-souled son Drona listens to Bhishma and, after paying homage to the gathered kings, says to Dhritarashtra, 'O king, do what Bhishma says. It is not wise for you to follow the counsel of covetous men. Making peace with the Pandavas, before war breaks out, is the most judicious course open to you. Arjuna will do everything he has said, which Sanjaya has repeated here, for there is no bowman to equal him in all the three worlds.'

The king takes no notice of what Drona and Bhishma have said and, without responding to them, asks Sanjaya again about the Pandavas. It is at this moment, when the king does not offer any response to Bhishma and Drona, that the Kauravas lose all hope of living.'"

“Dhritarashtra says, ‘What did Dharmaputra Yudhishtira say, Sanjaya, when he heard that a great force has assembled here in our support? What is he doing, in view of the war to come? Which of his brothers and sons look to him, waiting for his command? Who amongst his advisors tries to dissuade that honourable and virtuous king from war, and persuades him to make peace instead, knowing that my son’s evil, deceitful deeds have provoked him?’

Sanjaya says, ‘May you be blessed! All Pandu’s sons, as well as the Panchalas, wait eagerly for his command, but he restrains them. Multitudes of battle-ready war chariots belonging to the Pandavas and the Panchalas have come in separate divisions, making Yudhishtira glad. Just as the sky brightens at sunrise, so have the Panchalas’ hearts at being reunited with Kunti’s resplendent son, who floods the world with his lustre.

All the Panchalas, Kekayas and Matsyas, even their cowherds and shepherds rejoice with an equally happy Yudhishtira. Bevies of Brahmana, Kshatriya and Vaisya girls have come to catch a glimpse of Arjuna in his coat of mail.’

Dhritarashtra says, ‘Sanjaya, tell us about the armies that Dhrishtadyumna, the Somakas and others have brought, using which the Pandavas will fight us.’

With this barrage of questions put to him in the great sabha, Sanjaya falls into dark thought and heaves long, deep sighs. Suddenly, he collapses onto the floor.

Vidura cries to his blind brother, 'Rajan, Sanjaya has fallen to the floor, unconscious and unable to speak.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'I am sure it is from anxiety after seeing those Purushavyaghras, those Maharathas.'

Sanjaya recovers consciousness and is comforted. Then in the presence of all the Kurus in the sabha, he says to Dhritarashtra, 'O Rajarajan, I did indeed see those great warriors, the sons of Kunti. They are lean and trim from the austerities they observed while they lived in the Matsya kingdom. Listen, Rajan, to which kings and princes have joined them to fight you.

The noble Dhrishtadyumna will fight against you. He is a virtuous soul, who never forsakes virtue, not from anger, fear or temptation; not for the sake of wealth or because of an argument. He is an authority on dharma; and he is the best of righteous men. He has never made an enemy, but he will fight on the side of the Pandavas, against you.

Then there is the man who has no equal in the strength of his arms, who with his bow subjugated all the kings of this Earth, who long ago vanquished the kings of Kasi, Anga, Magadha and Kalinga. This man, Bhimasena, will fight for the Pandavas, against you. It is by his strength that his four brothers survived after he rescued them from the burning house of lac. This same Vrikodara saved them from the cannibal Hidimba; it is he who rescued Yagnaseni when Jayadratha abducted her; and it is he who saved the Pandavas from the forest fire at Varanavata. This formidable Bhima will fight for his brothers against you.

Then there is the warrior who slew the Krodhavasas to please Draupadi, successfully crossing the rugged and fearsome mountains of Gandhamadana. His arms have the strength of ten thousand elephants; and with him for their ally the Pandavas will fight against you. Long ago, and with only Krishna's help, this Kshatriya vanquished Purandara in order to please Agni; and he also gratified, with his prowess, the God of gods, Uma's trident-bearing lord Mahadeva, who dwells in his mountain fastness. This Arjuna, the greatest warrior, subjugated all the kings of the Earth, and with him the Pandavas will face you in war.

There is also that wonderful warrior Nakula, who vanquished all of the western world, the Mlechcha lands. He, too, this handsome son of Madri's, this unrivalled archer, will fight against you, O Kaurava.

Then there is the Kshatriya who defeated the warriors of Kasi, Anga and Kalinga. With Sahadeva on their side, the Pandavas will meet you in battle. There are only four men on Earth to equal him in sheer vitality—Aswatthama, Dhrishtaketu, Rukmi and Pradyumna. And against this youngest of the Pandavas, the terrible Sahadeva Manavottama, source of Madri's joy, you must do battle.

There is also Sikhandin, who was once born on Earth as the king of Kasi's daughter, during which life she practised the most severe tapasya, praying to become the instrument of Bhishma's death in another birth. She passed through death and was born as the Panchala king's daughter; but by divine chance, she has become a man. Sikhandin knows the strengths and weaknesses of both sexes; this invincible prince of Panchala, who fought the Kalingas, who is skilled in all the astras, will now fight on the side of the Pandavas, against you. With this woman who was turned into a man, and a formidable bowman whose destiny it is to bring Bhishma down, the Pandavas will fight against you.

There are others. The mighty archers, the five Kekaya princes clad in wondrous mail, will fight beside the Pandavas against you. You must face Yuyudhana, Satyaki the warrior of the long arms, who is a master of astras, intelligent and of indefatigable prowess, that lion of the Vrishnis. You will encounter Virata, who has been the refuge of the Pandavas for some time.

The lord of Kasi, that Maharatha who rules in Varanasi, has become an ally of the Pandavas, and with him in their army they will fight you. The noble sons of Draupadi, tender in years but invincible in battle, as unapproachable as serpents, will fight beside the Pandavas against you.

Do not forget Abhimanyu, whose tejas is as lustrous as Krishna's and whose self-restraint is as stern as Yudhishtira's; with him on their side the Pandavas will fight you.

Sisupala's warlike son Dhrishtaketu, of great fame and incomparable energy, is inexorable when roused. With this king of the Chedis, who has come to their side with an akshauhini of troops, the Pandavas will fight you.

Krishna is the refuge of the Pandavas, as Indra is of the Devas; and with him on their side they will fight you. Sarabha, brother of the king of the Chedis, has come with Karakarsa; and with both these in their army, the Pandavas will fight you.

Jarasandha’s son Sahadeva, and Jayatsena, both unrivalled in battle, have also pledged themselves to the Pandava cause; and with them the Pandavas will fight you. And the mighty and fearless Drupada, with a vast force, is resolved to fight on the Pandava side against you.

O Bharatarishabha, with the support of these and hundreds of other kings from the east and north, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja prepares for war.’”

"Dhritarashtra says, 'All the men you mention are, indeed, great and valiant, but Bhima is equal to all of them together. I am as afraid of Bhima's anger as a plump deer of a hunting tiger. I pass my nights in fearful sleeplessness, heaving feverish sighs, yes, like a small animal terrified of a lion.

He is mighty-armed and as powerful as Indra, and I do not see in our whole army even one man who can withstand him in battle. Wrathful and unwavering in his hatred, this son of Kunti and Pandu does not smile even in jest; mad with rage, he looks askance at all and speaks in a thunderous voice. Impetuous and with no knowledge of fear, long-armed and dreadfully strong, he will not leave even one of my foolish sons alive.

Vrikodara, that bull among the Kurus, whirling his mace in battle like Yama, will kill all my sons, who have set themselves on this calamitous course. Even as I speak, I see that terrible mace of his—six-sided, made of iron and adorned with gold—raised in fury: like a Brahmana's curse. Bhima will wreak havoc among my troops like a lion amongst a herd of deer. He is the only one of the brothers who will seek the death of all my sons.

Since his childhood, he has a voracious appetite and was endowed with fiery energy; and also since then he has been hostile towards my sons. Even now my heart trembles at the memory of how Bhima crushed Duryodhana and my other princes during their childhood fights. With his superior strength, he always dominated and bullied my sons, and it is Bhima of the terrible prowess who is the cause, the root, of this enmity.

I see Bhima, mad with rage, and fighting from the very van of their legions, devour my entire force of men, elephants and horses. He is also Drona and Arjuna's equal in his skill with other weapons; he is as swift as the wind, and in wrath like Maheswara himself. Who is there, Sanjaya, who can kill that dreadful Kshatriya in battle? I deem it a blessing that my sons have not already been killed by that awful Parantapa. How can any man withstand the prowess of this absolute warrior who has single-handedly savaged so many great Yakshas and Rakshasas? I was never able to control him even when he was a child. How will I do so now, especially since my dishonourable sons have wounded his great heart?

He is bitter and full of anger; he will not relent. Frowning and ever looking askance, as he does now, he cannot be persuaded away from horrible vengeance. He is heroic and has no equal in might or handsomeness. Fair-skinned and tall as a palmyra, taller than Arjuna by the span of the thumb, this second son of Pandu is swifter than a horse and stronger than an elephant. His voice is soft, deep and dangerous, and his eyes are the colour of honey.

Vyasa told me long ago of his remarkable physique and strength even when he was a child. Swinging his iron mace he will shatter chariots, elephants, men and horses. My child, for his disobedience to me I have, in the past, insulted this best of Kshatriyas, whose rage is so quickly sparked. How will my sons resist the power of his beautiful iron mace, which can kill a hundred men in moments, and which, when hurled at an enemy, makes the most fearful sound?

O, my foolish sons want to cross the vast, shoreless ocean that is Bhima, fathomless, swirling with vicious, tempestuous currents that are as deadly as whistling storms of arrows. My sons believe themselves wise and ignore my piteous appeals for caution. They see only the imagined honey of victory, not their impending doom. My sons, who will not hesitate to do battle with Yama, are doomed to death by the Supreme Ordainer; they are like little creatures already in a great lion's jaws.

Bhima's six-sided mace is four cubits long, and always lethal. When he hurls it at them how will my sons defy it? Bhima will whirl his mace around and smash the heads of our elephants; wetting the corners of his mouth with his tongue, he will draw deep breaths and rush, roaring, against our tuskers, matching the angry beasts roar for roar. He will erupt into the tight knot of our chariots and with unerring aim kill the greatest of our warriors who dare face him. When this happens, will even one of my men escape this conflagration of a man? Bhima Mahabaho will crush my forces, scythe a passage through them and, dancing with his mace in his hand, reveal the spectacle of the pralaya at the end of this yuga.

Like a maddened elephant which brings flowering trees crashing down, Vrikodara in rage will mow down the ranks of my sons. Sanjaya, he will divest my warriors of their chariots, sarathies, horses and flagstaffs; wildly, he will be among our elephant warriors; and, like the tempestuous Ganga in spate uproots trees on her banks, that Purushavyaghra will devastate my sons' troops in battle. Terrified of Bhimasena, my sons, their followers and the kings allied to them will fly in all directions.

It was Bhima who, long ago with Vasudeva's help, entered the inmost apartments of Jarasandha, the invincible king of Magadha, and killed him, thereby enabling the Pandavas to subjugate Bhumi Devi herself and perform the Rajasuya yagna. That he did not conquer the Kauravas, who were protected by Bhishma's prowess, and the Andhakas and the Vrishnis with their brilliant diplomacy, is only because fortune smiled on these. Ah, Bhima went to Jarasandha, who had no equal, and with bare hands, tore his massive body in two. What could be more astounding than that?

O Sanjaya, like a serpent who has stored his poison for years, Bhima will spew all the venom of his wrath at my sons in battle. As Indra incinerated the Danavas with his thunderbolt, Bhimasena, mace in hand, will blast all my sons to their deaths. Oh, he is irresistible, and in my mind's eye, I see him even now, his coppery eyes ablaze, slaughtering my princes. Even without his mace or bow, chariot or armour, there is no man on Earth who can withstand Bhima.

Bhishma, Dronacharya, and Saradwat's son Kripa know as well as I do, Bhima's intelligence and strength. These bulls among men, who are deep knowers of Kshatriya dharma, and for whom death in battle is desirable, will take their stand in the van of our forces. Destiny is inexorable, especially for men; so, even though I see victory for the Pandavas, I will no more try to restrain my sons. These mighty bowmen of mine, keen to take the time-honoured path to Swarga, will lay down their lives in battle, but without betraying their fame on Earth.

Child, my sons and the Pandavas are equals; all of them are grandsons of Bhishma and disciples of Drona and Kripa.

These three venerable ones are men of honour and will repay the small services that we have done them. For a Kshatriya who has taken up arms and wants to observe his dharma, death in battle is the highest good and brings punya. I weep, however, for all those that will fight the Pandavas. The danger that Vidura foresaw is near.

On the one hand, Sanjaya, wisdom cannot overcome sorrow but, on the other, grief seems to make wisdom evaporate. When even Rishis who are free from worldly concerns and who view the affairs of the universe with detachment are all affected by adversity and prosperity, it is small wonder that I, who am attached to a thousand things, my sons, my kingdom, my wives, my grandsons and my kinsmen, grieve. What good can there possibly be in store for me in the face of this terrible danger? Considering all things, I am convinced that the end of the Kurus is at hand.

That game of dice was the cause of the terrible fate which overtakes us each moment. Foolish Duryodhana committed that sin out of greed, and ever-fleeting, all-knowing Time, who controls all things, made him do it. I am bound helpless to the wheel of Time and cannot escape it. Tell me, Sanjaya, where shall I go? What shall I do? How shall I do it? My foolish Kauravas will all die, for their time has come. Helplessly I will have to hear their women wailing when my hundred sons are killed. Ah, how will death come to me?

As a summer fire, fanned by the wind, consumes dry grass, Bhima, mace in hand and with Arjuna beside him, will raze all who fight for me.'”

"Dhritarashtra says, 'He whom we have never heard uttering a falsehood, he who has Dhananjaya to fight on his side, will attain sovereignty over the three worlds.

I cannot think of anyone who can face the wielder of the Gandiva in battle. When he shoots winged arrows, nalikas and other shafts that pierce men's mail and breasts, he has no rival. Perhaps, if those bulls among men, Drona and Karna, stand united against him the outcome could be uncertain; but I am sure that final victory will not be mine.

Karna is compassionate and, at the same time, rash; the Acharya is elderly and most fond of his favourite pupil, Arjuna of the firm grasp of the bow, Arjuna who is brilliant and mighty. The encounter between them will be ferocious and will not result in any one's clear defeat. All these are heroic, masters of weapons, and have earned great fame. They might give up sovereignty over the gods if it is offered them, but not the chance to prove themselves in the coming war.

Peace will certainly result if either Drona or Karna or Phalguna falls. However, if truth be faced squarely, there is no one who can kill Arjuna. O, how can we pacify his anger against my foolish sons? There are others who are masters of weapons, who conquer and are conquered, but Arjuna always prevails.

Thirty years have passed since Arjuna gratified Agni Deva in the Khandava vana by vanquishing all the Devas. We have never heard of him being defeated anywhere, my child. Like Indra, victory is always Arjuna's; he has Krishna for his charioteer, who is also never conquered. We hear that the two Krishnas riding in the same chariot and the Gandiva are united as a single ineluctable force. As for us, we do not have a bow of that calibre, or a warrior like Arjuna or a charioteer like Krishna. Duryodhana's foolish followers do not think of this.

O Sanjaya, even a thunderbolt that falls on one's head leaves something undestroyed, but Arjuna's arrows leave nothing. Even now I see him unleashing his arrows in hurricanes, wreaking devastation all round, unerringly plucking heads from bodies. Even now I see flaming arrows flare from the Gandiva, burning all around and consuming the armies of my sons. Even now I see my vast army with its diverse forces struck with panic at the rumble of Savyasachi's chariot, and fleeing in all directions.

Just as a great conflagration, its flames fanned by the wind and spreading wild in all directions, consumes dry leaves and grass, so will the flames that are Arjuna's astras consume my troops. He will loose arrows beyond count each moment; ah, he will be irresistible, like Yama Deva himself.

When I hear that all kinds of evil omens manifest in the homes of the Kurus, on the battlefield and all around them, I am certain that annihilation will overtake our Bharata vamsa.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'The followers of the Pandavas are as strong and eager for victory as the Pandavas themselves are, and determined to sacrifice their lives for it.

My son, you have told me who my enemies are—the mighty kings of Panchala, Kekaya, Matsya and Magadha. Not only them, but Krishna, that Creator of the universe, that all-mighty one who can conquer the three worlds with Indra at their head, is on the side of the Pandavas and bent on giving them victory. Then there is Satyaki, who acquired the entire astra shastra from Arjuna in a moment. That scion of the Sini vamsa will stand on the battlefield, shooting arrows as effortlessly as a farmer sows seeds. The prince of Panchala, Dhrishtadyumna, awesome and ruthless Maharatha, a master of all the astras, will also fight my forces.

Great is my fear of Yudhishtira's anger, of Arjuna's prowess, and of the twins and Bhimasena. I am afraid that when those lords of men spread their mesh of unearthly arrows over them, my troops will not extricate themselves. That is why I weep, Sanjaya.

Pandunandana Yudhishtira is majestically handsome, endowed with great tejas, blessed with the power of Brahma, intelligent beyond common ken, wise and virtuous. He has the best allies and advisors and is surrounded by men who are ready for battle. His brothers and father-in-law are Maharathas. That Purushavyaghra, the son of Pandu, is also blessed with profound patience; he keeps his own counsel, is compassionate and modest; his might is unassailable; he is deeply learned, has his passions under control and his senses subdued, and is dedicated to serving the elderly. Possessed of every virtue, he is like an unquenchable fire.

What man is fool enough to fly moth-like into that blazing Pandava fire! Alas, I have deceived him and, like a long-tongued inferno, he will burn my foolish sons in battle, leaving none alive. I have come to the conclusion that it is better not to fight against him.

O Kauravas, let your minds be in accord with mine. Without doubt, all the Kuru vamsa will perish if there is war. I am blind, but this I see so clearly. If we do as my better lights urge, my heart might still find peace. If you agree that war is not the best option, we will do our utmost to bring about peace. Yudhishtira will not be unmoved when he sees us in distress; he is angry with me only because he blames me for this unjust war.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Great King, you speak truly. In the event of war, the annihilation of the Kshatriyas by the Gandiva is certain. I cannot understand how you, who are wise and well aware of Arjuna's power, still follow your son's lead.

You have wronged the sons of Pritha from the very beginning and repeatedly sinned against them; this is no time for remorse. A father is his children's best friend and, if he is always watchful and selfless in his affection, should swiftly seek their welfare. The man who wrongs them, instead, cannot be called a father.

When you heard of the defeat of the Pandavas at dice, you laughed foolishly like a child and said, This is won, this is ours! When cruel words were spoken to the sons of Pritha you did not intervene, for you were pleased at the prospect of your sons gaining the entire kingdom. At that time you did not foresee their inevitable downfall.

The Kuru kingdom, the lands called Jangala, is your paternal inheritance, but you have gained the whole Earth thanks to the might of the Pandava heroes, who made over their empire and all their vast conquests to you. You cannot imagine that you acquired all of it yourself. When the king of the Gandharvas seized your sons and when they were about to sink in a shoreless sea without a boat to save them it was Partha, O king, who rescued them.

In foolish glee you laughed at the Pandavas when they were beaten at dice, and again as they went into exile. When Arjuna looses a shower of his astras the very oceans will dry up and be no more, let alone men of flesh and blood. He is the best of all archers; the Gandiva is the best of all bows; Kesava is the best of all beings; the Sudarsana is the best of all weapons; and his chariot, with the Vanara emblazoned on its banner, is the best of all rathas. That chariot of his, flying that flag and drawn by white steeds, will consume us all in battle like the whirling wheel of Kaala.

Bull of the Bhaaratas, that best of kings who has Bhima and Arjuna fighting for him already owns the world. The Kauravas led by Duryodhana will see their forces fall, terror-struck and in despair; and when Bhima strikes they will all be razed. Paralysed by their fear of Bhima and Arjuna, your sons and their followers will find yawning defeat, and death.

The Matsyas, the Panchalas, the Salvas and the Surasenas have all withdrawn their homage and disregard you. Knowing the tejas of that wise king, they have all joined the son of Pritha and, loyal to him, will oppose your sons. He who has committed evil and wronged the sons of Pandu, who are all wedded to dharma and deserve neither punishment nor death; he who hates them even now, your sinful son Duryodhana, with all his followers, must be restrained by all the means you command.

It is not fitting that you grieve like this. The wise Vidura and I said as much even during the game of dice. Lamenting for the Pandavas as if you had no part to play in what resulted in their present condition is only hypocrisy, and will prove futile, O my king.'"

"Duryodhana says, 'Fear not, O king; do not grieve for us. We are more than able to vanquish our enemy in battle.

When the Pandavas were living in exile in the forest many Maharathas came to them: Krishna came with a huge army, in battle array and able to crush entire kingdoms; the Kekayas, Dhrishtaketu and Pritha's kinsman Dhrishtadyumna came with numerous other kings. And, assembling in a place not far from Indraprastha, those great warriors denounced you and all the Kurus. Bhaarata, those Maharathas, led by Krishna, paid homage to Yudhishtira, who sat amongst them, wearing deerskin.

The kings urged Yudhishtira to take back his kingdom and expressed their fervent wish to kill you and all your adherents. When I heard this I was struck with fear at the danger that threatened our people and spoke to Bhishma, Drona and Kripa.

I said to them, "I do not think the Pandavas will keep the pact they made. Krishna wants to kill us all. With the exception of Vidura, all of you will be killed; Dhritarashtra, who knows dharma, will also be spared. Krishna wants to bestow the entire kingdom of the Kurus on Yudhishtira.

What should we do? Shall we surrender, or flee? Or shall we fight the enemy, even if it means giving up all hope of life? If we fight them, our defeat is certain, for Yudhishtira still commands all the kings of the Earth.

The people of the realm are disgruntled and our friends are also irate with us. All the kings, especially our friends and relatives, speak ill of us.

There can be no shame in our surrendering, for from time immemorial the weaker side has chosen to make peace. However, I grieve for that Purushottama, my blind father, who will be overcome by sorrow and endless misery. You already know, Rajan, that all your other sons opposed the enemy only to please me. The mighty sons of Pandu will avenge the wrongs done to them by butchering all Dhritarashtra's race along with all our ministers and royal counsellors."

Drona, Bhishma, Kripa and Aswatthama saw how I was wracked with anxiety and said to me, "Have no fear, Parantapa. If the enemy declares war against us, they will not vanquish us in battle. Each of us, singly, can quell all the kings of the Earth. Let them come. Our arrows will curb their pride.

Long ago, inflamed with anger on the death of his father, Bhishma humbled all the kings single-handedly from his chariot. Countless Kshatriyas that furious Kurusattama killed, and in terror those that lived surrendered themselves into his protection. This Bhishma is on our side, and even now can crush all our enemies in battle. Therefore, Bhaarata, you quell your fear."

The Pandavas of great prowess have now resolved to fight us. Once they ruled all the world, but now our enemies without allies and their old power, and cannot possibly defeat us. Bharatarishabha, I am now Sovereign of the Earth, and all these kings assembled here are loyal to me in prosperity and adversity. They will enter fire or water for my sake.

They laugh to see you lament like an ignorant child and so full of fear to hear the Pandavas being praised. Every one of these kings can withstand the Pandavas. Indeed, Rajan, every one of them thinks he is all-powerful. Indra himself cannot subdue my vast host. Brahma himself cannot destroy it, though he may wish to.

Yudhishtira has given up hope of getting a city and asks for just five villages because he is afraid of the army I have assembled and of my power. Your belief in Vrikodara's strength is baseless. You do not know how strong I am. There is no one on Earth who can match me in a duel with maces. No man has ever beaten me in a gada yuddha, nor ever will.

I suffered many privations out of my devotion to learning when I lived in the home of my Acharya. I have mastered all the knowledge and skills he had to impart. I am not afraid of Bhima or the others. Blessed one, waiting humbly upon my guru Sankarshana as I did, he was sure that I, Duryodhana, have no equal in battle. In battle I am Balarama's equal, and in strength there is no one on Earth superior to me.

Bhima will not bear even a single blow of my mace. One wrathful stroke will send him to Yama. Rajan, I am eager to see Vrikodara with his mace in hand; long have I wished for this. I will strike him like thunder and my detested cousin will die, all his limbs shattered. Why, one blow of my mace will split the mountains of Himavat into thousands of pieces. Vrikodara knows the truth of this, as do Krishna and Arjuna: that there is no one equal to Duryodhana at the mace.

Dispel the fear that Bhima invokes in you, for have no doubt that I will kill him in savage battle. My lord, do not be dejected. After I have slain Bhima, my numberless chariot warriors, all as mighty as me, will quickly bring Arjuna down. Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Drona's son, Karna, Bhurisravas, Salya, the king of Pragjyotisha and Jayadratha king of the Sindhus can each kill the Pandavas on his own. United, they will send Arjuna to Yama in an instant.

There is no reason why the combined armies of all the kings, fighting as one, cannot vanquish Dhananjaya. Bhishma, Drona, Drona's son and Kripa will cover him in a hundred shrouds of arrows and, broken, Arjuna will vanish into death's catacombs.

Our Pitamaha Bhishma, born of Devi Ganga, is superior to Santanu. He was born amongst men, but he is a holy being, whom even the Devas cannot face. There is no man on Earth who can kill Bhishma. Pleased with the sacrifice Bhishma made for his sake, his father gave him an exceptional boon: You shall not die except by your own wish.

Drona was born of Bharadwaja Muni in a water-pot, with complete knowledge of the astra shastra at his very birth. Kripa, the best of Acharyas, whose father is Rishi Gautama, was born in a bank of river reeds and he, too, cannot be killed.

Aswatthama's father, mother and uncle were not born from a woman's womb. That hero, too, is on my side. All these Maharathas are veritable gods and can confound Indra himself in battle. Arjuna cannot even look upon any one of these. When united, these tigers among men will bring him down like a pride of lions does a deer.

Karna is equal to Bhishma, Drona and Kripa. Parasurama, too, declared him his equal. Karna was born with kundalas of dazzling beauty; and to please Sachi Devi, Indra begged him for them in exchange for an infallible shakti. How will Arjuna escape Karna when Radheya has that astra?

I am sure of victory; it is a fruit I hold in my hand. The rout of my enemies is already being talked about everywhere.

Bhaarata, in war Bhishma kills ten thousand soldiers in a day. As powerful as him are the master bowmen Drona, Drona's son and Kripa. In addition, the Samsaptaka warriors are resolved to fight Arjuna to the death. There are other kings, too, who regard themselves as being superior to Savyasachi, and who are determined to kill him.

Why then are you so fearful of the Pandavas? Once Bhimasena is killed who amongst them will continue to fight? Seven warriors—the five Pandava brothers, Dhrishtadyumna and Satyaki—are the backbone of the Pandava forces. We have Bhishma, Drona, Kripa and Drona's son; Karna, Somadatta and Bahlika; Salya of Pragjyotisha, Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti, and Jayadratha. We have your sons Dusasana, Durmukha and Dussaha, and the others; we have Srutayu, Chitrasena, Purumitra and Vivimsati; Sala, Bhurisravas and Vikarna. And I have assembled eleven akshauhinis. The enemy's army is far smaller than mine, with only seven. How will they defeat me?

Brihaspati has said that a king should fight an army which is less than his by a third. My army is bigger by more than that, my king. Besides, I know that the enemy has many shortcomings, while my forces are endowed with as many strengths. Knowing all this, and that my force is superior and that of Pandavas inferior, you must not to lose heart and good sense.'

Saying this, Duryodhana questions Sanjaya again, anxious to know more about the Pandavas' thoughts."

"Duryodhana says, 'Sanjaya, I have gathered an army of seven akshauhinis; what have Yudhishtira and the kings who support him done to prepare for war?'

Sanjaya says, 'Yudhishtira is eager for war and full of assurance. Bhimasena, Arjuna and the twins are also confident and fearless. Arjuna yoked his horses to his chariot and took it out to test the astras he has acquired, lighting up the world in all directions. Clad in mail, he looked like a mass of clouds charged with lightning.

He was thoughtful for a while and then he said to me, "Sanjaya, look at the omens, they all predict our victory," and indeed what he said was true.'

Duryodhana says, 'You are happy to praise these sons of Pritha whom we routed at dice. Tell me, what sort of horses has Arjuna yoked to his chariot, and what banners has he raised?'

Sanjaya says, 'The divine architect Tvashtri has, with Indra and Dhatri's help, created all kinds of wonderful and beautiful forms for Arjuna's chariot. Using maya, he adorned Partha's banner with celestial spirits of diverse forms and sizes. At Bhimasena's plea, Vayuputra Hanuman will also enliven Arjuna's pennant with his own splendid and fearsome form. Tvashtri's genius is so powerful that the flag covers one Yojana, both in width and length, and even great trees cannot obstruct it.

Tvashtri’s creation is like Indra’s evanescent and colourful bow that appears in the sky; nobody knows what it is made of and its form changes constantly. This banner rears its head like a column of fire and smoke rising up into the sky, filling it with dazzling colours and beautiful shapes, weightless, yet finding no impediment anywhere.

Yoked to the chariot are one hundred celestial white horses endowed with the speed of the mind; they are the gift of the Gandharva king Chitrasena. Nothing can stand in their way, nothing can arrest their careen, not on Earth, in the sky, or in heaven. A boon ensures that their number will always be a hundred, regardless of how often or how many are killed.

Yudhishtira’s chariot is drawn by great ivory-coloured horses of equal strength. The horses that pull Bhima’s chariot are as fleet as the wind and as splendid as the Saptarishis. Sable-hued horses with backs streaked like the wings of the tittiri bird are yoked to Sahadeva’s chariot; they are Arjuna’s gift to him, and superior to Dhananjaya’s own. And Madri’s son Nakula, of the Ajamida vamsa, is borne, like Indra, by exalted steeds given by Indra himself, all mighty and quick as the mind.

Superb horses, gifts of the Devas, large and equal to those of the Pandava brothers in experience and strength, swift and handsome, bear Subhadra’s and Draupadi’s sons into war.’”

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Sanjaya, whom have you seen come to the Pandava camp out of love for them? Who will fight for them against my son's forces?'

Sanjaya says, 'Krishna, chief of the Andhakas and the Vrishnis, has arrived. I have also seen Chekitana and Satyaki, also called Yuyudhana, both Maharathas, proud of their strength and renowned the world over; and they have each brought an akshauhini of troops. Drupada, the king of the Panchalas, has come, accompanied by his ten heroic sons—Satyajit and the others, led by Dhrishtadyumna, the fire-born.

Sikhandin has come in Drupada's support to honour Yudhishtira, with a full akshauhini of soldiers whom he has equipped well with everything they need. That lord of Earth Virata, and his two sons, Sankha and Uttara; Suryadatta and others headed by Madiraksha, with one akshauhini of troops and the support of his brothers and sons, have joined the son of Pritha.

Jarasandha's son, the king of Magadha, and Dhrishtaketu, the king of the Chedis, have arrived separately, each accompanied by an akshauhini. The five Kekaya brothers, flying purple flags, have joined the Pandavas with their akshauhini of warriors. All these valiant men, whom I have seen assembled there, will fight on the Pandava side against Duryodhana's armies. Maharathika Dhrishtadyumna, who knows all the vyuhas of Manavas, Devas and Gandharvas, leads the Pandava host as its Senapati.

O Rajan, Sikhandin is appointed to meet Santanu's son Bhishma in battle, with Virata and his Matsya warriors to support him. Yudhishtira will face the king of the Madras, though some feel that the two are not evenly matched. Bhimasena will fight Duryodhana, his sons and his ninety-nine brothers, as well as the eastern and southern kings. Arjuna will meet Vikartana's son Karna and Jayadratha, king of the Sindhus, those irresistible Kshatriyas so proud of their strength.

The five mighty bowmen, the Kekaya brothers, will fight the Kekaya soldiers who are with Dhritarashtra. Also in their lot are the Malavas and the Salvakas, and the two famed Trigarta warriors who have sworn to conquer or die. Subhadra's son has been assigned to kill all the sons of Duryodhana and Dusasana, and also king Brihadbala. And those great archers, the sons of Draupadi, with gold embroidered banners on their chariots, and led by Dhrishtadyumna, will do battle against Drona.

Chekitana wants to meet Somadatta in his chariot, in single combat; Satyaki is anxious to do battle against the Bhoja lord Kritavarman; Madri's heroic son Sahadeva, who roars so dreadfully in battle, means to kill your brother-in-law, Sakuni son of Subala; and Madri's other son Nakula will meet the deceitful Uluka and the Saraswatas. The Pandavas have placed all the other kings under the leadership of one or other of their allies. Thus has the Pandava host been divided. You and your sons must do as you think best, and without delay.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Alas, my foolish sons, who cheated at dice, are already as good as dead, for it is Bhima they have chosen to meet in battle. Like moths to the flame, all the other kings will rush inexorably towards the Gandiva, as if consecrated for a yagna by Yama himself. In my mind's eye I see my host routed and killed by those illustrious Kshatriyas whom I have grievously wronged. Who will follow my warriors, when the sons of Pandu break their ranks?

The Pandavas are Maharathas of awesome accomplishments, with the energy of the fiery Sun and ever victorious. Indra himself cannot wrest the Earth from them, who have Yudhishtira for their king, Krishna for their protector, the heroic Savyasachi and Vrikodara for their warriors, and Nakula, Sahadeva and Dhrishtadyumna also fighting for them.

Indra cannot prevail against them, who have with them the son of Prishata, Satyaki, Drupada and Dhrishtaketu with his son, Uttamaujas, the unconquerable Yudhamanyu of the Panchalas, Sikhandin, Kshattradeva, Virata's son Uttara, the Kasayas, the Chedis, the Matsyas, the Srinjayas, Babhru, the sons of Virata, the Panchalas, and the Prabhadrakas. These heroes are calm and steadfast on the battlefield; they can cleave the very mountains; they are endowed with every virtue and blessed with superhuman strength; and it is against them that my foolish son wants to pit himself, ignoring all my pleas.'

Duryodhana says, 'The Pandavas and we are of the same vamsa; we tread upon the same earth. Why do you think that victory will be theirs? Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, the unconquerable Karna, Jayadratha, Somadatta and Aswatthama are all mighty bowmen and endowed with great powers. When even Indra and the Devas cannot subdue them, what can the Pandavas do against them, O my father?

All these noble and heroic kings of the Earth, bearing weapons on my behalf, will easily contain and quell the Pandavas; the sons of Pandu cannot dare look at my troops, let alone face them in war. Why, by myself I can crush the Pandavas and their sons in battle. Bhaarata, all these sovereigns of the Earth, who are anxious to serve my cause, will even capture the Pandavas as they would net a herd of young deer. Rest assured, O Dhritarashtra, that, with our numberless chariots and tempests of arrows, we will annihilate the Panchalas and the Pandavas.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Sanjaya, my son speaks like a madman; he cannot prevail over Dharmaraja Yudhishtira. Bhishma knows the true might of the Pandavas and their sons, which is why he does not want war with them.

Tell me again, Sanjaya, of their movements. Tell me, who incites those bowmen of the wonderful tejas like priests feeding the homa fire with libations of ghee?'

Sanjaya says, 'Dhrishtadyumna urges the Pandavas to war, saying, "Fight, Bharatottamas! Have no fear whatever. All those rulers of the Earth, whom Dhritarashtra's son woos, will be no more than easy targets for your astras in war. I by myself can devour all the angry kings assembled, together with their kinsmen, like a whale swallowing swarms of little fish. Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Karna, Drona's son, Salya and Duryodhana—I will contain them all, as the shore does the swelling sea."

Yudhishtira said in reply, "The Panchalas and the Pandavas depend on your prowess and fortitude to see us safely through the war. I know, Mahabaho, that you are devoted to Kshatriya dharma. Indeed, you can kill the Kauravas on your own. Parantapa, when they face us, eager for war, whatever strategy you decide on will be the best for us, of that I am sure.

Those who know the Shastras say that the Kshatriya who manifests his strength, and then helps those who flee the battlefield after the rout he has made and ask for his protection, is worth a thousand men. Purusharishabha, you are such a man—peerless. I have no doubt that you will be the refuge of those who are taken by fear on the field of war."

When Dharmatma Yudhishtira said this, Dhrishtadyumna said to me, "Go, Suta, without delay and say to all those that have come to fight for Duryodhana—the Kurus of the Pratipa vamsa, the Bahlikas, the son of Saradwata, Karna and Drona, Drona's son and Jayadratha, Dusasana, Vikarna and to Raja Duryodhana and Bhishma: Do not offer yourselves up to be slain by Arjuna, whom the Devas protect. Before that happens, let some good man approach Yudhishtira with all repair and entreat that son of Pandu, that Purushottama, to accept the kingdom that they surrender to him, without delay.

There is no warrior on the Earth like Arjuna, of the pure and unquenchable prowess. The Devas protect the wielder of the Gandiva's celestial ratha, and he cannot be vanquished by a human. Therefore, steer your minds away from war.""

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Yudhishtira has the power of a Kshatriya by birth and since his youth led a life of brahmacharya. Sadly, my foolish sons ignore me and want to fight this noblest man, which is why I weep.

I beg you, Duryodhana, to turn away from this enmity. War is never commended under any circumstances. Half the Earth is quite enough for you and all your followers. Give back their rightful share of the kingdom to the Pandavas. All the Kauravas consider this course of action—to make peace with the sons of Pandu—to be in keeping both with nyaya and dharma.

Think carefully, my son, and you will realise that your own army will become the instrument of your death. Your folly prevents you from understanding this. I myself do not want war and neither do Bahlika, Bhishma, Drona and Aswatthama; nor do Somadatta, Salya and Kripa; nor Satyavrata, Purumitra and Bhurisravas. If truth be told, none of these kings wants war. The warriors upon whom the Kauravas depend disapprove of the war. My child, accept this. In your own heart, you do not wish for war, but sadly, Karna and the vile-minded Dusasana and Sakuni lead you to it.'

Duryodhana says, 'I challenge the Pandavas to battle without depending on you, Drona, Aswatthama or Sanjaya, on Vikarna, Kamboja, Kripa or Bahlika, on Satyavrata, Purumitra or Bhurisravas, or on any of the others in our force. Purusharishabha, Karna and I, by ourselves, are prepared to celebrate the Yuddha yagna—the sacrifice of war—with all the needful rites and make Yudhishtira the yagnapasu, the sacrificial animal.

At that yagna my chariot will be the altar; my sword will be the small ladle and my mace the large one for pouring libations; my coat of mail will be the witness; my four steeds will be the officiating priests; my arrows will be the blades of kusa grass; and fame will be the ghrita, the clarified butter. Rajan, by performing such a sacrifice with war in honour of Yama, and by providing the ingredients for it ourselves, we will return crowned with victory and covered in glory after slaying our enemies.

The three of us—I, Karna and my brother Dusasana—will kill the Pandavas in battle. Either I will slay them and rule the Earth or, having killed me, they will. My king, O you of unfading glory, I am ready to sacrifice my life, my kingdom, my wealth and everything else, but I cannot live at peace with the Pandavas. I will not surrender to the Pandavas even such land as may be covered by the point of a needle!'

Dhritarashtra says, 'Ah, I now cast Duryodhana off forever; however, I grieve for all you kings who will follow this fool into Yamaloka. Like tigers let loose amongst a herd of deer, the sons of Pandu will devour all of you, who are so agog for battle.

I think of the Bhaarata host as a helpless woman who will be brutalised, then slain and cast into the distance by Yuyudhana of the long arms. Augmenting the strength of Yudhishtira's army, which was already powerful enough, Sini's son will take his stand on the field of battle and scatter his arrows like seeds on a ploughed field. And each one will take a life.

Bhimasena will assume his position at the very front of the Pandava forces with his soldiers arrayed fearlessly behind him, as behind a rampart.

O Duryodhana, when you see elephants as big as hills fallen on the ground with their tusks broken, their heads crushed and their bodies dyed with their own blood; when you see them lying on the field of battle like splintered mountains; then, terrified of Bhima, you will remember my words. When you see your forces of chariots, horses and elephants devastated by Bhimasena, and looking like the ruined, smoking wake of a great conflagration, you will remember my words.

If you do not make peace with the Pandavas, inexorable doom will find you. You will meet your end by the hand of Bhimasena with his gada, and rest finally in peace. When you see the Kuru host levelled to the ground by Bhima, like a vast forest of trees torn up by their roots, then you will remember my words.'

Having spoken thus to all those rulers of the Earth gathered there, the king addresses Sanjaya once more."

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Wise one, tell me what Krishna and Dhananjaya said. I am eager to hear that.'

Sanjaya says, 'Listen, O king, and I will tell you how Krishna and Arjuna are, and what those heroes said. With my eyes turned down, my hands joined in reverence and with my senses under control, I entered the antahpura to confer with those gods among men. Not Abhimanyu or the twins have free access to the apartments that Arjuna and Krishna share with Draupadi and Satyabhama. There I saw those Parantapas, anointed with sandalwood paste, and cheerful from having drunk sweet wine. They wore grand clothes and celestial ornaments and sat on a golden dais decked with gems and covered with closely woven, many-hued carpets.

Krishna's feet rested on Arjuna's lap, while Arjuna's lay on Draupadi's and Satyabhama's. Arjuna pointed to a golden foot-stool for me to sit on; I touched it in ritual salutation and sat on the ground. And when he drew his feet away from the foot-stool, I saw auspicious marks on both his soles—two dark lines ran from heel to toe.

Seeing the two Krishnas—both of them tall, dark and straight like the trunks of sala trees—sitting on the same seat, a great foreboding gripped me. They looked like Indra and Vishnu seated together. Relying on Drona and Bhishma, and on Karna's vain boasts, the deluded Duryodhana does not realise that Yudhishtira, with these two obeying his every command, will have all his wishes fulfilled. My lord, of that I am entirely convinced.

They entertained me with food and drink and honoured me with other courtesies, too; then, raising my folded hands over my head in reverence, I conveyed your message to them. Arjuna, with his cicatrised hand, removed Krishna's auspicious foot from his lap and urged him to speak. Sitting up erect as Indra's banner, adorned with every ornament, and splendid in tejas as Indra himself, Krishna addressed me. His words were sweet, charming and mild, but full of doom for Duryodhana. Krishna spoke directly, clearly and meaningfully, but what he said at the end rent my very heart.

He said to me, "O Sanjaya, after greeting the elders and enquiring about the welfare of the younger ones there, say this to the wise Dhritarashtra, in the hearing of Kurusattama Bhishma and Drona:

'We hope that you have been performing yagnas, giving gifts to Brahmanas, and enjoying your sons and wives, for dire peril is imminent. We hope you have been giving wealth to the deserving, helping your near and dear ones and that you have been blessed with good sons, for Yudhishtira is eager for victory. My old vow to Draupadi remains unfulfilled. You have provoked Arjuna, whose bow is the fiery and invincible Gandiva, and who has me by his side. Even if he were Indra, is there any man who would challenge Arjuna, who has me to help him, unless that man's time on Earth has ended? Only the man who can lift the Earth in his arms, consume all creation in anger and who can cast the Devas out of Swarga, can hope to vanquish Arjuna. I do not see even one among the Devas, Asuras, Manavas, Yakshas, Gandharvas and Nagas who can face Dhanajaya in war.

That wonderful battle in Virata's kingdom is proof of this: when one man faced countless Maharathas and quelled them. That you all fled, routed single-handedly by this Pandava, is proof enough. No one has the might, prowess, energy, speed, lightness of hand, boundless stamina and patience that Partha does.'" Krishna cheered Arjuna with these words and, also, with roars of exultation, like thunder in the sky, that would frighten even Indra. When he heard what Krishna said, Arjuna, too, spoke in similar vein to me, and his words made the hairs on my body stand on end.'"

Vaisampayana said, “The wise Dhritarashtra weighs Sanjaya’s words, their merits and flaws. Once he has done this as best he can and has gauged the strengths and weaknesses of both sides, the Kuru king compares the might of each side, always keeping his sons’ interest at heart. He comes to the conclusion that the Pandavas, endowed with both human and divine ancestry and prowess, are more powerful.

He says to Duryodhana, ‘My child, I cannot shake off the anxiety that grips me. It clings to me so that I can almost see it, like some demon. My dark forebodings cannot be explained away by your reasoning; and it is natural, for you are my son. All beings love their progeny; they do everything in their power to please them, and work for their advantage. It is the same with benefactors—good men always want to reciprocate the good done to them and do what pleases their patrons.

Agni will remember what Arjuna did for him in the Khandava vana and will certainly help Arjuna in this unthinkable war. From paternal affection, Dharma, Indra, Vayu and the Aswins will come together to help the Pandavas; other Devas will join them. To protect them from Bhishma, Drona and Kripa, the wrath of the Devas will manifest itself like the very Brahmastra. Those Purushavyaghras, the sons of Pritha, are blessed with immense strength and are masters of all the godly and fell astras. When they are as one with the Devas, our warriors—mere mortals, all—will not be able to even look at them.

He whose bow is the divine Gandiva; he who has a pair of inexhaustible celestial quivers from Varuna; he whose banner, which flies as freely as smoke in the air, has the Vanara upon it; he whose chariot has no equal on the Earth bound by the four seas, its rumble like clouds roaring, and which, like the crash of thunder, terrifies his enemies; he whose superhuman tejas the whole world knows; he whom all the kings of the Earth know to be the conqueror of the Devas; he who takes up five hundred arrows at a time and in the twinkling of an eye shoots them in a blur into far distances; this son of Pritha, Parantapa, tiger among Maharathas, whom Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Drona's son, Salya the king of the Madras and indeed all impartial men of thought consider invincible even by kings possessing phenomenal prowess; he who shoots five hundred arrows at each stretch of his bow and whose arms are as powerful as Kartavirya's—I see this great bowman Arjuna, who is equal to Indra or Upendra, this Kshatriya himself without equal, wreaking unimagined havoc in this war.

O Bhaarata, this thought preys on my mind night and day, and I am miserable and sleepless because of my fear for my sons and for all the Kurus. Savage and bloody carnage is about to overtake them unless this war is averted by striking peace. With all my heart, I am for making peace with the Pandavas and not for war. My son, I have always considered them greater than the Kurus.'" Vaisampayana said, "At his father's words, Dhritarashtra's volatile son is inflamed with rage and in a voice heavy with envy says, 'You assume that the sons of Pritha are invincible because they have the Devas on their side. Best of kings, dispel your fear. The Devas achieved divinity by virtue of the absence of desire, covetousness, hatred and of detachment from worldly affairs.

Bharatarishabha, once, Dwaipayana-Vyasa, Maharishi Narada and Jamadagni's son Parasurama told us that, unlike human beings, the motive for what the Devas do is never desire, anger, covetousness or envy. Indeed, if Agni, Vayu, Dharma, Indra or the Aswins had actively taken their side, the sons of Pritha would never have fallen into this pit of distress. Do not be anxious, for the Devas always act dispassionately, in accord with principles worthy of their divinity. If envy and lust are incentives, the laws that rule the Devas will nullify them.

Besides, even if he flares into an all-consuming blaze, I will charm Agni into extinguishment. The tejas of the gods is great, but mine is greater. If the Earth herself cleaves in two, or mountain peaks split, I can reunite them with my mantras, Rajan. If a violent tempest or a roaring deluge threatens the universe of animate and inanimate, moving and immobile creatures, I can, from compassion for life, stop them. I have the power to freeze all the great waters of the Earth, so chariots and fighting men can pass over them.

It is I who set in motion all the affairs of the Devas and Asuras. My horses take me anywhere at my will, wherever I go with my akshauhinis, on whatever mission. Within my dominions there are no fearful nagas and, protected by my mantras, innocent creatures within my kingdom never fall prey to others. The clouds bring rain at the appointed time and in the quantity wished for by my people. All my subjects are devout, and natural calamities never visit them.

The Aswins, Vayu, Agni, Dharma and Indra with the Maruts will not dare protect my enemies. Had they been able to, would the sons of Kunti have suffered for thirteen years? Know that neither Devas nor Gandharvas, neither Asuras nor Rakshasas can save him who has incurred my wrath. I have never before had any doubt about the aptness of reward or punishment to friend or foe. Parantapa, whenever I say something it is always just so. The people know me as a speaker of truth.

Everyone can bear witness to my greatness, whose fame has spread all around. I say this, Rajan, for your information and not from vanity. I have never praised myself before; to sing one's own praises is petty. And I say to you, my father, you will soon hear of my victory over the Pandavas, the Matsyas, the Panchalas, the Kekayas, Satyaki and Krishna.

Just as rivers cease to be when they enter the ocean, so will the Pandavas and all their followers when they encounter me. My intelligence is sharper, my energy is greater, my prowess is mightier, my knowledge is deeper and my resources are superior, by far, to theirs. The knowledge of weapons that our Pitamaha, Drona, Kripa, Salya and Sala have, I have it all.'

Saying this, Parantapa Duryodhana questions Sanjaya once more about Yudhishtira's preparations for the war.

Vaisampayana said, "Ignoring Dhritarashtra, who was about to ask about Arjuna, Karna addresses Duryodhana with words to cheer the spirit of the assembled Kurus.

He says, 'When Parasurama discovered the false pretence by which I obtained the Brahmastra from him, he cursed me that I would forget the mantra for that astra at the end of my days. Even for so great an offence, that Rishi, my guru, cursed me lightly; that Maharishi of the fierce tejas can consume the very Earth with her seas. By my diligence and bravery, I appeased him. I have that weapon with me still, and my end has not yet come. I am confident of victory. Let the charge of winning the war be mine.

Through my guru's favour, I will, in the twinkling of an eye, wipe out the Panchalas, the Karushas, the Matsyas, as well as the sons of Pritha, their sons and grandsons. I will win the war and bestow many realms upon you. Let the Pitamaha, Drona and all the kings remain here with you. I will go forth with the best of my warriors and kill Kunti's sons. Let that task be mine.'

Bhishma says to him, 'What are you saying, Karna? The approach of your end has dimmed your intellect. Do you not know that when our chieftains are killed, all the sons of Dhritarashtra will die? Considering that you know how Arjuna burnt down the Khandava vana, with only Krishna helping him, you ought to restrain yourself and your friends and relatives.

You will see the shakti that Indra gave you burnt to ashes when Krishna strikes it with his chakra. Your other astra, with the serpent's head, that shines in your quiver and which you worship with offerings of flowers, will be consumed and you with it, when Arjuna's arrows flare at you. Karna, remember that it is Krishna, who killed Bana and Bhumi's son Naraka in fervid battle, and who has slain many others much greater than you, who protects Arjuna.'

Karna says, 'There is no doubt that Krishna is all that you say, and I believe he is even greater. Pitamaha, you are invariably harsh to me, and this is my response to you today: I hereby lay down my weapons! From now, you will see me only in the sabha and not on the battlefield. When death stills your voice, Bhishma, and only then, will the rulers of the Earth see my prowess,' and with these words, the great archer, Mahadhanushman Karna, leaves the Kuru sabha and goes home.

Bhishma laughs mockingly and says to Duryodhana in the midst of the Kurus, 'How truly the Sutaputra keeps his word. When Bhimasena arrays his forces and brings havoc by decimating our legions, scattering hundreds of thousands of heads, how does Karna intend to keep his pledge to kill the kings of Avanti and Kalinga with Jayadratha, Chedidhvaja and Bahlika looking on?

When he presented himself as a Brahmana before the holy Parasurama, he did indeed obtain the Brahmastra, but he lost his dharma and punya.'

"Duryodhana says, 'Pritha's sons are men like any others, mortals like other men. Why then are you so sure victory will be theirs? Both we and they are equal in energy, in prowess, in age, in intelligence, in our knowledge of the Shastras, in our mastery over astras, in the art of war, in lightness of hand and every other skill. We are all human by birth. How then, Pitamaha, do you know that victory will be theirs?

I do not seek to accomplish my goals by relying on you, Drona, Kripa, Bahlika, or on any of the other kings. Vikartana's son Karna, my brother Dusasana and I will slay the five sons of Pandu in battle. Having done this, we will gratify Brahmanas by performing great yagnas of all kinds, with abundant dakshina and gifts of cattle, horses and wealth.

When my warriors haul the Pandavas' legions across the field, like hunters a herd of deer caught in a net, or like whirlpools do a crewless boat, Pandu's sons will see the might of our vast host of soldiers, chariots and elephants, and not only they, but Krishna as well, will surrender their pride.'

Hearing this, Vidura says, 'Venerable men of infallible knowledge say that self-restraint is the best of all virtues; and for a Brahmana it is his eternal dharma. He whose self-control follows the path of daana, tapasya, gyana and Veda dhyana, always wins success, forgiveness and the punya of his charity. Self-restraint enhances a man's tejas and is a most holy attribute. By absolving a man of his sin and increasing his vitality, it even leads him to Brahman.

People always fear those who have no self-restraint, as if they are Rakshasas; and it is to curb Rakshasas that Brahma created Kshatriyas. Indeed, self-restraint is an excellent vow for all the four varnas to keep.

And these are the qualities of a man with self-restraint: forgiveness, firmness of mind, non-violence, respect for all things, truthfulness, simplicity, control over the senses, patience, gentle speech, modesty, steadiness, liberality, mildness, contentment and faith. He who is self-controlled sheds lust, avarice, pride, anger, sloth, vanity, malice and sorrow. Purity and straightforwardness are the hallmarks of a self-restrained man.

He who is not covetous, who is content with a little, who is indifferent to all things provocative or seductive, and who is as deep as the ocean, is a man of self-restraint. He who is virtuous, always pleasant and contented, who has Atmagyana and wisdom wins great respect in this world and bliss in the hereafter. The man who is wise and mature, who has no fear of other creatures and whom other creatures do not fear is the foremost of men.

Such a man, who seeks the good of all, is a universal friend and makes one and all happy. Blessed with depth of character, like the ocean, and happily content by virtue of his wisdom, this man is always serene and light-hearted. A man who has self-control and serenity, regulates his life by the example of men of dharma of the past and the present, and lives in joy. Alternatively, such a man, whose gyana has endowed him with contentment, abandons karma and, with his senses firmly restrained, wanders over the Earth, impatient for death and absorption into Brahman.

The path of the man who enjoys the contentment that his gyana brings is as invisible as the paths of birds in the sky. He who abandons the world and takes to sannyasa in pursuit of Moksha can look forward to the bright and eternal realms that are reserved for him in Swarga.'"

"Vidura says, 'O king, there is a tale told by men of old of the fowler who spread his net on the ground to snare birds. Two birds that lived together were trapped in the net at the same time, but they took the net up and soared up into the air. Seeing them fly into the sky, the fowler, without giving way to despair, began to follow them on the ground. Just then, a hermit living in a nearby asrama, who had finished his morning prayers, saw the fowler running to catch the birds.

The Muni said to the man, "Fowler, I find it strange and wonderful that you, who walk on solid ground are pursuing a pair of winged creatures of the air."

The fowler said, "These two, united now, are taking away my snare. Once they fall out I will indeed catch them."

Sure enough the two doomed birds soon began to quarrel, and they fell to the ground. Still caught in the net and facing death, they argued angrily with each other. The fowler came up stealthily and seized them both.

Kinsmen who fall out with one another over wealth fall into the hands of their enemies, like the quarrelling birds. The duty of kinsmen is to eat together and talk with one another, and not argue under any circumstances. Family members who lovingly wait on the elderly become unconquerable, like a forest guarded by lions; but those who are mean, although wealthy, always contribute to the prosperity of their enemies. Dhritarashtra, cousins are like charcoal, blazing when united but only smoking when divided.

I will tell you of something else I once saw on a mountainside. Listen to this, O Kaurava, and then do what you think best. Once, we went to the northern mountain, Gandhamadana, accompanied by some hunters and a number of Brahmanas who liked talking about magical charms and medicinal plants.

Gandhamadana was a great sylvan tapovana, its slopes covered with trees and luminous herbs, and Siddhas and Gandharvas lived there. There we saw a jar of bright golden honey perched on an inaccessible precipice. That honey, which was Kubera's favourite drink, was guarded by poisonous snakes. To the one who drank it, it had the power to grant immortality to the mortal, sight to the blind and youth to the old. It was this honey, too, that those Brahmanas had spoken of. The hunters saw that honey and, in their frantic attempt to secure it, they all died either falling from that snake ridden cliff or being stung by the vicious serpents.

In much the same way, your son lusts for unrivalled ownership of the Earth. He sees the prize but, foolishly, not the terrible fall. Duryodhana wants to do battle with Savyasachi, but I do not see in him enough prowess or vigour to give him success.

On a single chariot Arjuna conquered all the Earth. Bhishma, Drona and others, with huge armies behind them, were terrified of Arjuna, who routed them outside Virata's city. Keep in mind what happened there. Arjuna still forgives you and looks to you in hope, waiting for your decision. When roused, Dhananjaya, Drupada and the king of Matsyas will leave no remnant of your army; they will be like apocalyptic flames fanned by the winds of yuganta.

O Dhritarashtra, embrace Yudhishtira. If you go to war, neither side can win without dreadful losses to themselves, not under any circumstances.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'O my son Duryodhana, think carefully about what I tell you. Like an ignorant wayfarer, you mistake the wrong path for the right one.

The five sons of Pandu, whose tejas you are so eager to extinguish, are like the Panchabhutas, the five elements that support the very universe. You cannot vanquish Yudhishtira without sacrificing your life in the effort; this son of Kunti is the most virtuous man in the world. Like a weak tree against a howling storm, you dare defy Bhimasena, whose strength is unrivalled on Earth, and who is like Yama himself in battle. And what man of any sense would choose to face the wielder of Gandiva, greatest of all Kshatriyas, who is a man among men as Meru is among mountains?

There is no man whom Dhrishtadyumna cannot vanquish, the prince of Panchala who looses astras at his enemies even like Indra hurling his Vajra. The noble, irresistible Satyaki, whom the Andhakas and the Vrishnis honour, is always with the Pandavas. He, too, will slaughter your forces.

No man in his right senses would face the lotus-eyed Krishna, whose tejas and might surpass any in the three worlds. This same Krishna puts his wives, relatives, his own soul and the entire Earth on one side of a scale, and considers Arjuna on the other side to be equal to them all. Krishna, on whom Arjuna relies, is invincible; and the army with which he allies himself also becomes irresistible.

Listen, my son, to your well-wishers; they advise you for your own good. Accept your Pitamaha Bhishma as your mentor and guide. Listen to what I say and to what these other true friends of the Kurus—Drona, Kripa, Vikarna and Raja Bahlika—say. They feel for you as I do, and you would do well to regard them as you do me. Bhaarata, they all know dharma and love you as much as I do.

The rout by one man, and the ensuing panic of your troops, which you and your brothers saw outside Virata's city, is proof enough of the truth of what I am saying. When Arjuna could single-handedly do that, what can the Pandavas not achieve when united? Take them by their hands as your brothers and cherish them with a share of the kingdom.'" Vaisampayana said, "Having said this to Duryodhana, the wise Dhritarashtra asks Sanjaya, 'Now, Sanjaya, tell me what you have not yet told me—what Arjuna said after Krishna spoke. I am eager to hear it.'

Sanjaya says, 'Having heard what Krishna said, the irresistible Dhananjaya spoke to me in Krishna's presence.

He said, "O Sanjaya, all the kings and the others who have assembled here to fight for the Kauravas are about to die—our Pitamaha, Dhritarashtra, Drona and Kripa; Karna and king Bahlika; Drona's son, Somadatta and Subala's son Sakuni; Dusasana, Sala, Purumitra and Vivimsati; Vikarna, Chitrasena and Jayatsena; Vinda and Anuvinda; the two lords of Avanti; Bhurisravas, Bhagadatta and Jarasandha and the other rulers of the Earth. Dhritarashtra's son has brought them together to serve as a libation in the Pandava fire.

In my name, Sanjaya, enquire after the welfare of those kings according to their status, making sure that you accord them proper respect. In their presence, address Duryodhana, that worst of evil men, who is wrathful, of sinful soul, and covetous. Make sure that fool and his advisors hear my message."

Saying this first, Pritha's son, Dhananjaya of the large eyes with red corners glanced at Krishna and then spoke words of dharma and artha.

He said to me, "You have heard the measured words of the high-souled lord of the Madhus. Tell the assembled kings that they are mine as well.

Say this for me to those kings, Make peace with us so that you will not be poured as offerings into the arrow fire of the great yagna of war, in which the rumble of chariot wheels are the mantras and the annihilating bow is the sruva, the ladle which will pour blood into death's great fire. If you do not give his rightful share of the kingdom to Yudhishtira, I will send all of you, with your footsoldiers, horsemen and elephants, into the dark regions of departed spirits."

I bowed before Dhananjaya and Hari of four arms and took leave of them, and here I am, come speedily to convey their grave message to you who are as effulgent as the Devas themselves.'"

Vaisampayana said, "Duryodhana shows scant regard for Sanjaya's words; the other kings mutely rise to leave the sabha. As they go, Dhritarashtra, who, out of blind love, always does whatever his son wants, wishes all those kings success and secretly asks Sanjaya what the Kurus plan, and what the hostile Pandavas.

Dhritarashtra says, 'Tell me truly, Gavalgana putra, what are the strengths and weaknesses of our forces? You are minutely acquainted with the affairs of the Pandavas, so tell me where their superiority and inferiority lie. You are aware of the strength of both sides; you know everything; and you are versed in all matters pertaining to dharma and artha. I ask you, Sanjaya, which side will lose in the war?'

Sanjaya says, 'I will not say anything to you in secret, Rajan, for then you might bear ill-will towards me. Have your father Vyasa of the stern vratas and your queen Gandhari come here. Being knowledgeable about dharma, perceptive and able to discern the truth, they will remove any ill-feelings that you might have. In their presence, I will tell you what Arjuna and Krishna intend.'

Dhritarashtra sends for Gandhari and Vyasa, and Vidura ushers them in. Vyasa Dwaipayana, the wise, says, 'Sanjaya, tell Dhritarashtra everything he wants to know. Tell him honestly all that you know about Krishna and Arjuna.'"

"Sanjaya says, 'Those wonderful archers Arjuna and Krishna, who are equally godlike, have been born of their own divine will. Krishna's chakra, of the boundless energy, is five krosas wide. At will, and empowered by maya, he can cast it at any adversary, great or small. It blazes in refulgence but will be invisible to the Kurus. Krishna's Sudarshana chakra is what determines the strength or weakness of the Pandavas.

With it that mighty scion of the Madhus effortlessly, almost playfully, vanquished the formidable Naraka, Sambara, Kamsa and the Chedi king Sisupala. Krishna is the most exalted of all men; he is divine and a Paramatman; and he can bring Bhumi, Akasa and Swarga under his sway, just by willing it. Again and again you ask me about the strengths and weaknesses of the Pandavas. Listen and I will tell you of these, simply.

If the whole universe is placed on one side of a balance and Krishna on the other, Krishna will be heavier. He can, at his pleasure, reduce the universe to ashes, but if all the forces in the universe combine, they cannot do the same to him. Wherever there is truth, righteousness, modesty and compassion, there is Krishna; and where he is, victory must be.

Janardana is the soul of all creatures; he is the highest of all Purushas; and he guides, as if in sport, the earth, the sky and heaven. Beguiling the world, he uses the Pandavas as his instruments to destroy your evil sons, who are great sinners. The divine Kesava keeps the wheel of time, the wheel of the universe and the wheel of the yuga in constant motion.

Know that this glorious One is the lord of time, of death and of this brahmanda of mobile and immobile things; and this Mahayogi Hari, though the Lord of the universe, still performs his dharma, even like a humble labourer who tills the fields.

Indeed, Krishna beguiles the world with his maya; only those who have attained Him are not deceived.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'How have you come to know Krishna as the Lord of the universe, and I have not? Tell me this, Sanjaya.'

Sanjaya says, 'Listen, Rajan. You have lost your gyana, while the gyana I have acquired has not diminished. The man who has no gyana is wrapped in the dark cloak of ignorance and does not know Krishna. Through my gyana I know that in Madhusudana the three states—the gross, the subtle and the causal—come together. He is the Creator of all but is, himself, uncreated. He is divine; from him everything arises and into him everything returns.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'What is the nature of your faith in Krishna, which makes you know him to be the union of the kartaram, the akrutam and Devam?'

Sanjaya says, 'Rajan, worldly pleasures, which are really maya, hold no importance for me. I never perform empty rituals, like keeping vratas without a pure heart or faith in Krishna. With faith I have purified my soul and then realised Krishna through the shastras.'

Dhritarashtra says, 'O Duryodhana, turn to Krishna for protection. My child, Sanjaya is one of our truest friends. Seek refuge with Krishna.'

Duryodhana says, 'Even if the divine son of Devaki, united with Arjuna, were to destroy all mankind, I will not surrender to him.'

Dhritarashtra says, ‘Gandhari, this evil son of yours is determined to plunge us all into hell. Envious, black-souled and vain, he disregards the wisdom of his elders.’

Gandhari says to Duryodhana, ‘O covetous child who ignores the commands of your elders, you abandon your father and me; you give up prosperity and life; you enhance the joy of your enemies; and I am deeply distressed. When Bhimasena strikes you down and you die, you will, foolish boy, remember what your father said to you.’

Vyasa says, ‘Listen to me, Dhritarashtra. Krishna bears you love. Sanjaya, as your envoy, will do what is good for you. He knows Krishna, the ancient and exalted One. If you pay heed to him, he will certainly save you from the great danger that threatens you.

Son of Vichitravirya, men trap themselves because they are victims of krodha and kama. Those who are not content with what they have are like the blind leading the blind, into deep pits; deprived of their senses by avarice and desire, their actions lead them to a never-ending cycle of births and deaths. The path that the wise take is the only one that leads to Brahman. Those who are superior overcome death by keeping that path in view and reach their goal by it.’

Dhritarashtra says, ‘Sanjaya, tell me of that path without terrors, by which I can realise Hrishikesa and attain mukti.’

Sanjaya says, ‘A man of uncontrolled mind cannot know Krishna Janardana, who has perfect and absolute control over his soul. The performance of yagnas with uncontrolled senses is not the means to that end. Renunciation of the objects of our turbulent senses comes from true gyana. Spiritual enlightenment and abstention from injury arise from true wisdom. Therefore, O king, subdue your senses with all possible effort; let your mind not deviate from true knowledge; and detach your heart from the worldly temptations that surround you. Learned Brahmanas say that this subjugation of the senses is true wisdom; and this wisdom is the path by which learned men strive for their goal.

Rajan, Krishna cannot be realised by men who have not subdued their senses. He who has subdued his senses is gratified by spiritual knowledge that he gains from knowing the shastras and from the joy of absorption in Yoga, communion.’”

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Sanjaya, tell me again about the lotus-eyed Krishna, so that, by knowing the significance of his names, I may attain that Purushottama.'

Sanjaya says, 'I have heard many of Krishna's auspicious names, and I will tell you of those that I know. They all describe him as immeasurable and beyond description.

He is called Vasudeva because he wraps all creatures with the cloak of maya, because of his glorious splendour and because he is the foundation and resting-place of the Devas. He is called Vishnu because he is all-pervading. He is called Madhava because he is an ascetic whose energy is always focused on the truth and absorbed in Yoga.

He is called Madhusudana because he killed the Asura Madhu and because he is the substance of the twenty-four objects of knowledge. He is called Krishna because he is of the Sattvata vamsa, because he is the embodiment of the unity of the words Krishi, that which exists, and Na, eternal peace.

His name Pundarikaksha comes from Pundarika, the high and eternal abode, and Aksha, indestructible.

He is called Janardana because he strikes fear into the hearts of all evil beings. He is called Sattvata because the sattva guna is embodied in him. He is called Vrishabhakshana because he is the union of Vrishabha—the Vedas—and ikshana—eye: the Vedas are the eyes through which he can be seen. He is called Aja because he is Unborn; he has not taken birth in the usual way.

That Supreme Soul is called Damodara because, unlike the Devas, his effulgence is not acquired but emanates from him and because he has self-control and great splendour. He is called Hrishikesa because he is the union of joy and divinity—Hrishika, eternal happiness and Isa, the six divine attributes. He is called Mahabahu because of his mighty arms with which he supports the Earth and the sky.

He is called Adhokshaja because he never falls or deteriorates in any way. He is called Narayana because he is the refuge of all human beings. He is called Purushottama because he is the one who creates, preserves and destroys the universe—Puru means creator, preserver and destroyer. He is called Sarva because he knows and is all things. He is called Satya because he is the truth of Truth—Krishna exists in Truth and Truth in him. He is called Vishnu because of his prowess and Jishnu because of his success. He is called Ananta because he is eternal and Govinda because he knows all languages.

He makes the unreal appear real and beguiles all creatures. With these his attributes, being ever devoted to dharma, and divine, the slayer of Madhu, that mighty-armed one who does not decay, will come here to try and prevent the slaughter of the Kurus.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'O Sanjaya, I envy those who are gifted with sight, who will see Krishna, his beauty and radiance illuminating all the cardinal points of Earth and sky; Krishna, whose words the Bhaaratas listen to with reverence, which the Srinjayas consider sacred and auspicious, which those who seek prosperity regard as faultless and that the doomed find unpalatable; Krishna, who is full of exalted resolve, who is eternal and incomparably heroic, who is the bull of the Yadavas and their lord; Krishna who inspires awe in his enemies, who slays them and destroys their fame.

The assembled Kauravas will behold that high-souled and adorable One, that Parantapa, the lord of the Vrishnis, speaking words of kindness and enthralling my people. I surrender to the refuge of that Eternal One, whom Rishis blessed with Atmagyana, that ocean of eloquence, that Being whom ascetics realise, that bird called Arishta of the beautiful wings, that destroyer of creatures, that refuge of the universe, that thousand-headed one, that Creator and Destroyer of all things, that Ancient One without beginning, middle or end, of the infinite achievements, that cause of the primeval Seed, that Un-born one, that embodiment of Eternity, that highest of the high, that Creator of the three worlds and of Devas, Asuras, Nagas and Rakshasas, that foremost of all the learned and rulers of men, that younger brother of Indra.'"

BHAGAVAD-YANA PARVA

Janamejaya said, "When Sanjaya left the Pandava encampment and went back to the Kurus, what did my grandfathers, the sons of Pandu, do? Brahmanottama, I want to hear all this; I beg you, tell me."

Vaisampayana said, "After Sanjaya has gone, Yudhishtira addresses Krishna, scion of Dasarha vamsa and lord of the Sattvatas.

He says, 'O you who are faithful to your friends, the time has come to show your friendship. There is no one but you who can save us from our distress. We put our faith in you and fearlessly demanded our share of the kingdom from Duryodhana, who is swollen with bottomless pride, and from his counsellors.

Parantapa, you protect the Vrishnis during all their times of misfortune; do the same for us Pandavas, who are in grave danger, for we deserve your protection.'

Krishna says, 'Here I am, Mahabaho. Tell me what you want and I will do it.'

Yudhishtira says, 'You have heard about Dhritarashtra's intentions; all that Sanjaya has said to me has Dhritarashtra's approval. Sanjaya, whom we must think of as Dhritarashtra's soul, has spoken the king's mind. A duta says what he is instructed to, for otherwise he deserves to die.

With a mind not inclined to look impartially upon all that is his, and impelled by avarice and a sinful heart, Dhritarashtra wants to make peace with us without giving us back our kingdom. It was at Dhritarashtra's command, and believing that he would honour the pledge we made with him, that we spent twelve years in the forests and one more year in hiding. The Brahmanas who were with us will bear out the fact that we did not deviate from our given word.

Now the covetous Dhritarashtra does not want to keep Kshatriya dharma. Out of his love for his son, he listens to the counsel of evil men. Prompted by greed and selfishness, he takes Duryodhana's advice and treats us deceitfully.

What can be more sorrowful, Janardana, than my being unable to look after my mother and my friends? Even with the Kasis, the Panchalas, the Chedis and the Matsyas for my allies, and with you, Madhusudana, as my protector, I asked for only five villages—Avisthala, Vrikasthala, Makandi, Varanavata, and any one more of their choice.

Grant us five villages or towns, we said, where we five may live together; we do not want to see Bharata vamsa destroyed.

However, the evil-minded son of Dhritarashtra thinks he is the sole master of the whole world, and he did not agree. What can be more sorrowful than this?

When a man, born and raised in a noble family, covets the possessions of others his avarice destroys his intelligence. Once intelligence is lost, he feels no shame; the lack of shame leads to an erosion of dharma; and the loss of dharma leads to the withering of prosperity. The destruction of prosperity, in its turn, ruins a man, for poverty is like death. Kinsmen, friends and Brahmanas shun a poor man, just as birds avoid a tree that has neither flowers nor fruit. Krishna, to me my relatives shunning me feels like death; I feel as if my prana is leaving my body.

Sambara said that nothing is more distressful than being wracked with anxiety about where one's next meal will come from and the uncertain future. It is said that wealth is the highest dharma and that everything depends on it. Those who have it are considered alive, whereas those who have none might as well be dead. A man who forcibly robs another of his wealth not only kills his victim but ruins his dharma, artha and kama.

When poverty overtakes them, some men choose death; others leave their cities and retire to villages; many retire to the forest; while some become sadhus and beggars in a bid to destroy themselves. For the sake of wealth, some drive themselves to madness; others live as subjects of their enemies; and many go into the service of others. Poverty is more distressful to a man than death, for prosperity is the sole cause of a man's dharma as well as his kama. Actual death is not as painful, for it is inevitable and none can overcome it.

Krishna, a man who is poor from birth does not suffer as much as the man who, born into wealth and used to living in luxury, loses his prosperity. He may lose his wealth through his own fault, but he blames the gods and Indra, rarely himself. Even knowledge of the shastras fails to mitigate his pain.

Sometimes he gets angry with his servants and harbours malicious envy towards his friends. In his anger, he loses the clarity of his mind and, because his intellect is clouded, he commits evil. His sinfulness makes him careless about maintaining caste divisions. Varnasankarshana, the mixing of castes, leads to Naraka and is the worst sin of all. If a man is not made aware soon, he goes straight to hell. Wisdom is the only thing that can awaken him, and if he regains the eye of wisdom, he is saved. When wisdom returns the man turns to the shastras, which enhance his virtue. Shame becomes a treasured ornament.

The man who feels shame has an aversion to sin; his prosperity increases; and he is truly a man. He who is devoted to dharma, who has his mind under control and who always acts after careful deliberation, is never inclined towards adharma, nor does he sin.

He who feels no shame and has lost good sense is neither man nor woman. He cannot earn punya and is like a Sudra. He who feels shame pleases the Devas, the Pitrs and his own self, and thus attains moksha, the highest aim of all men of dharma.

Madhusudana, in me you have seen the truth of all that I say. You know how we have lived these years in exile, deprived of our kingdom. It is against our dharma to abandon what is rightfully ours. Our first efforts will be towards ensuring that both ourselves and the Kauravas enjoy prosperity and be united in peace. Otherwise, we will kill the Kauravas and regain the kingdom that is ours by right, although success won through bloodshed, even by killing the most hateful enemy, and in this case our close kin, is the very worst of violent deeds.

We have many kinsmen, and many of our elders have ranged themselves against us. To slaughter these is a grievous sin indeed. What good can come of war? Sadly, war is the dharma of a Kshatriya; and we are born into that wretched varna. Sinful or virtuous, any other way of life would be wrong for us. A Sudra serves; a Vaisya lives by trade; the Brahmana has the wooden begging bowl to sustain himself; we have to live by war! A Kshatriya kills a Kshatriya; fish live on fish; a dog eats a dog. See how they all live according their inherent dharma.

O Krishna, Kali, wrath, is always present in battlefields; lives are lost; and despite the strict laws that govern warfare, success and defeat cannot be foretold. None of Earth's creatures control their own lives; and neither prosperity nor adversity come until their time is ripe.

Sometimes one man kills many; sometimes many together kill one; a coward may slay a renowned and celebrated hero. In war both sides cannot win, and both cannot lose, even though both sides may suffer equal losses. If a Kshatriya flees a battle, he loses honour and glory. Ah, under any circumstances war is a sin.

Who in striking another is not himself struck? For the one attacked, victory and defeat are the same, O Hrishikesa. Defeat is almost as bad as death, but the victor's losses are no less. Even if the victor is himself not killed, one or more of his dear ones may die and, stricken by the loss of his kin, he becomes indifferent to his own life.

Those who are quiet, modest, virtuous and compassionate are generally killed in battle, while evil ones escape unscathed. After killing his enemies a man is gripped by remorse. Moreover, the vanquished survivor will muster another army, to challenge the victor. In the hope of ending a dispute with finality, one often tries to annihilate the enemy, at times without success; and victory creates hatred, for the vanquished lives on in sorrow.

The man who wants peace sleeps happily, giving up all thoughts of victory and defeat, while the man who provokes hostilities sleeps in misery and anxiety, as if he shares the room with a serpent. The man who kills seldom wins renown; in fact he gains eternal and universal infamy. A war waged over a long period of time never ends, because even if there is one family member left alive, there is no dearth of those who will remind him of past enmities.

Krishna, enmity is never converted to peace by further enmity; it feeds on itself like a fire on ghee. There can be no peace without the complete obliteration of one side, because otherwise there will always be chances for a survivor to take revenge on the victor, a vice to which opportunists are addicted.

Confidence in one's own prowess is an incurable disease that can bring heartache. The only way to know peace is by renouncing war, or by death. Madhusudana, although it is true that we can achieve the goal by ridding oneself of an enemy by tearing him up by the very root, that is savage and cruel. The peace that one may achieve by giving up kingdom is almost like death, which comes if one loses one's kingdom and is utterly ruined by the enemy. We do not wish to give up our kingdom, nor do we wish to see the extinction of our vamsa. Considering all this, it is better to make peace by giving in to the Kauravas.

The time to show one's might is when those who desire peace and not war fail at conciliation and war becomes inevitable. Horrible results follow the failure of peacemakers. Learned men have seen this in fights even between dogs. First, the dogs wag their tails, then they bark, then they circle each other and bare their teeth, then growl and, finally, attack each other. The dog that is stronger prevails and takes his meat. It is the same with men; there is no difference whatever. Those who are powerful should avoid disputes with the weak, who will yield, for they must.

The father, the king and the elder always deserve respect and, so, Dhritarashtra deserves regard and reverence from us. But Dhritarashtra's love for his son is great; he will be obedient to his son and reject what we propose. What do you, O Krishna, think is best at this juncture? How can we preserve both our interest and our virtue? Whom else, besides you, Madhusudana, shall we consult in this most difficult matter? What other friend do we have, who is as dear to us as you are, who wants our welfare, who knows the consequences of all karma, and who knows the truth?'

Krishna says to Yudhishtira, 'I will go to the sabha of the Kurus, for both your sakes. If I can make peace without sacrificing your interests, I will have performed an act of great punya, which will bear immortal fruit. I will also have saved the angry Kurus and Pandavas, as well as Dhritarashtra's sons and this sacred Bhumi herself from the snare of death, and perdition worse than death.'

Yudhishtira says, 'I am not in favour of you going to the Kurus; Duryodhana will never do as you ask, even if you use the best advice to persuade him. All the Kshatriyas of the world are assembled there, obedient to his command. I do not like the thought of you going into their midst. If any harm comes to you, nothing, not the promise of godhood, not sovereignty over all the Devas, let alone mere mundane success, will please us.'

The Divine One says, 'Rajan, I know how base and vicious the son of Dhritarashtra is; but by going there we will escape the censure of the kings of the Earth. Just like other animals before the lion, all the kings of the Earth united cannot stand before me when I am roused. If by some chance they try to do me harm, I will consume the Kurus. My going there will not be fruitless, for if our object is not fulfilled, we shall at least escape blame. And this is my intention.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Krishna, do whatever pleases you. May your plan be blessed. Go to the Kurus. I hope to see you return successful and in joy. Go and make such a peace that all the sons of Bharata may live together happily and in contentment. You are our brother and friend, as dear to me as to Arjuna. So close are we to you that we are not in the least concerned that you might neglect our welfare. Go there for our good.

You know us and you know our enemies; you know what our intentions are and what to say. Whatever you say to Duryodhana will be for our good. By whatever means peace is achieved, Kesava, keep our welfare at heart.'"

"Krishna says, 'I have heard what Sanjaya said and now I have heard you. I know Dhritarashtra's intentions as well as yours. Your wishes are based on dharma, while theirs stem from malice. You greatly value what you might obtain without war.

Yet, a long life of brahmacharya is not the way of a Kshatriya, O lord of the Earth. Men of all four varnas say that a Kshatriya should never live on alms. Brahma has ordained that either victory or death in battle is the eternal dharma of a Kshatriya; humiliating yourself by surrender is not for you. Yudhishtira Mahabaho, you cannot live by humbly giving in. Display your prowess and vanquish your enemies, Parantapa.

Through his long association with many kings, and because of their affection and friendship, Dhritarashtra's son has become powerful indeed. There is no hope that he will make peace with you. The Kurus think they are strong because they have Bhishma, Drona, Kripa and others with them. As long as you behave mildly towards them, they will not give up your kingdom. Dhritarashtra's sons will not accede to your wishes from compassion or mildness or from a sense of righteousness.

There is, Pandava, more evidence that they will not make peace with you. They felt no remorse despite having made you suffer terrible deprivation and hardship and making you wear a kaupina for your attire. The ruthless Duryodhana cheated to beat you at dice, in the sight of Pitamaha Bhishma, Drona, the wise Vidura, many holy Brahmanas, the king, the citizens and all the important Kauravas; he deceived you, who are charitable, gentle, self-controlled, virtuous and of stern vratas; and he was not ashamed of his vile deed. Do not show the wretches any compassion. These men, who are so deserving of death at anyone's hands, are that much more deserving of it at yours, O Bhaarata.

With what ugly words Duryodhana, with his brothers, gladly and boastfully, tormented you and your brothers. He said, "The Pandavas now own nothing in this wide world. Their names and lineage are already extinct. In time, which is eternal, they have already died. I have all their punya, and they will now be scattered into the five elements."

While the game of dice was being played, the brutal Dusasana seized the weeping Draupadi by her hair and dragged her to the sabha, as if she had no protectors. In the presence of Bhishma, Drona and others he repeatedly called her "cow". Restrained by you and bound by dharma, your mighty brothers did nothing to avenge her. After you were exiled to the forests, Duryodhana spoke savage words and boasted to his kinsmen, who knew you were innocent and sat mute in the sabha and wept silently.

The assembled kings and the Brahmanas did not applaud him for this deed. Indeed, all in the court censured him. To a man of noble descent, Parantapa, censure is equal to death. Death is many times better than a life of blame. That was when he already died; but he felt no shame although all the kings of the Earth disapproved of what he did.

He whose character is utterly despicable is destroyed as easily as a tree supported by a single weak root. Duryodhana deserves death by any hand, like a snake. Kill him, Parantapa, without the slightest hesitation or remorse.

It is incumbent upon you, and I approve of it, that you should pay homage to your uncle Dhritarashtra and to Pitamaha Bhishma. I will go there and remove the uncertainty of all men who are still in any doubt of Duryodhana's evil nature and ways. There, in the presence of all the kings, I will tell of your shining virtues and Duryodhana's vices. The rulers of kingdoms, who hear my words full of dharma and artha, will recognise that you are virtuous and truthful while Duryodhana is moved only by his greed.

I will speak of Duryodhana's vices before the citizens of Hastinapura and the other people of the kingdom, before the young and the old, of all the four varnas, who will be gathered there. Because you ask for peace no one will consider you sinful, while all the lords of the Earth will castigate the Kurus and Dhritarashtra. When Duryodhana dies the death of dishonour and of being forsaken by all men, my work will be complete. After that, do what needs to be done.

Mindful of your noble intentions but never sacrificing your interest, I will go to the Kurus and try to make peace. I will observe their preparations for war and return to make you victorious, Bhaarata.

I fear that war is certain; all the omens I see point to it. Birds and animals screech and howl at dusk; the best elephants and horses assume dreadful shapes; fires flame in many sinister hues. Such signs appear only when the pralaya is imminent.

Let your warriors ready their weapons, their machines of war, armour, chariots, elephants and horses, and prepare for battle. Collect everything you need for the war that looms. As long as he lives Duryodhana will never give back your magnificent kingdom, which he stole from you at a game of dice.'"

"Bhima says, 'Madhusudana, speak in such a way that there may be peace with the Kurus. Do not threaten them with war. Do not speak harshly to Duryodhana, who is always quick to anger, resentful, flouts his own best interest and is arrogant. Treat him gently. His heart, like a criminal's, is naturally inclined to sin; he is intoxicated with pride in his own prosperity, and he is hostile towards the Pandavas. He has no foresight, is cruel and always blames others for his own sins; his strength is vicious; his wrath is not easily or quickly subdued. He does not learn from the mistakes of others or his own; his very soul is evil and he is full of deceit and treachery. He would rather give up his life than his opinion. Peace with such a man, Krishna, is difficult.

Duryodhana disregards the advice of his well-wishers; he is without virtue and loves falsehood; his actions violate the advice of his best counsellors, which wounds their hearts. Like a snake hiding in the reeds, he is a slave to his evil nature and his anger, and he sins again and again. You know well the strength of Duryodhana's army, his ways, his character and his prowess. Until now the Kauravas and their sons passed their days happily, and we, too, with our friends and Indra, as if we were Indra's younger brothers. But now, sadly, Duryodhana's wrath will consume all the Bhaaratas, as fire does forests at the end of winter.

O Krishna, you know about the eighteen kings who killed their friends and relatives. When Dharma's time came to an end, Kali[1] was born among the Asuras, who blossomed in prosperity and blazed with energy; Udavarta was born among the Haihayas; Janamejaya was born among the Nipas; Bahula among the Talajghanas; proud Vasu among the Krimis; Ajabindu among the Suviras; Rushardhika among the Surashtras; Arkaja among the Balihas; Dhautamulaka among the Chinas; Hayagriva among the Videhas; Varayu among the Mahaujasas; Bahu among the Sundaras; Pururavas among the Diptakshas; Sahaja among the Chedis and Matsyas; Vrishadhvaja among the Praviras; Dharana among the Chandravatsas; Vigahana among the Mukutas and Sama among the Nandivegas.

Vile and powerful souls, Krishna, take birth at the end of each yuga, in their respective races, for the destruction of their kinsmen. So has Duryodhana, the embodiment of sin, and the disgrace of his vamsa, been born at the end of the yuga into our clan, of the Kurus. Therefore, mighty one, you should speak gently to him in sweet, not bitter words, imbued with dharma and artha, and in depth on his favourite subjects, so you please him. All of us would rather submit humbly to Duryodhana than let the Bhaaratas be annihilated.

Krishna, conduct yourself in such a way that we may rather live as strangers to the Kurus than incur the sin of destroying the whole vamsa. Encourage our Pitamaha and other elders and counsellors to foster feelings of kinship amongst us cousins and to pacify the son of Dhritarashtra.

I say this and Yudhishtira approves. Arjuna, too, is opposed to war, for he is deeply compassionate.'"

[1] Kali refers to the demon Kali, not the Goddess Kaali.

Vaisampayana said, "Hearing Bhima speak with such uncharacteristic mildness, as unexpected as hills without their bulk, or fire without heat, Krishna throws back his head and laughs aloud. And as if to provoke Bhima, like the wind fanning a fire, he speaks to him who was at that moment seized by an impulse of kindness.

Krishna says, 'O Bhimasena, you usually applaud war in your longing to slaughter Dhritarashtra's vile sons who delight in every bestiality, in destroying the lives of others. Parantapa, you stay awake the whole night, sitting with your head bent down. Frequently, you utter frightful exclamations of anger that express the storm that rages in your heart. Inflamed by the fire of your fury, you sigh in restlessness, like a smoking flame. You go off by yourself and lie down, your fevered breaths labouring, like a weak man weighed down by a heavy burden. Those who do not know the reason for all this think that you are mad.

Just as an elephant trumpets in rage while it tramples uprooted trees to pulp, you run wildly here and there, heaving sighs and making the Earth tremble under your tread. You take no delight in company and pass your time in solitude. Night or day, nothing pleases you so much as seclusion. Sitting by yourself, you suddenly laugh out loud; at times, you put your head between your knees and stay like that interminably, with your eyes shut; at other times, you frown and bite your lips and stare fiercely, fixedly ahead of you, your eyes seeing nothing. These are all symptoms of anger.

Once, in the midst of your brothers, you seized your mace and cried, “As surely as the Sun rises in the east and displays his radiance, and as truly as he sets in the west by journeying around Meru, so do I swear that I will kill Duryodhana with this gada of mine. And this I, Bhima, solemnly vow.”

How does this same heart of yours now advocate peace, Parantapa? When fear enters even your heart, Bhima, all those who want war are dismayed as war draws nearer. Asleep or awake, you see inauspicious omens. Perhaps that is why you want peace. You seem to have lost your manliness, even like a eunuch. Panic grips you, which is why you are distraught. Your heart trembles; your mind is taken by despair; your thighs quiver in weakness, and all this makes you want peace. The hearts of mortal men, O son of Pritha, are as inconstant as the pods of a salmali seed in the wind.

At this moment, your words are as soft and mild as the language of cows; and your brothers’ hearts sink into a sea of despair to listen to you, like swimmers in the sea without a raft. That you of all men should speak such tame and cowardly words is as strange as a mountain moving. Remember your strength, your achievements, and the race into which are born; and do not give in to grief. Be strong, Bhima. This weakness is not worthy of you; a Kshatriya never enjoys anything he has not acquired through his own prowess.’”

Vaisampayana said, "The choleric Bhima, who can never tolerate a slight, is stung to the quick, and responds like a mettlesome thoroughbred to a whip.

He cries, 'Krishna, you wrong me! What I want is one thing and one thing alone: war. We have known each other a long time and you well know that I delight in war and that my prowess is irresistible. Or, perhaps you don't know me at all, like a swimmer unaware of the depth of the lake he swims in. That is why you speak to me like this. No one else, knowing Bhimasena, could say what you have to me.

And so let me tell you, O joy of the Vrishnis, about my unrivalled might. I know that to boast is vulgar, but you have wounded me, and I will tell you about myself and what I am.

Krishna, Sky and Earth are immovable, immense and infinite; they shelter the countless beings that are born into them. If, through anger, they suddenly come to collide like two mountains, I can keep them apart with my arms. Look at my mace-like arms; no man alive can extricate himself from their grasp. Indeed, the mountain Himavat, the Ocean and the mighty wielder of the thunderbolt—the slayer of Bala himself—cannot free the one that I seize in my great arms.

I will grind under my feet all the Kshatriyas who come to fight against the Pandavas. You do not know, Krishna, the prowess with which I vanquished the kings of the Earth and subjugated them. If you really do not know my strength, which is as fierce as the midday Sun, you will see soon it in battle. You wound me deep with your cruel words; I feel the pain as of a foetid tumour being lanced. Ah, know that my strength is greater than I have described!

On the very day that the havoc of war breaks out you will see me fell elephants, warriors on chariots, elephants and horseback; and, my long withheld fury unleashed, you will see me butcher countless brave Kshatriyas. You and the others will see me do all this, and mow down the greatest Maharathas. The marrow in my bones has not yet dried, nor does my heart tremble. Even if the whole world rush at me in wrath, I will feel no fear.

Madhusudana, it is only from compassion that I advocate showing goodwill to the enemy. I quietly bear all our injuries, lest our Bharatavamsa become extinct.'"

"The Divine One says, 'I said what I did in affection and from a desire to know your true mind; it was not in reproach, from pride of knowledge, in anger, nor from any desire to hold forth. I know the magnanimity of your soul, your strength and your accomplishments. That is not why I was critical of you.

O Bhima, the benefit that the Pandava cause will gain from you is a thousand times greater than you give yourself credit for. You, Vrikodara, with your kinsmen and friends, are exactly the man that should be born into a noble house such as yours, which is honoured by all the kings of the Earth. However, those who have doubts about the consequences of dharma and adharma, and strength and weakness, can never arrive at the truth. Indeed, the very thing that is responsible for a man's success also causes his downfall. The consequences of human actions can never be certain.

Learned men, who can gauge the evil in any deed, declare how worthy or not any action is; yet, action can have the opposite and unforeseen results, even like the wind suddenly changing direction. Even those deeds of men, performed after great deliberation and with well directed policy, and consistent with dharma, are baffled by providence. Then, again, providential circumstances, such as heat, cold, rain, hunger and thirst, which do not depend on human endeavour, can be overcome by man's efforts. Also, apart from the course that a man is destined to follow as a result of his past lives, he can be rid of all other karma if he so pleases; the Smritis and the Srutis testify to this.

Pandava, one cannot move through life on Earth by doing nothing. One should act in the knowledge that one's goals will be achieved by a combination of destiny and effort. The man who does with this belief is never pained by failure, nor delighted by success. To explain this, Bhimasena, was what I intended, not to proclaim that war would ensure victory for you.

When a man's mind is upset he should not lose his cheer or succumb to lassitude or dejection. This is why I spoke to you as I did: to put heart into you. Tomorrow I will go before Dhritarashtra; and I will strive to make peace without compromising your interests.

If the Kauravas make peace, everlasting fame will be mine; your goals will be achieved, and they, too, will reap great benefits. However, if the Kauravas disregard my advice and are obdurate with their opinion, there will surely be war. Bhimasena, the burden of fighting this war rests on you and Arjuna, and you two will have to lead all the others. In case of war, I will drive Arjuna's chariot; that is his wish, not that I want to fight.

I was fearful of the weakness your words conveyed. I only re-ignited your wrath, Mahabaho.'"

"Arjuna says, 'O Janardana, Yudhishtira has already said whatever needed to be said. But after hearing you, it appears that you think that Dhritarashtra's greed and our relative weakness will make peace difficult to attain. Also, you think that human prowess alone is fruitless, that without showing our might our goals cannot be achieved. What you say may be true but, also, perhaps not always so. Nothing should be regarded as impossible. It is true that peace does seem to be unattainable, given our present condition, yet if peace is properly proposed, they might agree.

O Krishna, strive to strike peace with our enemies. You are the truest friend of both the Pandavas and the Kurus, even as Prajapati is of the Devas and the Asuras. Accomplish what is in the best interests of both sides. Bringing about our welfare is not difficult for you to achieve; if you try, you will surely succeed. Why, as soon as you go to Hastinapura, it will be done. Even if you decide to deal with Duryodhana in any other way, you must do as you wish. Whether you want peace or war with the enemy, Krishna, we will honour your decision.

Does the vile Duryodhana, with his sons and kinsmen, not deserve death when, unable to bear the sight of Yudhishtira's prosperity and finding no other honest course to assuage his own burning envy, he took our kingdom by cheating at dice? When invited to combat, what Kshatriya turns away from the fight, even if death is certain for him? When Duryodhana defeated us with the lowest treachery and banished us to the forest, I thought that he deserved death at my hands. What you want to do for your loved ones is not strange; what is mysterious, though, is how you will achieve your objective, by mildness, or other means. If you think that for you to kill them all immediately is best, do it now; we need no further debate.

Surely, you know how Duryodhana shamed Draupadi in the Kuru sabha, and how we bore it with profound fortitude. I cannot believe that the same Duryodhana will now behave with dharma towards the Pandavas. Wise counsel will be lost on him, like seeds sown in barren soil.

So, Krishna, do what you think is right, and beneficial for the Pandavas, and also decide what should be done next.'"

"The Divine One says, 'I will do as you say, Mahabaho, and do my best to bring about an outcome that will benefit both the Pandavas and the Kauravas.

Arjuna, of the two options, war and peace, only peace lies somewhat within my power. A farmer may, through his effort, water and weed his field, but without rain it will not yield crops. Some do say that his effort will result in success if he irrigates his field artificially; but even that is uncertain because a drought sent by fate may still make it dry. In view of all this, the Rishis of old have said that human endeavour will only succeed when providence collaborates. I will do all that can humanly be done, but I cannot prevail over providence.

Duryodhana goes in defiance of dharma and the world, and he feels no remorse. Moreover, his appetite for sin is fed by Sakuni and Karna, and by his brother Dusasana. Duryodhana will never make peace by giving back your kingdom, even if his obstinacy entails a bloody death for himself and his kinsmen at our hands. Yudhishtira does not wish to meekly give up his kingdom; neither will Duryodhana surrender it at any price. I think I need to deliver Yudhishtira's message to him, though Duryodhana will not agree to Yudhishtira's conditions. If he refuses, he deserves to die. Bhaarata, he deserves death at my hands because he is the one who always tormented all of you, ever since you were children, and later after cheating you of your kingdom when he could not restrain his overweening envy of Yudhishtira's prosperity.

Many times he has tried to draw me away from you, but I never paid him any heed. You know what dreams Duryodhana dreams, and you also know that I want Yudhishtira's welfare. Knowing Duryodhana's heart and my own wishes, why do you doubt me, as if you knew nothing?

You know that an apocalyptic, revelational war has been ordained by the gods; how then, can we make peace with the enemy? I will say and do as much as I can, but do not expect peace. When Duryodhana made off with Virata's cattle, did Bhishma not try to persuade Duryodhana to make peace for the good of all?

I say to you today: as soon as you decided to fight them, their death was a foregone conclusion. Inexorably, and not surprisingly, Duryodhana has refused to part with even a very small part of the kingdom, for even a short time. As for me, I am always obedient to Yudhishtira's commands, and I must ponder again the sins of the wretched Duryodhana.'"

"Nakula says, 'O Krishna, the benevolent Yudhishtira, who knows about dharma, has spoken at length; Bhimasena has heard him and has weighed his own strength against the desire for peace on the scales of dharma; you have heard what Arjuna said, too; and I have repeatedly expressed my own opinion, as well.

Set all this aside; concentrate now on what the enemy has in mind and do what you think is best, given the circumstances. Kesava, each situation warrants a different decision, but a man wins success if he does the apt thing for the particular situation in which he finds himself. A decision that suits one situation becomes the opposite in another. One cannot hold the same opinion all the time.

While we were in the forest, we adopted a particular way of life; things were different during the ajnatavasa. Now, when we need no longer hide, what we want has changed again. While we wandered in the vana, we were not as eager to have back our kingdom as we are now. Now our exile has ended and we have returned; and we hear that an army of seven akshauhinis has gathered to help us, by your grace, Janardana. Seeing these tigers among men, of immeasurable force, armed and ready for battle, what enemy of ours will not be terrified? Go to the Kurus; speak mildly first, then employ threats, so that the vile Duryodhana is filled with fear and anxiety.

What man of flesh and blood can stand up to Yudhishtira and Bhimasena, to the invincible Arjuna and Sahadeva, to Satyaki of the scintillating tejas, to me, to you or Balarama in battle, Kesava? Who can face Virata and his sons, Drupada and his allies, Dhrishtadyumna and the powerful king of Kasi, and Dhrishtaketu, lord of the Chedis?

Mahabaho, Yudhishtira Dharmaraja's objective will be accomplished immediately as you arrive there. Vidura, Bhishma, Drona and Bahlika will understand the wisdom of what you say. They will advise Dhritarashtra and the sinner Duryodhana to do as you say. When you, Krishna, are the speaker and Vidura is the listener, what is there in any of the worlds that cannot be communicated easily and effectively?'"

"Sahadeva says, 'What the king says is Sanatana Dharma, but you, Parantapa, must ensure, by what you do and say in Hastinapura, that there is war. Even if the Kauravas express a desire for peace with the Pandavas, you must provoke war with them. Krishna, you know how Panchali was dragged into the sabha and shamed. How can my anger be appeased without killing Duryodhana? Even if Bhima, Arjuna and Yudhishtira chose to be virtuous and peaceful, I will abandon dharma and meet Duryodhana in battle.'

Satyaki says, 'Mahabaho, noble Sahadeva speaks the truth. The anger I feel towards Duryodhana can be appeased only by his death. Do you not remember how enraged you were when you saw the distressed Pandavas in the forest, wearing rags and deer-skin? Purushottama, all the kings and warriors gathered here support what this fierce Kshatriya, Madri's heroic son, says.'

Hearing this, all the Kshatriyas set up a huge roar. They applaud Satyaki with shouts of Excellent! Well said! and, eager to fight, they are exhilarated.'"

"Vaisampayana said, 'Grief-struck Krishnaa of the long black tresses applauds Sahadeva and the great warrior Satyaki, whose words for her are resonant with dharma. Overwhelmed with sorrow to hear Bhimasena speak for peace, she turns to Krishna.

Her eyes are bathed in tears as she says, 'Madhusudana, you know how deceitfully Dhritarashtra's son, with his counsellors, robbed the Pandavas of their every happiness. You also know what message Yudhishtira sent through Sanjaya.

Effulgent one, he said, "Give us just five villages—Avisthala, Vrikasthala, Makandi, Varanavata, and for the fifth, any other of your choice." Krishna, this was the message sent to Duryodhana and his counsellors. Duryodhana heard what the humble Yudhishtira wants, and despite knowing that he is anxious to make peace, has done nothing towards it. If Duryodhana wants peace only without returning our kingdom, there is no need for you to go to Hastinapura.

The Pandavas, with the Srinjayas, can easily withstand the Dhartarashtra forces. When they are not amenable to conciliation, it is not right for you to show them mercy. To safeguard himself, a man must be severe with enemies with whom he cannot make peace either by conciliation or gifts. Krishna, the punishment you mete out, with the help of the Pandavas and Srinjayas, must be immediate and harsh. This is the best course for the sons of Pritha and will, if accomplished, add to your glory and that of the entire Kshatriya race.

The man who is covetous, be he a Kshatriya or of any other varna, other than even the most sinful Brahmana, must surely be killed by a Kshatriya, true to his dharma. The exception in the case of a Brahmana is because a Brahmana is the teacher of all the other varnas, and he is the first to get a share in everything. Those who know the shastras declare that sin is incurred only by killing one who does not deserve killing. It is just as sinful not to kill one who does deserve it. With the Pandava and Srinjaya forces behind you, you must act in a manner that will not taint you with sin. I keep repeating what has already been said because I have faith in you.

Krishna, what other woman is there on Earth like me? I am the daughter of King Drupada, born from the fire of yagna. I am your beloved friend Dhrishtadyumna's sister. By marriage I have become a queen of the Ajamida vamsa, the daughter-in-law of the illustrious Pandu. I am the queen of Pandu's sons, who are each like Indra in splendour. To these five heroic Kshatriyas I have borne five sons, all mighty warriors, who are as close to you as Abhimanyu is.

I, this same woman, was dragged by my hair into the Kuru sabha and humiliated in the very sight of the sons of Pandu, and even while you live. Krishna, the Pandavas, the Panchalas and the Vrishnis all lived to see me treated like a slave by those sinners. And while the Pandavas sat silent without giving way to their anger, I called out to you in my heart, saying, "Save me, Krishna, save me!"

Then the illustrious Dhritarashtra, my father-in-law, said to me, "Ask for any boon, O princess of Panchala. You deserve that and honour from me."

I said, "Let the Pandavas be free men with their chariots and weapons."

The Pandavas were freed, only to be exiled into the forest. Janardana, you know all these sorrows of mine. Save me, lotus-eyed One, with my husbands, kinsmen and relatives, from that grief. By dharma I am a daughter-in-law to Bhishma and Dhritarashtra. Yet, I was forcibly enslaved before them. O, shame on Arjuna's skill as an archer; shame on Bhimasena's might, for letting Duryodhana live for even a moment after what he did. If I deserve any favour from you, if you have any affection for me, Krishna, direct your wrath at the sons of Dhritarashtra.'

The bewitching Panchali, her black eyes, large like lotus leaves, bathed in tears, walks with the lovely gait of a she-elephant and comes up to Krishna. Taking in her hands her lustrous tresses with wavy ends, so dark, almost deep-blue, scented with myriad perfumes, of every auspicious sign and, though braided, soft and glossy like some mighty serpent, she addresses him.

She says, 'O Lotus-eyed, who are anxious for peace with the enemy, remember in all that you do, these tresses of mine that Dusasana seized in his coarse hands. If Bhima and Arjuna have stooped so low as to long for peace, my old father will avenge me, with battle. My five sons, too, of the mighty tejas, with Abhimanyu at their head, will fight the Kauravas. What peace can my heart know unless I see Dusasana's dark arm severed from his body and cut into pieces?

Thirteen long years have I passed in expectation of better times, hiding my anger in my heart like a smouldering fire. Now, pierced by Bhima's words like arrows loosed by dharma, my heart is about to break.'

The doe-eyed Draupadi is convulsed with sobs, tears pouring down her cheeks and over the lovely princess's breasts like liquid fire.

The mighty-armed Kesava speaks comfortingly to her, 'Krishnaa, you will soon see the women of Bharata vamsa weep as you do. Timid one, they will cry for their relatives and friends who have been slain. They, with whom you are angry, have already lost their warriors and their power. For, at Yudhishtira's command, and with Bhima, Arjuna and the twins, I will accomplish what is ordained by destiny.

Their hour has come. If they do not listen to me, the sons of Dhritarashtra will lie on the earth and become food for dogs and jackals. Himavat might shift from his place; Bhumi might shatter into a hundred fragments; the sky with its countless stars might fall down; but what I say can never be in vain.

Stem your tears, Panchali; I swear that soon you will see your husbands crowned with prosperity, and their enemies slain.'"

"Arjuna says, 'O Kesava, you are the truest friend of all the Kurus. You are related to both sides and a dear friend to both. You must bring peace between the Pandavas and the sons of Dhritarashtra, for only you can. Lotus-eyed Parantapa, go now with that intention and say what needs to be said to our irascible cousin. If the foolish Duryodhana does not accept your good advice, in keeping with dharma and artha, he will surely fall prey to what fate has destined for him.'

The Divine One says, 'Yes, I will go to Dhritarashtra. I want to achieve dharma, and weal for both ourselves and the Kurus.'

The night has passed and the Sun risen brightly in the east. The hour called Maitra has begun, and the rays of the Sun are still mild. The month is Kaumuda Kartika, the nakshatra Revati. It is the season of dew, for autumn has departed; and the Earth is verdant with lush crops.

This is how the world's stage is set that day, when Krishna, that mightiest of men, hears the auspicious and sacred sound of Brahmanas chanting the sweet mantras of prayer, like Indra hearing the adorations of the Devarishis. He performs his morning rituals, purifies himself with a bath, puts on his pitambara robes, adorns himself with ornaments and rubs himself with unguents, and worships Surya and Agni. He touches the tail of a bull and reverently bows to the Brahmanas; then he walks around the sacred fire and looks at the auspicious offerings laid out.

He remembers Yudhishtira's words and says to Satyaki, who sits nearby, 'Have my chariot prepared. Have my conch-shell, discus and mace, my quivers and arrows, and all my other astras placed in my ratha. Duryodhana, Karna and Subala's son are evil men and, yet, they must not be taken lightly.'

Krishna's attendants immediately begin to yoke his chariot, which is as effulgent as the fire that rages at the Pralaya, and which has no comparison in speed. Its two wheels are like the Sun and the Moon in lustre; it is emblazoned with crescent and full moons, fish, animals and birds; and it is adorned all over with garlands of flowers and with pearls and other gemstones of various kinds. It is grand and beautiful, and as splendid as the Sun. Besides its gold and jewelled decorations, it bears a wonderful flag-staff flying the finest pennants. Equipped with everything needed for battle, it is irresistible. Covered with tiger-skins, it can strip every enemy of his fame and enhance the joy of the Yadavas.

Yoked to this ratha are the superlative horses, Saibya, Sugriva, Meghapushpa and Balahaka, all of which have been bathed and exquisitely caparisoned. And adding to Krishna's glory is Garuda, the Lord of birds, who is perched on the flagstaff of that awesome chariot.

Krishna ascends his ratha as lofty as Meru's summit, the deep rumble of its wheels like massed clouds, which, like the pushpaka vimana, takes its rider where he wills it. Taking Satyaki with him, Krishna sets out, filling the earth and the sky with the thunder of his chariot-wheels.

The sky becomes cloudless; cool, fragrant winds blow in the pure, clear air. Auspicious animals and birds, whirling always to their right, fly around the ratha; cranes, peacocks and swans follow the slayer of Madhu, uttering cries of good omen. The fire, fed with libations to the accompaniment of mantras, blazes up, smokeless, also sending its flames towards the auspicious right.

Vasishta, Vamadeva, Bhuridyumna, Gaya, Kratha, Sukra, Kusika, Bhrigu and other Brahmarishis and Devarishis stand to the right of Krishna, the joy of the Yadavas and Indra's younger brother. Worshipped by these and other illustrious Rishis and Munis, Krishna sets out for the city of the Kurus, being seen off by Yudhishtira, Bhima, Arjuna and the twin sons of Madri; as well as by the heroic Chekitana, Dhrishtaketu of the Chedis, Drupada and the king of Kasi, that great warrior Sikhandin, Dhrishtadyumna, Virata with his sons and the princes of Kekaya. All these Kshatriyas ride a respectful distance behind that bull of the Kshatriya race to honour him.

Yudhishtira Dharmaraja follows Krishna for some distance and then speaks to him in the presence of the other kings. The son of Kunti embraces that Purushottama, who has never sinned, not from desire, anger, fear or any wish for profit; whose mind is steady; who knows no greed; who is dharma embodied, and endowed with fathomless intelligence and wisdom; who knows the hearts of all creatures; who is the Lord of all and the God of gods; who is eternal; who has every virtue and bears the auspicious Srivatsa on his chest. The king embraces Krishna and tells him what he must do.

Yudhishtira says, 'We should ask after the welfare of our mother, who always keeps dharma, performing tapasya and propitiatory rituals; who is devout in her worship of Devas and Atithis; who always waits upon her superiors; who loves her sons with a boundless affection; and whom we love dearly. She rescued us from Duryodhana's many snares, like a boat saving shipwrecked sailors from the terrors of the sea. Krishna, though undeserving of woe, she has suffered untold misery because of us. We should pay homage to her. Embrace and comfort her repeatedly by telling her about the Pandavas.

Ever since her marriage she has been the victim of pain and grief because of the way her father-in-law behaved; suffering has been her lot. Krishna, will I ever see the day when my afflictions end and I can make my grieving mother happy? On the eve of our exile she ran after us, crying in anguish, but we left her behind and went into the forest. Sorrow does not always kill; she might still be alive and, though grieving constantly for her sons, being looked after in Hastinapura.

Glorious one, salute her for me, and salute Dhritarashtra also, as well as all the kings who are older than us. Greet Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Bahlika, Aswatthama, Somadatta and everyone of the Bharata vamsa. Salute the wise Vidura, counsellor of the Kurus, of the profound intellect and knowledge of dharma. Madhusudana, embrace everyone on our behalf.'

Having said this to Krishna in the presence of the kings, Yudhishtira circles him in pradakshina and asks his leave to return. Arjuna walks ahead a few steps and says quietly to his friend Krishna, the Avatara, 'Illustrious Govinda, all the kings know that we have decided to ask for our kingdom back. If, without insulting us and by honouring you, they give us what we demand, I will be pleased and they will escape mortal danger. If, however,

Dhritarashtra’s son, who is always deceitful, does otherwise, I will obliterate the very race of Kshatriyas.’

Bhima is delighted when Arjuna says this. That Pandava, who constantly quivers with rage he can scarcely contain, now lets out a dreadful roar of joy. Hearing him, all the bowmen tremble, and horses and elephants helplessly urinate and excrete in terror.

Having declared his resolve to Krishna, Arjuna takes his leave and turns back after embracing his divine cousin. Once all the other kings are persuaded to turn back, as well, Krishna sets out with a cheerful heart, on his chariot drawn by Saibya, Sugriva and the other horses. Urged by his sarathy Daruka, those steeds fly, devouring road and sky as they go.

On his way, Krishna Mahabaho meets some Rishis who shine with Brahmatejas, standing on both sides of the road. He gets down and greets them reverently and worships them.

He says, ‘Is there peace in the world? Is dharma being practised? Are the other three varnas obedient to Brahmanas? Where have you met with success? Where are you going and why? What can I do for you? What brings you illustrious ones to Earth?’

Jamadagni’s son, Brahma’s friend, that lord of Devas and Asuras, comes forward and embraces Krishna. Parasurama Bhargava says, ‘O Dasarha, Devarishis of pious deeds, Brahmanas of deep knowledge of the Shastras, Rajarishis and venerable Munis, who are witnesses to the feats that the Devas and Asuras have achieved, want to see all the Kshatriyas of the Earth gathered together from everywhere, the counsellors sitting in the ancient Kuru sabha, the kings, and, amongst them, you who are the Truth incarnate, O Janardana.

We are going to Hastinapura to witness that awesome sight. We are also anxious to hear what you will say to the Kurus in the presence of all those kings, words full of dharma and artha. Bhishma, Drona and others, as well as the illustrious Vidura and you, Yadavapumgava, will adorn that ancient sabha. We want to hear what you say there—divine words of wisdom.

You now know our purpose, Mahabaho. We will meet you again; go safely. We hope to see you in the midst of that sabha, seated on a noble throne, radiating lustre and might.’”

Vaisampayana said, “O Parantapa, when Devaki’s mighty-armed son sets out for Hastinapura, ten powerful, fully armed and battle-ready Maharathas follow in his train. A thousand foot-soldiers, a thousand horsemen and hundreds of attendants carrying plentiful provisions also go with him.”

Janamejaya said, “How does the illustrious Krishna of Dasarha vamsa, the slayer of Madhu, leave on his journey? What omens appear when he sets out?”

Vaisampayana said, “I will tell you about the earthly and heavenly omens that appear on Krishna’s departure for Hastinapura. At first, the sky is clear and cloudless, yet thunder rolls and lightning flashes above. Later, light, fleecy clouds appear and pour down rain behind him, in his wake, as if in tribute. The seven great rivers, including the Sindhu, change their eastward courses and flow west instead. The cardinal directions seem to be reversed and all things seem in dizzy thrall. Fires blaze up everywhere, Rajan, and the Earth trembles.

In hundreds of wells and earthen pots water gushes up spontaneously and overflows. The whole universe is enveloped in darkness. Akasa is filled with dust that obscures the cardinal and subsidiary points of the horizon. Loud roars sound in the sky, but no creature is seen to make them. This wonderful phenomenon is seen all across the land. A southwesterly wind, roaring, uproots trees by the thousands and crashes them down upon the city of Hastinapura.

However, in those places through which Krishna passes delicious breezes blow and everything becomes auspicious. Lotuses and fragrant flowers fall in showers from above. The road becomes smooth and miraculously free from prickly grasses and thorns. Wherever Krishna stays, thousands of Brahmanas glorify that munificent One and worship him with offerings of curds, ghee, honey and rich gifts. Women come out onto the road and fling redolent wildflowers over him who is devoted to the welfare of all creatures.

Bharatarishabha, Krishna comes to wonderful Salibhavana abundant with every crop, an enchanting and sacred realm. He sees, with delight, villages crowded with animals; he passes through many cities and kingdoms. He passes through Upaplavya where its happy, good natured citizens, who have the protection of the Bhaaratas and, so, free from fear of invasion, and unknowing of danger or calamities of any kind, come out of their town and stand together on the way, eager to set eyes on holy Krishna. They see that illustrious one like a fire, and they worship him as they would an honoured and welcome guest.

When at last Krishna comes to Vrikasthala, the Sun is reddening the sky with his last rays of light. Alighting from his chariot, the Avatara performs the customary rites of purification, orders the horses unharnessed and sits down to his sandhya vandana. Daruka unyokes the horses, tends to them and lets them loose to graze and drink.

Krishna says, ‘We must spend the night here, for the success of Yudhishtira’s mission.’

His attendants quickly set up camp and serve fine food and drink.

Rajan, amongst the Brahmanas who live in that village, those who are of noble descent, and humble and obedient to the injunctions of the Vedas in their ways, approach Krishna and honour him with blessings and worship. They place their rich homes at his disposal.

Krishna joyfully accepts their hospitality and pays homage to each of them as befits their status. He visits their homes, then returns with his own people to his ample tent. Having eaten his meal with them and fed all the Brahmanas with sweet-meats, Krishna passes the night happily in Vrikasthala.’” Vaisampayana said, "Dhritarashtra, in the meantime, has discovered through his spies that Krishna is on his way. His hair stands on end as he reverently faces the mighty-armed Bhishma, Drona, Sanjaya and the illustrious Vidura, and Duryodhana and his confederates.

He says, 'O son of Kuru vamsa, we hear strange and wonderful news. Old men, women and children are talking of it in their homes; most speak of it in awe; others gather in groups outside and talk of it; wherever men congregate, in homes or open spaces, they are discussing just one thing. They all say that Krishna, the great scion of Dasarha vamsa, is one his way here on behalf of the Pandavas. He is worthy of every honour we can do him and our worship. He is the Lord of all creatures; everything in the universe depends upon him; intelligence, strength, wisdom and energy are centred in him.

This Narasreshta deserves the reverence of good men, for He is eternal virtue—Sanatana Dharma incarnate. He will bestow felicity and happiness if worshipped, and misery if not. If we please him with our offerings, we might have all our wishes fulfilled by his grace, in the presence of these kings.

Parantapa, waste no time; make arrangements to receive him worshipfully; have pavilions built on the road and furnish them with every luxury, so that Krishna is pleased with you. What does Bhishma think?'

Bhishma and the others warmly laud what Dhritarashtra says. Duryodhana immediately orders pavilions to be erected at regular intervals, at the most charming sites, and adorned with myriad jewels. The king has them furnished with luxurious beds and seats; he sends beautiful maidens, perfumes, ornaments, fine clothes, a variety of the best food and drink and fragrant garlands of many kinds. Especially for Krishna's reception and use, the king has a splendid, gem-studded pavilion built at Vrikasthala. Once these arrangements, made by superhuman or even divine effort, are complete, Duryodhana informs Dhritarashtra of them.

Krishna arrives at the Kuru encampment, but casts not even a glance at these opulent pavilions.'"

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Vidura, Krishna has left Upaplavya. He is in Vrikasthala now and will be here tomorrow. He is the lord of the Ahukas; he is the foremost of the Sattvatas; he is a Mahatman endowed with great lustre and might. He is the guardian and protector of the prosperous kingdom of the Vrishnis; he is the Pitamaha of the three worlds. The vastly intelligent Vrishnis and Andhakas worship Krishna's wisdom, just as the Adityas, the Vasus and the Rudras do Brihaspati's. Virtuous one, I will, in your presence, offer our worship to this noble son of the Dasarha vamsa. Let me tell you what I plan to do.

I will give him sixteen rathas made of gold, each drawn by four superb, well-adorned, identically coloured Bahlika horses. I will give him eight elephants with the juice of musth running down their temples, with tusks as big as plough shares, which can smite down hostile ranks, and eight mahouts for each one. I will give him a hundred lovely maidservants with golden skins, all virgins, and a hundred man-servants as well.

I will give him eighteen-thousand soft woollen blankets that the mountain dwellers gave us. I will give him a thousand deer-skins from Cheena, and everything else that one like him deserves. I will give him this great and serene gemstone of the purest rays that shines day and night, for only Krishna is worthy of it. I will give him my own chariot, which can traverse fourteen yojanas in a day. I will set food and drink before him, eight times more than what the animals and attendants in his entourage need.

All my sons, except Duryodhana, will go out to welcome him on their chariots. Thousands of graceful dancing girls, decked in ornaments and unveiled, will receive Krishna. Let all the citizens with their wives and children feast their prayerful eyes on the illustrious Madhusudana with as much devotion as they look at the rising Sun. Let pennants and banners be raised and the road by which Krishna comes be well-watered to settle the dust.

Let Dusasana's palace, which is better than Duryodhana's, be cleaned and decorated for Krishna to stay in. With its many beautiful mansions, and its abundant riches, it is enchanting indeed. All my wealth, as well as Duryodhana's, is kept there. Give Krishna all that befits one as great as him.'"

"Vidura says, 'O Rajan, you have the respect and love of everyone in all the three worlds, and you are considered the best of men. You are venerable and your mind is so serene that whatever you say will be in accord with the shastras and the dictates of reason. Your subjects are confident that dharma is as integral to you as writing etched on stone, as rays to the Sun or waves to the ocean. Your virtues make your subjects love you. Take care to preserve your noble traits. Be straightforward in all that you do. Do not, out of foolishness, be the cause of a slaughter of your sons, grandsons, friends, kinsmen and all your dear ones.

You plan to give much to Krishna as your guest; he deserves all that and more, indeed he deserves the Earth. However, your generosity does not stem from motives of dharma or a desire to please him, but from selfish reasons. It reeks of insincerity, falseness and deception. I clearly see the hidden intentions behind what you plan to do.

The Pandavas want only five villages, but you do not want to give them even that for the sake of peace. Instead, you are trying to win Krishna over with gifts and to alienate him from the Pandavas. You will not succeed in separating Krishna and Arjuna, neither with wealth, nor worship, nor with all your cunning stratagems. I know Krishna's magnanimity; I know how unshakeable Arjuna's devotion to him is; I know that Arjuna is as Krishna's life and he will never forsake him.

Krishna will not accept any hospitality from you other than water to wash his feet and to drink; the only courtesy he will offer is to enquire after the well-being of those he sees with you, nothing else. Rajan, offer him the honour of a welcome that he will accept. He is worthy of every reverence and deserves no less. Give Krishna what he comes for, which he desires for the good of both the Kurus and the Pandavas. He wants peace between you and Duryodhana, on one side, and the Pandavas on the other.

Do as he says, Rajan; you are like a father to the Pandavas; you are old and they are children to you by age. Behave as a father would towards them, for they look upon you as one.'"

"Duryodhana says, 'All that Vidura has said about Krishna is true. Krishna is devoted to the Pandavas and inseparable from them. The gifts that you plan to give him are inappropriate. Kesava is indeed worthy of it all, but this is neither the time nor the place for it. He will think that we are honouring him out of fear. An intelligent Kshatriya must never do anything that may be considered cowardly or shameful.

I am well aware that Krishna of the large eyes is worthy of the worship of the three worlds, but given the circumstances we should not give him anything. The war that we have set our minds on should not be set aside or delayed out of considerations of hospitality.'

Listening to Duryodhana, the Kuru Pitamaha Bhishma says, 'Krishna will not be pleased or angry whether he is honoured or not; nor will he be insulted, for he is above such things. No one, however powerful he may be or however hard he may try, can obstruct his purpose. Do not hesitate to do as Krishna says, and use him to make peace with the Pandavas. He is righteous and his advice will be in keeping with dharma and artha. What is fitting is that you gratify him by doing what he asks.'

Duryodhana says, 'Pitamaha, I cannot live if I have to share my fortune with the Pandavas. I have made my own decision: when he arrives here in the morning, I will imprison Krishna, who is the refuge of the Pandavas. With him confined, the Vrishnis and the Pandavas, indeed the whole world, will submit to me. Tell me how I should do this, so that Krishna does not guess what I intend, and so that we are not endangered.'

Dhritarashtra and his advisors are shocked to hear Duryodhana's abysmal plan.

Dhritarashtra says to Duryodhana, 'Never speak of this again, it is sinful! Hrishikesa comes as an ambassador. Besides, he is related to us and we love him. He has done us no wrong; how can you even think of imprisoning him?'

Bhishma says, 'Your sinful son faces his end by choosing evil over dharma despite his well-wishers' pleas; and you follow the lead of this wretch, who ignores all wise counsel and treads the path to doom. This vile prince of yours, with all his counsellors, will die the instant they lay hands on the pure Krishna. I dare not tarry to listen to this sinner anymore.'

And the inflamed Bhishma of the awesome might gets up and leaves the Kuru sabha."

Vaisampayana said, "Krishna rises at dawn and, having performed his morning ablutions and rituals and taken leave of those who rode with him, sets out for Hastinapura. The citizens of Vrikasthala bid farewell to the mighty-armed one and return to their homes.

Other than Duryodhana, all the grandly attired sons of Dhritarashtra, along with Bhishma, Drona, Kripa and others, go out to meet Krishna. Thousands of people come out to look at him—on chariots and on foot. He meets Bhishma of the immaculate deeds, Drona and Dhritarashtra's sons on his way; and they escort him into the city of elephants.

In honour of Krishna's visit, Hastinapura is vividly adorned and the main streets are bedecked with gold and gemstones of all kinds. Rajan, not a single man, woman or child remains indoors, so eager are the citizens to see Krishna. They come out and line the streets, and bow their heads in worship while they sing in his praise as he passes. Noble women crowd the balconies and terraces of great mansions to look at Krishna as he passes by; filling them until it seems they might collapse under their combined weight. And although swift, Krishna's horses move slowly through the thronging streets.

The lotus-eyed Parantapa enters the compounds of Dhritarashtra's ash-coloured stone palace with its numerous edifices. He passes through the first three chambers of the palace and then he meets Dhritarashtra. The blind king stands to honour Krishna in welcome, and Drona, Bhishma, Kripa, Somadatta and king Bahlika rise with him. The Vrishni hero comes forwards and pays his respects first to the illustrious Dhritarashtra and Bhishma; he then greets the other kings one by one, in proper order. Finally, after Krishna has greeted Drona and his son, Bahlika, Kripa and Somadatta, Dhritarashtra shows him to a throne of wondrous artistry, made of gold and inlaid with resonant jewels.

When Krishna is seated, Dhritarashtra's priests make a ritual offering to him of a cow, honey, curds and water. Krishna stays awhile, surrounded by the Kurus, exchanging pleasantries with each one as befits their relationship with him. In due course, having accepted the honours of welcome accorded to him and having greeted all the Kurus in their sabha, he takes Dhritarashtra's leave and goes to Vidura's fine home. Vidura comes out to welcome Krishna of the Dasarha vamsa with all kinds of auspicious and loving offerings.

Tears in his eyes, Vidura says, 'O Lotus-eyed Lord, I cannot begin to describe the joy I feel to see you, for you are the inner soul of all the living, the antaratman.'

Vidura, who knows dharma, asks after the Pandavas. Krishna, for whom the past and future are merged into the present, who knows that the Pandavas love Vidura and he them, that he is learned, constant in dharma, ever truthful and wise, and that he bears no anger against the sons of Pandu, tells him in detail about what the sons of Pandu have been doing.'"

Vaisampayana said, "After noon, after visiting Vidura, Krishna, chastiser of his enemies, goes to see his aunt Kunti. When she sees him, his face glowing with the radiance of the Sun, she embraces him and begins to pour out her sorrow for her sons. At the long denied sight of Krishna, who is her sons' very prana, her tears flow. When Krishna has received her ritual welcome she speaks to him, her face careworn, her voice choked with tears.

Kunti says, 'O Kesava, from their childhood my sons have served their elders and superiors with reverence. They were always devoted to each other. They were cheated of their kingdom and sent into exile, when they ought to have lived in the midst of their friends and kin. They have mastered anger and joy; they are devoted to Brahmanas and always truthful. These children of mine, the noble sons of Pandu, tore my heart out when, abandoning kingdom and pleasures, and leaving me behind, they went into the forest. How did my sons live in the vana full of lions, tigers and wild elephants?

They have suffered untold misery. Deprived of their father in their infancy, I raised them all so tenderly. How did they live in the forest without seeing their mother? From their infancy the music of conches, drums and flutes woke them from their sleep. While at home, they slept in palatial apartments on soft sheets and skins of the runku deer; and were woken in the morning by the trumpeting of elephants, the neighing of horses, the clatter of chariot-wheels, and the music of flutes and veenas, the sounds of conches and cymbals. They would worship at dawn while listening to sacred hymns chanted by Brahmanas; they worshipped the eldest of those Brahmanas with grand gifts of clothes, jewels and ornaments. And those illustrious Dvijas blessed them in return.

I cannot imagine how they slept in the deep forest where only the feral cries of predators ring. O how unjustified was their torment. They who were roused from their beds by music of cymbals, drums, conches and flutes, by the sweet voices of singers and by their praises being sung, how could they bear to be awoken in the forest by the roars of panthers and tigers?

My eldest son is modest and devoted to truth; he has his senses under control, and compassion for all creatures; he has conquered lust and malice; he always walks the path of dharma; he was able to bear the heavy burden of the ancient Rajarishis—Ambarisha, Mandhatri, Yayati, Nahusha, Bharata, Dilipa and Usinara's son Sibi; his character is taintless and his disposition immaculate; he is deeply versed in dharma; his prowess is irresistible; his accomplishments make him fit to rule the three worlds; his profound learning and devotion to dharma make him rightfully the foremost of the Kurus; he is handsome and mighty-armed; and he has no enemies. How is my Yudhishtira, O Krishna?

My pure-souled and golden-skinned second son is as strong as ten thousand elephants and as swift as the wind; he is the mightiest of the Pandavas and the most quick-tempered; he is devoted to his brothers and is beloved of them all. It is he who killed Kichaka and his brothers; he who slew the Krodhavasas, Hidimba and Baka. In prowess he is Indra's equal, in might Vayu Deva's; his anger is terrifying and like Rudra's; he is the foremost of all warriors. This Parantapa, this wrathful son of Pandu, restrains his anger, might and impatience, and he controls his soul in implicit obedience to his elder brother. Tell me, Krishna, how is my Bhimasena of immeasurable valour, whose terrifying appearance suits his name Vrikodara?

Krishna, what of my Arjuna, who with only his two arms is more powerful than his thousand-armed namesake of long ago, my son who shoots five hundred arrows with one draw of his bow? He is Kartavirya's equal with the astras; Surya Deva's equal in blinding energy; a Maharishi's equal in self-restraint; Bhumi Devi's equal in forgiveness. It is by his strength that the Kuru kings have acquired their vast empire that blazes in splendour; and the Pandavas greatly value his prowess. This son of Pandu is the foremost of all Maharathas; his might is true and irresistible; no enemy has ever escaped him with his life; he is the conqueror of all, and invincible; he is the refuge of the Pandavas, as Indra is of the Devas. Krishna, how is your brother and friend, my Dhananjaya?

Ah, tell me about my tender-hearted son, who is kind to all creatures and blessed with modesty, who is a master of powerful astras, who is delicate and virtuous, who is my most beloved child. The mighty archer Sahadeva is the hero and ornament of all sabhas; he is young and devoted to the service of his brothers; he knows artha and dharma; his brothers always praise his noble character and manner. Madri and Pandu's son, the heroic Sahadeva, is the best of warriors; he waits submissively on his older brothers and reverentially on me; he is tender in years and of a gentle disposition; he is brave and handsome. He is loved by all and most dearly by his brothers, whose very life he is, though he inhabits his own body.

And tell me about my Nakula, who is a master of the various vyuhas of war; who is strong and a mighty archer also. My precious child was raised in luxury; is he well in body and mind? Mahabaho, shall I ever see my Nakula again? That Maharatha is still a stripling to me; he does not deserve this grief. O, how could I, who knew no peace if Nakula was out of my sight for even the blink of an eye, be still alive today?

Dearer to me than all my sons is Draupadi. She is nobly born and completely beautiful; she is endowed with every accomplishment; she always speaks the truth. She chose to accompany her husbands rather than stay with her sons and, leaving her children behind, followed the Pandavas. Once, a retinue of servants waited on her; her husbands, who love her, gratified her every little wish. She bears all the auspicious marks on her person and is accomplished in every way. Krishna, how is Draupadi?

Although she has five heroic husbands, all slayers of foes and all peerless bowmen who are each equal to Agni in urjas, she has suffered great torment. I have not seen my daughter-in-law Panchali for fourteen years; she herself has not seen her sons for as long, and must have endured constant anxiety for them. That Draupadi does not enjoy the happiness that should be hers for her wonderful character convinces me that happiness is not the result of one's deeds or nature.

Whenever I remember how she was forcibly dragged into the Kuru sabha, I stop loving Yudhishtira, Arjuna, Bhima, Nakula and Sahadeva. Never before have I borne a heavier burden of grief as when the villainous Dusasana, driven by rage and lust, hauled Draupadi, who was in her menstrual period and wore only a single length of cloth, into the sabha where her father-in-law sat; and exposed her to the gaze of all the Kurus. Everyone knows that Dhritarashtra, Bahlika, Kripa, Somadatta and all the others were struck by sadness at this; but of all who were present in that sabha, it is only Vidura who spoke out for her, only him that I worship.

One does not become worthy of homage by learning or wealth. It is one's character alone that makes a man deserve honour. Krishna, the illustrious Vidura, with his great intellect and deep wisdom, is an ornament that adorns the world.'

Pritha is filled at once with joy at Krishna's presence and sorrow for her sons; and she vents all her grief. She says, 'O Parantapa, dissolute kings of ancient times occupied themselves with gambling and hunting deer. Can this be a happy way of life for the Pandavas? I am consumed by dark thoughts and images, Krishna—of Draupadi being violently dragged into the presence of the Kurus in their sabha by Dhritarashtra's sons, and abuse worse than death being heaped on her; of my sons being banished from their city; of them wandering in the wilderness. These and other sorrows fairly crush me.

Nothing could have been more painful to me or my sons than to have lived a year in wretched hiding, in a stranger's house. Fourteen years have passed since Duryodhana exiled my sons. If suffering destroys the karma of paapa, and if happiness depends on punya, then considering the torment we have been through, we might yet enjoy happiness again. I never treated Dhritarashtra's sons differently from mine. By virtue of that, O Krishna, surely I will see you emerge safely from this war, and with the Pandavas, their enemies slain and their kingdom restored to them. My sons have kept the oath they swore and lived so faithfully by dharma that their enemies cannot hope to vanquish them.

As for my sorrows, I blame neither myself nor Duryodhana, but my father alone. Like a wealthy man making a gift of money, my father gave me away. When I was still a girl, playing with toys, or with a ball in my hands, your grandfather gave me away to his friend, the illustrious Kuntibhoja. Abandoned then by my father and now by my father-in-law, and suffering unbearably as I do, what point is there in my being alive?

On the night of Arjuna's birth, a disembodied voice said to me, "This son of yours will conquer the whole world and his fame will reach the heavens. Your son will destroy the Kurus in a great war and recover the lost kingdom, and with his brothers he will perform three mahayagnas."

I do not doubt the truth of that marvellous announcement. I bow to dharma that upholds creation. If dharma is real, you will surely make good all that the asariri said. Neither the death of my husband, nor the loss of wealth, nor our conflict with the Kurus inflicted such eviscerating pain on me as the separation from my children. What peace can my heart know when I do not see Dhananjaya, wielder of Gandiva and best of all Kshatriyas? I have not seen Yudhishtira, Arjuna and Bhima for fourteen years, Krishna. Men perform sraddha, last rites, for those who have gone missing for a long time, assuming that they are dead. Practically, my children are dead to me and I to them.

Tell Yudhishtira Dharmaraja that his dharma diminishes with each passing day. Tell him to stop this with a Kshatriya's rough deeds. Cursed are they, Krishna, who live as dependents at another's mercy. Death is better than a livelihood gained by such meanness.

You must tell Dhananjaya and Vrikodara that the time has come for them to fulfil the purpose for which a Kshatriya woman bears a son; that if they let time slip by without achieving anything, then, although they are still universally respected, they will become objects of contempt; and that if men's disdain taints them, I will abandon them for ever. Tell those Purushottamas that when the time comes even life, which is precious, should be laid down.

Tell Madri's sons, who are more devoted to Kshatriya dharma than to life itself, that they must strive to win comfort and wealth back through their prowess, for only objects gained like that can please the heart of a man who wants to live by Kshatriya dharma.

Go now, Mahabaho, and tell Arjuna, foremost of all Kshatriyas, to walk the path that Draupadi shows him. You know well, Krishna, that when inflamed Bhima and Arjuna are each like Yama and can vanquish even the Devas. Their wife Krishnaa being dragged into the sabha and spoken to as she was by the beasts Dusasana and Karna was a searing insult to them. Duryodhana, too, insulted the mighty Bhima in the presence of the Kuru kings. I am certain he will pay for that, for Vrikodara knows no peace when an enemy provokes him. Indeed, once provoked, Bhima remembers the slight until he has killed his foes and their allies.

The loss of kingdom did not crush me; the defeat at dice did not sadden me; but the illustrious and beautiful princess of Panchala being dragged into the sabha, wearing only a single cloth, and there forced to hear the vilest taunts and abuse, grieved me more than anything I have known. Krishna, what could be a greater sorrow for me? Alas, that incomparable Kshatriya princess, so devoted to her dharma, had to suffer such savagery while in her delicate period and, though she had powerful protectors, was as helpless as if she had none.

O Madhusudana, I find it strange that I have had to bear such a burden of grief in spite of you, and that mightiest of men Balarama and that Maharatha Pradyumna being protectors of my children and myself; and despite my sons, the invincible Bhima, and Arjuna who never turns his back on the enemy, being alive.'

Krishna comforts his aunt so grief-stricken by the plight of her sons. He says, 'There is no other woman in the world like you, Matuli. You are the daughter of King Surasena, and by marriage you are of the Ajamida vamsa. The families of your birth and marriage are both noble; you are like a lotus transplanted from one great lake into another. You were blessed with prosperity and adored by your husband. You are the wife of a hero and have given birth to heroic sons. You possess every virtue and are endowed with great wisdom. It is fitting that you should bear joy and sorrow with equanimity and patience.

Your children have overcome sleep and sloth, anger and joy, hunger and thirst, cold and heat and enjoy happiness in the true Kshatriya way. They are endowed with great light and strength and, abandoning the sensual pleasures which the low-minded are addicted to, pursue the noble felicity which Kshatriyas should. Nor are they content with a little. Wise men enjoy the limits of joy or unhappiness from objects that give these. Ordinary men choose mediocre pleasures and are content with lethargy. Those that are superior desire either the most acute human suffering or the highest bliss that man can have. The wise delight in extremes; they find no pleasure in mediocrity. They hold the extremes with true happiness and see the in-betweens as real sorrow.

The Pandavas and Draupadi greet you through me. They send the message that they are well and ask after your welfare. You will soon see them become the lords of the whole world, with their enemy slain and themselves reinstated to power and prosperity.'

Consoled by Krishna, the sorrowing Kunti shakes off the gloom in which temporary ignorance has enveloped her and says to Krishna, 'Mahabaho, let us do whatever you think is proper, without abandoning dharma, and without deceit. I know the power of your truth and of your birth. I know also what wisdom and strength you will employ to accomplish what is best for your beloved cousins. In our vamsa you are dharma personified; you are truth; you are the embodiment of tapasya; you are Brahman. Everything is founded in you; and what you say must always be true.'

The mighty-armed Krishna bids her farewell, and after walking around her in pradakshina, leaves for Duryodhana's palace.'"

Vaisampayana said, "Having taken leave of Kunti and walked round her in pradakshina, Krishna goes to Duryodhana's opulent palace. It is richly adorned, with beautiful furniture, and as grand as Indra's abode. Krishna walks unobstructed through three large courtyards and enters the palace, which is as imposing as a mass of clouds, as tall as a hill, magnificent and resplendent.

There he sees Dhritarashtra's son of the mighty arms seated on his throne in the midst of a thousand kings and surrounded by all the Kurus. There he also sees Dusasana, Karna and Subala's son Sakuni, who sit next to Duryodhana. When Krishna enters the sabha, Dhritarashtra's illustrious son and his counsellors rise to honour him. Krishna greets Duryodhana and his counsellors, as well as all the kings present, according to their status, and then sits on a beautifully wrought golden throne spread over with a rich gold-embroidered cover.

The Kuru king makes the ritual offering to Krishna of a cow, honey, curds and water; and he places at his service all his palaces and other mansions, and the whole kingdom. In the presence of all the kings, the Kauravas worship Krishna, who is like the Sun in all his glory. Once the ritual of worship is completed, Duryodhana invites Krishna to eat with him in his palace. Krishna declines.

Duryodhana glances at Karna and, in a deceptively mild voice underlaid with malice, says to Krishna, 'O Janardana, why will you not accept the feast of food and drink, and the garments and beds that I have arranged for you? You are helping both sides in this dispute; you want the good of both. You are the greatest of Dhritarashtra's relatives and he loves you dearly. You also know dharma and artha, fully and in detail. Krishna, I want to hear the reason for your refusing my hospitality.'

Krishna raises his mighty right arm and, in a voice as deep as rumbling clouds, says to Duryodhana, 'Rajan, envoys accept food and worship only after the success of their missions. So, Bhaarata, when my mission succeeds, you may entertain me and my attendants.'

Duryodhana says, 'Krishna, it is not fitting that you behave in this manner. We are trying to please you because of your kinship to us, regardless of the success or failure of your mission. Our efforts seem to be futile; and we see no reason why you reject our worship, which we offer out of love and friendship. We have no quarrel or war with you; and on reflection, it seems what you say and do is not becoming.'

Krishna looks at Duryodhana and all his counsellors and says, 'I could never forsake dharma, not from desire, from wrath or malice; not for gain or for the sake of argument and not from temptation. One accepts food from another when one is in distress. You have not inspired love in me by anything you have done, nor am I in distress. Without any reason, you hated your gentle cousins the Pandavas, who have every virtue, from the moment they were born. The unreasonable hatred you bear the sons of Kunti does not become you.

The sons of Pandu are all devoted to dharma. Who would hurt them in the least? He who hates them, hates me; he who loves them, loves me. Know that the Pandavas and I have one soul. He who is driven by lust, anger and by the darkness of his heart, who hates and seeks to injure one who owns every good quality is the worst of men, even if he possesses every noble quality himself.

That wrathful villain of uncontrolled soul, who, from ignorance and greed, hates his godlike kinsmen, will never enjoy his prosperity for long. On the other hand, the one who, through good judgement, wins over virtuous men, even if he has an aversion to them in his heart, enjoys undying felicity and fame. The food you offer me is defiled by your vileness, and I cannot eat it. The only food I will eat here is what Vidura offers me.'

Saying this to the wilful Duryodhana, who cannot bear to hear anything contrary to his wishes, Krishna leaves the glittering palace and sets out for Vidura's home. While he is there, Drona, Kripa, Bhishma, Bahlika and many of the Kauravas come to see him.

The Kauravas who have come place their palaces with all the wealth in them at Krishna's disposal. Krishna thanks them for the honour they have done him and gives them leave to go.

After the party of Kurus has left, Vidura entertains Krishna, the unvanquished, with lavish hospitality, providing him with everything he could want; and Kunti places sattvik, delicious food in abundance before him. Krishna first gratifies the Brahmanas who know the Vedas; he gives them food and gold. Only then he and his attendants, like Indra with the Maruts, dine on what remains of the feast that Vidura has prepared.'"

Vaisampayana said, "In the night, when Krishna has dined and is refreshed, Vidura says to him, 'O Krishna, your coming has not been a well judged one. Dhritarashtra's son violates dharma and artha; he is evil and wrathful; he insults anyone he pleases, while he himself craves honour; and he disobeys the elders. He ignores the shastras; he is foolish and vile; he has set himself on a fateful, inexorable path to perdition; and he is malevolent towards those who are concerned for his welfare.

His soul is overcome by desire and lust, and he foolishly believes he is wise. He is the enemy of all his true friends. He is always suspicious, has no control over himself, is ungrateful and, having abandoned dharma, is infatuated by every sin. He is vain and immature, a slave to his senses, driven by bottomless greed, and indecisive.

And these are not his only faults. Even if you point out what is good for him, his arrogance makes him ignore such counsel. He has great faith in the prowess of Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Karna, Drona's son and Jayadratha and, so, he spurns peace. Dhritarashtra's sons and Karna firmly believe that the Pandavas cannot even face Bhishma, Drona and the other Kshatriyas, let alone fight against them. Duryodhana has assembled an immense army and thinks that victory is already his. The fool believes that Karna can single-handedly vanquish the enemy, and so Duryodhana will never make peace.

Krishna, you want peace and brotherhood between the Kauravas and the Pandavas; but know that Dhritarashtra's sons have decided not to give the Pandavas what is rightfully theirs. Whatever you say to these men will be in vain, for they their minds are already made up. A wise man would not waste his breath when his words, good or bad, will surely prove ineffectual, even like singing to the deaf. Just as a Brahmana's discourse is wasted on Chandalas, your words will be utterly disregarded by these ignorant and evil men, who have no reverence for anything that is worthy of it.

Duryodhana is fatuous and, as long as he has strength, he will never heed your advice; everything you say to him will be futile. I do not think it is apt for you to go into the midst of these sinners, and speak out against them, who are black-souled, and many. Because they have no respect for age, are blinded by wealth and vanity, are full of the arrogance of youth and impatient, they will never accept your wise counsel.

Duryodhana has mustered a strong force and does not trust you. He will never do as you say. Dhritarashtra's sons are inspired by the conviction that Indra himself, with all the Devas, cannot defeat them in battle. Your words, always profound, will not move men of such dark beliefs, men driven by lust, greed and anger.

Secure amidst his vast army of elephants, chariots and soldiers, Duryodhana is fearless and thinks he has already conquered the Earth. He wants his empire without rivals. Peace with him is not possible, for he assumes that what he owns is unalterably his. Sadly, the end of the world as we know it is at hand because of Duryodhana, for kings of the world and all their Kshatriya warriors have gathered here to fight for him against the Pandavas.

Krishna, in the past, you have made all these kings, who are now arrayed against you, suffer grievous losses. Prompted by fear of you, these Kshatriyas have joined Karna and made an alliance with Dhritarashtra's sons. Reckless, and even prepared to die, they have joined Duryodhana for the pleasure of fighting against the Pandavas and you. I do not think it wise for you to go to them. How will you manage, surrounded by so many treacherous enemies all seated together? I am aware that you cannot be vanquished by the Devas themselves; I know how powerful and intelligent you are.

Krishna, I love you as much as I love the sons of Pandu, and what I say is from affection, respect and friendship for you. Need I tell you how delighted I am to see you, Lotus-eyed One? You are the inner soul of all the living.’”

"The Divine One says, 'Vidura, all that a wise man should say; all that a far-sighted man would say; all that a man could to say to me as a friend; all that is truly worthy of you, in keeping with dharma and artha: all this you have said to me, as if I am your child. What you have told me is true, praiseworthy and sensible. Now, Vidura, listen to my reason for being here.

I am well aware of Duryodhana's evil nature and of the hostility of the Kshatriyas who support him; yet I have come to the Kurus. The Earth is in the grip of an enormous danger, and the man who saves her, with her elephants, chariots and horses, from imminent death will earn great punya. If this man does not succeed despite his best efforts to do what is dharma, he is anyway certain to merit the punya attached to that achievement, even though he fails. Similarly, as men who are versed in religion and the shastras know, if a man does not actually commit a sin, even if he intended to, he will not accrue the punishment attached to that sin.

I will try with all sincerity to bring about peace between the Kurus and the Srinjayas, who are about to be slaughtered in battle. Doom hangs over them because of the Kurus, fetched by the crimes of Duryodhana and Karna, while the other Kshatriyas only follow their lead.

Learned men condemn the man who does not persuade a friend who is about to plunge into death's maw to save himself. A man must do his utmost, even seizing his friend by the hair, to turn him away from a grave sin. Such a man will win praise, not blame. Duryodhana would do well to accept my good advice, which is in keeping with dharma and artha, and which can avert the unimaginable war that looms. I will sincerely try to secure the welfare both of Dhritarashtra's sons and Pandu's, as well of all Kshatriya kind. If Duryodhana disregards me, I shall at least have the satisfaction of having followed my conscience, for a true friend is one who mediates when hostility breaks out between kinsmen.

I have come here so that no one can later say that, although he could have done so, Krishna made no attempt to stop the Kauravas and the Pandavas from slaughtering one another. I have come here to serve both sides and not all the gathered kings can reproach me.

If, after listening to my well-meant advice, Duryodhana does not accept what I say, he will only invite a horrific destiny to take millions of lives. If I can bring about peace among the Kurus without sacrificing the interests of the Pandavas, what I accomplish will be worthy indeed, and the Kauravas will be freed from death's clutches. If the sons of Dhritarashtra reflect calmly on what I say, then my objective will be achieved and the Kauravas will worship me as the one who brought peace to them.

If, instead, they try to injure me, I tell you now that all the kings of the Earth together are no match for me. They will be as a herd of deer before an angry lion.'

Saying this to Vidura, that bull of the Vrishnis and joy of the Yadavas lies down on his soft bed to rest."

Vaisampayana said, "The starlit night is spent in conversation between these two illustrious tejasvins. The night passes too quickly for Vidura, who listens and talks to Krishna about so many things, both of them speaking words filled with dharma and artha and delight.

At dawn, a choir of singers awaken Krishna with melodious voices, accompanied by the sweet sounds of cymbals and conches. Krishna rises and performs his morning rituals; he bathes, recites the sacred mantras and pours ghee onto the sacrificial fire. He dresses himself and worships the rising Sun.

While he is still at his morning devotions, Duryodhana and Sakuni come to him and say, 'Dhritarashtra is in his sabha, with all the Kurus headed by Bhishma, and all the kings of the Earth. They request your presence, Krishna, with as much yearning as the Devas desire Indra's.'

Krishna greets them both with courtesy, and when the Sun has risen a little higher into the sky he calls for a number of Brahmanas and presents them with gold, clothes, cattle and horses. After he has made generous gifts he sits down; his sarathy Daruka come and salutes him; at Krishna's word, the sarathy fetches his master's dazzling chariot adorned with rows of tinkling bells and harnessed to the superb horses. Seeing his ratha, which rumbles like massed thunderheads, ready, Krishna walks in pradakshina around the sacred fire and the Brahmanas present, puts on the jewel

Kaustubha and, blazing in beauty, surrounded by the Kurus and escorted by the Vrishnis, climbs onto the chariot.

Vidura follows Krishna, foremost of all the living and most brilliant among men, on his own chariot. Duryodhana and Sakuni follow in one Kuru chariot; Satyaki, Kritavarman and the other Vrishni Maharathas follow Krishna in chariots, and on horses and elephants. Rajan, those exotic chariots, adorned with gold and drawn by wonderful horses, flash and rumble as they move along.

In the lead, Krishna, radiant in beauty, comes to a broad avenue that has been swept and watered, and made fit for the most kingly of kings. As he approaches cymbals clash, conches sound and other instruments pour out their music in homage. Many young Kshatriyas, the most heroic in the world and lionish in their strength, surround Krishna's chariot as his escort. Thousands of soldiers, attired in a variety of uniforms and carrying swords, lances and axes, march in front of Krishna. Five hundred elephants and thousands of chariots follow that unconquered hero as he proceeds in majesty.

All the citizens of the city, men and women of all ages, come out onto the streets to catch a glimpse of him. The terraces and balconies of houses are so crowded by women that they look as if they will collapse. Worshipped by the Kurus as he comes down the king's highway, Krishna looks around, his eyes seeing everyone, he hears their adulations and responds to each one's greetings, individually, magically.

When at last he reaches the Kuru sabha his attendants blow their conches and trumpets, shaking the skies. And all the great kings assembled in the Kuru sabha shiver in excited anticipation of seeing Krishna. Hearing the rumble of his chariot, deep as the roll of thunderclouds, they know that he is near and the hair on their bodies stands on end.

Krishna reaches the lofty gates and, alighting from his chariot that is like the summit of Mount Kailasa, he enters the sabha, which glimmers like newly risen clouds and is as splendid as Indra's own court. He walks in with Vidura and Satyaki on either side; and he overshadows the splendour of the Kurus with his own, like the Sun dimming the lesser lights of the heavens.

Karna and Duryodhana face Krishna, and the Vrishnis with Kritavarman are behind him. Bhishma, Drona, the blind Dhritarashtra and his courtiers rise to honour Krishna. When Dhritarashtra stands the thousands of kings who surround him also rise. Krishna accepts the exquisite golden throne that has been prepared for him at Dhritarashtra's command. He smiles and greets the king, Bhishma, Drona and all the other kings, according to each one's age. All the kings and all the Kurus worship him in return. Through a vast window Krishna sees at the great palace gates the Rishis he saw in the sky on his way to Hastinapura.

Seeing them here, with Narada at their head, Krishna calmly says to Santanu's son Bhishma, 'These Devarishis have come to this earthly conclave of ours. Invite them in and offer them the finest seats and your gracious courtesy, for none of us can sit until they do. Without delay, offer worship to these Rishis who have mastered their souls.'

Bhishma sees the Rishis at the palace gate and orders the servants to fetch the finest seats for them, inlaid with gold and gem-set. Only after the Rishis are seated and have accepted the arghya offered to them does Krishna sit, and then so do the other kings. Dusasana assigns an excellent seat to Satyaki, and Vivimsati gives another golden one to Kritavarman. Not far from Krishna that illustrious and wrathful pair, Karna and Duryodhana, sit together on the same wide couch. Subala, the king of Gandhara, surrounded by the chiefs of his country, sits with his son beside him. The high-souled Vidura sits on a jewelled armchair covered with a white deer-skin, so close to Krishna's that it touches it.

All the kings gaze at Krishna for a long time but, just as people who drink amrita are never satisfied, even after imbibing cup after cup of it, their eyes remain unfulfilled. Krishna, clad in pitambara robes and his skin like the dark atasi flower, sits in the midst of the sabha, like a sapphire set in gold. A profound silence descends, for no one stirs, or speaks a word, why, they hardly breathe."

Vaisampayana said, "Finally, Krishna, master of silence, of the perfect teeth and deep voice speaks. Although his words are addressed to Dhritarashtra, his words resound through all the sabha like thunderheads rumbling, and all the assembly hears him.

He says, 'I have come here to bring about peace between the Kurus and the Pandavas, to prevent a slaughter of Kshatriyas. I have nothing new to say, as you, Rajan, know everything there is to be known in this world. Because of its gyana and dharma, and because it is adorned with every accomplishment, your vamsa is the most distinguished of all royal dynasties. Joy in the happiness of others, grief at the sight of another's suffering, desire to alleviate distress, abstention from injury, sincerity, forgiveness and truth: all these prevail amongst the Kurus. Your dynasty is so noble that it would be sad indeed if anyone born into it did anything to break dharma, and tragic if it were you, King, who did so. For, you should be the first to restrain the Kurus if they sin against strangers or even their own people.

Know that your sons, led by Duryodhana, have abandoned dharma and artha and, deprived of their good sense by greed, now treat their own cousins despicably, most viciously. What your sons do is the cause of the terrible danger which threatens us all. If you ignore it, their deeds will result in a massacre past imagining. If you so will, you can prevent this calamity even now, Bharatarishabha; peace is not difficult to achieve.

The establishing of peace depends on you and me, Rajan. You correct your sons and I will pacify the Pandavas. Your sons and their followers must obey your command, whatever it is. Indeed, their best course is to obey you. If you strive for peace by controlling your sons, it will be to your benefit, as well as to that of the Pandavas.

O great king, reflect carefully over this and do the proper thing. Let the Pandavas be your allies, and with their support seek dharma and artha. You cannot have better allies than them. With them as your protectors, Indra himself could not vanquish you. How can mere kings of the Earth withstand your might?

If you have the support of Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Karna, Vivimsati, Aswatthama, Vikarna, Somadatta and Bahlika, of the rulers of the Sindhus and Kalingas, of Sudakshina the king of the Kambojas, of Yudhishtira, Bhimasena, Arjuna and the twins, of the mighty Satyaki and Yuyutsu, what man is there who is so misguided that he would dare challenge you? If you have both the Kurus and the Pandavas at your side, you will be invincible, and the sovereignty of the whole world will be yours.

All the rulers of the Earth, your equals as well as your superiors, will want an alliance with you. Protected on all sides by sons, grandsons, fathers, brothers and friends, you will live in unalloyed felicity. With all of them around you, and treating them affectionately, as you once used to, you will enjoy lordship over all this Earth. With your sons, allies and the sons of Pandu to support you will easily subdue all your enemies. Dhritarashtra, this is the most advantageous course for you to take. In unity with your sons, kinsmen and counsellors, you will be lord of the whole world, which they surely win for you.

O great king, nothing but death lies in war. What good can you see in the annihilation of both sides? Tell me, Bharatarishabha, if the Pandavas are killed in battle or if your own sons fall, what happiness will you enjoy? All of them are brave and skilled warriors; all of them want war. Save them from the terrible danger that threatens them. After the war you will not see all the Kurus or all the Pandavas; Maharathas will kill each other and you will see both sides decimated.

All the rulers of the world are gathered here. They will exterminate the very population of the Earth in their anger. Save the world; do not let the people of this sacred Bhumi be destroyed. If you regain your natural goodness, the world will continue to be peopled as it is now. Rajan, save these kings from the horrible danger that threatens them; they are all of pure descent, modest, generous and devout, and related to one another by blood or marriage.

Let go of your wrath and enmity; let these kings embrace one another in peace. Let them eat and drink together; let them return to their homes in joy, dressed in rich clothes, decked with garlands and paying kind courtesies to one another.

Let the affection you had for the Pandavas be revived in your heart and let it lead to peace. They lost their father while they were mere boys, and you raised them. Now cherish them as befits you, as if they were your own sons. It is your duty to protect them, especially when they are in distress. Do not abandon dharma and artha.

The Pandavas have greeted you reverently and said, "At your command, we have suffered great misery. For twelve years we lived in the forests, and we lived unknown in the thirteenth year. We never broke our sworn pledge and believed that our father, too, would keep his word. The Brahmanas who were always with us will testify that we never once broke our word.

We have kept our side of the agreement; now you must abide by yours. Our travail has been long and great; now let us have our share of the kingdom. Knowing dharma and artha as you do, it falls to you to rescue us. We have endured our suffering in silence because we owed you obedience. Be a father and elder brother to us now.

A guru should behave with his sishyas in ways that befit a teacher; and being your disciples, we regard you as our guru. So, treat us a guru should treat his sishyas. If we go wrong, it is the duty of our father to set us right. Therefore, set us on the right course and you, too, take the high path of dharma."

Your sons, the Pandavas, said this to the kings who have come here: "If the men in a sabha know dharma, they will not allow any impropriety to occur in their hallowed court. When, in the presence of men of dharma, sinners overpower the righteous and subvert truth by deceit, it is the evil ones who are vanquished. When, struck through by the arrow of adharma, good men seek the protection of a noble court, those who occupy that sabha are themselves pierced through by the arrow, if they do not extract it.

Indeed, in that case, dharma will fell the men of that assembly, even like a river eating away the roots of trees on its bank."

Bharatarishabha, be your own judge. The Pandavas have kept peace, with their hearts set firmly in dharma, and deeply reflecting on all things. Whatever they have said is in keeping with dharma and nyaya. Rajan, what can you say to them except that you will restore their kingdom to them? Let these kings who are here tell you what your answer to the Pandavas should be.

If you think that what I say is dharma and true, save all these Kshatriyas from certain death. Make peace, and do not give in to anger. Give the Pandavas their rightful share of their father's kingdom; then enjoy happiness and prosperity with your sons; and have all your hopes fulfilled, Parantapa.

You know that Yudhishtira always walks the path of dharma. You know how he has conducted himself with you and your sons. Although you tried to have him burnt him alive in the house of lac, he fled into the wilderness, he returned and put his faith in you, only to be banished by you to Khandavaprastha. Ruling from Indraprastha, he brought all the kings of the Earth under his sway and yet looked up only to you, to honour you. In spite of the noble manner in which he conducted himself, Subala's son robbed Yudhishtira of his kingdom and wealth, at a deceitful game of dice. And despite being reduced to absolute penury, and having to watch Krishnaa dragged brutally into this sabha, Yudhishtira of the immeasurable soul did not swerve from Kshatriya dharma.

I want both your good and theirs. For the sake of dharma and artha, for happiness, Rajan, do not mistake evil for good or good for evil and, thereby, allow the Earth's population to be razed. Restrain your sons, whose greed has made them cross every limit. The sons of Pritha are as willing to wait upon you dutifully as they are to fight. Do what you think is best, Parantapa.'

In their hearts, all the kings in the sabha laud what Krishna says, but none of them dares speak out for dharma in Duryodhana's presence."

Vaisampayana said, "All in that sabha fall silent on hearing Krishna, the hair on their bodies stands on end. All the kings think that there is no man who would dare respond to what Krishna has said.

Seeing that all the kings sit silently, Parasurama addresses Duryodhana but speaks to the entire gathering of Kurus. He says, 'Listen to what I have to say and to the story I will tell to illustrate it; if you are convinced by me, do what will benefit you all.

There was a king named Dambhodbhava, who ruled all the world. They say that his kingdom covered all this Bhumi. Every morning, when he rose, he would call his Brahmanas and Kshatriyas to him and ask them if they knew of anyone—a Sudra, a Vaisya, a Kshatriya or a Brahmana—who was better than, or even equal to him in battle. The king wandered over the face of the Earth asking this question, and he became drunk with vanity.

High-souled Brahmanas, who knew the Vedas and who feared nothing, advised the boastful king to curb his pride. However, the king continued to ask his question day after day. Some great Brahmanas of immense tapasya became angry and spoke to the conceited king.

They said, "There are two men, who are the best of all men, and who are always victorious in battle. Dambhodbhava, you will be no match for either of them."

The king asked those Brahmanas, “Where might I find these two heroes? To what vamsa do they belong? What feats have they achieved? Who are they?”

The Brahmanas said, “We have heard that these two are Munis, named Nara and Narayana. They have both been born as mortals. Go and find them, O king. This illustrious pair practises the severest tapasya in a remote fastness of the Gandhamadana mountains.”

The king could not bear to hear of the greatness of Nara and Narayana. He mustered his vast army of six kinds of forces and hastened to the rugged Gandhamadana mountains, where those unvanquished Rishis lived. There, he began to search for them and finally discovered them hidden in a deep vana. He saw that they were emaciated from hunger and thirst; their veins were swollen and stood out; and extremes of cold and heat had debilitated them. He approached them, touched their feet and enquired after their welfare.

The two Rishis received the king hospitably, with fruits and roots, with a darbhasana and water. They enquired about the king’s business, and then blessed him, saying, Tathaastu. Dambhodbhava asked them what he always asked everyone.

He said, “I have conquered the Earth with the strength of my arms, and killed all my enemies. I have come here because I want to do battle with you. Do me the courtesy of hospitality by granting my wish, for I have wished for this for a very long time.”

Nara and Narayana said, “Best of kings, anger and covetousness have no place in this mountain asrama. How then can we do battle here? There are no weapons here, no adharma or malice. Look somewhere else for a fight; there are many Kshatriyas on Earth.”

Undeterred, the king tried to persuade them, but the Rishis ignored his repeated request and continued to try and placate him. Dambhodbhava, who was beside himself to fight them, would not relent.

Finally, Nara took up a handful of grass and said, “Since you are so eager for a fight, Kshatriya, take up your weapons and array your troops. I will rid you of your eagerness forever.”

Dambhodbhava said, “Rishi, do you really think this weapon you hold is fit to be used against me? Nevertheless I will fight you, for I have come here expressly for that.”

And with that, Dambhodbhava and his warriors shot arrows at the Muni from all sides. The Rishi, however, warded off those deadly banks of shafts that could mangle any enemy, with his blades of grass. The invincible Rishi directed his own astra, made just of the blades of grass, yet irresistible, at the king's army. Such was that weapon that it cut off the eyes, ears and noses of the troops.

The king saw the sky turned pale by those blades of grass, and he fell at the Rishi's feet and cried, "Bless me!"

Nara, who was always ready to grant refuge to anyone who asked for it, said to Dambhodbhava, "O king, always obey Brahmanas and live by dharma. Never again do what you have done today. The conqueror of hostile kingdoms, a Kshatriya who is mindful of his dharma, should never be as you are, even in his inmost heart. You must never, from pride in yourself, insult anybody at any time, be they inferior or superior to you. Conduct yourself in a manner that befits you.

Acquire wisdom, abandon covetousness and pride, control your soul, restrain your passions, be forgiving and humble, cherish your subjects and be well loved. Never slight anyone under any circumstances without first determining their true strengths and weaknesses. With our blessings, and by our leave, go now and change your ways from this day forth. We command you to ask sage Brahmanas what is good for you."

The king worshipped the feet of the two Maharishis and returned to his capital. And from that day on he began to live by dharma. This was the great feat that Nara achieved long, long ago.

The Rishi Narayana was superior even to Nara, for many more and greater qualities had their home in him. That is why the eight astras—Kakudika, Suka, Naka, Akshisantarjana, Santana, Nartana, Ghora and Asyamodaka—are integral to that best of bows, the Gandiva. Rajan, give up your pride and go humbly to Dhananjaya. His astras take lives.

These eight astras correspond with the eight sensual passions—lust, wrath, covetousness, vanity, insolence, pride, malice and selfishness. When these astras strike a man, he loses his senses and wanders about in bewilderment. Under their influence, men fall into a stupor, behave violently, vomit, pass urine and excreta, and weep and laugh uncontrollably.

Arjuna has Narayana—the Creator, the Lord of the Trilokas, the one who knows the destiny of every created being—as his ally beside him, and he is invincible in battle. Who is there in the three worlds who can vanquish that Kshatriya—Arjuna of the Vanara banner—who has no equal in battle? Countless are the virtues that reside in Arjuna, and Krishna is his superior. You know Kuntiputra Arjuna well. I say to you, the ancient Nara and Narayana are now Arjuna and Krishna. Great king, that is who these foremost of men are. If you believe this, and if you trust me, make peace of dharma with the sons of Pandu. Realise that it is for your good not to have discord within your clan, then do not set your heart on war but make sacred peace.

You are the foremost of the Kuru vamsa. The dynasty to which you belong has high honour through time. Let the vamsa continue to be worthy of that regard. Blessings be upon you; think of what is conducive to your own welfare.'"

Vaisampayana said, "The noble Rishi Kanva, who is present in the sabha, hears Parasurama and speaks to Duryodhana.

Kanva says, 'Loka Pitamaha Brahma is indestructible and eternal, as are the Maharishis Nara and Narayana; for, of all Aditi's sons, Vishnu alone is eternal. Only he is unconquerable and indestructible; he alone exists for ever; he is the Lord of all and the possessor of divine attributes. All others, the Sun and Moon, Earth and Water, Wind and Fire, Sky, the planets and stars, can be destroyed; when the end of the universe comes all these will cease to exist. They are destroyed and created over and over, again and again. Human beings, animals, birds and other living creatures that live in the mortal world have impermanent lives. Even kings, having enjoyed great prosperity, reach the hour of their death and are reborn to reap the fruits of their good and evil karma.

Therefore, it is essential that you make peace with Yudhishtira. Let the Pandavas and the Kauravas both rule this Earth together. Duryodhana, do not be vain about your strength, for there are always men more powerful than those who are considered strong. Mere physical strength is not regarded as true strength by the wise. The Pandavas are all blessed with prowess equal to that of the Devas and they live by dharma; they are truly strong.

There is an ancient tale told that illustrates this, of Matali's search for a husband for his daughter.

Indra, king of the three worlds, has a charioteer named Matali, whom he loves dearly. A daughter was born to Matali, and she came to be celebrated across the world for her beauty. The girl, named Gunakesi, was blessed with celestial beauty; and in loveliness of face and form she outshone other women. Knowing that the time for giving her in marriage had come, Matali and his wife became anxious, and he wondered what he should do.

He thought to himself, "Alas, the birth of a daughter in families that are noble and upright, that are respected and of great humility, brings evil in its wake. Daughters, when born into noble families, always endanger the honour of three families—their maternal and paternal families and the family into which they marry. In my mind's eye I have scanned the worlds of Devas and Manavas, but I have not found an eligible groom for my daughter."

Amongst the Devas, Daityas, Gandharvas, Manavas and Rishis, not one did Matali consider a suitable husband for his daughter. One night, after consulting his wife Sudharma, he decided to travel to Nagaloka, thinking that since he had not found an eligible groom for Gunakesi amongst the Devas and Manavas, he might find one amongst the Nagas.

Telling his wife this, he took her leave and, sniffing the head of his daughter in affection, Matali set out for the under-world.'"

"Kanva says, 'On his way, Matali saw Narada Muni going towards Varuna Deva's abode. Narada asked him, "Where are you going? Are you on some work of your own or is it at Indra's bidding that you journey?"

Matali told Narada about his quest, and the Muni said, "Let us go together. I am coming from Devaloka to visit Varuna. While we range through Nagaloka, we will seek out a suitable husband for your daughter."

The illustrious pair went into the underworld and there they saw Varuna, the Lord of the waters. Narada was worshipped in a manner befitting a Devarishi, and Matali received what would be offered to Indra. The two of them, pleased that they could get on with the business at hand, explained why they were there. With Varuna's leave, they began to wander about in Nagaloka and, while doing so, Narada, who knew all the inhabitants of that realm, described them in detail to his companion.

Narada said, "O Sarathy, you have seen Varuna with his sons and grandsons around him. Now see his kingdom, so enchanting and rich. Varuna's son of great wisdom is distinguished for his conduct and saintly character. This beloved son has eyes like lotus leaves, is blessed with great beauty and is a joy to look at. Soma's daughter has chosen him for her husband. Her name is Jyotsnakali and she is as beautiful as Sree Devi. I remember that she once chose the eldest of Aditi's sons for her husband.

Matali, look at Varuna's dwelling, made of gold, where the wondrous wine called Varuni flows abundant. It is from having imbibed this wine that the Devas acquired their godly status. These blazing weapons of every kind that you see once belonged to the Daityas, who have since lost their sovereignty. These astras never decay and, when loosed at an enemy, return unerringly to the hand that cast them. The Devas obtained them as the spoils of war. Tremendous tejas is required for them to be used against enemies. Many tribes of Rakshasas and Daityas, who possessed all kinds of devastras, lived here long ago, but they were all vanquished by the Devas.

Look at that great fire in Varuna's lake; see where Vishnu's Chakra dazzles in the midst of those mighty flames. Look, there is that gnarled bow that was created for the destruction of the world. The Devas protect it constantly and vigilantly, and it is after this bow that Arjuna's Gandiva was named. It has the strength of a hundred thousand other bows, and the power that impels it in battle is indescribable. It quells all evil kings who are friendly towards the Rakshasas. Brahma, the first expounder of the Veda, created this fierce weapon, and Indra has declared it to be one of the most terrible of all weapons. This awesome astra obeys the command of Varuna's sons.

Look at Varuna Deva's sovereign parasol in that royal chamber. Like clouds, it showers cool water. The water that drops from it is as pure as the Moon and yet cloaked in such dense darkness that no one can see it.

Here, Matali, there are innumerable wonders to be seen. However, your mission will suffer if we spend more time in this palace of wonders. So let us go now," said Narada Muni,' says the Maharishi Kanva."

"Kanva says, 'Narada continued, "Here in the heart of Nagaloka is the city of Patala. It is celebrated across the universe and the Daityas and the Danavas worship it. Creatures that live on Earth cry out in terror if the ocean washes them to it. Here the fire, known as the Asura-agni, which is fed by water, burns continually. The Devas revere this fire, which does not move, being confined to this place.

It was here in Nagaloka that the Devas, when they had defeated and killed all their enemies, disposed of the Amrita that remained after they had drunk their fill. It is here that the waning and waxing of the Moon originate. It is here that son of Aditi, the horse-headed Vishnu, Hayagriva, rises and fills the universe with his lustre on festive occasions, to the accompaniment of Vedic hymns, at which times he is called Suvarna. This wondrous place is called Patala because the Moon and other forms of water shed blissful showers on it.

From here, the celestial elephant Airavata sucks cool water with which he fills the clouds for the nurture of the universe; and Indra pours the water down as rain. All kinds of aquatic animals of diverse shapes, the timingala and others, which get their nourishment from the Moon's rays, live here. Also living here are creatures that sunlight kills during the day and which are restored to life at night by the Moon. This is where the Moon rises every day and, with its rays, resuscitates the dead creatures with his touch. It is here that many demonic Daityas, whom Indra defeated and deprived of their prosperity, stay imprisoned. It was here that the lord and master of all creation, Bhutapati, sat in austere tapasya for their benefit.

Many Maharishis live here, who observe the vrata called go, who are emaciated from their arduous study and chanting of the Vedas, who have suspended their pranas and achieved Moksha by their tapasya. A man is said to live by the go-vrata when he can sleep wherever he chooses, and when he lives only on food and clothes that are given to him. Here were born all the best of elephants descended from the elephant Supratika of great renown—Airavata the king of his tribe, Vamana, Kumuda and Anjana.

Look around, Matali, and see if there is a bridegroom here who stands out because of his superior qualities. I will go to him and ask him to accept your daughter's hand.

Look at that dazzlingly beautiful Egg in the water. It has been here from the beginning of the creation. It does not move, nor does it hatch. I have never heard how it was born or what it is, and nobody knows who its father or mother is. It is said, Matali, that when the end of the world comes, a mighty fire will erupt from within it and consume the three worlds, with all their moving and rooted beings."

Matali heard all that Narada said and replied, "I do not see anyone here who is eligible. Let us leave this place.""

"Kanva says, 'Narada continued, "Here is that great and most famous of cities, Hiranyapura. It belongs to the Daityas and Danavas who are skilled at one hundred types of maya. It was planned by the Danava Mayaa, and built by the divine architect Viswakarma. Many tejasvin Danavas, who obtained boons from Brahma long ago, live here, practising their thousand magical illusions. No one could vanquish them, neither Indra nor any other Deva, neither Yama, nor Varuna nor Kubera the Lord of treasures.

Also living here are the Kalakhanja Asuras, who sprang from Vishnu; and the Yatudhana Rakshasas, who came forth from Brahma's feet. All these violent beings have frightful fangs, are as swift and powerful as the wind, and have great powers of maya. Besides these, another invincible tribe of Danavas called Nivatakavachas also live here.

You know that Indra cannot vanquish them. Many times you with your son Gomukha, and Sachi's lord Indra Deva with his son, have had to flee before them. Look at their homes, Matali; they are all made of silver and gold, and grandly adorned. All these mansions are decked with vaiduryas and corals, and shine from the lustre of the jewels—arkasphatika and ajrasara. Many of these palaces seem as if they have been made of brilliant padmaragas, or of bright marble or of the most excellent wood. They dazzle like the Sun, or a blazing fire. Look how tall these jewelled edifices are, and they stand close together. They are of magnificent proportions and beauty, and it is impossible to determine exactly what materials they are built of, or to describe them. Indeed, they are lovely.

Look at these grounds that the Daityas use for recreation and sport; look at their bedsteads, their opulent utensils set with precious stones, their majestic thrones. Look at these hills of theirs that seem like massed clouds, these water fountains, these trees that move of their own will and yield all the flowers and fruit that they are asked for.

Matali, see if you can find a suitable groom here for your daughter. If you cannot, we will go elsewhere."

Matali said, "Devarishi, it is not wise or fitting for me to do anything that the Devas might disapprove of. The Devas and Danavas, though brothers, are always at war with each other. How can I make an alliance with our enemies? Let us go to some other place. I must not look among the Danavas for a husband for my child. Ah Muni, I know your nature and how you love instigating and fanning quarrels.'""

"Kanva says, 'Narada said, "This region belongs to luxuriantly feathered birds that feed on snakes. They are tireless in their prowess, whether in flight or carrying loads. This avian tribe is descended from Garuda's six sons—Sumukha, Sunaman, Sunetra, Suvarchas, Surucha and that prince of birds Subala. These best of avians, born of Kasyapa's line, have multiplied and increased to create a thousand dynasties of birds. They are all of noble lineage and bring glory to Vinata's dynasty.

These birds are blessed with great prosperity; they all bear the auspicious Srivatsa mark; they are wealthy; and they are mighty. Their deeds are like a Kshatriya's, but living as they do on snakes, they are without compassion. And because they also prey on their own kind, they can never attain Brahman.

I will tell you their names, Matali. Listen well; these birds are respected because of the grace that Vishnu showers on them. They all worship Vishnu, who is their protector. He is always in their hearts and he is their refuge.

These are their names—Suvarnachuda, Nagasin, Daruna, Chandatundaka, Anila, Visalaksha, Kundalin, Pankajit, Vajraviskambha, Vainateya, Vamana, Vatavega, Disachakshu, Nimisha, Animisha, Trirava, Saptarava, Valmiki, Dwipaka, Daityadwipa, Saridwipa, Sarasa, Padmaketana, Sumukha, Chitraketu, Chitravara, Anagha, Meshahrit, Kumuda, Daksha, Sarpanta, Sahabhojana, Gurubhara, Kapota, Suryanetra, Chirantaka, Vishnudharman, Kumara, Parivarha, Hari, Suswara, Madhuparka, Hemavarna, Malaya, Matariswan, Nisakara and Divakara.

These descendants of Garuda all live in one province of this subterranean realm. The names I have recited are only of those who are distinguished by their power, fame and achievements. If you do not find one to your liking here, I will take you to another region, where you might find an eligible groom for your daughter," said Narada,' says Kanva."

"''Narada said, "This, now, is called Rasatala: the seventh stratum below the Earth. Here Surabhi lives, the mother of all bovine species, who was born of Amrita. She continuously yields milk that is the essence of all the best things of the Earth; its unique, unmatched taste is an amalgam of the six tastes.

Surabhi, the embodiment of perfection, sprang in that ancient time from Brahma Pitamaha. When he was satiated with Amrita the best of everything flowed out of his mouth. A single jet of Surabhi's milk fell on the Earth and created the Kshirasagara. The shores of that ocean are always covered with white surf that looks like a flower garland. The best of ascetics, who are known as Fenapas, foam-drinkers, live by this ocean and subsist only on its surf, and so their name. They practise the most austere tapasya and even the Devas fear them.

Surabhi gave birth to four calves, who stand one each at each of the four cardinal points and support them. They are called the Dikpalis. Surupa supports the east and Hansika the south; Subhadra, of the wonderful nature and universal form, supports the west, which is ruled by Varuna; and Sarvakamadugha supports the north, where dharma reigns supreme and is named after Kubera, the lord of treasures.

The Devas and Asuras, with the Mandara Mountain as their rod, churned the waters of Kshirasagara to obtain the wine called Varuni. Devi Lakshmi, Amrita, the prince of horses Uchchaisravas, and that most precious of jewels the ruby Kaustubha emerged from it as well. Matali, those waters that yielded these precious things are mixed with the milk of these four cows. As for Surabhi's milk, it becomes Sudha for those that live on Sudha, Swadha for those that live on Swadha and Amrita for those that live on Amrita.

Even today, learned men recite the verse that the dwellers of Rasatala sang in days of old: Neither in Nagaloka, nor in Swarga, nor in Vimana nor in Trivishtapa is one as happy as in Rasatala," says Kanva.'"

"Kanva says, 'Narada said, "This best of cities that you see now, which is like Indra's Amaravati, is Bhogavati. Vasuki, the king of the Nagas, is its ruler and he lives here. He supports the vast Earth by dint of having performed the most austere tapasya. His body is the size of Swetachala, the White Mountain; he is decked in celestial ornaments; he has a thousand heads; his tongues are like flames; and he is immeasurably strong.

Countless Nagas of varied forms and adorned in all kinds of ornaments, all sons of Surasa, live here happily. They are adorned with the marks of gems, swastikas, chakras and kamandalas. All of them are fierce and mighty; some have a thousand heads, some five hundred and some three; some have two heads, some five and some seven; all of them have mountainous bodies. There are perhaps millions of Nagas of each dynasty, or even tens of millions; they cannot be counted. Listen now as I name a few of the more famous amongst them.

They are Vasuki, Takshaka, Karkotaka, Dhananjaya, Kaliya, Nahusha, Kambala, Aswatara, Bahyakunda, Mani, Apurana, Khaga, Vamana, Elapatra, Kukura, Kukuna, Aryaka, Nandaka, Kalasa, Potaka, Kailasaka, Pinjaraka, Airavata, Sumanomukha, Dadhimukha, Sankha, Nanda, Upanandaka, Apta, Kotaraka, Sikhi, Nishturika, Tittiri, Hastibhadra, Kumuda, Malyapindaka, the two Padmas, Pundarika, Pushpa, Mudgaraparnaka, Karavira, Pitaraka, Samvritta, Vritta, Pindara, Bilvapatra, Mushikada, Sirishaka, Dilipa, Sankhasirsha, Jyotishka, Aparajita, Kauravya, Dhritarashtra, Kuhura, Krisaka, Viraja, Dharana, Subahu, Mukhara, Jaya, Badhira, Andha, Visundi, Virasa and Sarasa. There are these as well as many other sons of Kasyapa. Matali, see if there is anybody here whom you can choose."'

All this time Matali was gazing intently at one who stood before them, at a small remove, and when Narada stopped speaking, the celestial sarathy, looking very pleased, asked Narada Muni, "What vamsa does that handsome, radiant youth belong to, who stands in front of Aryaka of Kauravya vamsa? Who are his parents? Of which line of Nagas is he, who stands tall and erect like a flagstaff? His intelligence, patience, beauty and youth make my heart lean towards him. He will make an excellent husband for my Gunakesi."

Narada saw how delighted Matali was at seeing the young Sumukha and told him of his noble parentage and feats.

He said, "This prince of Nagas is Sumukha. He is born in Airavata's line; he is Aryaka's favourite grandson, and his maternal grandfather is Vamana. His father was the Naga Chikura, whom Vinata's son Garuda killed not so long ago."

Matali was delighted to hear this and said to Narada, "Lord, I would like to have this best of Nagas for my son-in-law. I beg you, try to make this match, for I am extremely pleased at the thought of bestowing him on my precious daughter,"'"

"Kanva says, 'Narada said to the great Naga Aryaka, "This is Indra's sarathy Matali, and Sakra's dear friend. His conduct is pure; he has an excellent character and has many virtues; he has strength of mind, great tejas and might. He is Indra's companion, advisor and charioteer. In every battle, one sees that there is very little difference between him and Indra, in strength and prowess. In all the wars between the Devas and Asuras it is Matali who, with his mind, drives Indra's glorious and ever-victorious chariot, drawn by a thousand horses. The enemies of the Devas are defeated by Matali's expert handling of those unworldly steeds and by the might of Indra's arms: Matali first outmanoeuvres them and then Indra kills them.

Matali has an excellent daughter, of unrivalled beauty. She is truthful and accomplished; and her name is Gunakesi. Matali has searched all the trilokas for a suitable husband for her.

O Aryaka of godlike splendour, he finds your grandson Sumukha to be a suitable match for his child. If you think his proposal acceptable, decide quickly to receive his daughter as a gift to your grandson. As Lakshmi does Vishnu's, or Swaha Agni's, let the slender-waisted Gunakesi grace your vamsa. Accept her for Sumukha, for they are born for each other, like Sachi and Indra.

Although this youth has lost his father, we chose him for his good qualities and for the honour of being related to Airavata and yourself. Sumukha's virtues, his disposition, purity, self-restraint and other qualities have persuaded Matali to offer his daughter to him. Do Matali the honour of accepting her."

Aryaka was filled with delight and sorrow, at once, on hearing Narada's words—delight to see his grandson being chosen as a bridegroom and sorrow at the memory of his son's death.

He said to Narada, "How, Devarishi, how can I have Gunakesi for a daughter-in-law? That I do not approve is not for lack of reverence for you, for who is there who would not want an alliance with Indra's own sarathy? Mahamuni, I hesitate only because I feel that the alliance will not be a lasting one. Effulgent one, this boy's father—my son—was devoured by Garuda, and we are in deep mourning. Worse still, when he left Nagaloka, Garuda swore that, in a month's time, he would devour Sumukha as well. Suparna will surely do as he said. His parting words have plunged us in grief."

Matali then said to Aryaka, "I have a solution for your fear. I have chosen your grandson as a son-in-law. Let him come with Narada and me to Indra, lord of Devas. I will do everything in my power to make Garuda desist from doing as he has sworn. If he does not agree, I will ascertain the life span allotted to Sumukha. Blessings upon you, O Naga; let your grandson come with me to Indra."

Saying this, Narada, Matali and Aryaka took Sumukha with them and these radiant ones went to Indra, in Devaloka. Vishnu, who happened to be there at that time, heard Narada's account of Matali's search and his eventual choice.

Vishnu said to Indra, "Give this youth Amrita; let him be immortal like the Devas. By your grace, let Matali, Narada and Sumukha have everything they wish for."

Thinking about Garuda's awesome might, Indra agreed and commanded that Sumukha be given Amrita. To this, Vishnu said, "You are the lord of all mobile and unmoving creatures. Who would refuse a gift from you?"

Indra then granted the young Naga the boon of longevity, that he become a Chiranjeevi even without having to drink any Amrita. Sumukha's face was suffused with radiant joy, making him truly sumukha! He married Matali's daughter and returned home. Narada and Aryaka, delighted with the success of their venture, departed after worshipping Indra, lord of the Devas.’

Kanva says, 'Meanwhile, Garuda heard about Indra's boon of longevity to Sumukha. Inflamed with rage the sky-ranger flapped his wings furiously and punished the three worlds with a hurricane.

He came to Indra and said, "Illustrious one, why have you deprived me of my food? Having granted me a boon of your own will, why do you now withdraw it? From the very beginning the Supreme Lord has ordained what my food is to be. Why do you now obstruct that divine decree?

I had chosen this great Naga and had appointed a time to kill him, for I wanted to offer the meat of his body as sustenance for my numerous young ones. Now your boon has made him immortal, how can I kill another of his species? How can you do as you please, so frivolously? I, my family and my servants will die of hunger; perhaps that will gratify you, Indra. Indeed I deserve this and worse because although I am powerful enough to be lord of the Trilokas, I agreed to become the servant of another. O Trilokapati, Vishnu is not the only cause of my inferiority. I am your equal, yet the sovereignty of the three worlds is yours.

Like you, I have Daksha's daughter for my mother and Kasyapa for my father. Like you, I can untiringly bear the weight of the three worlds. I have immeasurable and irresistible strength; no creature can withstand me. In the war with the Daityas I, too, achieved wondrous feats. I killed Srutasri and Srutasena, Vivaswat, Rochanamukha, Prasrura and Kalakaksha and other sons of Diti.

I perch on the flag-staff of your younger brother Vishnu's chariot and protect him in battle; I sometimes carry him on my back. Perhaps this is why you disregard me. Who else in the universe can bear such heavy burdens? Who is stronger than me? In spite of my superiority, I carry your younger brother and his companions on my back. By interfering with my prey, my sustenance, you insult me, just as your brother does when he makes me carry him.

As for you, Vishnu, of all the mighty and strong ones that Aditi has given birth to, you are the most powerful. Yet I can carry you, without feeling any fatigue, on just one of my feathers. Think then, brother, which of us is stronger."

Hearing the Bird's haughty words, Vishnu, wanting to forestall the crisis he saw looming, provoked Garuda further, saying, "How do you think of yourself as being strong when in fact you are a weakling? It does not become you to brag like this in our presence. The three worlds together cannot bear the weight of my body. The truth is that I carry my own weight and yours as well. Come now, lift my right arm. If you can, I will consider your boast to be true."

Saying this, Lord Vishnu placed his arm on Garuda's shoulders, and the golden Eagle fell down unconscious. To Garuda the weight of Vishnu's arm felt as great as that of the entire Earth with her mountains. Compassionate Vishnu did not submit him to more suffering, and spared his life.

Crushed by the immense weight of the Lord's arm, Garuda gasped for breath and shed his feathers. His limbs were weak and terror confounded him. He bowed his head low before Vishnu and spoke to him.

Garuda said feebly, "Illustrious Lord, the power that sustains the universe dwells in you. It is no wonder that one arm of yours, stretched out but lightly, crushes me. Divine One, forgive this worthless winged creature that perches on your flag-staff, this fool intoxicated with pride in his own strength, for, O Lord, I am entirely helpless. I did not know how great your strength is and, so, thought my own unrivalled."

Vishnu was gratified and, affectionately saying to Garuda, "Never yield to such arrogance again," with his toe he cast Sumukha onto Garuda's breast.

From that time, Rajan, Garuda has always lived in friendship with that Naga, and that is how that mighty and illustrious kings of birds, the son of Vinata, was crushed by Vishnu's might and cured of his pride.

In the same way, Duryodhana, you will live as long as you do not confront the heroic Pandavas in battle. Who is there that Vayu's son Bhima, and Indra's son Arjuna cannot slay in battle? Your enemies are verily the gods themselves—Vishnu, Dharma, Vayu, Indra and the two Aswins. You are not worthy of even looking at them on the field, let alone face them in battle. Rajan, do not set your heart on war; with Krishna's help, make peace. It is your duty to save your very race by doing this.

Mahamuni Narada saw with his own eyes the incident I have just narrated; it should tell you how great is Vishnu. Krishna is that Vishnu, the wielder of the discus and the mace,' says Kanva.

Hearing what Kanva Muni says, Duryodhana's face darkens; frowns and breathes heavily. Then he looks at Karna and bursts into loud mocking laughter and slaps his thigh that is like the trunk of an elephant.

He says to the Rishi, 'Maharishi, I am what the Creator has made me. What will be must be. Whatever is ordained for me must happen; and I cannot prevent it. Of what use then are your futile sermons?'"

Janamejaya said, "Why did Duryodhana's friends not try to dissuade him from taking the path that led surely to doom, knowing that he was wedded to evil, blinded by avarice, addicted to sin and determined to bring ruin upon himself, thereby filling his kinsmen with grief, afflicting his friends and well-wishers with sorrow and making his enemies joyful. And why did neither Krishna nor Pitamaha Bhishma say anything out of affection?"

Vaisampayana said, "Krishna and Bhishma both advise him. Narada, too, says much. I will tell you what they all say.

Narada says, 'Rare is the man who takes his friends' advice; and rare, too, is the friend who gives honest advice. The man who needs advice is never where the man who is willing to offer it is. Kurunandana, I think you ought to listen to what your friends say. Do not be obstinate; the path you choose for yourself is fraught with evil and danger. I will tell you an ancient story to illustrate this, of how Galava disgraced himself because of his unyielding disposition.

In an ancient time, Dharma Deva assumed the form of the Rishi Vasishta and came down to Earth to test Viswamitra, who sat in austere tapasya. In this form—of one of the Saptarishis—and pretending to be hungry and in dire need of food, he came to Kausika's asrama. Viswamitra was awestruck and prepared charu—rice and honey boiled in milk—for him. He cooked with such careful concentration that he could not properly wait on his guest; and it was not until after his guest had eaten what some other hermits gave him that he was able to offer the charu that he had made, which was still hot.

The holy one said he had already eaten and, telling him to wait there, went away. The Mahatapasvin Viswamitra waited, standing as still as a post, holding the food on his head with his arms raised, and subsisting on air. As he stood there, a muni named Galava began to wait upon him out of reverence and affection for him, and in order to please him.

A hundred years passed and Dharma Deva assumed the form of Vasishta once more, and came to Viswamitra to ask for food. Seeing the wise Maharishi still standing there with the food on his head, living all the while on air alone, he accepted the still warm and fresh charu from him. After eating, Dharma Deva expressed his gratification and went away.

At Dharma Deva's word, Viswamitra, once a Kshatriya, was, to his great joy, elevated to being a Brahmana. Pleased with the services and devotion of his disciple Galava, Viswamitra gave him leave to go wherever he liked.

Galava was happy with his Guru's command and affectionately said to the radiant Viswamitra, "Exalted one, what shall I give you as Gurudakshina? Bestower of honours, any spiritual deed becomes successful only when accompanied by this final gift, and the giver attains Moksha. Gifts are the fruit of one's actions, which one enjoys in heaven, and they are the embodiment of peace. Tell me what I should give to you, my Guru?"

Viswamitra knew that he had been won over by Galava's devotion and repeatedly tried to dismiss him, but Galava kept asking him what he should give as Gurudakshina. Annoyed with Galava's persistence, Viswamitra finally said, "Give me eight hundred horses, all of them as white as the Moon's rays and each with one black ear. Galava, go now!"""

"Narada says, 'Viswamitra's words filled Galava with such consternation that he could not sit, sleep or eat. He became a victim of anxiety and regret and, lamenting bitterly and burning with remorse, Galava grew pale and skeletal.

Duryodhana, smitten with sorrow, he cried, "O where will I find rich friends? Where will I find money? Have I any savings? Where will I find eight hundred moon-white horses? How can I enjoy food or the things I like? The very love of life is extinguished in me. Why do I need to live? I will go to the opposite shore of the great ocean, or to the furthest part of the Earth and give up my life. What is the use of living? What happiness can there be, without extreme exertion, for one who is poor, unsuccessful, deprived of all the good things of life, and burdened with debt? The man who has, from friendship, enjoyed a friend's wealth and cannot repay him is better dead than alive.

When he fails to keep his word, a man's good deeds lose their punya and become stained with falsehood. One who is tainted in this way cannot be beautiful, have children, or acquire power or influence. How can such a man attain bliss? What ungrateful man has ever earned fame? What is his proper place and where is his happiness? An ungrateful man can never win esteem or affection; neither can salvation ever be his. The wretched man who has no wealth is barely alive; he cannot support his relatives or his friends. He is unable to repay favours, he will certainly be ruined.

I am this ungrateful wretch, destitute of resources and tainted with falsehood, for I have got what I wanted from my Guru but cannot do as he asks. I will do my best and then lay down my life.

I have never before begged the gods for anything, and they respect me for this in yagnas. I will seek the protection of Vishnu the divine lord of the Trilokas; I will place myself in Krishna's hands; he is the refuge of all who deserve protection. I will bow down and ask to see Krishna, that most exalted of ascetics, the Eternal One from whom all blessings flow to the Devas and the Asuras."

While Galava was thus lamenting, his friend Garuda, the son of Vinata, appeared before him and, wishing to help him, cheerfully said to him, "You are my dear friend. It is the duty of one who is prosperous to fulfil the wishes of his friends. Brahmana, Indra's younger brother Vishnu has blessed me with good fortune. I have spoken to him on your behalf and he is pleased to grant my wish to help you.

Come, we will go together wherever you like. I will carry you comfortably to the other shore of the ocean, or to the farthest end of the Earth. Come, Galava, do not linger."'

"Narada says, 'Garuda said, "God, who is the source of all knowledge, has commanded me. In which direction shall I take you first, to show you what there is? Shall I go east, south, west or north, Dvija?

That cardinal direction where Surya, the illuminator of the universe, rises; where the ascetics practice their evening tapasya; where the Primeval Intelligence that pervades the universe was born; where the two eyes of Dharma are positioned to guide the universe; where ghee was first offered in sacrifice and from where it then flowed: that direction is the gateway of day and time, Dvijottama.

There in time out of mind the daughters of Daksha gave birth to their children; and there the sons of Kasyapa first multiplied. That quarter is the source of all the prosperity of the Devas, for it was there that Indra was first anointed as their king. It was there that Indra and the other Devas performed tapasya. That is why this cardinal quarter, the East, is called Purva, or the First; and also because in the earliest times it was the home of the Devas and said to be owned by the oldest inhabitants of the universe.

The Devas performed all their religious ceremonies here. It is here that the Creator first sang the Vedas. It is here that the Devi Savitri was born from Surya's mouth to live as a sacred mantra. It is here that Surya presented the Yajur Veda to Yagnavalkya. It is here that the Gods first drank sanctified Soma during yagnas. It is here that the Homa—the sacrificial fire—first accepted ghee and milk; and it is here that Varuna became prosperous when he left for the netherworld.

Here the ancient Rishi Vasishta was born, grew famous and died. Here Om, the mystical beginning of every mantra, was born and developed its one hundred branches. Here the smoke-imbibing Munis live as the smoke of sacrificial fires. Here Indra killed boar and other wild animals and dedicated them as sacrificial offerings to the Devas. Here the thousand-rayed Sun rises and in anger consumes all ungrateful and evil Manavas and Asuras.

This is the gateway of the three worlds, of Swarga and of happiness. This cardinal quarter is called Purva. If you like, we will go there. I will do whatever pleases you, my friend. Galava, tell me if there is any other direction to which you wish to go, and we will fly there. Listen, I will tell you about another cardinal quarter.'""

"Narada says, 'Garuda said, "Long, long ago Vivaswat performed a yagna and gave this quarter away as Dakshina to his Guru, which is why this region, the South, is known as Dakshina.

It is here that the Pitrs of the three worlds live; the Devas who live on smoke and the Devas known as Viswadevas also live here. They are worshipped in sacrifices in all the worlds and partake equally of the sacrifices with the Pitrs.

This cardinal direction is known as the second door of Dharma. It is here that the span allotted to man is calculated in periods of time known as trutis and lavas. It is here that the Devarishis, Pitrlokarishis and Rajarishis live, beyond the reach of pain. Here reside Dharma and Satya; here man's deeds bear fruit.

This quarter is the ultimate resting place of the deeds of the dead, and it is where everybody must eventually come. However, as all of them are shrouded by ignorance, they cannot be happy here, for thousands of Rakshasas have been created to obstruct the paths of men, and those who have not brought their souls under perfect control see them as obstacles.

Here, Brahmana, in Mount Mandara's glades and in the asramas of Rishis, Gandharvas chant hymns that entrance the heart and mind. Here the Daitya Raivata heard the hymns of the Sama Veda sung so sweetly that he left his wife, friends and kingdom and retired to the forest. Here the son of Savarna and Yavakrita set a boundary which Surya cannot cross. Here illustrious Ravana of the Pulastyas, the king of the Rakshasas, performed austere tapasya and asked the gods for a boon of immortality.

It is here that Vritrasura brought Indra's hostility upon himself by his evil ways. It is here that the lives of all beings come, to be broken up into their five elements. It is here that men of evil deeds rot in agony. It is here that the river Vaitarani flows, filled with the bodies of those who cannot cross it to obtain Moksha. People who come here are subject to the extremes of joy or sorrow.

When it arrives here the Sun drops sweet water on the Earth and then, continuing towards the cardinal direction named Vasishta, sheds dew. Once when I was hungry, in this realm, I found for food a huge elephant battling with an enormous tortoise.

It is here that Maharishi Chakradhanu was born from Surya. That Devarishi later came to be known as Kapila and it was he who made ashes of Sagara's sixty-thousand wild sons. It is here that a class of Brahmanas known as Sivas, who mastered the Vedas, were crowned with the fruit of their tapasya and finally attained eternal Moksha.

In this region is the city called Bhogavati, ruled by Vasuki, the Naga Takshaka and Airavata. Those who come here after they die encounter a heavy gloom that is so dense that neither Surya nor Agni can penetrate it.

Worthy as you are of worship, you still have to pass this way. Tell me now if you wish to go in this direction. Otherwise, listen while I tell you about the West.'"

'Garuda said, "The cardinal quarter, the West, is the favourite of Varuna, the lord of the ocean. He was born here and rules over it. Because it is here that the Sun sends his rays at paschata—the end of the day—it is called Paschima.

The divine Kashyapa installed Varuna as the king here to rule over all marine creatures and to protect the waters themselves. Here the Moon, the dispeller of darkness, drinks all six of Varuna's juices and renews himself at the beginning of every bright fortnight. It is here that Vayu defeated and captured the Daityas, who fled, panting, before a mighty tempest and finally laid themselves down to die.

Here, everyday, the mountain Asta lovingly embraces the Sun in welcome and dispels the evening twilight. It is from here that Ratri and Nidra—Night and Sleep—emerge at the close of day and spread themselves over the Earth to steal half the life-span of all living beings from them. It is here that Indra, seeing his pregnant stepmother Diti lying asleep, cut up the foetus in her womb into forty-nine parts, from which the forty-nine Maruts were born.

It is towards this cardinal direction that Himavat Parvata's base stretches to touch the immortal Mandara Parvata who is sunk in the ocean, and even if one travels for a thousand years one cannot reach it. It is here that Surabhi, the first cow, goes to the shores of the sea that is adorned with golden lotuses and pours forth her milk. Here, in the midst of the ocean, is the headless torso of radiant Svarbhanu, Rahu, who is always intent on devouring the Sun and the Moon.

Here the invincible and ever youthful Suvarnasiras, of the immeasurable tejas, loudly chants the Vedas. It is here that Muni Harimedha's daughter Dwajavati was transfixed in the sky by Surya's command to stop and stay. Here wind, fire, earth and water are all deprived of their inherent capacity to inflict pain. It is from here that the Sun's course starts its deviation; it is here that all luminous bodies enter the solar sphere, and after travelling for twenty-eight nights with the Sun they leave the Sun's orbit and move with the Moon. It is in this region that the rivers which always feed the ocean have their sources.

In this, the abode of Varuna, dwell the waters of the three worlds, Ananta—the king of snakes, Vishnu, who is without beginning and without end, and Maricha's son Maharishi Kashyapa.

I have told you now about Paschima. Tell me, where shall we go?"'"

"Narada says, 'Garuda said, "O Brahmana, the cardinal quarter of the North saves a man from sin, and it is here that one attains salvation. The power to do both these is called Uttarana and hence this direction is called Uttara. It is sometimes called Madhyama, central, because the repository of all its treasures stretches in a straight line from east to west.

Dvijarishabha, this quarter is the best of all—no one who is unfriendly, of uncontrolled senses or unrighteous can live here. In a refuge known as Badari live Krishna who is Narayana, Arjuna who is Nara, that most exalted of men, and Brahma the Creator. Here on the slopes of the Himavat Mountain dwells Maheswara, blazing in effulgence like the fire at the end of a yuga, like Purusha with the universal mother Prakriti. Only Nara and Narayana can see him, and not all the different classes of Munis, or the Devas with Indra at their head, or the Gandharvas, Yakshas and Siddhas. Vishnu, of the thousand heads and thousand eyes, which appear as one by the power of his maya, lives here.

It is here that that Chandramas, the Moon, was crowned king of all twice-borns. It is here that Siva first received Ganga on his head and afterwards let her flow from heaven into the world of men. It is here that the Devi Uma performed tapasya from her desire to have Siva as her lord. It is here that Kama, Siva's anger Rosha, Himavat and Uma were born and shone in unity. It is here that Kubera was vested with sovereignty over Rakshasas, Yakshas and Gandharvas.

Kubera's gardens, named Chitraratha, and the asrama of the Vaikshana Munis are here; the celestial river Mandakini and the mountain Mandara are here. The gardens called Saugandhi Kanaka are here, constantly guarded by Rakshasas. There are grassy, verdant plains, plantain forests and the celestial trees called sautanakas in this realm.

This is where the Siddhas, who have their souls ever under control and who wander as they please, have their luxurious and heavenly homes. This is where Arundhati and the Saptarishis reside, and where the constellation Swati rises. This is where Pitamaha Brahma lives, near the embodied Yagna. This is where the movements of the Sun, Moon and other stellar bodies are visible.

O Brahmanottama, here those illustrious and utterly truthful Munis called Dhamas guard the source of the Ganga; and no one knows where they came from, or how they look, or even what tapasya they perform. Indeed, the thousand dishes they use to serve food to those who go there, as well as how they prepare the food are all a mystery. Anyone who crosses the line of their protection is sure to meet with death; only the divine Narayana and the eternal Nara, Arjuna, can pass and remain unharmed.

It is in this cardinal quarter that Kailasa Parvatam lies and where Kubera lives. It is here that the ten Apsaras known as Vidyutprabhas were born. It is this quarter that Vishnu covered with three strides when he accepted the three worlds at the Asura king Bali's sacrifice; and one of his footprints is marked by a spot named Vishnupada.

Here, by the shore of the golden lake named Jambunada, is a place called Usirvija, where Raja Maruta performed his yagna. Here the lustrous gold mines of Himavat made themselves visible to Rishi Jimuta, who gave all their mined wealth away to Brahmanas and asked that it be named after him. That gold is called Jaimuta. Here, every morning and evening, the guardians of the four cardinal points call out and ask each other which person's affairs they should attend to.

O Brahmanottama, it for all these and many other reasons that the North is superior—uttara—to all the other cardinal quarters, and that is another reason for its name Uttara. I have described all four realms to you in detail. To which direction would you like to go? I am ready to show you all four quarters and all the Earth, so climb on to my back.”””

"Narada says, 'Galava said, "O Garuda, slayer of the king of serpents, you of the beautiful feathers, Vinataputra, carry me to the east, on which the two eyes of Dharma are focused. Take me to that region you described first, where the Devas are always, where Dharma and Satya reside. I want to meet all the Devas; so take me there.'

Narada continues, 'Accordingly, at Garuda's prompting, Galava climbed onto the Bird's back and said to him, "Devourer of snakes, your beauty as you fly is as radiant as that thousand-eyed maker of day, the morning Sun. Sky-ranger, you are so swift that the trees break in the storm of your flapping wings and seem to fly behind you in your wake; why, you seem to tow Bhumi with all her waters, mountains and forests in the airs you stir. The tempest that your wings blow lifts the waters of the oceans with all their fish, snakes and crocodiles into the air.

The fish, the timis and timingalas, that look alike, and snakes with human faces are all dashed about by your wing-storm. And I am so deafened and stunned by the roar of the oceans that I seem to forget the reason for my journey. Slow down; remember that you may be endangering a Brahmana's life.

O Garuda, I can no longer see the Sun, the cardinal points or the sky. I see only a thick gloom all round me. I cannot see my body, but only your eyes, shining like two brilliant gems. I cannot see your body, but at every wing-beat I see fire spewing from it. Put out this fire and extinguish the dazzle from your eyes; I beg you, slow down! I do not need to go on this journey with you. Blessed one, I cannot bear your speed. I have promised to give my acharya eight hundred moon-white horses with one black ear each. I do not see how I can make good my word.

The only course open to me is to lay down my life. I have no wealth of my own, nor a wealthy friend; indeed, no wealth, however immense, can give me what I need."

Laughingly, and without slackening his speed, Garuda said to Galava, "Your wish to end your life shows that you are a man of little wisdom, O twice-born Rishi. Death can never be brought about by one's own effort. Death is God himself. Why did you not tell me what your intention was before we set out? There are many excellent ways by which your goal can be accomplished.

Here is the mountain Rishabha, on the seashore. We will rest here for a while and refresh ourselves with some food before we turn back."""

CANTO 113

"Narada says, 'The Brahmana and the Eagle landed on the summit of Rishabha and there they saw a Brahmana woman named Sandili in tapasya. Galava and Garuda bent their heads in respectful greeting and worshipped her. The devi asked after their welfare and invited them to sit. Seated, they accepted the food she offered, having first dedicated it with mantras to the Devas. After eating, they lay down on the ground and fell into a deep sleep. Garuda woke up, wanting to leave, but discovered that his wings had fallen off and that he had become a ball of flesh with only a head and legs.

Galava, seeing him in that plight, said, "What has staying here done to you? O how long will we have to remain here? Did you have any evil thoughts in your mind, for it cannot be a trivial sin that has taken your wings from you."

Garuda replied to the Brahmana, saying, "Actually, Dvija, I did think about carrying this Brahmani, of the tapasyashakti, away from here to where Mahadeva the Creator, Vishnu, and both Dharma and Yagna dwell, for I thought she ought to live there. For my own good, I will prostrate before this holy devi and pray to her.

Garuda said to the Brahmani, "With a sore heart, I confess that I entertained the idea of carrying you away. Whether I acted rightly or wrongly, my intention, of which you evidently disapprove, was prompted by my regard for you. I beg you, from the nobility of your heart forgive me."

Pleased with the prince of birds and the Brahmana, she said to Garuda, "Do not be afraid, beautiful-feathered one. Here, have your wings back and cast off your fear. You insulted me, and I do not forgive insults. The sinner who insults me will quickly fall from Swarga. I bear no inauspicious signs at all and, being blemishless in my purity, I have achieved exalted tapasyashakti. Dharma and artha are the fruits of pure conduct, which removes all that is inauspicious.

Go from here where you wish, prince of birds, and take care never to insult a woman, even in thought, even if she is not chaste. You shall regain your strength and energy as they were before."

At these words Garuda had back his splendid wings, and they were more powerful than before. Taking leave of Sandili, Garuda flew away with Galava on his back. They could not, however, find the kind of horses they were looking for.

On their way, they met that most eloquent of men, Viswamitra, and in Garuda's presence he said to Galava, "Brahmana, the time has come for you to give me what you promised. I do not know what you will do to get me the horses but, since I have waited so long, I will wait a little longer. Find a way of making good your solemn word."

Hearing this, Garuda said to the downcast Galava, who was plunged in sorrow, "I have now heard what Viswamitra said to you earlier. Come, Brahmanottama Galava, we will think about it together. You cannot rest until you have given your Guru what you swore."""

"Narada says, 'Garuda said to the cheerless Galava, "This wealth is called Hiranya because Agni created it in the bowels of the Earth, which is also named Hiranmaya, and then Vayu increased it. Because this wealth supports the world and sustains life it is called dhana; indeed that has been its purpose in the Trilokas from the beginning.

On the particular Friday, when either the constellation Purvabhadra or Uttarabhadra rises, Agni creates more wealth by his will and confers it on mankind in order to add to Kubera's store of treasures. Deities called Ajaikapats and Ahirbudnas guard the wealth created in the Earth's core, making it rare and well nigh impossible to obtain. This wealth is your only chance to acquire the horses; beg some king born into a vamsa of Rajarishis to help you, without harming his own subjects.

I have a friend who is a king born into the Chandra vamsa. Let us go to him for, amongst all who live on Earth, he has the greatest wealth. This Rajarishi Yayati is the son of Nahusha, and has irresistible prowess. If you plead with him and I endorse your plea with my commendation, he will give us what we need; he is immensely wealthy, as wealthy as Kubera the lord of treasures. Learned one, by accepting this king's gift, we can pay your debt to your Guru."

Talking together in this way and thinking about the best thing to do, Garuda and Galava went to King Yayati in his capital. The king received them hospitably and offered them arghya, and padya to wash their feet. Then he asked them why they had come.

Garuda said to him, "O Son of Nahusha, this ocean of tapasya is my friend Galava, who has been Viswamitra's sishya for several thousand years. This devout Brahmana, whom Viswamitra commanded to go wherever he chose, told his Guru that he wanted to give him gurudakshina. Viswamitra knew he was poor and did not ask for anything, but then, annoyed by his persistence, he asked for eight hundred moon-white horses with one black ear each. The Rishi told Galava that since he insisted, this is what he should give. The great tapasvin Viswamitra spoke in anger and it is this that grieves the Brahmana so painfully.

Unable to fulfil his Guru's command, he has come to you for refuge. Purushavyaghra, when he has accepted this favour he asks of you, he will pay his gurudakshina and happily devote himself to tapasya once again.

A Rajarishi such as you, endowed as you already are with great punya, will be even more enriched when this Brahmana gives you a share of his own tapasya. Lord of men, giving a horse as a gift entitles you to as much bliss as there are hairs on a horse's body.

This man is as worthy to accept the gift as you are to make it. Give it to him, as you would pour milk into a conch shell.""

"Narada says, 'Yayati, ruler of all the Kasis, performer of a thousand sacrifices, that most generous of men, reflected deeply on Garuda's words of truth.

He saw his friend Garuda and Galava's request for alms as an auspicious omen; he thought about Galava's tapasya, and he pondered the fact that these two had passed over all the other kings of the Surya vamsa and come to him.

Yayati said, "I and the vamsa into which I was born are blessed today. Sinless Garuda, you have blessed my kingdom. My friend, there is one thing that I wish to say to you. I am not as rich now as before, for my wealth is greatly reduced. Regardless, I cannot render your visit fruitless, nor can I disappoint this Rishi.

I will give him enough to allow him to accomplish his purpose. If a man who comes for alms leaves unfulfilled, he might destroy my entire race with a curse. There is nothing more sinful than to say, I have nothing, and dash the hopes of one who comes in need. The disappointed man can ruin the sons and grandsons of the one who fails to help him.

O Galava, take this daughter of mine, who will be the perpetuator of four dynasties. In beauty, she is like a daughter of the Devas; she will promote every virtue; and for her beauty, Devas, Manavas and Asuras are always me asking for her hand. The kings of the Earth would give entire kingdoms for her, let alone eight hundred horses with a black ear each. Take my daughter Madhavi. My only wish is to have a grandson by her."

Galava accepted the king's gift and left with Garuda, saying to the king, "We will see you again," and taking the maiden with them.

Then Garuda said to Galava, "We finally have the means to obtain the horses," and took his leave and went home.

After the prince of birds had gone, Galava, with the maiden beside him, began to think about going to a king who would give him a fitting dower for her. He first thought of that best of kings Haryaswa of the Ikshvakus, who ruled in Ayodhya, who was endowed with great tejas, who possessed a great army consisting of the four kinds of forces, who had a well-filled treasury and an abundance of corn, whose subjects loved him and who respected all Brahmanas. Wishing to have children, he lived quietly, performing austere tapasya.

Galava went to Haryaswa and said, "Rajadhiraja, this maiden will increase her husband's family by bearing many children. Accept her from me as your wife, Haryaswa, by giving me a dower. Listen to what dower I expect and then decide what you will do."""

"Narada says, 'Raja Haryaswa reflected for a long time, breathing deep and fervent sighs at the thought of having a son. At last he said, "The six parts of the body that ought to be raised in one's body are well elevated in this maiden. The seven parts of the body that ought to be slender are indeed so in her. The three that ought to be deep are deep in her; and the five that ought to be reddish are flushed in her. It seems that her beauty is worthy of being gazed upon by Devas and Asuras, and she is accomplished in all the arts and sciences. With all these auspicious signs, she will certainly bear many children, and indeed one of them might become an emperor.

As for the wealth you seek, Brahmanottama, what should her dower be?"

Galava said, "Give me eight hundred horses of a lofty pedigree, which are all moon-white and with one black ear each. This blessed and large-eyed maiden will then become the mother of your sons, as the fire-stick gives birth to fire."

Hearing this, Rajarishi Haryaswa was filled with sorrow, but blinded by passion, he said, "I have only two hundred horses of the kind you want, but there are many others which roam in my kingdom. Galava, I want only one son with this maiden. Grant me my wish."

At this, the maiden said to Galava, “One who had attained Brahman once granted me a boon that I would, after the birth of every son, regain my maidenhood. Give me away to this king and accept his horses. In this way, you will get eight hundred horses from four different kings, and I will have four sons, as well. Collect the wealth that you want to give your Guru like this. This is what I think, but you may do as you think fit.”

Galava said to Haryaswa, “O Haryaswa, best of men, accept this maiden for a fourth of the dower that I have asked for, and have only one son with her.”

Haryaswa worshipped Galava and took the princess. In due time, she gave the king the son he so longed for, and the boy was named Vasumanas. He became richer than the wealthiest kings of the Earth and looked like one of the Vasus; and he came to be a great and generous king.

After some time had passed, Galava came back to the delighted Haryaswa and said to him, “O Rajan, you have had a son, a child who is as splendid as the Sun. The time has come for me to go to another king for alms.”

Haryaswa, being truthful and honourable in all that he said and did, and remembering the balance of six hundred horses that he had been unable to give the Brahmana Galava, gave Madhavi back to him. Madhavi left that radiant and prosperous king and, becoming a virgin once more, she followed Galava.

Galava said to Haryaswa, “Let the horses stay here with you,” and went with Madhavi to Raja Divodasa.’”

"Narada says, 'Galava said to Madhavi, "The ruler of the Kasis is the illustrious king Divodasa, who is Bhimasena's son. He is an immensely powerful king. Blessed one, we are now going to Divodasa; follow me slowly and do not worry. This king is virtuous and devoted to truth, and has his passions under control."

Muni Galava came before the king, who received him with due reverence and hospitality. Galava urged the monarch to have a child.

Divodasa said, "I have already heard about your quest, so you need not tell me much, Brahmana. As soon as I knew what you would come for, my heart was set upon it. I am honoured that you have passed over all other kings and come to me. What you want will be yours, but my wealth is like Haryaswa's, reduced. I shall, therefore, have only one royal son with this maiden."

The Brahmana gave the girl to the king, who duly married her. Rajarishi Divodasa enjoyed his time with Madhavi like so many illustrious couples: Surya with Prabhavati, Agni with Swaha, Vasava with Sachi, Chandra with Rohini, Yama with Urmila, Varuna with Gauri, Kubera with Riddhi, Narayana with Lakshmi, Sagara with Jahnavi, Rudra with Rudrani, Pitamaha Brahma with Saraswati, Vasishta's son Saktri with Adrisyanti, Vasishta with Akshamala, Chyavana with Sukanya, Pulastya with Sandhya, Agastya with princess Lopamudra of Vidarbha, Satyavan with Savitri, Bhrigu with Puloma, Kasyapa with Aditi, Richika's son Jamadagni with Renuka, Kusika's son Viswamitra with Himavati, Brihaspati with Tara, Sukra with Sataparva, Bhumipati with Bhumi, Pururavas with Urvasi, Richika with Satyavati, Manu with Saraswati, Dushyanta with Sakuntala, the eternal Dharma with Dhriti, Nala with Damayanti, Narada with Satyavati, Jaratkaru with Jaratkaru, Pulastya with Pratichya, Urnayus with Menaka, Tumburu with Rambha, Vasuki with Satasirsha, Dhananjaya with Kumari, Rama with Sita the princess of Videha, Janardana with Rukmini.

And to Raja Divodasa, who delighted in her, Madhavi bore a son named Pratardana. After the child's birth, Galava came to Divodasa and said to him, "Let the maiden come with me, but let the horses that you are giving me remain here. I need to go to another kingdom to obtain more dowry."

The virtuous Divodasa, who was devoted to dharma, gave Madhavi back to Galava."'"

"Narada says, 'Madhavi was faithful to her promise and, abandoning prosperity and becoming a virgin once again, followed Galava. Galava, whose heart was set upon the accomplishment of his own business, had reflected on what he should do next and went to the city of the Bhojas, to King Usinara.

When he arrived before that king of the unrestrainable prowess, Galava said to him, "This maiden will bear you two royal sons, who will be like the Sun and the Moon. With these two princes you will be able to attain all that you hope for in this world and in the hereafter. O you who are knowledgeable about dharma, in exchange you must give me four hundred horses of moon-white splendour with one black ear each. My effort to obtain the horses is only for my Guru's sake; I myself have no need of them. If you accept my terms, do as I tell you, without hesitation.

Rajarishi, you are childless. Have two children, for children are like a life-saving raft, who will rescue you and your Pitrs. The man who enjoys the punya of having had a son never falls from heaven, nor will he ever have to go to that frightful hell, Naraka, to which the childless are doomed."

Raja Usinara said to him, "I have heard your words, Galava, and my heart is inclined to do as you say. However, only the Supreme Lord has ultimate power over all things. I have only two hundred horses of the kind you want, but I have thousands of other kinds in my kingdom. I will do as Haryaswa and Divodasa did and have only one son by Madhavi.

My wealth is for all my subjects, in the city and in the country, and not for my own comfort and pleasures. The king who gives away, for his own benefit, the wealth that belongs to others can never earn virtue or fame. Give this divinely radiant girl to me. I will accept her to bear me only one child."

Hearing these and other things that Usinara said, Galava approved of him. He gave Madhavi to him and went away into the forest. And as any man of dharma enjoys well deserved happiness that his good deeds have earned him, Usinara enjoyed Madhavi, and they sported in valleys and dales of the mountains, beside fountains and waterfalls, in charming mansions, in gardens, forests and woods, in other places of delight, and on palatial terraces beneath the stars. In due time, a son was born to them, who shone like the morning Sun, and who later became the great king Sibi.

After the birth of this boy, Galava came to Usinara, took Madhavi from him and went to Garuda.'"

"Narada says, 'Garuda saw Galava and said to him, "How happy I am to hear of your success."

Galava, however, informed him that a fourth part of his task was still unfinished, at which Garuda said, "Do not try to get the remaining two hundred horses, for you will not succeed. Long ago, Richika wanted to marry Satyavati, the daughter of Gadhi of Kanyakubja.

Gadhi said to Muni Richika, Holy one, give me a thousand horses, all as brilliantly white as the Moon and each having one black ear.

Saying, So be it, Richika went to Aswatirtha, the great home of horses in Varuna's abode, and found what he wanted, which he promptly gave the king. The king performed a yagna named Pundarika and gave those horses away as dakshina to deserving Brahmanas. The three kings, whom you made agreements with, each bought two hundred of those horses from the Brahmanas. The remaining four hundred were claimed by the river Vitasta, while they were being led across it.

You can never have that which is not there to be had. Virtuous one, give this girl as a gift to Viswamitra, along with the six hundred horses you have acquired. You will be freed from your grief and crowned with success."

Saying "Tathaastu," Galava went with Garuda to Viswamitra, taking Madhavi and the horses with him. On arriving, he said, "Here are six hundred horses of the kind you asked for. I offer you this maiden in place of the remaining two hundred. I beg you, accept what I offer as gurudakshina. This girl has had three virtuous sons by three Rajarishis; let her fourth, and best, son be yours.

Let these six hundred horses be the complete discharge of my debt to you, so that I can be free to practice tapasya as I like."

Viswamitra saw Galava with the Bird and the maiden, and he said, "O Galava, why did you not give this girl to me before? All four sons, sanctifiers of my race, would have been mine. I accept this maiden, to give me one son. The horses can graze in my asrama."

Viswamitra lived happily with Madhavi, and she bore him a son, named Ashtaka. As soon as the child was born, Mahamuni Viswamitra instructed him in dharma and artha, and gave him the six hundred horses. Ashtaka went to live in a city, bright as the city of Soma; and Viswamitra gave Madhavi back to Galava and went away to the deepest forest.

The happy Galava who, with his friend Garuda's help, had succeeded in giving his Guru the dakshina he had asked for, said to Madhavi, "You have given birth to one son who is most charitable, to another who is very brave, to a third who is devoted to dharma and satya, and to a fourth who is a performer of great yagnas. Lovely Madhavi, through your sons you have saved not only your father but four kings and me, as well. Go to your father now, slender-waisted one."

Saying this, Galava bid farewell to Garuda that devourer of snakes, and after restoring the maiden to her father, went to live in the forest.'"

"Narada says, 'King Yayati wanted to give his daughter in marriage by way of a swayamvara. He took Madhavi, decked in flower malas, in his chariot to a sacred asrama at the confluence of the Ganga and Yamuna, with his sons Puru and Yadu following him. Gathered in that place were innumerable Nagas, Yakshas, Manavas and Gandharvas; animals and birds; dwellers of mountains, trees and forests; and many inhabitants of that particular province. The vanas that surrounded the asrama were home to many Rishis, who were like Brahma himself.

The swayamvara began, and that loveliest of maidens passed over all those assembled there and chose the vana as her lord. Descending from her chariot and greeting all her friends, Yayati's daughter went into the sacred forest and devoted herself to a life of tapasya.

She emaciated herself by fasting, performing religious rites and rigid vratas; and she took to living the life of a deer. She ate soft, green grass whose tender stems looked like lapis lazuli and tasted bitter-sweet; she drank the cool, sweet, crystalline water of sacred mountain streams. She roamed with other deer through forests where no lions or tigers lived, in deserts where there was no danger from forest fires and in dense forest, leading the life of a wild doe. She earned great spiritual punya because of her life of austere tapasya and brahmacharya.

King Yayati lived for many thousands of years and, like many before him, eventually succumbed to inexorable Time. The progeny of his sons Puru and Yadu multiplied, thereby earning great reverence for Yayati in this and the other worlds. Yayati lived in Swarga, like a Maharishi; he was greatly honoured and respected, and enjoyed the best of those regions.

One day, after many thousands of years had passed in great joy, when Yayati sat amongst illustrious Rajarishis and Maharishis, he mentally ignored all the Devas, Rishis and Manavas who were there, from folly, ignorance and pride. Indra immediately saw into his heart. The Rajarishis, too, saw this and disapproved.

Everyone began to ask, "Who is this man? What king's son is he? Why is he in Swarga? What has he done to deserve this honour? Where did he practice tapasya and earn punya? What is he known for? Who knows him?"

The Swargavasis questioned each other about Yayati and asked hundreds of heaven's charioteers, gatekeepers and those who were in charge of the seats in heaven; but all replied that they did not know. Their minds were suddenly clouded so that none of them recognised the king, who immediately lost his heavenly splendour."""

"Narada says, 'In this state—deprived of his place in Swarga and cast out, his trembling heart consumed by fear and burning with remorse, his unfading garlands withered, his senses in turmoil, shorn of his crown and ornaments, his head reeling, his limbs weak and his body unadorned and unclothed—no one recognised Yayati. In the bewilderment of the fog that blanketed his mind, the Swargavasis swam in and out of his vision as Yayati fell headlong towards the Earth.

As he fell, the king thought, "What sinful thoughts did I think that lost me my place in Devaloka?"

All the kings, the Siddhas and the Apsaras laughed to see Yayati fall. At Indra's command, came a Duta whose task was to remove from Swarga those whose punya had run out.

He said to Yayati, "Intoxicated with pride, there is no one whom you have not disregarded. It is because of your vanity that Swarga is no longer for you. You do not deserve to live here, Rajaputra. We do not recognise you here, so fall you must."

At the Devaduta's words, Yayati, the son of Nahusha, said three times, "If I must fall, let me fall amongst the righteous," and this king, who was the best of all who had attained Swarga, thought about where he should fall.

As he plunged down, Yayati saw the four mighty kings, Pratardana, Vasumanas, Sibi and Ashtaka, in a forest, and he fell toward them. At the time, those kings were performing the Vajapeya yagna to gratify Indra, and the smoke that rose from their fire had reached the gates of Swarga, looking like a river that flowed between heaven and Earth. It resembled the sacred Ganga during her descent to Earth. It was the smoke that guided Yayati as he fell toward the Earth and brought him to those four lions among men, all blessed with great splendour, the foremost of all sacrificers, who were in fact his own kin, who resembled the four Lokapalas, and who blazed in glory like four mighty sacrificial fires. Having exhausted his store of punya, Yayati fell toward them, and hung in mid-air above the kings, and he was still dazzlingly beautiful.

Seeing him and how he shone, the kings asked, "Who are you? What race, country and city are you from? Are you a Yaksha, a Deva, a Gandharva or a Rakshasa? You do not appear to be a human being. Why are you here?"

Yayati answered, "I am Rajarishi Yayati. I have fallen from Swarga because my punya was exhausted. I wanted to fall amongst men of dharma and have fallen amidst you."

The kings said, "Purushottama, may your wish come true. Accept as yours our punya and the fruits of all our sacrifices."

Yayati said, "I am not a Brahmana but a Kshatriya, and I cannot accept charity; nor do I want to take others' punya from them."

Just at this time, Madhavi, in course of her wandering, came there. The four kings greeted her and said, "What brings you here? What would you command us to do for you? You have the right to command us, for we are your sons, O Tapasvini."

Madhavi was filled with delight when she heard this. She came before her father with reverence and greeted Yayati; and she touched the heads of all her sons.

She said to her father Yayati, "Rajadhiraja, these are my sons, your grandsons. They are not strangers. They will save you. This practice is not new; it has its origins in antiquity. I am your daughter Madhavi, and I have been living in the forest like a deer. I have earned punya, and you must accept half of it because all men have the right to enjoy a portion of the punya earned by their children. That is why men want their daughters to have sons. That is what you wished for when you gave me to Galava."

At their mother's words, the four monarchs paid homage to her and to their grandfather. They reiterated what their mother had said, as clearly and affectionately as she had; and the whole Earth resounded with their wish to save their fallen grandfather.

Galava too came there and said to Yayati, “Accept an eighth of my tapasya from me and go back to Swarga.”””

"Narada says, 'No sooner was Yayati recognised by those virtuous ones, than he rose once more into Swarga, without having touched the Earth at all. He regained his celestial form and shed his grief. Once again he was adorned in celestial garlands, raiment and ornaments; sprinkled again with celestial perfumes and vested with heavenly attributes; all this without having actually set foot on the Earth's surface.

Vasumanas, whose generosity was renowned through the worlds, announced to Yayati, "I hereby give you the punya that I have won on Earth by my blemishless conduct towards men of all varnas. Let it all be yours King. I have acquired the punya that one gains from generosity, and redemption from my sins through the yagnas I have performed; let those, too, be yours."

Then Pratardana said, "My devotion to Kshatriya dharma has earned me fame and a heroic name. I hereby give you this punya."

Sibi, the intelligent son of Usinara, affectionately said, "I have never spoken an untruth to children, to women or in jest, to those in danger, in a crisis or during a game of dice. I can give up all objects of desire and pleasure, my kingdom and my life itself, but I cannot give up satya. By virtue of this and of us having gratified Dharma, Agni and Indra, you will ascend to Swarga.

Lastly, Rajarishi Ashtaka—Madhavi and Kusika's son, said to Yayati, "I have performed hundreds of Pundarika, Gosava and Vajapeya yagnas. Take the punya of these. I have spared nothing for their performance, not jewels, gold or other treasures. By that truth, ascend to Swarga."

Immediately, Yayati left the Earth and began to soar towards Swarga, higher and higher as his grandsons said what they were doing for him, one after the other. That is how those kings saved Yayati, who had been cast down from heaven, and how these royal grandchildren of Yayati's, those perpetuators of their dynasties, made their grandfather rise again into Swargaloka by means of their dharma, yagnas and dana.

The four kings said in unison, "We are your daughter's sons, O Rajan, endowed with nobility and every virtue. By our dharma and punya, ascend again into heaven."""

"Narada says, "Restored to his place on high by his grandsons, distinguished by the largesse of their sacrificial gifts, Yayati blazed in beauty, adorned by his own great deeds, showered with fragrant flowers and enveloped in scented, balmy breezes. He was welcomed back with the joyful clash of cymbals and entertained with songs and dances by diverse clans of Gandharvas and Asuras. Devarishis and Rajarishis paid homage to him, and the Devas worshipped him with arghya and other honours.

After he had returned to Swarga and, free from anxiety, regained tranquillity of heart, Brahma Pitamaha spoke words of approbation to him, saying, "You had earned the full measure—four padas—of dharma by your deeds on Earth. You had attained Swargaloka and renown for eternity. Rajarishi, you nullified all this punya by your vanity, which cloaked the hearts of Swargavasis in darkness so impenetrable that they could not recognise you, and you were cast down. You have been saved by the love and affection of your daughter's sons and returned, regaining this eternal, sacred, wonderful and deathless realm you won earlier by your own deeds."

Yayati said, "Holy One, I have a doubt, which only you can dispel. My punya was vast, augmented by my reign of dharma over my subjects for thousands of years, and won by innumerable sacrifices and gifts. How could such immense punya become exhausted, and I be cast down from here? You know that the place created for me was eternal. Why was it destroyed?”

The Pitamaha said, “Your merit, earned by countless yagnas and increased by your rule of dharma, perished because of a single fault: your vanity, and it made you the object of contempt of all the Swargavasis. Vanity, pride of strength, malice, deceitfulness or deception will all reduce your time in Swarga. Never disregard those that are inferior, superior or equal to you. There is no greater sinner than the man who is consumed by the fire of vanity. Those who tell of your fall and re-ascension will be protected from all calamities.”

Rajan, this is the story of how vanity brought Yayati’s downfall, and the distress that Galava suffered because of his obstinacy. Those who want their own good should listen to their well-wishers. One must never be stubborn, for it is the root of ruin.

O Son of Gandhari, forsake vanity and wrath; make peace with the Pandavas. Abandon anger; let go of what you have once given away, that which is done, austerities that you have practised and libations that you have poured on fire. These are indestructible and cannot be diminished. Also, no one other than their doer enjoys their fruit.

The man who understands this greatest and best of stories, which is praised by those who know the scriptures and who are free from anger and greed, gains knowledge of dharma, artha and kama, and sovereignty over the world.’”

"Dhritarashtra says, 'Holy one, it is as you say. I, too, want to do exactly as what you tell us to, but I am powerless.'"

Vaisampayana continued, "The Kuru monarch then addresses Krishna and says, 'O Kesava, you have spoken about the path that leads to Swarga, which is for the world's good, full of dharma and wise. However, being blind, I cannot act independently, and Duryodhana never pays heed to me. Krishna, you must persuade my foolish, unprincipled and disobedient son. He never listens to the advice of Gandhari, Vidura or other true friends, or Bhishma the chief of them, all of whom want his good.

Counsel my dishonest and evil prince, for by so doing you will have acted nobly, as a friend should.'

Krishna, all-knowing about dharma and artha, says to Duryodhana, 'Kurusattama, listen to what I say, which is good for you especially, as well as for your followers. You are born into a vamsa that is distinguished for its great wisdom, and you are honour-bound to keep dharma.

You are learned and possess so many excellent and qualities. Only low-born, evil, shameless and cruel men do what you mean to. Men of dharma are always inclined towards virtue while sinful men lean the opposite way. Everything you are thinking of doing is against dharma. Insisting on going to war is nothing but sinful, vicious and evil, and will lead you to death.

Abandon this dangerous path you have chosen to tread; it is unworthy of you and will only lead to untold suffering and doom.

You will do yourself, your brothers and your followers a great service if you make peace with the Pandavas instead. The sons of Pandu are wise, courageous and learned; they have immeasurable tejas and perfect control over their souls. If you do what I ask, that will please Dhritarashtra, as well as Pitamaha Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Somadatta, Bahlika, Aswatthama, Vikarna, Sanjaya, Vivimsati and many of your kinsmen and friends. The whole world will benefit from that peace.

You are blessed with modesty, noble birth, learning and kindness. Listen to what your father and mother tell you; a good son always obeys his father's command, knowing it will benefit him. When calamity strikes, men remember their father's advice, which they once ignored. Making peace with the Pandavas will please your father; so let peace recommend itself to you and your advisors.

The man who hears the counsel of his well-wishers but does not heed it will be consumed by the consequences of his disregard, even as if he has eaten the poisonous kimpaka fruit. The fool who rejects sage advice and procrastinates will fail to achieve his objective and then repent. On the other hand, the man who heeds wise counsel and accepts it, setting aside his own opinion, will always be happy.

He who discards the words of well-meaning friends, deluded that what they say is not in his best interest, will be crushed by his enemies. The man who ignores the views of the righteous and clings only to those of the sinful, who flatter his vanity, will sink into misery and make his friends weep for him. He who turns away from superior advisors and seeks out inferior ones will fall into distress, from which he will not be able to extricate himself. The Earth will abandon the man who befriends sinners, who behaves deceitfully, who ignores what his friends say, who honours strangers but hates his own people.

Bharatarishabha, you have chosen to make enemies of the Pandavas and look to incompetent, foolish and sinful men for support. What other man is there on Earth besides you, who would disregard kinsmen who are all Maharathas, each like an Indra, and instead seek refuge and help from strangers? You have persecuted the sons of Kunti from the time they were born, but because they are virtuous they were not angry with you. Indeed, although you have been deceitful to them since their birth, those noble men have always been noble and generous to you. You ought to reciprocate their magnanimity in like measure.

Do not yield to anger. Wise men's energies are always focused on dharma, artha and kama. If all three cannot be attained, men pursue at least dharma and artha. Even if these three are followed separately, superior men, who have their senses under control, choose dharma as their priority; those who have a position between good and evil choose artha, which is subject to dispute; while those whose minds are darkened by tamas concentrate on gratifying their desires, however base.

The fool who abandons dharma to pursue artha and kama by sinning is soon destroyed by his own senses. The man who seeks artha and kama should first practice dharma, because all three are inextricably linked. Rajan, the wise say that dharma is the primary source, and so he who seeks all three purusharthas will, by practicing dharma alone, flourish, like fire when it touches a hayrick.

Bharatarishabha, you want to employ sin to obtain sole sovereignty over this vast and flourishing empire. The man who deals falsely towards those who live by dharma cuts himself down, like a forest felled by the axe. One seeks to destroy the very mind of the man one wants to defeat, for with his mind in chaos he cannot devote his attention to his true welfare.

The man who has his soul under control is never heedless of anyone, not even the most common of creatures, far less those bulls among men, the Pandavas. He who gives in to anger loses his sense of right and wrong. Evil must not be allowed to grow; look at the proof of this.

Solidarity with the sons of Pandu is far better for you than union with sinners. If you make peace with them, you will make peace with yourself, and have everything that you wish for. You now enjoy the kingdom that the Pandavas founded, but you ignore them and go to others for friendship and protection. Wanting the undiminished continuance of your prosperity, you have vested the care of your kingdom with Dusasana, Durvisha, Karna and Subala's son, men far inferior to the Pandavas in knowledge, in dharma, in their ability to garner wealth and in prowess.

Let alone these four men, all these kings together, with you at their head, cannot even look at an angry Bhima on the battlefield. This army of so many kings of the Earth is at your command. Also with you are Bhishma, Drona, Karna, Kripa, Bhurisravas, Somadatta, Aswatthama and Jayadratha. All of them together cannot face Arjuna, whom even the Devas, Asuras and Gandharvas cannot quell. Do not set your heart on war, Duryodhana.

Have you seen any man who has encountered Arjuna in battle and come away unscathed, let alone victorious? What can you gain from a universal slaughter? Show me one man who will defeat Arjuna, whose defeat alone can ensure your victory. Who will face that son of Pandu in battle, who vanquished all the Devas, Gandharvas, Yakshas and Nagas at Khandavaprastha? There is also that marvellous account of the encounter in Virata's city, of one against many, which should convince you.

Do you hope to vanquish an enraged Arjuna, invincible, irresistible, ever-victorious and unfading, that hero who gratified even Mahadeva Siva in fight? When, with me as his sarathy, that son of Pritha storms on to the battlefield, like Indra himself, who will dare challenge him? He who would vanquish Arjuna in battle could lift up the Earth in his arms, consume in his rage the entire population of the world and cast the very gods out from heaven.

Look at your sons, brothers, cousins and other relatives. Let them not die because of you. Let the Kaurava vamsa not horribly dwindle or even become extinct. Rajan, let the people not call you the exterminator of your dynasty and the destroyer of its noble achievements. If you make peace with them, the Pandava Maharathas will install you as Yuvaraja and your father Dhritarashtra as the king of this vast empire.

Do not dismiss the prosperity that awaits you, which is sure to come if you tread the path of dharma. Give half the kingdom to the sons of Pritha and win great prosperity. Listen to your well-wishers. By making peace with the sons of Pandu and living with them in harmony you will be blessed for eternity.'"

Vaisampayana said, "After listening to Krishna, Bhishma says to the angry Duryodhana, 'Krishna has spoken to you out of a desire to establish peace between cousins. Follow his advice; do not give in to vindictiveness. If you do not do as Krishna says, you will never gain prosperity, happiness or your own welfare.

What Krishna said to you is in keeping with dharma and artha. Do as he says and you will achieve your every objective; do not obliterate the Earth's population. Do not destroy this resplendent prosperity of the Bhaaratas amongst all the kings of the Earth, even while your father Dhritarashtra is still alive. If you disregard Krishna, your father and the wise Vidura, your stubborn arrogance will take you to your death and, with you, all your counsellors, sons, brothers and kinsmen will also die. What your true well-wishers counsel is dharma and will benefit you greatly.

Do not become the extinguisher of your vamsa; do not cleave to evil; turn your heart away from sin; do not tread the path of adharma; do not drown your parents in a sea of grief.'

When Bhishma has spoken, Drona says to Duryodhana, who by now is panting with rage, 'Rajan, what Krishna said is consistent with dharma and artha, and Bhishma has said the same. Accept their counsel. Both of them are wise, learned, of superior intelligence, have their souls under control and want only what is good for you. What they say is salutary; listen to them. Wise king, do as Krishna and Bhishma say; do not disregard Krishna, who counsels you gravely out of your vain delusion.

The men who have been blithely encouraging you cannot give you victory. They will deny their responsibility and cast the burden of war onto others. Do not slaughter the Earth's population nor slay your sons and brothers. The army which has Krishna and Arjuna in it is invincible. If you reject what Krishna and Bhishma have said, you will have cause to repent. Arjuna is even greater than Bhishma describes, and as for Devaki's son Krishna, not the gods can withstand him.

Bharatarishabha, there is no use in continuing to tell you what is good for you. Everything that needed to be said has been said. Now do as you wish; I have nothing further to add.'

After Drona has spoken, Vidura looks at Duryodhana and says, 'Duryodhana, I have no sympathy for you. I do grieve, however, for your elderly parents Gandhari and Dhritarashtra. With an unprincipled protector like you, whom they will soon lose, they will be left to wander the Earth like beggars and, deprived of their friends and counsellors, as well, they will be like a pair of birds whose wings have been shorn.

Having a sinful son, who will cause the extermination of the human race as we know it, they will sorrowfully roam the Earth, living on alms.'

Now the king turns to Duryodhana, who sits among his brothers and all the other kings. Dhritarashtra says, 'Listen, Duryodhana, to what Krishna Mahatman advises. Do as he says, for his words are eternal, auspicious and will lead to your salvation. With the help of blemishless Krishna we, of all the kings, are sure to achieve our most cherished goals.

Join Krishna and reconcile your differences with Yudhishtira; give this the same importance you would a mahayagna, for the weal of all the Bharatas, the Pandavas and Kauravas as one. With Krishna's help, bind yourself closely with the Pandavas, in love. This is the time to make peace; do not let the opportunity pass.

If you choose to disregard Krishna, who wants your welfare as much as that of the sons of Pandu, and who urges you to make peace for your own good, you can never win the war that will be and ruin will overtake us all.'"

Vaisampayana said, "Dhritarashtra's impassioned words prompt Bhishma and Drona, who sympathise with the old king, to speak to the recalcitrant Duryodhana.

They say, 'While the two Krishnas are not yet clad in their armour; while the Gandiva is still quiet; while Dhaumya has not yet begun to burn his enemies in the fire that he will light and feed for the war; and while that mighty archer Yudhishtira, who wears modesty like a garment, has not yet begun to look on your army with anger, let all hostilities cease.

While Bhimasena has not yet positioned himself in the midst of his troops, let enmity end. While Bhima has not yet entered the battlefield with his mace in hand and begun to smash down his enemies, make peace with the Pandavas. Before Bhima with his deadly gada makes the heads of elephant-warriors roll on the field like ripe palmyra-fruit, make peace. While Nakula and Sahadeva, Dhrishtadyumna of Prishata's vamsa, Virata, Sikhandin and Sisupala's son, all seasoned warriors versed in the astra shastra, have not yet donned their armour or penetrated your army, like crocodiles cutting through helpless waters, and showered you with fusillades of burning arrows, put a stop to this insane enmity.

As yet, fierce-winged barbs do not fall upon the vulnerable bodies of the assembled kings; as yet, iron shafts, shot by mighty bowmen who unerringly find any target at whatever distance, do not pierce the breasts of your warriors, who sit here smeared with sandalwood and other fragrant pastes and adorned with golden necklaces and jewelled ornaments. Let hostilities end before they do.

Let that elephant among kings, Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, receive you with an embrace while you salute him with your head bowed down. Bharatarishabha, let that king, renowned for the munificence of his sacrificial gifts, place his right hand marked with the signs of banner and hook on your shoulder. Let him set his gem-adorned and red-palmed hands on your back when you are seated before him.

Let Mahabaho Vrikodara, his shoulders as broad as the sala tree, embrace you with goodwill for the sake of peace. When Arjuna and the twins greet you with respect, sniff their heads in affection and speak lovingly to them.

Let all these kings who have gathered here shed tears of joy on seeing you united with your heroic cousins. Let the news of this happy union be proclaimed in their cities. Rule the Earth with brotherly affection in your heart and let her forever be freed from the fever of envy and anger.'"

Vaisampayana said, “In the Kuru sabha, Duryodhana is not pleased to hear this, and he says to Krishna, ‘O Kesava, it is indeed just that you speak as you have after reflecting on all the circumstances. Yet you speak harshly and, without reason, find fault only with me, whilst always speaking kindly to the Pandavas. Have you weighed the strength and weaknesses of both sides before censuring me?

You, Vidura, the King, the Acharya and the Pitamaha all reproach only me and none other. I do not find the least fault in myself, yet all of you, including my own father, despise me. Parantapa, even after reflection I cannot find any shortcoming in me, grave or insignificant.

At the game of dice, which the Pandavas happily accepted, Sakuni defeated them and won their kingdom. How can I be blamed for that? On the other hand, I commanded that the wealth I won from the Pandavas be returned to them. It cannot be any fault of mine that the invincible Pandavas lost again at dice and had to go into exile in the forest. What fault do they lay at my door and make me their enemy?

Krishna, why do the weakened Pandavas so confidently choose to have war with us, as if they were as strong as they were once? What have we done to them? For what injury do the sons of Pandu, as well as the Srinjayas, seek to slaughter the sons of Dhritarashtra? Neither their fierce deeds nor their intimidating words will deprive us of our good sense and make us bow in fear, to them or even to Indra.

I do not see any Kshatriya who can conquer us in battle. Let alone the Pandavas, the Devas themselves cannot vanquish Bhishma, Kripa, Drona and Karna. If, Madhava, we die while keeping our Kshatriya dharma in battle, we will still go to Swarga.

Our highest duty as Kshatriyas is that we lay ourselves down on the field of battle on a bed not of down but arrows. If we do this without bowing to our enemies, that sharp bed will not injure us. Is there a Kshatriya who lives by his dharma, who would bow to an enemy out of fear and the wish to save his own life? Warriors who seek their own good honour what Rishi Matanga said: a Kshatriya should always keep himself erect and never bow down, for effort is manliness; he should rather break than bend.

A Kshatriya like me should only bow to Brahmanas, out of piety, and not to anyone else; and with all others, I must conduct myself as Matanga said. This is Kshatriya dharma, and I have always been true to it.

The portion of the kingdom that my father gave the Pandavas can never be theirs again, not as long as I live. As long as Dhritarashtra lives, both we and they must put away our weapons and live under his command as his dependents. The kingdom was given away from ignorance and fear when I was a callow youth and a dependent. It will never be given away again, and the Pandavas will never have it.

As long as I live, I shall not give the Pandavas even as much of our land as may be covered by the point of a needle!'"

Vaisampayana said, "Krishna is thoughtful for a moment and then, his eyes reddening ominously, he addresses Duryodhana in the presence of all who have come to the Kuru sabha.

Krishna says, 'You wish for the bed of heroes, and you shall have it, and your counsellors as well. For a great slaughter will soon happen. Does your small intelligence truly make you believe you have not committed any sin against the Pandavas? Let the kings who are assembled here be your judges.

Piqued by the prosperity that the noble sons of Pandu enjoyed, you and Subala's son conspired to arrange the game of dice. Why would those virtuous, honest and noble cousins of yours otherwise play such a vile game with the deceitful Sakuni? Gambling robs even the best of their intellect; as for the evil, it fetches disputes and other problems. It was you who, with your evil confederates, planned that disaster in the form of a game of dice, without consulting any men of dharma.

Who else could shame his brother's wife in the way that you shamed Draupadi by dragging her into the sabha and speaking as coarsely to her as you did? She is of noble birth and of pure conduct, and dearer to Pandu's sons than their lives; yet you treated Panchali despicably.

All the Kauravas know what Dusasana said that day in the sabha to Kunti's sons when they were about to set out for the forest. Who could behave so disgracefully towards honourable kinsmen, who are always virtuous, untouched by greed and cleave to dharma? Karna, Dusasana, and you, too, used words that only the most cruel and contemptible men use.

You took great pains, albeit without success, to immolate the Pandavas and their mother at Varanavata, when the princes were just youths. They escaped and were forced to hide in the home of a Brahmana in the town of Ekachakra. You tried again to kill them with poison, with snakes and by strangling; indeed you used every means to have the Pandavas killed, but none of your plans succeeded. When you have always behaved so malignantly towards the noble sons of Pandu, how can you say you have not offended them?

O sinful one, you are not willing to give them their rightful share of the kingdom, although they beg you for it. But you will be forced to give it to them when you are vanquished in battle and forcibly stripped of your prosperity. Having wronged the Pandavas so cruelly and so grievously, you now want to present yourself in a different light.

Repeatedly, your parents, Bhishma, Drona and Vidura tried to persuade you to make peace, but you did not. Peace would be advantageous to both you and Yudhishtira, but you fail to see the good in it. What else can be said of you than that you are ignorant? Going against the advice of your well-wishers, your true friends, can never bring you felicity. What you are about to do is fraught with disgrace, sin and danger, and will fetch a doom you cannot begin to imagine.'

Now Dusasana speaks to Duryodhana. In the Kuru sabha he says, 'My brother, if you do not willingly make peace with the Pandavas, the Kauravas will bind and surrender you to Kunti's son; Bhishma, Drona and your own father will hand Karna, you and me to the Pandavas.'

His heavy breath hissing like a great snake's, Duryodhana rises in rage. He ignores Vidura, Dhritarashtra, Bahlika, Kripa, Somadatta, Bhishma, Drona and Krishna, indeed, all those present, and stalks out of the sabha, followed by his brother, his counsellors and all the other kings loyal to him.

Bhishma says, 'The enemies of the man who abandons dharma and artha to follow his greed and anger rejoice when he falls into distress. This evil son of Dhritarashtra, this foolish Duryodhana who knows nothing of dharma, who is undeservingly vain of his sovereignty, obeys only the dictates of wrath and avarice. Alas Krishna, I see that the end of all these Kshatriyas has come, all these deluded kings who follow Duryodhana.'

Lotus-eyed Krishna says to those that remain, chief among them Bhishma and Drona, 'This is the great sin that all the Kuru elders are guilty of: that they do not stop this evil king from enjoying sovereignty. The time has come to stop him, for that may still do some good. Listen to me, sinless ones. What I say will benefit you.

During the lifetime of the old Bhoja king, his son, who was evil and a slave to his passions, usurped his father's throne and was eventually killed. It was I who killed Ugrasena's son Kansa, whom his friends and relatives abandoned, in a great battle for the weal of the world. My kinsmen and I then paid homage to Ugrasena, son of Ahuka, and re-installed him on the Bhoja throne. All the Yadavas, Andhakas and Vrishnis found prosperity and peace by abandoning a single evil one: Kansa.

Rajan, when the Devas and Asuras were arrayed for battle with their weapons raised and ready to strike, Paramesthin, the lord of all creatures, said something which is pertinent to the situation in which we now find ourselves.

When the peoples of the worlds were divided into two sides and were about to be slaughtered, the divine Creator and Protector of the universe said, "The Asuras, Daityas and Danavas will be vanquished, and the Adityas, Vasus, Rudras and other Swargavasis will be victorious. The Devas, Asuras, Manavas, Gandharvas, Nagas and Rakshasas will massacre one another in this war."

With this in mind, Paramesthin commanded Dharma, saying, "Tie up the Daityas and Danavas securely and hand them over to Varuna," which Dharma accordingly did. Varuna bound them again, fastening his knots over Dharma's and even now keeps them in the depths of his watery kingdom, guarding them carefully.

Even so, secure Duryodhana, Karna, Sakuni and Dusasana and give them up to the Pandavas. For the sake of a family, an individual may be sacrificed; for a village a family may be sacrificed; for a province a village may be sacrificed; and for the sake of one's soul, the very Earth may be sacrificed.

Rajan, restrain Duryodhana and make peace with the Pandavas. Do not be the instrument by which the entire race of Kshatriyas is annihilated.'" Vaisampayana said, "Dhritarashtra turns to Vidura, who knows all aspects of dharma.

He says, 'Go to the wise, far-seeing Gandhari and bring her here. Together with her, I will plead with my black-hearted son. If she can pacify him, we may yet be able to do as Krishna says. By speaking for peace, she might bring my greedy, foolish son, influenced by his evil friends, back to the path of dharma. If she can avert the calamity that Duryodhana is about to cause, we might be able to preserve peace and enjoy happiness for ever.'

Vidura brings Gandhari into the sabha, and Dhritarashtra says to her, 'My queen, with utter disregard for my commands, and greedy for power, your son is about to sacrifice the kingdom and his very life. Like some rough peasant, showing contempt for his superiors and the advice of his well-wishers, he walked out of our court with his sinful friends.'

Gandhari says, 'Have that sinful son of mine fetched here. The man who has a coarse soul and sacrifices dharma and artha does not deserve to rule a kingdom. Arrogant, envious and greedy, obtained a kingdom by the vilest means. Indeed, Dhritarashtra, you who are so fond of your son, are to blame for this, for, knowing his evil heart, you did as he wanted. Lust and wrath have seized this son of yours and he is a slave to delusion. You cannot force him to change his ways, Rajan; it is too late for that. Now you reap the fruit of having given charge of the Kuru kingdom to an ignorant, selfish and evil prince, and one with unscrupulous advisors.

Are you not affected by the imminence of the war that will be fought between such close relatives? Your enemies will rejoice at your discord with the Pandavas, who are as your own sons. What sane man would use force to overcome a calamity that can be resolved by conciliation and generosity?'

At Dhritarashtra and Gandhari's command, Vidura brings Duryodhana into the sabha. His tread is heavy, his angry breath hisses snake-like and his eyes glitter coppery as he comes back into the sabha to hear what his mother has to say. Gandhari rebukes him and speaks to him in an attempt to make him see reason and to secure peace.'

Gandhari says, 'Duryodhana, my son, listen to what I say; it is for your good and that of your followers as well. What I say is easy for you to do, and it will bring you prosperity and happiness. Duryodhana, do as your well-wishers tell you, those Bharatottamas: your father, Bhishma, Drona, Kripa and Vidura. If you make peace, you will pay homage to Bhishma, to your father, to me and to all the others who love you with Drona at their head.

Nobody succeeds in acquiring, retaining or enjoying a kingdom by his own effort alone. The man who does not have his passions under control can never enjoy a throne for any length of time. Only the restrained man, one endowed with great intelligence, can rule a kingdom. Unbridled lust and wrath make a man lose his possessions and enjoyments. It is after first conquering these enemies within himself that a king brings the Earth under his subjection.

Sovereignty over men is a great thing. Evil men may want to win a kingdom, but they cannot rule it when they do acquire it. He who desires to acquire an empire must firmly tether his senses to dharma and artha, for, if the senses are restrained, intelligence increases, like a fuel-fed fire. If uncontrolled, his senses can even kill him, like unbroken, wild horses can kill an unskilled rider.

The man who tries to win over his counsellors without first conquering himself, and who tries to conquer his enemies without subduing his counsellors, is soon vanquished and ruined. He who masters himself first, taking himself for his worst enemy, will later succeed in conquering his confederates and outside enemies. Prosperity worships the man who commands his senses and his advisors, who metes out punishment to transgressors, who acts after deliberation and who is calm and wise.

Lust and wrath, which live within a man, are like two small fish caught in the net of wisdom and restrained. These two, when they manage to escape and grow, make the gods shut the doors of heaven against a man who has shed his worldly desires and who is, otherwise, qualified to enter. The king who understands how to conquer lust, wrath, greed, boastfulness and pride can indeed rule the whole world.

The king who wants to acquire artha and dharma, and who wants to vanquish his enemies, should always restrain his passions. The man who, influenced by lust or anger, behaves deceitfully towards his kinsmen or others can never win true allies. By uniting with the heroic sons of Pandu, who are all blessed with great wisdom, you can happily enjoy the Earth, my son. What Santanu's son Bhishma and Maharatha Drona tell you is true—Krishna and Arjuna are invincible. So, seek the protection of this Mahabaho, to whom any exertion is as nothing, for if Krishna decides to be gracious, both sides will be happy.

The man who does not obey wise and learned friends, who want his prosperity, will gladden only his enemies. My son, there is no good in battle, no dharma, no artha. How then can it bring felicity? Besides, child, victory is far from certain. Do not set your heart on war. Bhishma, your father and Bahlika gave the Pandavas their share of the kingdom from fear. Parantapa, never even think of going to war against Pandu's sons. The peaceful state of your sovereignty over the Earth is the result of their rule, during which they removed all obstacles to harmony.

Give the Pandavas what is only their due. If you wish to enjoy, with your friends and advisors, your half of the empire, give them their share. Half the Earth is enough to support you and yours. By doing as your well-wishers say, you will win great fame, Bhaarata. A war with the sons of Pandu will result only in the loss of everything you now have, for they are all blessed with prosperity; they have their souls under control; they are vastly intelligent and they have conquered their passions. Dispel the anger of your elders and rule your kingdom in a manner that becomes you: by giving the Pandavas back their rightful share.

My son, for thirteen years you have made the Pandavas suffer; it is enough. Douse the fire that your lust and anger have fed. Neither you who covet their wealth, nor the always angry Sutaputra nor your brother Dusasana is a match for them. The fury of Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Karna, Bhimasena, Dhananjaya and Dhrishtadyumna can obliterate the Earth's very population. Do not let your anger become the cause of the end of the Kurus. Do not let the world be destroyed for your stubbornness.

Your limited intellect deludes you into thinking that Bhishma, Drona, Kripa and all the rest will fight whole-heartedly for you. That will never happen, for these men, who have Atmagyana, are just as fond of the Pandavas as they are of you. Even if they are willing to give up their lives in gratitude for the care that Dhritarashtra has given them, they could never be angry with Yudhishtira.

Men never acquire true wealth through greed. Give up your avarice and desist, my son, O Bharatarishabha.'" Vaisampayana said, "Duryodhana ignores his mother's words and, again, angrily walks away to be with his evil friends. Now the prince conspires with Sakuni, the crafty player of dice, and, together, he, Karna, Sakuni and Dusasana alight on a foul plan.

They decide, 'Krishna is always quick to act and, with Dhritarashtra and Santanu's help, he will want to seize us. So we must take him captive first, even as Indra did Bala. When the Pandavas hear of his being our prisoner they will lose heart and become hapless, like snakes without fangs. Mahabaho Krishna is their protector and their refuge. If we imprison this granter of wishes, this bull of all the Sattvatas, the Pandavas and the Somakas will despair and become impotent to fight.

We will ignore Dhritarashtra and take Krishna captive, even here in Hastinapura, and then go to war against the enemy.'

The intuitive Satyaki, who can read men's intentions by what he sees around him, soon realises what Duryodhana is plotting. He comes out of the sabha with Kritavarman.

Satyaki says to Kritavarman, 'Array our troops now! Wait with your armed men at the entrance to the sabha, while I speak to Krishna.'

He walks back into the sabha, like a lion into a mountain cave, and informs first Krishna, then Dhritarashtra and Vidura of the conspiracy.

Then he laughs, 'What these evil men have plotted violates dharma, artha and kama. Besides, they will never be able to achieve what they plan. Overwhelmed by their passions and yielding to their wrath and greed, these sinners want to commit the most heinous sin. These despicable men, who want to seize lotus-eyed Krishna, are like children who want to hold a blazing fire in their hands.'

Vidura says to Dhritarashtra in the Kuru sabha, 'O Rajan, the hour of all your sons' deaths is at hand for what they are plotting, however incapable they might be to actually accomplish this unspeakable plan. Alas, they are united in their wish to vanquish Indra's younger brother and make him their prisoner. When they encounter this Purushavyaghra they will all perish like insects in a fire. Even if they fight as one, if Krishna wants he can send all of them to Yama, like an angry lion dispatching a herd of deer.

However, he will not do anything so sinful. This best of men, of everlasting glory, will never leave the path of dharma.'

Krishna looks at Dhritarashtra, who sits in the midst of so many good men, all heedful of sage counsel, and he says to the Kuru king, 'Rajan, if these men of anger want to use violence against me, allow them to. As for me, easy though it may be for me to kill all of them, I will not commit any sin. Because of their greed for what belongs to the Pandavas, your sons will lose even what is rightfully theirs. And if they try to take me their prisoner, Yudhishtira will accomplish his purpose without fighting a war, for I will seize them and all their followers and make them over to the Pandavas. I tell you, it will not be difficult for me.

However, Bhaarata, I will not be driven by anger or evil, nor commit this offence in your presence. Let Duryodhana do as he likes; I give him and all your sons my leave to do as they plan.'

Dhritarashtra says to Vidura, 'Bring sinful Duryodhana, with his friends, counsellors, brothers and followers into my presence. I will make one last attempt to set him on the right path.'

Again, Vidura fetches the reluctant Duryodhana into the sabha with his brothers and the kings who follow him. Dhritarashtra says to Duryodhana, who stands haughty and defiant, surrounded by Karna, Dusasana and all those other kings, 'O, you wretch of accumulated sins, how do you even dream of doing what you and these sinful allies of yours have plotted? O, you disgrace to your race, only you could think of committing this impossible crime. You want to make the invincible and inexorable lotus-leaf-eyed Krishna you prisoner! Like a child wanting the Moon, you want to do what even all the Devas led by Indra cannot achieve.

Do you not understand that no one can withstand Krishna in battle, not the Devas, Gandharvas, Asuras, Uragas or Manavas? As impossible as seizing the wind, as reaching for the Moon with one's hand or as supporting the Earth on one's head is taking Krishna by force.'

Vidura looks at Duryodhana and says to Dhritarashtra's malignant son, 'Duryodhana, listen to what I have to say. At the gates of Saubha, the great Vanara Dwividha, who fought beside Rama at the gates of Lanka in the Treta yuga, covered Krishna with a thunderous shower of rocks, wanting to capture him. He did not succeed. And you want to apprehend Krishna by force?

When Sauri went to Pragjyotisha, Narakasura with all the Danavas could not overcome him. And you want to seize him by force? He slew Naraka, rescued a thousand women from his city and married them all, by law.

In the city of Nirmochana, six thousand awesome Asuras could not capture him with their sorcerous nooses. And you think you can take him by force? When he was a child he slew Putana and two other Asuras who took the shape of birds. He held up Govardhana on his little finger to protect the herd from Indra's deluge. He slew Arishta, Dhenuka, the powerful Chanura, Aswaraja and the evil Kansa. He vanquished Jarasandha eighteen times in battle, and killed Vakra and Sisupala, Bana and countless other kings.

His strength is limitless, immeasurable. He vanquished Varuna and Agni, and when he brought the Parijata tree down from Devaloka, he routed Lord Indra himself, along with all the gods. While floating on the Ekarnava, the single infinite ocean, he slew Madhu and Kaitabha; and in another birth he killed Hayagriva. He is the Creator of everything but is himself uncreated. He is the origin of all power. Whatever he wishes, he accomplishes without effort.

Don't you know that sinless Krishna is permanent and undecaying? Like an angry cosmic snake, he is the never ending source of energy. By trying to use violence against Krishna, you and all your followers will perish, like insects that fall into a great fire.'"

Vaisampayana said, "When Vidura has spoken passionately, Krishna says mildly to Duryodhana, 'You are under the delusion that I am alone, which is why you think of overpowering me and taking me captive. But look, foolish prince, here are all the Pandavas and all the Vrishnis and Andhakas. Here are all the Adityas, the Rudras and the Vasus, with all the great Rishis.' And throwing back his beautiful head, he laughs ringingly.

As the divine one laughs, from his body emerge myriad gods, each flashing like brilliant lightning and no bigger than a man's thumb. On his brow Brahma appears, on his breast Rudra, on his arms the Lokapalas, and from his mouth issue Agni, the Adityas, the Sadhyas, the Vasus, the Aswins, the Marutas, Indra, the Viswadevas and hosts of Yakshas, Gandharvas and Rakshasas, all in miniature forms.

From his two arms Balarama and Arjuna appear. Arjuna stands on his right with his bow in hand, and Baladeva on his left armed with the plough. Behind him are Bhima, Yudhishtira and the two sons of Madri, and before him are all the Andhakas and the Vrishnis with Pradyumna and other chieftains, with mighty weapons raised. In his countless other arms, now in view, flash the conch, the discus, the mace, the bow called Saranga, the plough, the javelin, the Nandaka and every other weapon, all shining with lustre and ready to strike. From his eyes, nose, ears and every part of his body burst forth dazzling sparks of fire and smoke; and from his pores flames spring, like the rays of the Sun.

Beholding the magnificence of this form of Krishna, all the kings shut their eyes in fearful awe, except Drona, Bhishma, the wise Vidura, the blessed Sanjaya and the saintly Rishis imbued with their profound tapasya, for the Lord has revealed this divine form to them before. While this wondrous vision is manifested in the Kuru sabha celestial drums beat in the sky, flowers rain down upon Krishna, the Earth trembles and the oceans churn turbulently. And, O Bharatarishabha, all living things on Earth are filled with uncanny wonder.

Krishna withdraws his divine and auspicious form and, taking the Rishis' leave, and his arms linked with Satyaki's and Kritavarman's, he leaves the Kuru sabha. An uproar breaks out, during which the Rishis, Narada and others, vanish from sight to return to their sacred abodes. And this, too, is marvellous to see.
